"What do you intend to prove with your educational experiment?" is a question very frequently asked. In reply to this I will say that there are many important principles which I desire to prove as far as an individual case can furnish proof of them. I desire to show that a child, at a very young age, can be a good reader and an erudite scholar; that freedom and kindness produce far better educational results than coercion and cruelty; that interest, and not force, should be made the incentive for learning; that all learning should be in the form of play; that no injury can result to a child, no matter how much it learns, so long as it is left completely free; that a comparatively young child can readily acquire a liberal knowledge of such important sciences as physiology, economics, psychology, etc.; that intellectuality and character depend almost entirely on post-natal education, and only very little, if any, on hereditary, or pre-natal influences, and that every healthy child which is properly educated under the system of interest, kindness and freedom will have an extensive vocabulary and a wonderful memory, as well as many other unusual accomplishments with which we now scarcely ever meet. The writer is confident that with the proper system of education, children, before they arrive at the age of eight, will have a larger store of useful knowledge than is now possessed by the average graduate, and they will acquire all this practically without any strain or effort. The truth of this statement may, we think, be easily demonstrated in a practical way by living examples. So far, Viola's rate of education is much in advance of the one mentioned above.—The Strand.

This system of education presented in the above, opens up wonderful possibilities. Through its influence the rising generation can be spiritualized, made better in every respect, and war and crime eventually be abolished. The thoughts presented are of inestimable value to Spiritualists generally, and should be filed away for future reference.

CHRISTIANITY:

The Dispensation of Love.

I wish to protest an article in The Progressive Thinker, No. 562, entitled "Love or Wisdom." The writer styles Christianity the Dispensation of Love, and I thank him for this most gracious distinction by him conferred upon the era of Jesus of Nazareth. Unwittingly, perhaps, but truly indeed, he has named it aright. It is not the first time that a violent critic of Christianity has tried to kill only to make alive. Balaam still tries to curse Israel and ends with a blessing. "'Twas ever thus." So we accept Dispensation of Love.

He objects to what he calls "blind love." He adds: "It is like the steam in the boiler which, if properly directed, will run the engine * * but if left to itself will produce wide-spread disaster." Let me say that I, too, object to "blind love." Mere gush, just a superabundance of sentimental feeling, is perfectly useless. No Christian of average intelligence holds otherwise. Our brother concedes the only possible point at issue when he likens love to steam in the boiler, needing control only to be useful. Exactly. His illustration is perfect. I accept it delightedly in connection with the beautiful title he confers upon our era. Yes: we object to blind love, and we want the steam in the boiler properly controlled.

Why am I objecting, then? Simply because the brother affirms, or at least implies, that Christianity is a system of blind love. In fact he says that to teach or urge loving one another is "simply a repetition of what Christianity has been doing for nineteen centuries." I object to the assertion that Christianity cultivates blind love, or even fosters a weak sentimentalism. It does nothing of the kind. On the contrary it inculcates a hearty, robust, intelligent affection. It demands most emphatically a love which is diametrically opposed to all forms of hysteria, or merely goody-goody-ism. It holds up for consideration a love enlightened by knowledge, a love restrained by wisdom, and a love tempered and adjusted by both mercy and justice. It would seem unnecessary to refer to Scripture proof, but my experience has taught me that critics of Christianity are not usually well acquainted with the matter in hand. They are generally absolutely ignorant of the Scripture teaching, or at best have only a superficial knowledge of it. So I will direct the enquirer a little.

"And this I pray that your love may abound more and more in knowledge and judgment.

"That ye may approve things that are excellent: that ye may be sincere and without offense." Phil. 1:9, 10.

Here now is the love of Christianity. I have italicised the words which qualify love in the above quotation, that which controls and governs the "steam in the boiler." Will Prof. Loveland note them? "Knowledge" and "judgment" are to be used, Paul says, in exercising our love, and the happy result will be that we may "approve things that are excellent," and be "sincere" and "without offence." This is one of the favorite texts from which I have been preaching love in the pulpits of the Christian Church for twenty years past. Not blind love either, but the kind that is directed by judgment and knowledge into the approval of things that are excellent. So Christianity teaches. The brother well calls it the "Dispensation of Love."

He further says that "Humanity has always had plenty of love—has all that is needed at present." This remarkable statement might be answered by simply saying it is not true. And let all the people say amen! It may be true the world has enough of the cold, refined, passionless affair which the brother has placed on a pedestal; but of the love which discerns human need with sorrow, and thrills with kindness for the lonely, the lost, and the fallen, there is not enough. Only the most fatal blindness to the actual needs of the world can prompt the saying that we have love enough. Look upon the fallen of the cities, both men and women; gaze into prison cells; pass in review the haggard, pinched features of want, victims of greed and avarice.

What do they need? More love. "Love or Wisdom?" is the brother's title, and he concludes we need, not love but wisdom. I solemnly affirm that we have wisdom enough. We know better than to treat our fellow man as we often do—we know what to do, but do it not. Why? Because we do not love as we should.

"Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn."

Our brother says we have love enough, but need to get more wisdom. Almost exactly the opposite is true. It is simply a fact that we know better than we do—human wisdom can direct us at any time to something better. But human living will never catch up with wisdom's ways until love quickens our laggard footsteps. The Love Dispensation is what we need—love enough to do what we know is right.

I once heard the noted Geo. W. Bain say: "An educated brain above a bosom devoid of love is like an electric lamp shining over a grave full of dead men's dust." It is a striking figure but true. I can heartily concur in Prof. Loveland's eulogium of Wisdom, but forever also there must be love as well. There is a cold and frigid beauty amid the Polar ice-fields, but bloom and beauty combined exist eternally in the warm and sensuous tropics.

Paul said: "Though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, I am nothing."

Listen: "Love suffereth long, and is kind: love envieth not: love is not forward: doth not behave itself rudely, is not exacting, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil. Love rejoiceth not in iniquity, but delighteth in the truth. Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." I. Cor. 13. This is an epitome of the principles of the Love Dispensation.

Can anybody object? Yes: it is possible. In a certain contingency I once urged urged the Golden Rule upon a man. He said, "I reject the Golden Rule." Just a little astonished, I asked him why? He laughed a little uneasily, and then quite frankly replied: "Well, to be honest, the main reason I object to the Golden Rule is because it demands of me a better life than I am willing to live!"

And sincerely, my dear friend, no matter who you are, is not that the main-spring to all your various objections? You reject without logical reason and because of moral restrictions to which you are unwilling to submit.

Finally, our brother says "a good lover is a good hater." It is true. A good lover is one who entertains strong hatred. Both attributes are essential to moral completeness. A man all love and no hate would be as great a monstrosity as a man with but one eye, one ear and one nostril. Love and hate balance, coordinate to perfection. Hear Paul again: "Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness." Heb. 1:9.

Pre-eminently this is the correct thing. Love righteousness, hate iniquity; love sobriety, hate drunkenness: love truth, hate lying; love candor, hate hypocrisy; love generosity, hate avarice; love purity, hate lust. And so on. Moreover, the greater the love for righteousness the deeper the hatred of iniquity.

Right you are! Love and hatred go together, and a splendid team they make. If we hitch them to the chariot of the soul they will bear us on a more splendid journey than the voyage of Elijah in the mythical chariot of fire. They will draw our souls away from the dirt and slime of sin, out of darkness into the light.

Let no one suppose I am specially defending the Bible or Christianity—I am not. I mention these because they were alread introduced. The subject has greater amplitude than merely the Christian Scriptures. The Vedas might be quoted, and Confucius; Plato and Socrates: Seneca and Marcus Aurelius: Sappho and Hypatia: Homer and Horace: Milton and Shakespeare: A. J. Davis and the beloved Peebles. All the truly great writers have eulogized love, and discerned the surpassing greatness of the Love Dispensation.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Will C. W. Stewart please send his address to this office?

Dr. J. M. Peebles writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "I am just home from camp-meetings in Ohio, New York, Michigan, etc. I have been on the tramp four or five weeks, lecturing, lecturing, lecturing, and prescribing for the sick at the same time, the busiest man in the world. I leave here Thursday for the Minneapolis annual association of Spiritualists."

The Denver (Colo.) News says: "At Canon camp, in South Boulder canon, D. W. Hull will deliver several lectures on the 'Bible and Spiritualism.' His first three lectures will be an attempt to show that early Christianity was founded on intercourse with the spirit world. Mr. Hull is the editor of the Liberator of Norton, Kans., is is widely known as a lecturer."

D. A. Richardson, of Paulding, Ohio, writes: "The Progressive Spiritualist Association of Payne, O., held a grove meeting, September 2. It was a grand success. Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter were the chief attractions."

Prof. W. M. Lockwood is stopping temporarily at Petoskey, Mich., seeking relief from hay fever.

John Barry writes to the R. P. Journal: "I read an article in the Journal on crystal-gazing; how to hold the glass, and breathing into the water to magnetize it. In my family we practice it every day, and the visions never fail. I don't see them, but my wife and daughter and two little boys do. We commenced to practice it last winter, thanks to the Journal for suggesting it. My people simply fill the glass with water, put it on the table, and then look into it. My wife sometimes sees two or three visions at the same time. She can tell the past, present or future correctly. The little girl is not quite as good as the mother. She must be on a different plane. The elder of the boys is, good. A person can take him anywhere, get him a glass of water, and he will describe all that is in the ground there. He has saved me a good many days' hard work. The younger boy is also a good psychic. As for doing anything with the glass of water, I suppose that it makes no difference how it is done, so long as the person is able to see visions. My eldest boy went to the creek for a bucket of water, and as he did not come back for some time, I called him. When I asked him what detained him, he said that he was watching a lot of Chinamen fighting in the funniest town he ever saw. He said they were killing each other by the hundreds. We are the only Spiritualists in this part of Montana. What we lack here is enough psychics to form a circle; but we have to do it alone, and we do it fairly well."

Mrs. N. Ewan writes: "A Spiritual society has been organized on the South Side, to be known as the Independent Spiritual Society, and have elected the following officers: G. N. Kinkead, president; Mrs. Maggie Henry, vice-president; Nelson Coe, secretary; Mrs. N. Ewan, corresponding secretary; Geo. T. Hanson, treasurer. The society will meet each Sunday evening at 8 p. m., at 77 Thirty-first street (Auditorium) Hall. Good speakers and test mediums have been engaged."

The Peoria (Ill.) Transcript says: "A ghost has put in appearance in Lincoln. A man clad in white and ghastly raiments makes nightly visits to the Deffenbaugh home, but is not seen by anyone except Miss Grace, the sixteen-year-old daughter. He always appears in the dead of night, and although the girl sees and hears him distinctly she is powerless to speak. First he appeared to her about three weeks ago and traced a D on her arm. He told her not to mention his visit and he would come again in a month to see her. However, he appeared again the next night and removed a ring from her finger that she could not remove herself, and put a cross on a chair. The next day she told her family of the strange visitor, and nothing more was heard of him for a week, when he again very unceremoniously arrived at the house and replaced the ring on her finger and took of a substance to use to remove the D mark from her arm. He told her that he was going to put her to sleep some time for an indefinite period. He kept his word. On last Sunday night she retired as usual but on Monday morning she could not be aroused for breakfast. A physician was called but he was unable to do anything with her all day. She slept until 8 o'clock at night, when she woke up in her usual manner and asked for something to eat. She says he told her that the next time he put her to sleep it would be for a month or a year. Her father filed her ring from her finger so he could not again take it, as he has become almost a household guest now and is looked for at any time. Miss Deffenbaugh is a pretty, bright, winning and affectionate girl and has the sympathy of all the good people in Lacon."

D. J. Moran writes from Lincoln, Neb.: "I received the premium books all right. I was highly pleased with them. I would not part with one for the price of all unless I could replace the same. How you can give so much for so little is a mystery to me."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Geo. H. Brooks is now at his home, Wheaton, Ill., resting from his arduous labors at Lily Dale. He can be addressed at No. 114 President street. On his way home Mr. Brooks stopped at Clyde, Ohio, to visit friends there. He found A. B. French (well known among Spiritualists as one of the finest orators that ever graced a rostrum) full of business, but genial as ever. Mr. Brooks has proved a great favorite at Lily Dale as presiding officer.

The Herald, of Mexico City, Mexico, says: "Psychologists and physicians will have matter for study in the alleged cures produced by the exercise of faith among the members of the sect known as the Christian Alliance of the United States, which recently held a meeting at Old Orchard Beach, in the State of Maine. The leader of the Christian Alliance is the Rev. Dr. Simpson, a man of remarkable force of character and personal magnetism, who has been very successful in raising great sums of money for foreign missions. A man who can in a single day induce people to give him $70,000 for missions is no ordinary preacher. He was presiding during the first fortnight of the current month over the assembly of the Christian Alliance when many testimonials of the cure of disease by faith were offered. The Christian Alliance bases itself on the plain doctrines of Jesus; one of its tenets is that diseases are all curable, if the sufferer have perfect faith. The recent pilgrimages to Catholic shrines in the United States and Canada, where relics of St. Anne are kept, are so many instances of a continued belief in the efficacy of faith among the members of the most ancient communion of Christians. There is abundant Catholic authority in support of the faith cure continued from the time of Christ to this day. Thus modern Protestant sects and the Catholic Church meet on common ground in one particular. They uphold the New Testament doctrine of the power of faith to heal the sick."

Mrs. E. M. Wombold writes from Anderson, Ind.: "W. E. Hart, of Richmond, Ind., has been spending the past ten days with friends at Anderson, Ind., and holding seances, all of which were very satisfactory to skeptics and Spiritualists. His trumpet work is progressing very rapidly, and he is also able to give light seances for partial materialization. One spirit materialized, wrote a message on a slate and held it up above the cabinet to be recognized, and gave the slate to the lady to whom the writing was for, together with other tests. Mr. Hart sits on the outside of the cabinet, and is held by two other disinterested parties."

The Jamestown Evening Journal, in a communication from Lily Dale, says: "It is also hoped the Hon. A. B. Richmond amidst his declining years may honor Lily Dale with his majestic presence and enthusiastic interest another year. Mr. Richmond has been a co-worker for 12 years in this movement. A man of gigantic intellect, he has searched for the truth and leaves not a stone unturned. A shrewd lawyer of unusual ability and power, who recognizes the wheat and leaves the chaff to blow away. Lyman C. Howe, a veteran co-worker, though honored with streaks of gray hair, is active in the cause, and is much beloved. Mr. and Mrs. Hull are much thought of, and for their labor in the school and otherwise they are appreciated. Mr. Hull is one of the best Bible students who comes to the Dale, and is also a profound historian. Mrs. Hull is a co-worker in the woman suffrage movement in addition to her other interests."

The Indianapolis (Ind.) News has the following: "Muncie, Ind., August 29.—John Mercer's home was robbed while he was attending a Bryan demonstration in this city four years ago, and a quantity of jewelry and other plunder was carried away. Patrolman Beall spent much time on the case, finally discovering that the thief is now in prison in Illinois. Beall is a Spiritualist in religious belief, and recently he consulted a medium, and there was a slate-writing seance, during which he found on the slate: 'Go look under a large rock near the intersection of the first road west of the Mercer farm; you can't miss the rock.' Beall found the plunder as described. He is confident that the message from the spirit land alone aided him."

T. Packard writes: "When Volume 3 arrives, then I shall have your full library of the seven premium books. I have read them all with much interest, and I trust with profit also. Volumes 1 and 2 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World were very fascinating and intensely interesting, opening out as they do, something of the mystery that attends death. Any person reading carefully these books need have no fear of the future."

H. Brady writes from Thorpe, Iowa, that the country and the small towns are in a sad blight, so far as Spiritualism is concerned, and need assistance. He says: "We would hail with great enthusiasm a good speaker and test medium."

Fred P. Evans writes: "After a very busy season in New York I have decided to go to my California ranch for a much needed vacation for recuperation. I will return in about four or six weeks. During my absence, however, the Occult Book Store will be open for the sale of literature."

Mrs. Squires writes: "I will begin meeting September 16, afternoon and evenings, in Van Buren Opera House, corner Madison street and California avenue. A cordial invitation to all. Come and help to make a winter success."

The Chicago Journal says: "Joseph Smith, who lives in a large tenement in Great Barrington, Mass., says his flat is haunted. He reports that his furniture has been scattered about the room and the stove moved, while a general disturbance is continually going on. What does it he is not able to say, as a careful watch has been kept in every room by himself and several of his friends, but without seeing any kind of 'things.' Smith and his boarders became so alarmed one night that nearly all spent the night out of doors. Besides moving the furniture the spook does a deal of sweeping, and one night in throwing a dustpan of refuse out of the window part of it fell in a bed where two women were asleep. Smith is employed in a dye-house and is said to be sober."

We keep a standing notice on this page that every item sent here for publication must contain the full name and address of the writer, otherwise it will not appear. That accounts for "your" item not appearing this week.

G. W. Kates will please send his present post-office address to this office.

It is a grave question whether religious freedom should extend to these demented beings. A special to the New York World, from Bridgeville, Del., says: "Henry Dorsey, colored, of Baltimore, a member of the Sanctified Band, died here Thursday night last in a grove, surrounded by members of the band chanting weird melodies and performing incantations. The Sanctified Band was organized here several years ago. During that time it has been driven from State to State. It returned here a short time ago, and meetings have been held in deserted buildings and in the woods. A few days ago Dorsey was taken sick. As it is the custom of the band to cure the sick by incantations, no physician was called in. Members of the band, however, gathered nightly at Dorsey's house, and after removing him to a grove near by would proceed to go through a series of incantations. The leader, clad in a fantastic costume, would kill a chicken and smear the sick man's body with the blood. Forming a circle around the couch, the band would march around it, singing and praying at intervals. Despite these nightly meetings and curious ceremonies, the sick man grew rapidly worse. Finally it was decided that the band must spend an entire day in fasting, and Thursday was the day chosen. In the evening the band was out in full force. While they were prancing around Dorsey he expired. The verdict returned at the coroner's inquest held on Friday was 'Death from natural causes.'"

A blind organ grinder, who is well known to the people in the neighborhood of Tompkins square, said the other day that he preferred that locality because he found its population very appreciative, says the New York Commercial Advertiser. "How do they show it? By the number of coins they put in your can?" was asked. "No, sir," answered the blind man gravely. "I make a deal more in other districts. They are all poor people around there, and often I go away without getting anything. But I can feel their appreciation. Although blind, I always know how big a crowd my playing attracts, and what effect it has on them. How do I feel it? I could not describe it to you if I would. There are many things that we blind folks feel without being able to explain how. Otherwise our lives would not be worth living. Anyhow, I know when my tune makes people stop and feel moved. I know when I send a thrill through a group of women and children, and it makes me happy."

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican says: "The New England Spiritualist Camp-meeting Association of Lake Pleasant, has brought suit in the district court to collect from Hattie Reed Cornick the amount of the 3 per cent assessment on eight building lots at that resort. Each of the deeds of building lots issued by the association contains a provision that a 3 per cent tax will be paid on the lots when assessed by the trustees of the association. There has been some question among those holding property as to the exact legal position in which the owners of the property stand in relation to the assessment, and the outcome of the case will be watched with interest. Mrs. Cornick in her answer states that no legal assessment was made, and denies the authority of the association to make the assessment."

R. W. Simpson writes from Toronto, Canada: "This season at Lily Dale camp ground, the Canadians who were there thought well to establish 'The Canadian Spiritualist Association, for the Dominion of Canada.' Dr. Austin, of Toronto, was elected president; R. W. Simpson, Seaforth, Ont., secretary; W. S. Shaw, Branbridge, Ont., first vice-president, and F. C. Willson, Toronto, second vice-president. The membership fee is $1 yearly, including 'The Sermon,' a monthly magazine edited by Dr. Austin. Members of the Association and others, by sending names and addresses of liberal-minded persons, will have Spiritualistic literature forwarded to them. Next summer at Lily Dale there will be 'Canadian Day,' and Dr. Austin will be the speaker for the occasion."

The Galveston (Tex.) News says: "Della Cooper, the colored girl of Sherman, who has strange hallucinations so that she becomes by turns various sorts of birds and animals, and while in such moods emits cries similar to those of the respective birds and animals, is no better to-day, having had several attacks. Her case puzzles all who investigate it. Prof. Lampkin, whose opinion was quoted in the News this morning, is still of the opinion that she is under hypnotic influence brought about crudely or maliciously. Students of occult research suggest that she is under a telepathic influence. The child became more talkative than usual to-day and said that a colored woman at McKinney had mixed a mashed up snake in some lemonade and 'conjured' her with it. She has a peculiar thumping in her side and her attendants verily believe she has swallowed a snake. A 'hoodoo' doctor is on his way from an interior village to operate on her."

Edgar F. Bundy writes from Louisville, Ky.: "I wish to speak of a friend, Mrs. Mann, and of the manifestations that take place in her presence. I have a private seance with her every Monday evening. At one of them my guides brought me a carnation pink. They said they brought it from a greenhouse that was three or four squares distant. At each seance my guide, Onetta, sings some beautiful spiritual songs. Some of my other guides generally give me a lecture upon some subject which I enjoy and appreciate."

Maggie Waite writes: "The Progressive Friends' Association held its annual meeting at North Collins, August 31, September 1 and 2. Mrs. Whitlock, of Providence, R. I., was the speaker and lectured at each session, I serving as test medium for Sept. 1 and 2. President Frank Walker presided at all meetings. My services have been secured for the next annual meeting, September, 1901."

F. Silberg, of 845 Blue Island avenue, Chicago, writes: "I would be pleased to make the acquaintance of a few ladies and gentlemen having a desire to form a home circle for development."

Harry J. Moore's address is 2979 Wabash avenue (instead of Walnut street), where he can be addressed. He says Mr. Hilles follows his lectures with psychometric readings and spirit messages.

On Sunday evening, September 2, the opening services for the new year of the Students of Nature, at 1565 Milwaukee avenue, Chicago, were partly in the nature of a celebration of the birthday of their pastor, Mrs. Summers, and were enjoyed by as large a congregation as the hall would hold. Decorations by palms, ferns and flowers were profuse, and an exceedingly large basket of cut flowers, besides other tokens of esteem, were presented to Mrs. Summers by her personal friends. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Jacobson and Messrs. Cole and Strong.

Ervin A. Rice writes: "The Church of the Soul will resume regular Sunday meetings in Handel Hall, No. 40 Randolph street, at 11 a. m., Sunday, September 16. The pastor, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, will officiate as usual, and the subject of the discourse for the opening Sunday will be 'From Mountain, Forest, Lake and Vale.' The church has taken the large auditorium at Handel Hall, and we have free seats for all."

A. A. Averill, secretary, writes: "The Lynn (Mass.) Spiritualists' Association held its regular annual meeting on Sept. 4, and elected the following officers to serve the ensuing year. President, Dr. Alex Caird, formerly of Chicago; vice-president, Amanda Robinson; secretary, A. A. Averill; treasurer, E. P. Averill; directors, E. F. Metzger, C. J. Butler and Effie I. Webster. The society has some of the very best talent engaged that can be secured, opening the season on October 7, with Mrs. May S. Pepper as medium, whose name on the bills always insures a large audience. She will be followed by Mrs. Carrie Twing, C. Fannie Allyn, Effie I. Webster, Lizzie Harlow, and other good speakers and mediums."

Mrs. Nora E. Hill, of 750 W. Lake street, has finished her vacation, and will now resume her usual business, also holding her circles on Tuesday and Friday nights at her residence, 750 W. Lake street, Chicago. She is also open for engagements for lecturing.

Dr. and Mrs. Briggs, who are now stopping at the Island Lake camp grounds will soon go to Cincinnati. During the coming winter they will locate in Detroit, Mich.

C. E. Dent writes: "The spirit still moves at Vicksburg, Mich. As our successful camp-meeting closed August 26, we do not mean to let the cause die out here. Sunday, September 2, Brother Frank T. Ripley gave us two good lectures, and followed them with messages. The audience was well pleased, and all join with me, hoping we can soon have him with us again. We have engaged our hall for the next year and expect to hold meetings every Sunday."

G. F. Perkins, of 884 W. Madison street, Chicago, writes that those people coming from the North Side can utilize Robey street, Paulina street, Western avenue, and Madison street cars; also the elevated cars, to attend his meetings Tuesday, Friday and Sunday evenings.

Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt, 498 W. Madison street, Chicago, will make engagements for camp-meetings, or societies, and will answer calls to officiate at funerals, weddings, or other services. He is a speaker of fine ability, and of superior culture.

Mrs. M. R. Naston writes from Topeka, Kansas: "The Spiritualists of Topeka, Kansas, gave a reception at the home of Mrs. Frisby, on September 4, for Mrs. E. E. Hammon; also presented her with a slight token of our regard for her previous to her leaving us as a society for her Western home, Los Angeles, Cal. She goes seeking health and new work in the cause of truth. Mrs. Hammon is a fine inspirational speaker; gives the best of private readings and good platform tests."

In Wisconsin a work is being inaugurated that will bring that state into the front ranks of Spiritualism. See communication on our second page.

Mrs. A. M. Pennefeather writes from New Canton, Ill.: "Will you kindly announce to the many who are seeking to engage the services of our medium, Oscar Ward, that the controlling powers are not willing yet to permit him to make engagements; but say that in a little while, perhaps, if he gives his time for development, he will be able to meet their wants. I hope the time is not far distant when his name will be added to the list of noble workers for our glorious cause."

From Cripple Creek, Col.

Somewhere, somehow, sometime the patient and earnest investigator must reap the reward of his efforts in the search for truth. It would seem that the liberal thinkers of the Cripple Creek district had reached a point where the opportunity presents itself to study the truth in all its beauty and ennobling aspects, under the tutelage of one who has pentrated deep into the mysteries of the highest philosophy of life.

After diligent search and faithful investigation into all the demonstrations and manifestations of Spiritualism, only to be brought face to face with the sordid grasping for the almighty dollar, like a ray of sunshine comes one teaching a pure, beautiful science of occultism, untinctured by the chink of gold, which by the power of truth and force of logic opens up a glorious vista of unfoldment.

This talented teacher, Mrs. Elsie Braun, is as broad as the universe, accepting and teaching the truth wherever found and in whatever guise. Her course of lectures on the "Highest Philosophy of Life," delivered at the Masonic Temple in Cripple Creek, have been of inestimable benefit to those of us who have been searching for something beyond the lower manifestations, and in some instances fraudulent ones; something that would satisfy the heart and appeal to the intelligence. We can safely say that no one who is searching for the truth can listen to the statements made in her lectures as to the unfoldment and progression of man upon the physical plane without being broader, better, truer men and women.

We investigators in Cripple Creek (the greatest gold camp on earth) believe that we are only doing our duty in recommending our teacher to others as one who will by her lectures open up to them the highest, the best and the noblest in all manifestations of the life principle (the I Am) in the entire universe.

Mrs. Braun's permanent address is 1921 West 38th avenue, Denver, Colo., and she may be reached there at any time by those desiring information regarding her lectures and various courses in occultism.

LOVE IS GOD.

Great God of Love, in whom we trust,
Help us outgrow our greed and lust,
Help us expand the love confined
Within our souls to all mankind.
Touch the dormant seeds within each breast
That truth within may be expressed,
And prove in truth each is a brother
In all our actions with each other.

Great God of Light, Thou Infinite One,
We know we feel we are Thy son;
And as thy light illumes our soul,
We faintly sense our glorious goal.
We are the ray—Thou art the light
Which floods our soul with visions bright
Of future bliss in realms above,
Where all will rise by thy great love.

As infinite Truth we seek for Thee
And in our souls a glimmer see,
As it flashes and gleams within our breast
But our love of self keeps it suppressed.
We travel adone in a world of gloom,
With fear of death and a dismal tomb,
And we fail to know the truth sublime
That human souls must higher climb.

POWER OF THOUGHT.

Some Mistaken Ideas Corrected.

The idea that thought has power seems to prevail among writers on Psychology—that thought is power per se. They speak of "thought transference" and many other things that thought does, or can do. This idea has its rise in the misconception of the meaning of the word, and applying it to an element with which it has no relation.

Thought is the memory of what one has been thinking. Thinking is a mental process set into operation by a force that exists previous to the thinking. If thought has power, then memory has power. This idea is absurd.

We speak of telepathy and associate the word with "thought transference." There is no such association. Telepathy is from tele, far, and pathy, feeling. It is the ability in one to arouse a feeling in another at a distance when both are sensitives. This feeling arouses thinking in the one so affected; for where there is no feeling, there can be no thinking.

We are apt to take the appearance of a thing for the thing itself. Thus we speak of sunrise. If we did not know the cause of the phenomenon, it would be to us as a reality. A definition of consciousness will help us in this analysis. Without consciousness, nothing would be—to us. Consciousness is the cognition of being; the internal sense, the faculty by which things become known. In this life, it is dependent on the physical senses, just as force is dependent on matter for its manifestation; yet force is not matter. Thought is not matter, and force cannot be manifested only through matter. So thinking is dependent on consciousness. Feeling is a sensuous process; thinking is an intellectual process. It is the instinctive impulse to gratify feeling—a pleasurable sensation, or to avoid a painful one.

Thinking gives rise to knowing, and its sole function in its ethical sense is to devise ways and means for the satisfaction of desire, the gratification of feeling, or the avoidance of pain or misery. Thought is instrumental—not creative, nor distinctive. There is in every conscious being a desire to enjoy; to be happy, and an aversion to pain or misery. This desire and this aversion are the sources of all rational, voluntary human activity, which is the effort to obtain the one and to avoid the other.

All that men obtain or seek to obtain, all that men do or seek to do, all that men avoid or seek to avoid, is for the sole purpose of satisfying some desire, gratifying some feeling, or avoiding some evil.

No one can successfully controvert this proposition. It determines and points out all the factors of human conduct, and defines each. It makes feeling (desire, passion, appetite, or fear of pain) the cause of voluntary activity; thinking and knowing, the devising of means for satisfaction of desire or avoidance of pain; and activity is the employment of means in the consummation of the end—enjoyment. The order of this process is (a) feeling, (b) knowing, (c) acting—the cause the means, the end.

Suppose one passes into the stillness of the night, by a number of houses; some being vacant, in which the doors and windows are closed and all is dark and silent within. He throws a brickbat against the door of each. In some there is a response, in others none (the houses being vacant). What causes the response? The answer is, "Throwing the brick-bat." Why was there no response in the vacant houses? Just so it is in the case of thought. Where there is no feeling, there can be no motive, where there is no motive there can be no thought, and where there is no thought there can be no action.

Suppose again: A says to B, "Your son is dead." Here is a thought. Believing the statement, a certain feeling is aroused in B. I ask what made him feel that way. You answer, "The thought of his son's death." The statement is a means by which B is set to thinking, the consciousness of which arouses a feeling; the thought is merely instrumental in the operation. Suppose again: A's son is not dead; the thought is a myth. Can that which does not exist exert a power? Can a thought in which A has no concern, act upon him?

I have been thus particular in the analysis of this subject because of its momentous importance. In the solution of ethical problems, the basic factor is ignored, and that which is regarded as such, is secondary in the process of human conduct, and a false function is ascribed to it. It gives rise to the theory that knowledge is the determiner of human conduct—the sole director and regulator of all human affairs. By this theory the wrongs of mankind can never be righted.

The Golden Rule is well known to all Christendom, but it will be observed that those who practice it, are moved by noble feelings. The philanthropist and reformer are trying to uplift humanity by precept. If a music teacher would adopt this plan, he would be laughed at. Conduct is action that has its rise in feeling—the cause and conduct is the effect which can be changed only by changing the cause. Since feeling gives rise to conduct, the character of the conduct is determined by that of the feeling that gives rise to it.

So long as thought or knowledge is regarded as the moving, controlling or directing power of human conduct, we will be no nearer in solving the problems of ethics than were they who believed in alchemy could solve the problems of chemistry, or the believers in the geocentric theory could formulate the three laws of Kepler.

Lake Brady, O.

The ninth annual session of Lake Brady encampment closed here Sunday, September 2. All of the surrounding towns sent excursions, the attraction being the closing exercises of the camp. All of the workers, local mediums and speakers gathered at the auditorium in the forenoon for a farewell conference. Though financially the camp was not a success this season, owing to the fact that the railroads refused to run excursions to the grounds if a gate fee was charged, in other respects it was far above the average in social features and talent employed.

We would like here to correct the impression which seems to have gone out, that there is inharmony at Lake Brady. There is a difference of opinion regarding methods of management and business regulations of the board, otherwise the best of feeling exists among the workers. This fraternal love has extended over a period of years and as season after season has brought us together, each one has seemed like a real family reunion.

We have just said good-bye to those faithful workers, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague. During this season, Mr. Sprague spoke at every meeting, while he and his wife together gave nearly fifty test seances, besides holding developing circles during the greater part of the season. Though we have many noble workers in the field, we consider this worthy couple well fitted to take rank among the best.

Brother D. A. Herrick sustained the dignity of the chair up to the last moment, besides many times during the camp, filling the rostrum as speaker when vacancies occurred.

Mrs. McCaslin also gave several lectures in the regular course, the last one, an illustrated lecture on Vitosophy, or the Science of Life, made clear some of the mysteries of psychic phenomena.

T. V. Nicum, of Dayton, first vice-president of the Ohio State Association, was with us during the latter part of the camp and gave several interesting short talks.

Mrs. Amanda Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., gave the last regular address of the season. Though only two or three years in public work, Mrs. Coffman gives promise of being an excellent trance speaker. Her lectures are profound and logical, showing rare knowledge of the spirit world and its relation to this.

The last entertainment of the season was a new version of "My Friend From India," specially prepared by Mrs. McCaslin, introducing the Fox Sisters, both in earth and spirit life, occult manifestations and picturesque East India costumes, well adapted to Spiritualist societies.

Though the camp is closed, many people still remain upon the grounds. Though the social features of the camp predominate, the mediums still hold seances, and Mrs. McCaslin has been requested to repeat a course of lectures given last week on "Sexual Science."

Considerable money has been raised toward a purchase of Lake Brady, with a view to making it wholly a spiritual camp ground; it's being a summer resort at present is an objection to some of the wealthier class of Spiritualists willing to invest in it.

MRS. M. M'CASLIN.

A North Carolina Medium.

It is with pleasure that I write you tonight telling you of my latest experience with Ernest Orvis, the psychic of the "Land of the Sky." I arrived in Asheville yesterday, and called on Mr. Orvis at his home on Hay [illegible] street. The surroundings are such [illegible] think they should be conducive of the best spiritual results. I rang the bell and was met by a colored servant who showed me into the parlor, a cheerful apartment, where several others were waiting to see him. As I entered the door I heard a deep, manly voice say distinctly, "Make Mrs. Markham comfortable, Anna." Presently the door between the parlor and adjoining room opened to admit the sitter, and he was followed by Mr. Orvis, a man of some 40 years of age, with dark hair, beard and eyes, and whose face wore a kindly smile. He greeted us all and I made an engagement with him for after the supper hour.

Many and varied were the messages received, and oh! how my hungry soul was filled with the bread of eternal truth. Dear editor and friends, who can doubt this truth. It is so satisfying, so gratifying. I feel as if I were raised from the dead.

While waiting to see him on my earlier visit I was told by one of the gentlemen present that he had been healed by Mr. Orvis, and that he know of others who had been benefited by his method of treatment. Mr. Orvis uses a type-writer tells me he is kept very busy. I met his wife, a matronly-looking woman of about 33 or 34 years of age, and of the blonde type. She is also a medium, and gives satisfaction to her sitters. She assists her husband in his work.

It seems that they are very deeply interested in all things of an occult nature. They try to avoid publicity and live such a peaceful home life. I consider them both angels of light. Whereas once I was a bitter, cynical old woman, I now feel like a new being.

Oh, may the angel world use this man long for the spreading of the truth. In my sitting with him he said: "Here is a man who committed suicide. He wants to talk to you through a trumpet sometime." Could not give me the name, but described the man so accurately I recognized him at once.

He described my home to me. He says he can give better satisfaction by having a lock of hair and date of birth, to form a magnetic connection between him and the person sitting. Another thing he declares brings good results is flowers sent by persons wanting readings. He said that only last Saturday, Sept. 1, two different spirits wanted their friends to send boxes of flowers. I wish some one would write and explain these things to me. I do not like to ask Mr. O., as he is always occupied. I will cheerfully answer all inquiries. Address for a few weeks, Asheville, N. C.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. B. F. French: Q. (1) What colleges in the United States sustain theological professorships, and at what probable cost, direct and indirect to the people?

(2) Of the seven churches in Asia, mentioned in the second and third chapters of Revelations, are there any in existence at the present time?

A. The universities have a theological department and the purely theological schools are exclusively devoted to theology. These professorships are the means of replenishing the ranks of the hundred thousand preachers, who think they are called to save the world. The cost of these preachers, who as a rule do not contribute the least to the productiveness of the world, may be conservatively placed at $1,000 each, or $100,000,000 annually. To this must be added the vast expense of building and keeping the church buildings in repair, and the time spent by the laity in listening to prayers and sermons. It requires seven years for the education of a minister of the gospel. They who wrote the New Testament were ignorant peasants, but to understand it requires a world of learning. Four years in college, and three in the theological school, costs at least three thousand dollars, and thus the army of an hundred thousand preachers costs three hundred millions to begin with, and one hundred millions a year to support.

If for this vast outlay anything were returned, there could not be so much objection, but really nothing is given but the erroneous views of the past, and the people are held in the bondage of superstition and committed to harmful views of the objects of life. The pulpit might be made one of the grandest educational institutions of the age. It could week by week give instruction in the latest achievements of the master minds of the world, and the laity, who have not time to become informed, would receive the best instruction. On the contrary the ministers absorb the attention of their followers by commenting on texts of the Bible, as they have learned to do by studying other commentators writings, threshing over and over again the old straw, and thinking the dust they raise the very inspiration of godliness. They keep clear of science, for the smattering they have acquired is sufficient to warn them that it is dangerous. Now and then a narrow-minded one, anointed by the spirit of Don Quixote, makes a charge on some statement of science. Of late the windmill has been Evolution, and the preacher begins by declaring Darwin held that our grandfathers were monkeys; forgetting that those who make such an assertion furnish pretty good evidence of the theory.

() The "Seven Churches of Asia," which in the beginning, if they existed at all, were only gatherings of a few devotees, had no prolonged existence, made no mark on the pages of history, and any trace of their influence on the cities where they are said to have been located is looked for in vain. They are probably as mythical as the Book of Revelations itself.

Harvey Brown: Q. (1) What is meant by living a spiritual life?

(2) Is the freed spirit exempt from the effects of lusts of the flesh, such as avarice, gluttony, drunkenness, sensuality, etc., or do they haunt us in the higher life?

(3) How can we escape their influences?

A. (1) To live a spiritual life does not mean the old method of sacrifice, and physical suffering. It is to maintain a harmonious balance of all faculties, and have all lower desires and appetites in obedience to highest justice and love. A spiritual life is one devoted not only to affairs of this life, but to those having an eternal relation.

(2 and 3) These questions have been answered at length in preceding numbers. The habits and methods of thought of this life are reflected on the spirit and retained for an indefinite time. If one would escape bad influences, he must order his life by good ones.

Mother: Writes that of her five children one has passed into the spirit land, and although this one comes to her and makes her presence known by caress and kisses and fond words, yet she feels that she would lay life's burdens down and join the one gone before.

Spiritualism does not incite to such desires. It holds to having present duties performed. Were this mother's wish granted, when she saw the deserted home and the four children bereft of her care, she would mourn to return far more vehemently than she now does to join her lost one. Do the tasks at hand. Live for to-day, nor think to escape burdens. If unhappy, seek the cause. To feel repulsion for those we ought to be attracted to, to hate the joys of this life, is abnormal, and means nervous strain, over-tax, and unless mastered, the loss of reason. Go away—not to the spirit-land—but on a long visit, and you will return with normal mind.

Subscriber, New Orleans, La.: Q. How best can we gain happiness?

A. We may have a strong conviction of the reality of a future life, yet not perceive any antagonism between that life and the present. The materialistic school that cries, "One world at a time," receives its bias from the old ideas against which it is a reaction. There is no necessity of sacrificing earth to gain heaven. The true and abiding love of husband and wife for each other, or for the children in whom their united lives commingling flow, is as holy and sacred as the love borne to God himself, and as much a part of religion. The contrary would make the adaptation of man to his environments a failure, and the infinite qualities of the Maker otherwise than infinite. These gloomy views of life are rapidly disappearing, and a reaction has come. Instead of placing the objects of life in the future, the future is ignored, and the present made supreme. Not sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, but sufficient for the day is all the day produces; the morrow is unknown. Hence, as life is only a succession of sensations of various character, some pleasing, others painful, the more of the pleasurable sensations which can be crowded into the few years of its continuance, the better. This materialistic view would be complete, had not life a morrow, and a morrow intimately related with to-day. After the full satisfaction of present wants there comes the immeasurable aspirations of the spirit. The physical world, bodily enjoyment, or mental culture are not all; and, when so regarded, the mistake entails misery where happiness was sought.

Freeing ourselves from these erroneous ideas inherited from our ancestors, we are prepared to answer the question of what true happiness consists and how best it may be gained. It is the primal desire of the heart, and our constant efforts are to gain it.

True happiness is a result of our being in accord with the laws of the world. When all the physical forces of nature and the spiritual energies move in harmonious rhythm through our being, there is no jar or conflict as we are wafted onward, and the soul feels the delight of perfect happiness. To arrive at this desired condition, we must understand the fundamental principles of creation and the relations of God thereto and of ourselves to both. We may accept as granted that the plan of nature, whatever idea be received of God, is perfect, and man as a part of nature is a unit therewith. There can be no break in the continuity of being, and hence his adaptation to the physical world must be regarded in the same light as the adaptation of his spiritual faculties for a spiritual life.

A Testimonial to Hudson Tuttle.

I have just finished reading Hudson Tuttle's Arcana of Spiritualism, out of print for many years, but now somewhat infused with thoughts and opinions nearer to date, and reprinted for the benefit of the modern student of Spiritualism. I may claim to have read every word of it, for I have read it aloud, page by page, and evening after evening, to a little home gathering of critics and students.

Its author was born into a useful mediumship, and has lived a life worthy of his manhood. He has not turned aside in almost half a century, during which he has been the mouthpiece of intelligences representing the high water mark of spirit return, and honest mediumship.

The Arcana of Spiritualism should not only be on his shelves, but be carefully studied by every thinker who would probe the facts and fancies interwoven in modern revelations through inspired mediums. The author gives full value for the dollar and a half, which, sent to him at Berlin Heights, O., will, by return of mail, bring back the book.

Of course there is much to be written and said after the utmost has been told through any one mind, and some of us are striving to make yet further advance. But even to such the book furnishes a solid foothold for reference, study and instruction.

I take this opportunity to personally thank Mr. Tuttle for both his teachings and example through so many years of unselfish, and generally unremunerated labor for spirits and mortals. Sometimes he and I do not look even at an acknowledged truth from the same standpoint; and I fear I have often grieved and wearied his noble soul by my habit of groping in the dark corners of modern revelations, and routing out unnoticed facts. But, all the same, I feel sure he knows and understands my personal appreciation of both his manhood and his mediumship. It is in that spirit I invite the reader to make an early purchase of this very useful work, which in its author's opinion, is the culminating effort of his life.

Island Lake Camp, Mich.

Island Lake camp closed its session September 3, having held for seven Sundays. The closing lecture was by Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing. Well did she do her part, carrying away the respect and good will of the campers. Her earnest, honest ways captivated all. She is a host in camp; everyone loved her. She was good, kind and lovable to everyone.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates filled their time and made friends; they are a host of themselves, and will always find a welcome at Island Lake camp.

The entire season has been a busy one, with an increased number of campers and attendants. Week-days rather light, but Sundays full, and all interested.

The lectures have all been of the best. The chairwoman, Mrs. Nellie Baade, attended faithfully to all the cares and responsibilities, meeting the approval of all. Mrs. S. E. Cronk gave tests from the platform, in every case recognized at the time or directly after the meetings; skeptics slow to acknowledge except after the closing.

The improvements of the grounds and conveniences to campers are fully appreciated, and has paid, proving the necessity of Spiritualists to keep up with the growing necessities of life, and placing their knowledge of truth in the foreground, that all may know our departed still live and can return by the same order of nature, by which they leave earth life. How long are sensible men to voluntarily remain in ignorance, cleaving to the old church dogmas that are daily being shown to be false. In fact and history I know of no class of humanity so thoroughly humbugged and deceived as are believers in orthodox Christianity.

Our camp has elected new officers, and they are preparing for the coming year's camp, making further improvements on the grounds. More cottages will be built. We have the purest water, beautiful lake, high forest lands, and a healthy locality. Strangers that have been with us for the first time, have given the camp high praise. We are looking forward to another year of prosperity in 1901. You will probably hear from us in the meantime.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENG.

A NEW MEDIUM IN PARIS.

An esteemed correspondent, writing from Paris, speaks of a new medium whose gifts have been investigated by several well-known and competent observers, with the result that they have been well satisfied. He says:

The medium is a quiet, unassuming woman of twenty-eight years. Her education is very imperfect, yet I have heard through her a brilliant discourse. "Julia," the little control, is the daughter of a very poor woman who led a life of misery in a traveling van, which brought them to Belgium some fifty years ago, where "Julia," then a little beggar girl, died of misery and an attack of cholera.

She is now the mouthpiece of the spirit band of the medium. "They have chosen me," she said to me one day, because I knew so much of the miseries of humanity that I am better fitted than others to come in contact with the different natures that come to my medium here." In all my long experience with mediums in the United States, in England, and in France since "back in the sixties," I have but once or twice before had the same profound satisfaction. For myself I have passed through the experimenting stage of inquiry, and simply takes "what comes," submitting the same to analysis and reason afterwards, and by that method I got with this medium a beautiful proof of identity. The little spirit control permitted a friend on the spirit side to come, and we conversed together for at least twenty minutes on subjects absolutely unknown to the medium. The spirit referred to matters which had been told me by this same spirit in America ten years ago, and which no one but myself knew about. Exact descriptions and names were given. The name of the medium is Mme. Lay-Fonvielle, 30 Place St. Georges, Paris.

THE NEW THOUGHT OF GOD.

Watchers of the signs of the times know that, for good or evil, a thought of God has gradually been evolved which will transform the intellectual Theism of Christendom. The Theism that is not intellectual will go on its way a little longer, but it is doomed. The Theism of the past was, at all events in imagination and picturing, sheer materialism. God was a huge man, seated on a great white throne—overwhelmingly visible, if one could have found the site and penetrated as far. The Theism of the future will be as purely spiritual as that was radically material, and as serenely strong as that was dangerously weak.

Last week we referred to the Rev. R. Heber Newton's very noticeable discourse, in "Mind," on "The New Thought of the Christ." The same finely-toned organ of philosophical thought gives us another of this alive preacher's studies; this time on "The New Thought of God"; and, of the two, this is perhaps the more important, as going to the fountain head.

In this study, Mr. Newton—one of the most prominent clergymen in New York, be it remembered—traces the evolution of the God-Idea concurrently with the evolution of Man. The conception of God has kept pace with the development of the mind and the spiritual sense of Man. "The story of the thought of God would be the story of the growth of the human soul," carrying with it all modes of faith and worship, and still in process of transformation. "Release or enlarge God!" is not the cry of the iconoclast only; it is the cry of the Time-Spirit. If not a greater God, a more spiritual God, then no God; for, not rebellion against God, but rebellion against unworthy or inadequate presentations of Him has usually driven the oppressed intellect and moral sense into atheism or agnosticism.

We have often indicated this grave present-day fact, and deeply feel its urgent importance, and are therefore all the more encouraged to see it so finely set forth, and to see the remedy for atheism and agnosticism so convincingly described by one in Mr. Newton's position. His breadth of view and outspokenness may be gathered from the following summary of his discourse:

Our traditional thought of God in Christianity is the thought of Judea modified by the thought of Greece—ennobled by poetry and philosophy;—a Vast Man above the skies, the manufacturer of worlds and the occasional miracle worker in them, but always apart from then. It is this thought that is being dissipated. From the two extremes, of Science and Spirituality, comes the dissipating breath, before which it is vanishing.

Science fought hard against the old dates and against the old notion of a manufactured world and man, and compelled the theologians to push farther and farther back the intervening God. At last Darwin and others came, and behold, the door was opened, passing beyond which we found God in His universe, the living God of living men. That Universe emerged upon our delighted vision as a Cosmos, eternal, infinite and a unity, with everywhere order invincible and life unbounded. The overwhelmingly glorious doctrine of Evolution gives us indeed a Universe, with an Immanent Power nowhere absent and nowhere inoperative. The Universe is a beginning, brooding, struggling, emerging, radiant, advancing, from the inorganic molecule to the highly organized man.

The Universe, then, is an organism—an animated structure, pervaded with life and mind. It is not a mechanism; it is the body of a soul; it pulses with life; it is illumined with intelligence; there is the direct action of mind in all its parts, and action from within. It is not an artificer who is at work; it is an all-pervading soul; and all things are thoughts of this soul on the physical plane of manifestation. This Soul appears to know what it is about throughout the ages. It forecasts and provides, and by slowest stages achieves and compels. It is the all-pervading Purpose, Idealizer, Will. It is not to be confounded with the things that become, for it is within, behind and above all becoming. Moreover it has character. It wants something in the ethical and spiritual spheres, and it works without ceasing, to get it. It loves and resents. It builds up and breaks. It "makes for righteousness"; it is working for beauty without and within; it reveals a moral law; it suggests higher and higher ideals to struggling Man, and whispers to choice spirits the thrilling secrets of absolute purity and goodness, beauty and truth.

Last of all dawns the sublime and consoling thought that this is indeed "Our Father," the origin of all life, and assuredly of ours, "in whom we live and move and have our being," and who becomes more consciously our very own as, by yielding ourselves to the higher monitions, we mount from sense to soul, from sensuous cravings to spiritual discernments. It is this that lands us at last by the side of Jesus, with his consciousness of the Father's presence in His own world and His own spiritual child, and yet Our Father who is in Heaven; but now we know that the Heaven of God is here.

Such is a rapid glance over this vast field, in the company of one who evidently knows it well. It is not an unfamiliar field to us, but we like to see it from every point of view, and we rejoice to see anyone entering it. We are confident that it contains for the world its only hope of a Theism in harmony at once with science and spiritual religion. We are confident, too, that multitudes who are feeling unhappy concerning belief in God, or who shrink from facing their supposed belief, might find salvation here.

SPIRIT HELP IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. Boursnell, of 58 Uxbridge road, has a son on active service with the 21st Royal Scots Fusiliers, in South Africa. Some months since, we published an extract from a letter which the son had written to his father, in which he spoke of the spirit of an old gentleman who appeared to him from time to time and rendered him signal services in cases of extreme emergency. In a letter recently received, written from Krugersdorp, on June 23, he mentions the same spirit visitor again. "One night," he says, "I was so thirsty, as we had no water to drink and did not know where to get any, and the officers told us it would be four miles before we could get a drop. I was very bad for the want of a drink after a hard day's work. It was pitch dark and I went out to try if I could find any water of any sort, when the grand old gentleman I have told you about before appeared to me with a light in his right hand and led me to a pond over some hills. It was beautiful water and I filled four water bottles with it and went back to my resting-place. Don't you think it grand to have such a good guide, for I was nearly broken down for want of a drink of water?"

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

THE REAL SPIRITUALISTIC HELL.

One of the fundamental doctrines of the orthodox theology of fifty years ago was the eternal punishment of unbelieving sinners in a material hell of fire and brimstone. Graphic descriptions of the hell-torments were not unfrequently uttered from the pulpits, and it was the recognized function of both priest and preacher to prevent as many souls as they could from spending eternity in intensest suffering.

But if we turn to the orthodoxy of the present day we find that such crude notions of a material hell are rarely entertained, and that they are abandoned for the more rational and less fanciful ones of spiritual progressive thought. As a consequence of this change of opinion, it is not generally considered such a grave and unpardonable offense, as it was some years ago, to mitigate the tortures, and dispel the hopeless gloom of the hell condition.

Converts to Spiritualism from the ranks of conventional orthodoxy are delighted to understand that a is a delusion, or that it was long since been disestablished. But in their felicity, upon learning that the chiefest terror of their religious infancy has but theological existence, they are too prone to forget the existence of a very real hell, into which materialism and ignorance may unexpectedly plunge them.

The existence of such a hell is amply affirmed by seers and returning spirits who communicate with earth, and some of whom have by tollful endeavors, reparations and prayers, emerged from it into the brighter conditions of the spirit world. The informers are unanimous in their testimony that the dwellers of this hell condition lead a most wretched and distressing existence.

Judge Edmonds has written an account of a remarkable vision of hell which was once given him. He says: "They have taken me to the darker spheres. There I see countless numbers of spirits, of various hues of blackness, amid that dark and murky atmosphere, so dark and thick that it would seem almost impalpable to my senses. There amidst that cold and watery and cheerless air, amidst the repulsive gloom, I see those countless myriads, boiling up as it were under the influence of the darkest passions and wildest propensities of the human heart, like a seething cauldron filled with human misery, and set into never-ending motion by the lurid and enduring flames of human passions."

Swedenborg, describing the

says: "Some hells appear like caverns in rocks, tending inward and downward; some like dens which wild beasts inhabit in forests; some like arched caverns and holes, such as are seen in mines. In some hells there appear rude cottages, which in some places form lanes and streets. Within the houses infernal spirits engage in perpetual brawls, in blows and butchery, while the streets are infested with robbers. The hells abound in foul smells, cadaverous, stercoraceous, noxious, and putrid, in which evil spirits dwell, as do some animals in rank odors."

The spiritual philosophy teaches us that although such distressing and lamentable conditions do really exist, there is no cause for us to be pessimistic. Such and correspond to the inner states of the spirits which create them.

Thus hell is not a place of punishment created by God; nor is it the creation of devils, except such as once lived upon earth. Our Father, God would never be satisfied by the infliction of pain upon His children, for He is divinely impartial, and His love and grace flow indifferently to the evil and good—to all in hell as well as to all in heaven. The conditions of because they cannot be otherwise until the character, appetites and aspirations of the subjects are radically changed. Their suffering is the result of their undeveloped condition, and their external surroundings are mainly determined by their condition of spirit.

"All eternity represents the mind; is the mind symbolized or mirrored in objective spiritual forms." A lucid thinker has stated this truth very cogently: "The spiritual world is created momentarily, by and through the changes of affections and thoughts in the inhabitants. It changes as the scenery of a dream changes in correspondence with the changes of state recurring in the brain of the dreamer."

Touching the punishment of sin in the spiritual hell, the same author says: "Observe that these are not punishments of the sins committed in this life, but the punishment of sin continually being committed on account of the organically evil state of the soul. No spirit is ever punished for what he did in the world, but only for what he is now doing to afflict and destroy others.

He has indeed acquired by his life in the world the peculiar spiritual constitution, the conformation of heart and brain that continually impel him to the commission of the evils which continually precipitate him into suffering and punishment."

The root of many false ideas regarding life in the spirit hell lies in the baseless supposition that man will undergo an instantaneous change, once the "muddy vesture of decay" shall be discarded. All who expect such a transformation are egregiously deluded, for man can no more get away from his spirit hereafter than he can from his mind now. Each is what he has made it by cultivation. "The spirit will be made up, warp and woof of all the thoughts and acts committed while here in the body." Faith, penance, or prayers cannot suspend or escape the operations of universal laws, and the depraved spirit must live the natural desires of his nature and character. God will not punish him, and he himself is solely responsible for his condition.

It does not necessarily follow that because hell exists its sufferings are of perpetual duration. Being an effect, it can only last in connection with its cause, and the removal of the former would also be the removal of the latter. Sin or wrong-doing engenders inharmony and dissatisfaction, which is a condition very undesirable to most human beings. Therefore, the natural inclinations will tend to move its cause, for harmony and happiness are the desideratum of all, although they are pursued by various but converging paths, because of the ignorance and falsities which prevail in this world of delusions and fancies.

Many spirits are so corrupt that long ages must pass ere they become conscious of obligation and responsibility; but the highest instincts of the human soul declare that good shall ultimately conquer and subdue all vice and ignorance. Within all men there dwells some particle of good, which has the potency of expanding to such an extent that there will be no place for evil. The perpetuity of the hell condition is an idea which is not only repugnant to sympathetic souls, but also strong evidence of man's mean thoughts of Him who has been called the "Great Soul of Love."

The importance of obtaining some knowledge of the terrors and miseries of the real hell is very great. It should not only disabuse our minds from theological delusions, but teach us to avoid the cultivation of those habits which unavoidably bring hell in their train. It should make us pause, and think of the terrible issues we incur by neglecting our duty to ourselves and to each other, which, in the words of Burns, are—

The torturing, gnawing consciousness of guilt—
Of guilt, perhaps, where we've involved others.
The young, the innocent, who fondly loved us,
Nay more, that very love their cause of ruin!
Oh! burning hell. In all thy store of torments
There's not a keener lash!

As the intense sufferings of hell are the results of a perverted life, so the bliss and felicity of the summerland are obtainable only by those who through sacrifice and perseverance have subordinated self and rendered service to their kind. The discipline of suffering is essential to the attainment of the grandest character, and those persons who will not voluntarily subjugate the sensual nature while on earth must suffer the process of purification in another sphere. The purpose of existence is the development of man, and in order to attain the sublime heights of perfectibility it is necessary that he understands what it means to "suffer and be strong." Then will he be able to fulfil his true mission, and to thank the Supreme Mind for the hell which shall burn away the dross from human nature.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "putteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymalchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Nectar itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episkolical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. IMMORTALITY,

...OR...

FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.

BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins? Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Right; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Many other matters are treated, too numerous to mention. Price, cloth, $1; paper 50 cents. Postage 12 cents. For sale at this office.

THE NATURAL PHYSICIAN.

The Physician can only be the servant or handmaid of Nature in the cure of

In reality we can do nothing; we can only remove the offending cause while

STURGIS, MICH.

Annual Meeting of the Harmonial Society.

The yearly meeting of the Harmonial Society of Sturgis, Mich., for the purpose of electing officers to serve for the ensuing year was held in the Free Church of that city, on Monday, Sept. 3. The attendance was unusually small, that being Labor Day, and excursion trains to an adjacent city where political candidates were to address the people took away many of our people. Of those present, however, we noticed Mrs. Lydia P. Wilson, Mrs. A. D. Howard, David Kribbs, Miss Ann Baker, Mrs. C. Cressler, Mrs. Hannah Buck, John and Mrs. Rapp, Miss Agnes Cressler, Thomas Collar and Thos. and Mary Harding.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Thos. Collar. The minutes of last year's meeting were read and approved, after which the secretary protem, Thos. Harding also read aloud the names of all the living members of the society. The number is 83, four having died during the past year. The original membership was 109, but some had resigned and moved away. These figures, however, give but a faint idea of the numbers composing the audiences at the spiritual meetings in Free Church. The names of the four members who died during the year now closed, are Dr. A. D. Howard, G. Wilson Parker, Dr. Ira F. Packard and Hellen C. Francis, all residents of this city.

It was decided after some discussion, that, as the attendance was small, only the vacancies ought to be filled and the president and committees allowed to serve for another year. Accordingly a ballot was taken which resulted in the election of Thomas Harding for secretary, and David A. Kribbs and Mrs. Barrows to fill the two vacancies in the executive committee.

Before closing, the president, Thos. Collar, took occasion to thank the society for the confidence reposed in him, that having been the fourth time it intrusted him with the presidency. He considered it the highest honor which could be conferred upon him, to be permitted to preside over a spiritual society, more particularly the Harmonial Society of Sturgis, which is so well known throughout the world as the possessor of the first Spiritual meeting-house which had ever been erected. He felt himself unworthy of so great an honor, and again thanked the association for the confidence reposed in him.

The newly elected secretary, Thomas Harding, spoke of some of the difficulties which the president had to encounter during the past year, and that a president needed the kind support and earnest sympathy of his society in order to accomplish much. He hoped that the Harmonial Society of Sturgis would, during the year entered upon, be more "harmonious" than it had ever been before. He considered it good exercise to read over the names of existing members in order that all brothers and sisters should know each other; he thought it ought to be done at every annual meeting so that each and every member might know where and to whom to look when he or she needed a friend. In the small number then in the house he pointed out three persons whom he never knew to be Spiritualists until that afternoon, and hoped that all the members would become better acquainted with each other. The meeting was then closed. T. H.

Sturgis, Mich.

Tells How He Was Hypnotized.

I met Granger, or Harry La Mar, as he called himself, in Paterson about two weeks ago. Before he had talked to me five minutes he had acquired an influence over me, so that I thought him one of the finest fellows I had ever met.

We often met in the evenings, and I did not lose confidence in him even after he began to tell me of his life.

He told me he made a living without working; that he could get around people and do what he pleased with them.

He wanted to make me his partner, he said, because I was clever; we would live on the fat of the land and never want for anything if I would only go with him. But I said no.

Last Wednesday night about 11 o'clock I went with La Mar to a saloon and had a glass of beer. After that I remembered nothing until the next day, when we were in New York.

I was anxious and worried and wanted to return home. La Mar looked at me, said something which I do not remember, and in a minute I was perfectly content to stay with him.

We remained that night in New York and the next day went to Providence on the steamer Massachusetts.

I had no money, although I had $31 in my pockets when I left Paterson. La Mar, however, seemed to have plenty of money and he paid my fare.

During Friday night I awoke and found La Mar seated beside my bed. I told him I was going home. He looked me in the eyes and told me to go to sleep. Then he made a few passes with his hands across my forehead and I knew nothing more.

We remained in Providence roaming around the saloons for several days.

Sunday he tried to make me help him rob a drunken man in the street. I told him I wouldn't do it, and he ran away and left me.

Then for the first time I realized my position. I walked the streets. I could not go home, for I had no money. I went to the Narragansett Hotel and wrote to my friend Paul Grasch in Paterson to send me money and to tell my people where I was.

On Monday the detectives arrested me, but they let me go when they found I had done nothing wrong.

Then my father came and took me home.

La Mar had written in my name and received my pay from the Rogers Locomotive Works, and had forged letters to my father that I had gone away to accept a position in Providence and asking for money. I never wrote any of those letters and knew nothing about them. In fact, I didn't have a mind of my own while I was with La Mar.—Geo. W. Kaltenbach in New York Journal.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, from her residence in Sturgis, Mich., at 2 o'clock on the morning of September 2, Mrs. Hellen C. Francis. Mrs. Francis had been a Spiritualist (together with her family and her brother's family) almost from the time of the Rochester knockings. She had been a member of the Sturgis Harmonial Society almost from its formation. Millard Fillmore, ex-President of the United States, was her uncle, and at his death she inherited a large proportion of his wealth. Her husband and her brother preceded her a very few years ago to that better country, and she leaves a family of daughters. T. H.

After a short illness, Mr. James Shumway, of Philadelphia, passed to the spirit world, on August 31, and was buried Sept. 4. Mr. Samuel Wheeler, vice-president of the Philadelphia Spiritualist Society, delivered a beautiful discourse over the remains. Mr. Shumway was 87 years of age, and had been a devoted Spiritualist and an earnest worker in the cause for over forty years. Mr. Shumway was a man highly respected by all who knew him. JULIA R. LOCKE.

Passed to spirit life, August 28, Susan M. Bumpstead, of Chicago, Ill., aged 71 years. She became a Spiritualist some thirty years ago and since that time has devoted her life work to the encouragement and advancement of others. She will be missed by all who knew her, and a deep gloom will spread over the hearts of those who came in close contact with her in every-day life. She leaves her aged husband who is paralyzed, two daughters and three sons to mourn her loss. The services were held at the grave, at Eden Cemetery, Mrs. Emma J. Hasson and Mrs. Nora E. Hill officiating. The services were short, but impressive. NORA E. HILL.

THOUSANDS CURED!

Marvelous Has Been the Success of This Well-Known Healer in Curing Chronic and Obstinate Cases.

J. M. PEEBLES, A. M., M. D., PH.D.

If Sick Read His Liberal Offer, Then Consult Him and Be Healed.

Half a century spent in successfully treating chronic diseases and the unsolicited testimonials from thousands of those whom he has cured, after the best local physicians had failed to give permanent relief, successful practitioner and healer in AMERICA.

This eminent man, whose life has been devoted to the relief of suffering humanity, is not only a graduate of the best medical colleges of this country, but he has counseled with the best medical men in every country on the globe, and his study and research after knowledge that would enable him to benefit those around him who are suffering from chronic diseases, has taken him three times around the world, and to-day his advice and counsel is sought after not only by chronic invalids who have learned his ability to cure these troubles, but also by many physicians as well.

This great and true Healer was one of the pioneers in the study and investigation of the Psychic Science, one of the greatest and most wonderful of all the sciences, and one which is destined to do more for the sick and suffering than any other agency ever discovered. He has made a study of this subject for over half a century, and is to-day considered by the advanced students of this grand science the greatest Psychic living.

You should read his late essay on this subject, entitled, "The Psychic Science in the Art of Healing," which he will send you free of cost with the diagnosis if you desire it. Learn for yourself of this wonderful power the human body like an open book. All Dr. Peebles' diagnosing is done by the aid of this occult science. Doctor a plain honest letter in your own handwriting. If you will do this, he will send you a diagnosis free of all cost and special advice concerning your case, also his essay spoken of above and other literature explaining fully his methods of treatment and testimonials showing some of the most remarkable cures ever performed.

Thousands of sufferers are treated by physicians who do not know positively where the seat of trouble lies. They experiment for weeks trying to hit upon the right point. The result is that instead of getting relief, the patient gradually grows worse and the case becomes, as they term it, "chronic," and at last the poor sufferer receives that awful sentence, "Your case is hopeless." With Dr. Peebles there are no hopeless cases. His life has been devoted to conquering disease, and the tens of thousands of lives he has saved, the thousands of so-called invalids he has made healthy men and women, and the countless number of homes in every part of the world his wonderful skill has brightened, are testimonies of his ability to treat all kinds of chronic diseases.

Remember that Dr. Peebles does not cure by Christian Science, Mesmerism, or any other "ism," but uses mild magnetized remedies in connection with his Psychic treatment. "These Psychic treatments," says one of his patients, "seem as if they would almost raise the dead." Every effect has its cause, and if the cause is seen and removed the effect will cease—health will ensue. What is your condition? It is within your power to know. If he can tell you the exact cause of your trouble, he can bring relief and without doubt a cure. This he can do, and it will cost you not one cent to test it. In order to inspire confidence in those who have been given up beyond hope, he will diagnose all cases free of charge. All that is required is for you to write the Doctor an honest letter, giving in your own writing your name, age, sex, and leading symptoms of your case. A letter of advice from this great and true physician, whose life has been devoted to relieving the suffering of his fellow-men, drives back the cloud of despair and comes like a ray of sunshine into the chronic invalid's darkened sky.

Remember that it costs you nothing to write the Doctor and learn your true condition. Write to day and learn your exact condition, and also ask for literature that will give you a full knowledge of this wonderful method of curing disease.

They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books complete and at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL

BY

LOREN ALBERT SHERMAN.

Sets forth the Philosophy of Existence, with detailed evidence. It appeals to Christians and Spiritualists alike, as it demonstrates the truth of the spirit manifestations of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian religion is based, as well as the actuality of modern spirit manifestations. Its title page claims that the book is

A SCIENTIFIC DEMONSTRATION of the Existence of the soul of man as his conscious individuality independently of the physical organism; of the CONTINUITY OF LIFE and the ACTUALITY OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The first eleven chapters are devoted entirely to manifestations of the soul incarnate, with a clear exposition of the psychic philosophy.

The succeeding four chapters set forth the philosophy of the Infinite.

The last twenty chapters are devoted to an exposition of spiritual philosophy, with evidence in detail, much of it being personal experiences of the author.

SPIRIT CONTROL.

A Chapter of Mediumistic Experience.

The diversity of opinion as to how soon after death can the spirit control a medium tempts me to give one or two instances of my experience. While I resided in Eureka, Kansas, Mr. Moran, an old soldier friend, passed out as I sat by his bedside, noting the spirit manifestations in the room, also the look of surprised joy that lit up his face as he extended his hands, no doubt to clasp hands with his two daughters in spirit life. Three days after, as I sat sewing and talking with two young ladies, all at once I became conscious of not feeling natural. I could feel beard on my face, my nose was long, thin and pinched, my mouth was drawn and jaws set as if in death. My hands were seemingly covered with purple spots, and hair on my wrists and hands. The girls both exclaimed, "Oh! how much you look like Mr. Moran." After a gasp or two, he said through my lips, which now seemed to be his: "Yes, I am Mr. Moran. Tell Sarah I live, there is no death." Sarah is his wife. She was a scoffer at Spiritualism, but Mr. Moran had often said, "Sarah, let's not scoff at anything that we know so little about."

A young man named Joseph Sample, a graduate in the same class with my son, died the next year with consumption. He came to me in less than an hour after he passed out. I coughed so hard and suffered such intense pain, I was unable to rise and dress for more than an hour. Twice during the day he came and prostrated me for a time, but I had no idea of who or what it meant until the third time. Upon going uptown in the afternoon, I learned of his death and what time it took place. I also learned his mother was very anxious to learn where my son was, as she wished him to be one of the pall-bearers. I sent her a note telling her where to find him, as he was out of the city. She afterward told my son she would always keep the note for it was the most beautiful words of condolence she received, and seemed as if they were a part of her dear Joe. I have never to my knowledge met the lady, except seeing her at the funeral, which I had to leave owing to the incessant coughing the spirit threw upon me. Also desiring I should tell the minister, Mr. Wright, that he would like to do a part of the talking to his friends.

Another instance. My spirit husband at this time frequently spoke through me. One day he said to an old friend, a Mr. Willson, "Say, Mr. Willson, when are you going to be ready for heaven?" He replied, "Oh, I don't know. Why?" The spirit said, "Well, you had better be getting ready, for we are coming after you pretty soon." Willson said, "Oh, I am in no hurry. I am doing very well here." "Yes," said the spirit, "but you can do better here with us."

Mr. W. died in less than a month, although at that time he was seemingly well. In about ten minutes after he left his body he, accompanied by my spirit husband, came into my room, saying he had just got out of the old shell, and felt a great relief. Said Mr. Hooker helped him to leave the old body. Some twenty minutes later my son came in from up-town and said Mr. Willson was dead. I saw this same spirit overshadow and transfigure a Mrs. Clogston, of Eureka. The personation was miraculous. This was about two weeks later.

I am impressed here to relate another experience, although not bearing upon this line, yet I feel of equal interest. The Mrs. Clogston just mentioned, some six months previous, dropped in on me one afternoon. Her sister, Mrs. Kate Lewis, also was there, and my niece, about 18. I was engaged working button-holes in shirts, Mrs. L. assisting, when Mrs. C. said to me, "I cannot keep from drawing up closer to you. I guess our spirit friends have something to tell us."

I dropped my work, Mrs. L. likewise. We were all four sitting so far apart we could but just clasp our fingers. It was thus we formed our circle, not one moving from where we sat. As the thought was suggested by Mrs. C., I began by giving her a test as to some housework anticipated, then advised her to never allow the surgeon's knife used on the tumor from which she had long suffered, as it would in time all pass away (and it did). Then a spirit overshadowed me, and spoke upon the grandeur of soul unfoldment. As he finished speaking, he said, "Yes, sister, I have set my seal upon thee that thou mayest know hereafter under whose dispensation this medium is working." As he ceased, she held up both hands and said, "Oh! just look at my hands. Oh my! how they do hurt. I never had anything hurt so." They felt just like someone drove spikes through them, and in the palm of each hand were purple and red spots, even on the back of her hands, which remained near an hour afterwards. These prints were put upon her hands upon another occasion, at her home, Mrs. Lewis and I being present; but we did not join hands this time.

Now I shall not venture any solution of the stamping of seal upon her hands, but will say that my thoughts had nothing whatever to do with its being done, for I was not conscious either time that such a thing was done until she showed her hands after the spirit ceased speaking.

I only write these experiences that your readers may have the knowledge of a few of the many experiences that no doubt many other mediums have and will continue to have. The last named experience I have heretofore said but little about, but any one can verify my statement by writing to either of the three ladies—Mrs. Mary Cogston, Mrs. Kate Lewis, Mrs. Cora Lewis, all of Eureka, Kan.

As to the limited time or feasibility of a spirit controlling a medium, I believe that everything depends upon conditions, attraction and desire, especially in the case of young Sample. He no doubt desired to reach his mother with words of condolence, his affection for my son made conditions favorable. Mr. Willson desired to tell me the help he had received not only from my husband but my spiritual teachings. Mr. Moran came through good will to myself and a desire to reach his wife.

Every ray of spiritual knowledge a spirit receives while in the body is thrice appreciated when they leave it. Every thought of justice and love a medium sends out upon the great ocean wave of Life, are beacon lights that guide spirits to them for wisdom and experience of again controlling mortal bodies. Every thought of mortal mind is an educator of spirit, either in or out of the mortal body. A spirit understanding the law of mind over matter; a medium understands subjective, receptive conditions of self, can make it possible, I believe, for instant control at death. But I also believe that spirit control will in time cease to be demonstrated, as education brings into demand the practical benefits derived through communication, which is but the vibration of mind emanation, thus doing away with the suffering of spirit mind, which they too frequently bring to mediums, thus proving their minds are in a measure still clothed in the material thought of physical pain. True many times this suffering personation seems to be their only way of identifying themselves to their friends, yet I feel it is not a necessary proof, and mind communication, of telling instances of life occurrences, or names given, are of equal proof. The sooner that all minds forget the bondage of matter, and all the man-made ills of the physical body, the sooner mortal and immortal spirit will become unfolded in the school of soul thought, and mind will know no limit to space, thought, time or place. All is bequeathed as the right of man, when he learns to read the Architect's plan.

Impressions of Franklin and Delphos Camps.

To the Editor:—I have just returned from camps and although I see an account of those I have visited, in your paper, yet I would like to say a word in regard to them. I was in attendance at Franklin, Nebraska, during the whole meeting, and I must say that I never saw greater interest manifested for any cause than was shown at Franklin for Spiritualism, both by Spiritualists and investigators.

A large per cent of the audiences was unbelievers, those who know but little if anything of the doctrine, yet the best attention was given to the lectures, tests, etc., on all occasions.

The management and all members of that association seem to be earnest and honest people and working against great difficulties to promulgate the cause so dear to their hearts. A genial air of good feeling seems to pervade the camp and there is that informal sociability among the people which puts all in a happy frame of mind and bids "the good angels come in."

I met quite a number of the Spiritualist workers, among whom were Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Bonney, of Blair, Nebraska, Paul S. Gillette and wife, of Omaha, Father Dunton, of Lebanon, Kans., and James Campbell, Havelock, Neb., all enthusiastic laborers in the vineyard.

The attendance was regular and for a new Western camp was very good, indeed quite gratifying was the success of the camp to those who have labored so hard to sow the good seeds of Spiritualism upon the western plains.

Delphos Camp was all that could be anticipated for it.

There were large crowds and plenty of workers to entertain and educate them. The principal speaker was Will C. Hodge, of Chicago, whose lectures are always so fraught with wisdom, and given in so earnest a manner that they command the attention and respect of even the most skeptical.

On my way home Mrs. Inez Wagner and myself stopped at Lincoln Center, Kansas, and held a meeting. Every arrangement had been made for the meeting and the audience room of the new court house, just completed, was the place obtained for holding the meeting. I was fearful lest there would not be many people out, as they told me there were not many Spiritualists there, and that my lectures would probably have to be given mainly to the walls and seats of that spacious room, but when we arrived, a few moments before 8 p. m., the auditorium was full and people still coming in. The crowd was so large that many were compelled to stand outside and the good attention during the exercises of lecture and songs by myself and tests by Mrs. Wagner, showed how much they were interested.

The second night was but a repetition of the first, except that the crowd was even greater.

"Straws show which way the wind blows," and it seems to me that such toleration by the skeptical world, and such manifestations of interest in this cause show that both in the theological and materialistic ranks Spiritualism is commanding attention and the "New Thought" is pervading society everywhere.

I am now working for the Church of Spiritualism at this place. Am ready to make engagements to lecture and sing at any other places also.

STUDIES IN SPIRITUAL THOUGHT.

Outreach of Pure Thought--Spiritual Relationship With Both Worlds.

It is good to step aside at times from the cares and turmoil of earthly life, the thoughts about things that absorb all too much of our minds' attention during our waking hours of existence. We can withdraw ourselves mentally and in spirit from the things of earth that engross our ordinary daily thought, and we can enter into another world, in essence, where the mind is occupied with other things than the affairs of mere earthly life. We possess and may exercise the power to translate ourselves, our mental spiritual being, into another and more elevated realm of life, where we shall hold close communion in thought with the higher spirits of good that have entered fully into the world unseen.

We may exchange thoughts with the angels, by attuning our hearts to the beautiful rhythm of the higher spiritual life, or state of being.

By spiritual culture we may so elevate and refine our thoughts that they shall enter into harmonious accord with the thought-notes of the purer spiritual spheres.

Pure, sweet, beautiful thoughts seek and find their own spiritual relationship, throughout all spiritual realms. They gravitate unto their own and enter into harmonious coalescence, forming a divine one-ness with all of like nature.

There are no bounds to the diffusive expansion of pure spiritual thought; the boundless universe is its field. It cannot be circumscribed or limited by special conditions or physical barriers.

Minds that harmonize on spiritual lines may enter into spiritual companionship and communion, though oceans or continents intervene, or though separated by the conditions that seemingly divide this earthly life from the unseen spirit world.

The silent loving thought, given forth by the human on earth, or by the dweller in higher spheres, speaks with a voice heard beyond the veil of death, and vibrates throughout the Eternal Now of Spiritual Being.

Loving thoughts from different places, planes and spheres, attract each other, meet on their way, and each one's pathway left behind is a guiding way to the other to its destination.

So it is well and in accordance with the spiritual fitness of things that there be formed Silent Thought brotherhoods, Soul Communion societies, for the cultivation and practice of the New Thought and its development in the spiritualizing and upliftment of humanity. Congenially agreeing upon the one idea which is their definite object, though, may-be, differing widely on other matters of thought and opinion, there can be realized much of mutual help in spiritual thought, life and growth; and the influence that must be consciously or unconsciously radiated as a result of the experience of these centres of spiritual light and force, will tell powerfully upon the outside world as well as upon the individual spiritual advancement of those most intimately interested.

But there is a felt realization of mutual spiritual helpfulness when a number of friends meet at a stated time and place for soul communion. Coming together, drawn by a brotherhood of spiritual longings and aspirations with minds united in one object and purpose, each gives and receives, and together they call the same quality of influence, more refined, from helpful, harmonious, unseen sources, and they realize the truth hidden in the words of Jesus: "When two or three meet in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

Meeting in the desire of the Christ spirit, the spiritual anointing is conferred upon them by unseen anointed ones, and they realize the spiritual fulfillment of the promise. The chrism of love bestowed by angel hands fills their minds with pure and loving thought, thrilling their inmost being, and radiating out to all humanity, in all spheres.

It may be good for some to know that though one may not thus meet in outward union with others, he may place his mind in conjunctive spiritual harmony with such gatherings, in the silence of his own room, or by entering into the inner state of silence, wherever one may chance to be. One may abstract his thoughts from the business, the cares and worries of earth existence, and enter for a time into conjunctive relationship with minds on spiritual planes, and receive much spiritual good thereby.

Whether in company where one beholds the physical presence of friends and feels the influence of their congenial aura, or resting in the solitude of one's own room, or even passing amid the busy throng on the city's streets, one can realize that he has the companionship and communion of angels and kind spirits unseen.

The habit of entering into silent soul communion need not interfere injuriously with one's duties or proper business as a citizen of this world. In fact the cultivation of one's spiritual nature tends to increase and intensify one's sense of moral obligation in the relations of business and citizenship. The other-worldliness implied in spiritual culture must healthfully tend to eliminate the spirit of grasping greed, and carking worry and care; and to induce a larger humanitarianism, a greater degree of unselfish interest in the welfare of others, an altruistic sympathy and love toward all human kind.

Real spirituality is incompatible with all that savors of injustice, unkindness, malice, revenge, or hatred toward others. While it sharpens and intensifies one's sense of injustice and wrong, it tends to enlarge and intensify a feeling of kindness that excuses rather than harshly condemns.

Recognizing the fact that this world is interblended with the world unseen, it is our province to claim citizenship with both worlds, the seen and the unseen. We should, in fact, more firmly and completely assert and cognize our citizenship in the unseen or spiritual world than with this coarser physical world, because the spiritual world is our continuous abiding-place, and our real and enduring self is our spiritual self. Spiritual things are the things that abide, while physical things are evanescent, subject to decay and disintegration.

Realizing this relation of citizenship in both worlds, it seems easier and quite natural to enter into the enjoyment of soul communion with friends in both spheres, embodied and disembodied, for we are in close contact with each world and the dwellers therein, the spiritual not less than the objectively physical.

And in the cognition of this spiritual relationship with both worlds, we may more freely give forth our silent thought, in the assurance that it will be received and spiritually sensed on both planes, or in both realms of existence. There will be no bars to limit or circumscribe the free reach of our thought on this or the other side of the one great world of life and being which infolds time and eternity in the One Eternal Now. One comes in touch with souls on the mortal and the immortal spheres of life and enjoys soul communion with spiritual kindred here and beyond the veil. This gives spiritual enlargement, soul growth; and that other world Unseen is not as a distant foreign country, but is felt and sensed as our true, abiding home, and we feel that in verity it is in that spiritual world, rather than in this of physical environments and limitations, we live and move and have our being. We know that our spiritual nature is our real self, and is therefore more closely related to the spiritual than the physical world.

There are times when the goings-out of our thoughts carry with them a magnetic glow that lights and warms and thrills till the thinking soul seems lifted up and borne away as on angel pinions to scenes of supernal life and beauty—a thought-world of pure ideal sweetness, light and love.

Coming back, as one yet in mortal needs must, from such journeyings to celestial realms, one feels more keenly the harsh abrasions incident to everyday life; and experience induces a more strenuous appreciation of and longing for that higher and purer ideal life of which we have been favored with such bright glimpses. Such spiritual experience induces a spiritual home-sickness, a longing and uplifting desire that impels and draws the soul's thoughts upward and onward in loving outreach toward the blessed ideal, the beautiful vision that has been opened to the spiritual eye.

THE MOUNT OF VISION.

Upon the Mount of Vision fair I stand,
In sweet soul-silent attitude I wait,
And visions of a beautiful bright land
Break on my sight and make my heart elate.
Tongue may not voice the beauty that appears,
Nor pen portray that heavenly excellence—
'Tis the pure gift that blesses souls of seers,
That they may bless mankind thro' that clear sense.

How sings my soul in rhythmic gladness strong,
Exultant o'er the fair prospective view,
And raises clear its joyful pean song,
Whose echoes flow the heavenly spaces through.
All bright with light the mountain tops appear,
And angels beck'ning lend their voice of love,
Mid Earth's soul-struggles giving strength and cheer,
To lift my longing soul to heights above.

The beatific vision with me stays,
Alluring with its beauty all divine,
And yearningly and lovingly I gaze,
And wish its blessedness were wholly mine.
Nor earth's sweet charms nor brightness of the stars
Can win my eyes nor thoughts from it away:
Wait patient, till sweet Death removes the bars,
And yields glad entrance to Supernal Day.

My raptured soul goes out in loving thought,
That meets the loving thought of souls above,
And tho' by earthly name I know them not,
We meet as kindred in the tie of love.
Inbreathing thoughts from loving souls to me,
My soul expands to reach the vision given,
And yearning for the blessedness I see,
I mount the gilded stepping-stones tow'rd Heaven.

WHEN OLD JACK DIED.

When old Jack died we stayed from school (they said
At home we needn't go that day), and none
Of us ate any breakfast—only one,
And that was papa, and his eyes were red
When he came round where we were, by the shed,
Where Jack was lying, half way in the sun
And half in the shade. When we begun
To cry out loud pa turned and dropped his head
And went away; and mamma, she went back
Into the kitchen. Then for a long while
All to ourselves like, we stood there and cried—
We thought so many good things of old Jack,
And funny things—although we didn't smile—
We couldn't only cry when old Jack died!

When old Jack died it seemed a human friend
Had suddenly gone from us; that some face
That we had loved to fondle and embrace
From babyhood no more would condescend
To smile on us forever. We might bend
With tearful eyes above him, interlace
Our chubby fingers o'er him, romp and race,
Plead with him, call and coax—aye, we might send
The old halloo up for him, whistle, hist
(If sobs had let us) or, as wildly vain,
Snapped thumbs, called "Speak!" and he had not replied;
We might have gone down on our knees and kissed
The tousled ears, yet they must remain,
Deaf, motionless, we knew—when old Jack died!

When old Jack died, it seemed to us, some way,
That all the other dogs in town were pained
With our bereavement, and some that were chained
Even unslipped their collars on that day
To visit Jack in state, as though to pay
A last sad tribute there, while neighbors craned
Their heads above the high board fence, and deigned
To sigh "Poor dog!" remembering how they
Had cuffed him when alive, perchance because
For love of them he leaped to lick their hands—
Now that he could not, were they satisfied?
We children thought that, as we crossed his paws,
And o'er his grave, way down the bottomlands,
Wrote "Our First Love Lies Here," when old Jack died!

SPIRITUALISM.

Lecture at Lily Dale, by Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood, who as a scientist and psychist stands among the highest and most profound on the continent, delivered an able lecture Friday. He makes statements that are to the point and proves what he says in an unquestionable manner. His subject was "The Conflict Between Science and Religion in the Realm of Spiritualism." In part he said:

"The scholarship of modern thought discovers in the arrangement of the Bible many conflicting statements which have ever been a source of annoyance and contention to the investigating mind. The first chapter of Genesis presents a class of thought belonging to an Elohistic age. The term 'elohism' is of very ancient origin and means, when correctly interpreted, principles of nature. It is a plural noun and in no scientific sense can represent an individual or personality called God. Between these ages of elohistic character and Jehovistic attributes we find a great lapse of time, representing a period of nature worship in the elohistic ideal. The first chapter of Genesis is a beautiful prophetic poem of natural evolution, and if when you read it you will insert the words 'principles of nature' instead of the term God, as found in the translation, remembering that it is a poem, in which the principles of nature are deified you will get a clearer conception of the dignity of the poem. Between these ideals and those of the Jehovistic period, there has ever been waged a mental conflict as wide in its formula of disagreement as the demonstrations of modern science are from the early formulas of faith qualifying ecclesiasticism. We can only briefly present these issues in their bearing upon the real question under discussion.

"Heretofore, speculators and thinkers have conceived of the visible world as the real expression of a materialistic universe, but modern science discovers that nowhere do we see the real operating energies of time and space that promote visibility of form. Recent discoveries demonstrate that all forms of visible matter are actuated by an invisible shaping or formative principle, and that what we see of nature is only the phenomena of these invisible energies in the expression. We have been taught that the matter we saw was real, but a later and more scientific view discovers that what we see is never the real, but only the changing form in nature's process of evolution. We are told of man's physical senses, but close physiological investigation discovers that man has no physical sense. All sensations are in consciousness, the result of impressions made upon it by invisible or psychic modes of motion. The eye and the ear and all the mechanism of the so-called five senses of man are only electrodes connecting objective nature to human consciousness. Man has no vision until his consciousness, an attribute of the soul, has been impressed by the vibrations of physical or objective nature. Consciousness sees, consciousness hears, consciousness alone has sensation and the avenues are only connecting lines through which vibrations of various characters are involved in their action upon the citadel of consciousness.

"The word 'psychic' is of Greek origin, and means to breathe upon. You will see an analogy of what this breathing upon in nature, means, when I show you the relationship between this bar of steel which, like a needle, is driven away from the presence of this large magnet. This action is psychic or invisible and we will find by a close investigation of cosmic process that nature is psychic in all her operations. The action of heat upon this metallic thermometer, is known only to science as an invisible mode of motion of heat, operating upon the contracting or expanding metallic wires. We cannot see the reaction that takes place in the molecular structure of the mechanism in this phenomenon. It is beyond our vision. We find also in this barometer an instrument so finely made that the rising or falling of the pressure of the atmosphere which changes as we move our instrument into higher altitudes. This process is also psychic. The transference of thought motion through a telephone transmitter is also invisible and psychic in its co-operations, by which we mean that an impulse projected upon the annode end of the line is transmitted throughout the wire as an invisible mode of mental motion evoking thought and sensation of speech in the consciousness that receives the message at the other end of the line.

"Hence, Spiritualism, understood in this higher sense, is a scientific philosophy of invisible modes of motion, and a complete analysis of these modes of motion will disclose the truth that man's mental sphere is eternally co-related to reciprocal mental spheres through this same continuous order of nature's co-relations, and the discoveries in modern psychic research demonstrate that consciousness is united to consciousness through great distances of space when these mental spheres are in reciprocal polarity, and the application of the grand truth of thought transference as invisible modes of motion comprises a truth which finds its analogy in every department of cosmic process.

"Stars and systems and centers of astronomical nebula, are found to be infinitely co-related, and the phenomena of these co-relations give to us the varying procession of the seasons. If mind be thus related to mind through states of reciprocal polarity, in which phenomena we discover the plane of mental energy and its relations, we shall find this truth unites human consciousness to a realm of life beyond the grave. We affirm that these principles of conscious affinity through the action of invisible modes of motion find their analogy and are expressed in every demonstration of philosophical research, and proves beyond the possibility of doubt, that consciousness is related to consciousness beyond the grave. And we also affirm that these immutable principles of time and space existed before the Bibles of any civilization were known; before primitive man knew he was a progressive, undying soul. Therefore, a belief in any of these so-called sacred writings has nothing whatever to do with the interpretations of those principles which existed in cosmic process before this planet swung in space. Hence it is not difficult to see that the divergence of thought between ecclesiasticism with all of its creeds and schisms established upon the Bible are divergent from the truths of demonstrative science in the arena of the evolution of the human soul as a cosmic fact, and this conflict between science and religion will continue until the science of the Spiritual philosophy establishing its own data upon known facts, proves the evolution and immortality of the human soul to be a truth in nature and has nothing whatever to do with the religious ideas of a primitive and pagan age."—Correspondence in the Jamestown Evening Journal.

A PREDICTION.

Invention of Beautiful Building Material.

Reading in The Progressive Thinker (July 14, 1900) "Life and Experiences in Spirit Land," by Spirit Franz Petersilea, I am reminded of a certain prophetic vision that has often come before my mind within the past twelve years. I have told it to no one, nor written it down, but now it seems to me that perhaps it might be interesting reading, so I will write it for The Progressive Thinker. The prophecy is this: There will come a time when man will discover a process for making building material from soil or earth matter, which will take the place of lumber for building purposes. The earth will first be reduced to a semi-liquid state by a chemical process and then become hardened and ready for use, all of which can be quickly and cheaply done. It will be strong and very durable, molded into any desired size, shape or dimensions, to a great extent. The whole side of a house can be molded in one piece or section. An ordinary house, if not too large, can be almost completed with eight sections—one for floor—four for the sides, with places left open for doors and windows—two for roof—one light piece for ceiling. A house can be built in one day. Larger buildings will require more time for construction; a greater number of sections, with strength of material in proportion to size. It will be a great saving of time, money and labor. Dwellings will be plenty and rents very low. Outside of cities it will require but little capital for a person to his own or her own house. The houses will be fire-proof and far more durable than those constructed of wood.

It does not appear to me that the invention will be suddenly revealed in its completeness, but it must come by progressive steps. I am an inventor, yet my guides have not shown me that I shall take a part in it directly, nor that I shall be living on the earth plane when the fulfillment shall appear.

Someone may say: "Why don't the spirits show it to us now?" They can't. It requires labor, time, patience and the co-operation of mortals. It may in some instances take years, yea, hundreds of years for the accomplishment of a design. If Spiritualists and progressive thinkers will give some thought to this problem, it will come to pass much sooner than it otherwise would; for this will help the spirit inventors to bring it about, which they are trying to do as soon as possible.

I wish to corroborate the prediction by a quotation from Petersilea's narrative, bearing directly on the point:

"The day is not far distant when great palaces will be erected, built from vast blocks of crystal, in all the beautiful shades and colors found in prismatic states. Many of these buildings will be patterned after the brilliantly stained glass now only used in windows, but as soon as the great white heat is discovered, sand will be more precious than gold, and will be used for thousands of purposes never thought of before—it will be smelted into glass, most elegantly colored, and pressed into great thick slabs and tiles, pillars, domes. Great glass factories will line the seashore and inland where sand may be found. Houses will be built entirely of glass, requiring no inside work except doors, and these will also be made of pressed glass. The glass for buildings will be opaque, yet light will glitter through all the lovely coloring. Sidewalks and flagging will be laid in ground glass.

"All this already exists as a great scientific truth, here in the spheres, as soon as possible to be given to earth. We withhold nothing from earth that the people are capable of receiving. Even your cars and vehicles will be made of glass. There will shortly come a time which might be properly called the 'Glass Age.' Nothing now seems so utterly barren and worthless as a great sand desert, but when the glass age comes, nothing will be more precious and useful: in fact, together with electricity and white heat, it will make a new and most brilliant age and, really, little else will be needed except food and clothing; but there will be new inventions to supply these wants. Exceedingly soft, warm, pliable material will be pressed into suitable clothing that will not cost as much as the washing of a garment does now. People can have beautiful homes wherein very little labor will be needed. All manner of dishes and household utensils will be made of glass, easily kept clean. The glass and electrical age takes the place of wood, stone and iron. We know whereof we speak. Just this that we have written has already been taught us in the Temple of Wisdom."

WHAT DOES SPIRITUALISM INCLUDE, AND WHAT ARE THE DUTIES IT IMPOSES?

By Prof. J. S. LOVELAND, Summerland, California.

NUMBER THREE.

In the preceding article, I have briefly shown that mediumship is the embodiment and manifestation of the fundamental energies or principles of physical and mental life. And that this manifestation is in harmony with laws hitherto unknown and unsuspected. So far as man's physical organization is concerned, the scientist has had no scruples in entering the domain of anatomy and physiology to develop and explore its mysteries. He has also subjected the mind to analysis, and created the science of psychology. But when the great mass of phenomena, which are developed by mediumship, have been approached, he has made a halt and turned them over to the supernatural or miraculous, which has been regarded as above and beyond the scope of scientific research. There has been no limit to the speculations and theories about them, but to secure knowledge by the scientific method is the achievement of the last half of the present century. Man had so far progressed that upon the outbreak of the Spiritistic phenomena, in the middle of this century, he at once began the investigation of the facts and laws of the same, resulting in the deductions heretofore submitted. And they have led us, as shown, to the very arcana of life itself. Instead of being discreted from human life and law and performed by some supernal power, good or bad, we have found them to be the very embodiment of the most occult and potent energies of human life, acting in accord with immutable, natural laws.

The limits of these articles do not allow of a minute and exhaustive analysis of the cognate branches of the science of life. Hence, I have confined myself to the essential points necessary as a basis for the philosophical portion of my essay. But, if I had repeated all the vast array of facts embodied in Chemistry, Physiology, Psychology, etc., I should have reached only what I now have, with my brief anaylsis of mediumship, viz, Life. Botany and Zoology conduct us to Life as the great causative energy of organized forms. The end of all our generalizations is life, only life. And as mediumship, that is Spiritualism, is the outworking of Life, in its most potent and occult manner, combining in most perfect union the life energies of man as a physical, mental and immortal entity, it is logically legitimate to term it the Science and Philosophy of Life. It includes Life in its essence—in its activities and in its duration. It is not life in one phase, as found in the vegetable and the animal, but it is the embodiment and culmination of all phases and energies of life in eternal conjunction. Spiritualism is the apex of the life evolution of past eternities.

In cosmic evolution, there has been a steady advancement; the later forms including the energies of the preceding, thus showing continual ascension in functional capacity. That ascension has reached its highest point in mediumistic life functions. Having pursued the scientific method till we found life to be the principle reached by all our analyses, we are now prepared to reverse the process and consider the bearing of our deductions upon the law of human action, or apply the ethical principles emergent therefrom to the relations and activities of human life.

In discussing this great question, I submit that Right is one of the attributes of Life. And, however individualized or personalized it may be, right still inheres in its very essence. The special character and extent of right is determined by two considerations. 1. The innate capacity of the thing or person to do, or to appropriate. The capacity must be determined by the actual power possessed. 2. By the relations existing between the various forms of life. Certain forms can perform only a definite series of uses. That area of use is their entire sphere of right. The sphere belonging to the mere animal cannot cover that of man though it may embrace a portion of it. Another way of expressing the great fact of right is to say, needs are the true measure of rights, because needs are the exponents of capacities. There can be no needs where there is no capacity. Seemingly there is a conflict between man and the animal kingdom. I have not space to treat the question at length, and will submit this self-evident proposition: Man's right over the lives of animals cannot extend one inch beyond supplying his actual needs for food and protection. To kill for sport is wanton cruelty and murder. As right can be affirmed of nothing but a sensitive or living entity, and as the extent of right must be measured and limited by the inherent powers of life possessed, it will follow that the rights of the same class of life forms will always be the same in essence, and varying in quantity according to the growth or development of the object. One man will possess the right to a larger amount of food than another because his organism requires more for its support. The man who weighs two or three hundred pounds will have the right to more cloth for his garments than the one who only weighs one hundred and twenty. But the right to coats, pants, etc., will be the same in all cases, because life in them all needs the same essential things though varying slightly in quantity.

Rights being innate attributes of life no one can abdicate them. Man can no more divest himself of his rights (except by crime) than he can of life itself; and he, who seeks, or consents so to do is a traitor to humanity and a suicide of his own highest nature.

Rights may be classified as primary and secondary, or higher and lower. The supreme right is, as shown, life itself. The secondary ones are the conditions or means necessary to the continuance and development of the same. But the primary includes the secondary, hence, life carries with it the right to all the conditions and means for its continuance and expansion, and the unrestricted use of all its powers and possibilities.

Evolution has developed a phase of life which we term social or national. It began with the family, expanded to the tribe, and ultimately became the nation. This aggregation of individuals into a nation was no result of thinking, planning or study. Nations grew as naturally and as necessarily as the person grows. It was a natural outgrowth of the universal life. There was no surrendering of some rights to secure the protection of others. The instinctive affiliation of men into tribe and nation is only a manifestation of the absolute oneness of the Universal Life principle. In a true nationality, no one surrenders any right, or part of one. The protection of right is the object of a just government, and this can be more perfectly done by a seggregation of duties than by each individual performing the whole for himself. Hence, the assignment of some to military, and others to civic duties, is a wiser and a more economical method than for all men to be soldiers, policemen, etc. It is a form of co-operation.

But the development of the social life and state involves certain relations between the individual and the state, which need to be well understood. And as it is the relation of the self-conscious, personal life to the universal life, as it is aggregated in the social wholeness, we must correctly comprehend those relations or we can never understand the reciprocal rights and duties of the single person and the social unity. The personal selfhood is an integral potency of the social oneness. It is a factor of the sum total of national life and power. Each one possesses all the rights possessed by any other one. The nation does not possess any rights not inherent in the individual. The function of the nation is to preserve inviolate every right of every member thereof. It can never justly invade or usurp a personal right. Seemingly this is done, when personal possessions are taken for public use. But, as the welfare of the person is involved in that of the state, it is really for his own good, and where ample restitution is made there can be no valid plea of wrong. But, if private possessions are seized and full recompense not made, or if it is for private or corporate use that the seizure is made, then right is violated and wrong perpetrated.

So far as natural wealth is concerned, the only right of the individual is to its use. The ownership in perpetuity of any natural wealth by the individual is impossible as a right. And wherever it is claimed and attempted to be exercised it is a flagrant usurpation of the inalienable right of the social unity. The individual is transitory, the state is continuous. The state is bound to furnish each unit of the composite wholeness the use of all the natural wealth necessary for its subsistence and development. But, if the individual man can rightfully secure the ownership of natural wealth, in a few decades, the entire natural wealth of the world may pass into a few hands and the many will have no right to stand upon the earth except by the sufferance of the few owners of the soil. It is said that the Astor family own $600,000,000 of the real estate of New York City. How long before they can own the whole? It is impossible, in the nature of things, that any individual can acquire absolute ownership of what he has no need, and especially if necessity exists for its use by some one else. Life is universal. Life is the same in essence in every person. The right of ownership is in the universal, and only the right of use in the individual; and that right limited by needs as to amount, and by earthly life as to duration, because earth life includes all the necessity for use to the individual.

The perfection of the social life is the perfection of the individual units composing that life; hence, it would seem that even egoism would demand that the social wholeness should direct its energies to the evolution and perfecting of every individual life or unit factor of its organization. Partiality or special favors to one over another would be impossible if right was done. Justice would hold an even balance, and all would stand upon the plane of perfect equality. Perfect justice would be the program of the state, and altruism that of the individual members. The absolute identity of human interests is so self-evident to all thinking minds, who have grasped the great fact of the oneness of the universal life principle, that it is passing strange that any law should remain on the statute books of any enlightened nation allowing ownership in perpetuity of land, or any other form of natural wealth, as it is nothing but special favors to the few. The productive energies of no one person can very much, if any, exceed the supply of their necessities, consequently a great excess of accumulation must be the result of some robbery of others as the result of special favoritism.

It is surprising that people, able to comprehend the sameness of the attributes in humanity, should not recognize, not only the absolute oneness of life, but also the relations existing between the unit forms of that life. It seems impossible not to perceive that the welfare of each of the parts is indispensable to the welfare of the whole, and vice versa. And, when the idea of future existence is admitted, it is still more unaccountable how any, entertaining that idea, can be found occupying any other position than that of the universal brotherhood of humanity. And when we add to that the revelations claimed to be furnished by the mediumship of Modern Spiritualism, and finding as we have that mediumship is one of the evolutions of life on its highest and most occult plane of manifestation, we are still more astonished at the apathy of professed Spiritualists in reference to the position which their principles place them in, toward the great humanity around them. Having discovered the laws and functions of life, as belonging to man, heretofore attributed to Gods or Devils, and thus put in possession of the means to interpret and explain all the supernaturalism, all the mysteries of all the world religions, most certainly the position of Spiritualism is that of leader and interpreter of the world's thought, in all that pertains to the attributes and manifestations of its religious life. If Modern Spiritualism has not spoken the last word to be uttered in reference to life, it has spoken the last, and the most revelatory one that has yet been uttered. And no more will or can be uttered until present utterances are comprehended, and the principles applied to the unfolding and beautifying of of life as has never yet been done in the history of this planet.

No one interested even in a small degree, in human advancement, should lose sight of the fact that all reforms are only so many expressions of life. Don't forget that there is, that there can be nothing pertaining to man, outside of life. Moreover, no advancement, no sort of improvement is possible only so far as the relations of living entities to each other are understood and adjusted in conformity with the absolute right. And, as I have suggested, the absolute right is nothing but life forms (individuals) acting out all the capacities they possess. This would be freedom in its truest, highest sense. This would be the "pursuit of happiness" with untrammeled, unburdened hands and feet. It would be the manifestation of man and womanhood in a perfection this earth has never yet seen. It would be such a fulfillment of the old Greek precept Gnothi Lanton, (know thyself) as the Greeks never conceived, for it would be life, in its understanding attitude, comprehending itself as the wisdom and love of the Cosmos. As the eye the ear, the heart and brain of the human wholeness. More than that it would be life, not only recognizing itself in self-conscious thought as the light of all science, the summary of all philosophy and the sum total of all religions, but also as the sun which shall fill eternity with its outbeaming splendor and undimmed brightness.

Brother, sister Spiritualists, I beg you for once to pause and for just a little while contemplate what life was before the science and philosophy of Spiritualism secured lodgment in the human consciousness. And also what it is now where its revelations are unknown or rejected. Think of the status of man in the light, or rather the darkness of the old religious creeds! "Conceived in sin and shapen in iniquity" and born into a probation sure to send the vast majority to an endless hell! Or if a more hopeful view was taken, his welfare was purchased with the agonies of a dying God, and he was "saved by grace through faith, and that not of himself it was the gift of God." Knowledge of self was not sought, but knowledge of an unknowable something was the grand pursuit. Instead of seeking to outwork a noble, altruistic character, you were tied down to the degrading notion that every good and perfect thing was from above and came down from from the unknowable something living everywhere. Human life, human nature was a weak, polluted thing, and all the beauty it could ever show was the tinsel finery of grace, washed in blood, and worn forever as the badge of eternal dependence and servitude.

How vast the change wrought by the word uttered by Spiritualism. Man is the evolving, self-conscious, personal life. The glory that shall shine "more and more unto the perfect day" is no "blood-bought" gift—no "Holy Ghost" regeneration. It is the essential, life entity, which, innately perfect in its essence, will unfold in more and more grand and beautiful manifestations of love and wisdom forever. And through all the ages retain the satisfying consciousness of self-merit and deserving worthiness for it all. Could contrast be greater? Could a longer step be desired for one epoch of progress? Can any position befitting Spiritualism be imagined except that of Leader and Interpreter of the world's philosophy? We must lead or follow. What shall we follow? Where is the science and philosophy of Life if it is not embodied in Spiritualism? If Spiritualism is only a part, what and where is the wholeness? Who will answer?

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER THIRTY-FOUR.

As we come en rapport with the forty or fifty thousand readers of The Progressive Thinker, we find within the minds of these persons a question—a really imperative question—which they greatly desire that we, as spirits, should answer.

"Is it possible for spiritual beings to visit such remote, far away zones as the so-called Milky Way, or stars so far distant that it takes such a long period of time for their light to reach us here? Can a spiritual being travel more rapidly than light?" and we answer:

A spiritual body cannot travel to these far distant spheres. A spiritual body cannot travel faster than light—we here refer to the sublimated material spiritual body—but within this body is another body, which for want of a better name we shall call the thought body.

Some may think that we here mean the soul, but we do not, for within this thought body dwells the soul. A person on earth, who has not yet laid aside the material body, has a material body, a spiritual body, a thought body, and a soul. The soul is the immortal living principle that has neither beginning nor end, and it clothes itself with these various bodies or substances—the material body, the spiritual body, the thought body—and it expresses itself through these various forms.

The material body cannot leave the material earth, and yet the thought body can transfer itself instantaneously to any part of the globe, as well as to the far away regions in space. The spiritual body, after leaving the material body, cannot leave the spiritual spheres, but the thought body can go, in a comparatively short time, to any sphere or zone that it is possible to cognize; but when the spirit is freed from the earthly body its powers are increased an hundred fold, and its perceptions and sight become clear and lucid.

If, while in the material body one can weigh and measure the stars and compute their distance, understand them somewhat, and see their light, what may not the soul and thought body be capable of? But we have the power here of freeing ourselves of the spiritual body for quite lengthy periods of time. One might say the spiritual body goes to sleep, or becomes unconscious, while the soul and thought body fly away to other zones.

And this is what we meant when, in a former letter we stated that men of earth traveled from one city to another, from one country to another, and occasionally around the globe; while we, here, traveled from one sphere to another, from one planet to another, and occasionally took a turn through the milky way, as we really do; still, we can visit all the planets in our sublimated spiritual body, that is, all belonging to the system of which your earth is one.

After we have taken these delightful journeys we return home, so to speak, enlarged and refreshed, having added to our store of knowledge. We return and impart what we have gained to those who are not yet able to disentangle themselves from their material, spiritual bodies, and to those of earth, if they desire to know, and ask in all seriousness, with minds receptive to truth; but a carking, captious, fault-finding spirit is obnoxious to the higher intelligences; and when a spirit is doing its utmost to give truth to the world, it does not like to be met with the cry—"Evil spirit! Fraud! Lying spirit! Deceiver!" Suppose, for instance, that a teacher or lecturer of earth was engaged in giving the best of the knowledge he had attained to an audience, and as he was striving to elucidate some point one should rise up and shout—"Liar! Deceiver! Fraud! Blatant Ananias!" and so forth. What would you think of such an one? Probably the lecturer would sit down in confusion and one in authority, or in other words a policeman, would immediately remove the offender of good manners and decency; and we here in the spirit are even more sensitive to such rudeness than those of earth. But when one asks questions which one really and earnestly desires to have answered because one wishes to know, then it is a pleasure to us to answer such questions to the best of our knowledge and ability.

There are spirits here who might not be able to visit any zone, or even a planet, in a thousand years; such ones being bound down to gross materiality; and, allow us to say, that some of the very learned and erudite ones of earth, on coming here, are more obtuse than some of those who were on earth considered extremely ignorant. Take, for instance, one who is all technic—who can tell you the names of almost everything, but has little or no perception of spirituality or spiritual things—one who deals in words, words, words, and when he gets through one can scarcely find an idea among them—one who, perhaps, can talk or write for hours, and when he is done you look for an original thought, or, in fact, any thought at all, and feel as though you were looking for a needle in a hay-mow. Such spirits may be, and often are, here a great many years and know but little if any more than they did when on earth. Oh, they are dry souls—husky and dry beyond measure!

Nearly all the technical terms used on earth are useless to us here—so useless, indeed, that we often quite forget them. Spirits use very little language, their thoughts being transferred one to another without much speaking.

Error can be clothed in words without number—yea, a whole dictionary of words; but truth is so simple that it needs little more than a glance or gesture. A mother has only to look into her baby's eyes to tell it that she loves it, and the baby understands it entirely, trusts her wholly, without a word being spoken on either side; in fact the baby does not yet understand a word of spoken language, but it understands perfectly just what the mother wishes it to know. The most silent people are often the wisest, and the greatest amount of wisdom is gained by retiring into the silence where the soul holds silent communion with the higher angels, the thoughts or truths of the angels flowing into the receptive mind without a word being uttered on either side. There is scarcely a question that the human mind can ask that may not be answered, truthfully, in this way. The more erroneous an idea, the more words it takes to bolster it up, but truth can stand alone without such wordy props. Beautiful jewels are often hidden by heaps of rubbish.

LETTER NUMBER THIRTY-FIVE.

We wish now to tell you a little more about the future of the earthly world. Do not say that the future cannot be prophesied, for that which exists here with us we know and are sure of. We also know that many of the truths that are in operation here will soon be given to the world below, and one, among many others, is that of thought photography.

You have already got wireless telegraphy; the next thing will be thought telegraphy together with thought photography.

Now thought can travel as fast as electricity and even faster. The brain is really a storage battery, it not only sends forth its currents of thought but it is a receiver at the same time. Earthly language is to become less instead of more, for when once thought photography becomes firmly established and in fine working order, people will learn to condense their thoughts into as few words as possible, and the simpler the better. Much that is now called imagination is really photography. The sensitive brain of one who is highly mediumistic receives impressions from the ethereal atmosphere, just as a sensitized plate receives and holds fast the objects designed to be photographed.

We know a lady who is so mediumistic, and whose brain is so sensitive, that she knows about all that is taking place on the earth, at all times, without taking the slightest trouble to inform herself of these things by reading the daily papers. In fact, daily papers are not admitted into her house, and she has, long ago, ceased to read them, they render her so miserable—the murders, the suicides, the scandal, the police records, the catering to fashion and fads, the sickening details of fashionable society, the cruelty, the injustice, and all the details that go to make up a daily newspaper; but, without reading or hearing a word she can tell nearly all that is transpiring in the world; and those who are, as they suppose, thinking, planning, and perhaps writing great things secretly, their thoughts are not secret at all, for the electrical ether, or the electrical currents within the ether, are carrying them almost instantly, and they are being reproduced or photographed on the brain of this sensitive and all other sensitives like her, also the image of the person or persons who are thus thinking, planning and writing.

That which is called clairvoyance will, bye and bye, be much better understood than at present. Hundreds on the earth to-day are secretly, or otherwise, engaged in testing telepathy, and the results, to them, have been most wonderful; although the words are never quite exact the thought is; and this shows the truth of what we before stated, that words will become of less account while the thoughts will be all important.

Now there are those at the present time who are trying to discover the method whereby thoughts can be photographed so that they may be seen with the material eye; and, believe us, friends, it will soon be brought about; the time is also near at hand when your spirit friends will be able to give you their pictures together with much of the scenery in spirit life, and then will be proved, beyond cavil or doubt, the existence of animal life here in the spheres; for in the spirit scenery the animals will appear.

It is knowledge like this which will save the world and bring it up out of selfish sensuality; not the crystallizing of new creeds and the forming of new societies, patterned after the old, where a few may have honors and emolument conferred upon them and thereby reap a goodly harvest of shekels. Sitting in the silence to receive instruction from higher intelligences, the home circle where there is no incentive for fraud, and the reading and writing of good spiritual literature is better, far better, than all the societies, creeds and promiscuous seances in the world. When mediumship is not bartered for money it will be better for all.

Why should the divine gift of mediumship be sold for filthy lucre? Why not earn money in other ways, through regular business channels, and keep the divine gift pure and unspotted from the world? It may be said that the laborer is worthy of his hire; but why make it a calling for hire? Just so long as it is, just so long the world must expect fraud, for the persons who work for hire will always try to please those who pay them that they may gain more and larger hire. So, wonder not that your ranks are filled with fraud, for the one who can give the most wonderful things gets the most money. Now if mediumship never received a cent of pay from any quarter, fraud would die a natural death and be buried out of sight forever—and, friends, allow us to tell you that all will have to come to this at last. Your wonderful materializing seances and public tests will all have to die the death, for so many frauds will arise—so many disgraceful arrests will be made, that these things will become a stench in the nostrils.

Spirits never materialize that a so-called medium may receive a dollar for each visitor—never, never, dear friends! Do not believe it. Spiritual beings very rarely materialize and when they do it is usually in private. They sometimes make themselves visible to some dearly beloved, grief-stricken friend, to whom they were tenderly attached, to assure them that they are not dead, but simply invisible to the eyes of the mourner; they strive hard to let the grief-stricken one know this great truth by making themselves as tangible as possible for a few moments. Sometimes an earthbound spirit will haunt a house, or other locality, occasionally making itself visible. Then there are spirits who are revengeful; they desire to be revenged on someone who injured them in life; perhaps they were murdered, or robbed, or ruined, and they thirst for revenge; but these are earth-bound and there is very little good accomplished by such appearances.

If every seance-room could be visited by men of science—exact science—and every medium claiming the gift of being able to make spirits materialize could be subjected to such conditions that fraud would be impossible, very little materializing would be found in the world, and what there was would be genuine and worthy to be placed, as a great truth, with the exact sciences. When such a medium was found and tested beyond all question of doubt, then such an one should be surrounded by the most favorable conditions and all reasonable wants and necessities supplied or a reasonable salary paid them as well as a guarantee of support in sickness or old age; but, even then, each seance should be strictly tested so that no fraud could possibly creep in.

There are other errors that we should like to write about, and one is, that some who leave earth are not given a chance to manifest themselves if they would. This does not apply to the phase of materialization, but to that of spirit control of thought photography. If a very noted person of earth comes here and wishes to give information to the world he has left, he is met by the cry, "Oh, this cannot emanate from the spirit of such an one. It is not worthy of him;" and Mr. Ingersoll wants to say a few words on this subject which we will reserve for our next letter.

Trances Have Saved This Girl's Life.

The Record, of Troy, N. Y., says: "Miss Mamie Burch, daughter of B. S. Burch, of Petersburg, Va., has just emerged from her fourth trance. Her case is considered by physicians a most remarkable one. Before she went into these trances Miss Burch was suffering from a violent form of dyspepsia. About six months ago she had her first trance and for three weeks she could not be aroused. In the second trance she sang beautifully but could not be communicated with. In one of her trances she imagined that she saw her dead brother.

"These trances, Dr. J. F. Booth says, have saved her life, as medical skill had been exhausted when nature came to her rescue.

"Miss Burch awakes restored to fair health, except for emaciation from lack of food. Her mental faculties after each trance have been clear and she says that she enjoys the sleep and feels benefited."

Her Birthday Bible.

A dear little girl who lives on the North Side was 9 years old a few days ago, and among the presents that she received was a beautiful Bible from her auntie.

After the exciting events of the day were over the lady who presented the good book called to find out how it had been received.

"Yes," said Katherine very thoughtfully, "it's a beautiful book."

"I am so glad you are pleased with it," her aunt replied.

"It must have cost a great deal, too."

"It was rather expensive."

"And I have three other Bibles. They are all alike inside, aren't they? And this is just the same as the rest, except the binding, isn't it?"

"Yes, dear."

"Well, it seems to me you might have done better with all the money you had to pay for it if you had bought me a pup."—Chicago Times-Herald.

Those edges soonest turn that are most keen; a sober moderation stands sure, no violent extremes endure.—Aleyn.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

THE OCCULT.

It Is Manifested Among All Classes and Cults.

"Stretch out your arm," and with a lunge like that of a pugilist Herman Finley, the newsy, known all over the downtown district, shot out an arm paralyzed since birth. The next moment he stood flat on his feet, when for years one foot had been drawn from the ground by the same dread malady. Standing again on a rude box, beneath the flickering light of a portable gasoline flare, H. C. Blandford gave this exhibition of a power he does not explain. The space in Grant street fronting the court house was crowded with the skeptical, and the believers, the marvelers and the learned delvers into the esoteric theories of life.

After the Finley case, thirty or forty other afflicted people pushed through the dense throng to submit themselves to his silent ministrations. He would place his tapering fingers upon the affected part of the body, close his eyes, go into a seeming trance, while his lips muttered what appeared to be a prayer. A father held up a child afflicted with water on the brain, which caused spasms. There was no immediate cure, but Blanchard said his touch was not always instantaneous in effect. A man came with his wife, and asked that sight be given him. He departed promising to leave off his spectacles, and find whether use would not now restore vision.

Then several negroes brought up Charles Olmstead, a negro paralytic, a well-known property owner in Roberts street. For five years he had been houseridden. He hobbled in a second, and hundreds crowded about him to see the strange use of his limbs. Joe Beck, another paralytic bootblack, found after being touched that he could move an arm. He worked his cramped fingers in glee. These were the apparent cures effected by Blandford's mysterious touch last night, in the other cases the request being made for a return visit. There was no effect produced upon the major portion of the spectators. But many believed on the simple faith, that seeing is believing. The exhibition of the occult power started the student of psychic forces back to his books and his ruminations, which lead to insane asylum, or saintly visions.

Blandford had preceded his laying on of hands by the statement that he would appear nightly at the court house and all persons desiring treatment must receive it in public. He held up the collection basket of the familiar wicker kind, and said that he did not care whether he got money or not. His expenses were paid from a source he need not state. He will appear in various sections of the city twice each day, besides the court house appearance. He has a box of leaflets, he said, in the freight house, and when obtained he will distribute them. The sight was one impressive, when not viewed from the phase of its being an ordinary example of fanaticism.

Blanchford is garbed in the cloth of the Episcopal clergyman, with three red crosses on shoulder and breast. His hair is long and curling. He is the ascetic in appearance, his face pale, chiseled with all the perfection of a young Adonis, and he is not twenty-seven years old yet.

Jacob Wilson, the venerable man whose crutch he took away, as noted in the Sunday Post, stood gratefully by the healer. He rested on a cane, and said he felt better yet. Blandford still kept his crutch and carried it with him to the hotel. When leaving the spot a business man at the corner opposite seized Blandford's hands and examined them closely. He had noticed a small red cross inside of one. It transpired that it was an abrasion of the skin, and no stage accessory.

At the Hotel Duquesne Blandford talked with great fluency of diction to a reporter for the Post. He reels off the whole vocabulary of theology, medicine and anatomy, and never hesitates at the lingo of theosophy, Buddhism, Christian Science or anything scientific or supernatural. In one respect he is no impostor. He is educated. He says he was born in London, England. He was destined for the Episcopal ministry, and sang in the choir, and was an acolyte. His education at the university was curtailed by the death of his father. At fifteen he began public preaching all over England. He knew that he was of the religious character. He knew that he had the religious instinct, and must be Christian or agnostic. He finally became divorced in thought from Episcopalianism, and has ever since taught the literal exposition of the gospels. "Go forth from city to city and preach the gospel, and heal the sick," is to him the exact injunction to be followed by an imitator of Christ.

At fifteen his little brother took ill, and he prayed that he should recover. But he died. At sixteen he found his healing power, and brought back to health an aunt whose life was given up. At eighteen he came to this country, but went back to preach all over the United Kingdom. Four years ago he came to the United States, and has healed and treated in all large Southern cities, in Indianapolis and Cincinnati. He says the police have never interfered with him for he is not a "divine healer."

In Cincinnati, Chief Deitz granted him permission to appear at Fountain Square, the jealously guarded precinct of the city. Blandford has a vein of wit, for he recalled some of the quips the press there visited upon him when he cured leading officials of aches and ills. They said he "healed the heelers even." It will be remembered that Senator Foraker and Mayor Tafel submitted their afflictions to his care in Cincinnati.

Blandford does not explain his power. He says that when he is applying his hands he calls an ecstasy, and though never losing consciousness, has visions of angels. He is "etherealized." This does not always happen, but only when the crowd seems in sympathy. He disclaims being a Christian Scientist, saying that it is related to Buddhism. He is a Christian. He does not oppose the use of medicine, though he allows none of his patients to use it. The Christian Scientist believes that simple faith will cure. Blandford believes there must be some instrument to help. He is that instrument, he claims, and this is the title he prefers. He believes in surgery. Spiritualism, in its rapping and slate-writing branches he ridicules. Hypnotism he accepts thoroughly. In short, Blandford is a mystic, a student of the spiritual in the true sense of the word. All force to him is soul.

Blandford's presence in the city has evidently made many forget the heat and started discussion of the "more things that are in heaven and earth which are not dreamed of in man's philosophy." The healer has been abroad since kings of England laid on hands for scrofula, and miracles of easy solution have mystified the ages for a time. But as a midsummer night dream Blandford will please. What purposes are yet to be revealed are unknown. Many made engagements with him for afflicted relatives as he walked to his hotel last night. If he is a traveling doctor with a religious attachment, he persists in having his doctor shop in the street. He claims to have lectured on medicine in several hospitals, and it is manifest that he knows anatomy. Many of his injunctions to keep up the use of limbs once partially restored is common medical advice.

As an illustration of the readiness of the people to flock toward novelty the crowd around the yellow light last night was perfect. As showing the fascination that the student, as well as the superstitious, has in what is not of earth, it was also strong.—Pittsburg (Pa.) Post.

OWNS A GHOST.

Uncle Sam Owns a Haunted House.

A government watchman vouches for this story. He is employed at one of the department buildings, and declares that the structure contains a ghost; that the place is haunted, and he defies scientists or scoffers to give the lie to his statement. The building in question was purchased by the government a number of years ago. It lies west of the once famous "Tragic park," now called Lafayette park, and was the residence of a prominent statesman long since dead. The statesman built the house when he was in the zenith of his fame, and used it as a place to dispense lavish hospitality. There he arranged all his political intrigues, when the wealth and wits of the nation's capital lived in that section of the city.

The house to-day bears no interior resemblance to what it was in the old days. There has been no change of the exterior, save that the old garden, which in the early days was full of mystic beauty, surrounded by great masses of flowers and sweet smelling shrubs, has been swept away to make room for sidewalks and for adjoining buildings. Thousands of clerks have filed in and out of the building since Uncle Sam became the tenant, thousands of people have thronged past the doors which once swung back to allow the smart set of early Washington to pass within its portals, but not many have heard of the terrible tragedy which was enacted behind those walls, and which the watchman declares is responsible for the nightly sounds of revelry, terminating suddenly in a shriek so low that it cannot be heard outside of the structure, yet so piercing and so heartrending that nothing short of Dante's description of the lost soul's last cry can fittingly describe the sound.

A STORY OF JEALOUSY.

The story of the tragedy is no longer fresh even in the minds of old Washingtonians. It came as a climax to a long series of political intrigues and culminated in one of the greatest political scandals of that period. The curtain was rung down only after murder had been committed. The statesman who enjoyed this social prestige came out of the South. He brought with him a wife, beautiful, refined, tactful and with a manner so captivating that she was quickly drawn into the social maelstrom and had a court of male admirers which soon set the tongues of the Mme. Grundys wagging. The husband seemed to enjoy his wife's social success and indulged her in her slightest whim. But the whirl of tragic events was crowding in upon the pair. First a bit of political treachery was discovered and traced to the doing of the statesman. It resulted in the downfall of a prominent member of Congress, but the clamor which it raised was too loud to be lasting and in a comparatively short time the matter was seemingly forgotten—forgotten by all but one man, and this man had sworn to wreak vengeance upon the man who had brought ruin and disaster upon his uncle.

There is no record obtainable in the city that a murder was committed within those walls. The crime was hinted at in some quarters as suicide, but the doctor's certificate read "heart disease." The beautiful wife of the statesman was found in a bath tub dead. Just two years later to a day the congressman—her husband—was ruined. The social world was shocked at the sudden death. There was no suspicion nor any evidence of foul play, yet one of the most cruel and cold-blooded murders conceivable had brought death to this beautiful woman. It is true that she administered the deadly potion with her own hands, but it was in the presence of the husband she had loved and whom she had been foully accused of betraying that she swallowed the poison.

A FATAL KISS.

The avenger had plotted well. That night the doors of the statesman's house had been thrown open to one of the gayest social functions of the season. Many of the celebrities of that time spent the early evening over a rare dinner and wine, and later the younger guests in dancing. This part was the gayest of the gay, and men flushed with wine carried on desperate flirtations with every pretty woman present. When the climax was reached the hour had grown late. Already a number of the revelers had gone, and the hostess, more beautiful than ever, was bidding adieu to the departing guests. In the crowd that night there was a tall Southerner of soldierly appearance. Throughout the entire evening he had hovered near the hostess, and just as he was about to depart paused on the threshold, spoke something in an undertone and lightly kissed the hostess on the forehead. The statesman was led to the spot by the avenger just as the kiss was imprinted. In an instant a terrible madness invaded his being. He gave the avenger a curt good night and sought his library. He had forgotten that a few hours ago the Southerner had been introduced as his wife's cousin.

The interview between husband and wife was told by a family slave. It was brief, and the verdict was that the wife must die. This she did. Shortly after her death the husband met with both financial and political reverses. In a comparatively short time the whirlwind of disaster swept him off his feet. He left Washington and returned to his home in the South, where a few years later he was killed in a duel by the man whom he had been searching for since that fatal night.

THE HOUSE IS HAUNTED.

Since that tragic event hundreds of families have tried to live in this house. Other statesmen have rented it, but failure and defeat lasted while they lived in the doomed mansion. It was years before the building gained the name of being "hoodooed," but once it got the name people in all walks of life shunned the place, and for a long time before the structure was finally bought by the United States government it was tenantless.

There is no longer a bathroom in the building. But at night, so the watchman declares, between the hours of 2 and 3 a. m., in the little room which is now used for storing files, can be heard very plainly the heartbreaking sobs of a woman, the gurgle of running water and a piercing scream. At first the night watchman thought some of the employes had left the water running in the washbowls, and many nights has he trudged from cellar to roof looking for the running water, only to find every faucet securely shut. The sound of voices he tried to account for by accusing colored folks who live in the alley near by and songful cats. It was the same every night, and the watchman at last became mystified. A search outside proved there were no voices and no cats. He is an old soldier, but the grewsome sounds soon became more than his nerves could stand, and at last he told others of his suspicions. An old negro passing through the building one day heard him discussing the nightly occurrences. He stopped long enough to say that his wife had been a slave in the statesman's family and to tell the story recorded above.—Post, Washington, D. C.

A SKEPTIC,

And His Impressive Challenge.

To the Officers of the Southern California Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Association, Los Angeles, California:

Sirs:—With an earnest desire to settle the controversy concerning the genuineness of the ballot reading practiced by Mrs. Maud Freitag and Mr. Chas. Brockway, I respectfully submit for your consideration, the following proposition: I will place in bank or in the hands of any reliable party to be agreed upon, the sum of one hundred dollars, the entire amount to be forfeited to the camp association if strict test conditions do not prove the ballot reading of both Mrs. Freitag and Mr. Brockway to be the result of sleight-of-hand, the conditions presented to be as follows: Mrs. Freitag to be searched for a rapping machine and to wear soft slippers during the seance. I to furnish the ballots which are to be written by various people unknown to Mrs. Freitag or Mr. Brockway and so sealed as to prevent the possibility of their being opened or read by other than psychic power; the kind and quantity of ballot reading to be the same as given by them in their public seances. The test to take place before a committee to be jointly agreed upon.

Hoping this may meet with your approval and receive favorable attention, I am, very truly yours,

A. M. BUCK.

Los Angeles, Cal., August 23, 1900.

This Mr. Buck is one of the most incorrigible skeptics we ever met. He will not down. Now, we believe in honest skepticism; it is a good thing to have, it is a staple article in one's sensorium. We would like to see, however, this howling skeptic silenced. We believe Mrs. Freitag is an honest medium and a lady. We believe Charles Brockway is a most excellent medium also—none better. We want them to get this man's hundred dollars. They can do it, and thus stop his mouth and pen forever, and pour $100 into the treasury of the camp.

NEBRASKA.

Important Proposition for Nebraska Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—I take the liberty of addressing you by letter for the first time, presuming on your amiability, evidenced by your position in present society as captain of such a paper as The Progressive Thinker. Your position must be a trying one indeed, so many minds to please and so many of the most sensitive in disposition, easily offended and irritable indeed. Knowing this by experience, I have almost feared to encroach on your valuable time, and if it were not that I have a hope that your help would greatly add to the enthusiasm that will be needed to bring our plans to fruition in regard to securing permanent grounds for the Nebraska State Spiritualist Association for camp purposes, I would do so.

At last year's camp and convention held at Lincoln, being called to speak at one of their meetings, I suggested the idea of trying to get a permanent camp location for the association. The suggestion was well received and I was encouraged to work upon that idea and try to bring it into a realization.

In the course of enquiries over the state, I found what I deemed the most advantageous place, in the vicinity of Crete. Although not so centrally located as it might be, yet still very favorably situated. About 20 miles from Lincoln (southwest); 70 from Omaha; 45 from Beatrice, on the main line of the B & M. There is about 110 acres of the finest land in Nebraska; the Blue River runs along the south side of the grounds, making excellent boating facilities for campers who desire this form of recreation. There are also buildings left on the grounds that were formerly used by the Chautauqua Assembly of the Nebraska Sunday-school Association. These buildings are worth at least $4,000, and can be easily repaired and got in order for our work. The total sum asked by the proprietor is $8,000. My plan is to work for 400 subscribers at $20 each giving them back a plat of ground, say 25 x 50 feet, which will probably take 20 acres of the land, reserving the main portion for the Association forever. These lots would be exchangeable, and to be deeded same as any other property. This will give an idea of our plan to be brought before the State Association at Lincoln, September 30 and October 1. With kind wishes for your continued usefulness and welfare in the cause of Truth, I remain, yours fraternally,

JAMES CAMPBELL.

BOOK REVIEW.

Tolstoi. A little book of charming interest is that of Alice B. Stockham, M. D., and Havelock Ellis, published by Alice B. Stockham & Co., Chicago. It affords the reader an interesting study of Tolstoi; his life and teachings, and in a general way a view of Russian home life of the common people. Mr. Ellis presents brief analyses of Count Tolstoi's writings. In this volume the spiritual and metaphysical ideas of Tolstoi are particularly elucidated, as well as his social philosophy.

"Who Are These Spiritualists and What Is Spiritualism?" A pamphlet of 40 pages by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the well-known author. Price 15 cents. For sale at this office.

MISSIONARIES' REPORT

To the State Spiritualist Associaton of Minnesota.

Friends and Members of the State Association:—We were employed by your board of officers to perform the missionary labors of your association for the specific purpose of advocating Spiritualism to the citizens of Minnesota, and to organize local societies as auxiliaries to your body. We found very few names throughout the state were possessed by your secretary, and no specific arrangements made for our prospective labors.

The state was a comparative new field for our cause. Local societies did not exist in more than a very few localities. You had six auxiliaries, principally in Minneapolis and St. Paul. The other large cities of the state were scarcely able to hold meetings. Many localities had never held a Spiritualist meeting, nor their people heard any of our speakers, nor attended a seance. Spiritualism was greatly an unknown philosophy. But, now at the end of one year the truths of Spiritualism are being almost universally discussed throughout the commonwealth.

No longer is it held as an enemy of society and the church; but, hand-in-hand with the best that conserves human interests, is its assured future. With the rapid strides made in one year you should be encouraged to labor and support the future efforts. We need help—personal and financial. We need your moral and intellectual help, and very vitally do we need your financial aid.

The lowest estimate for the coming fiscal year that will be required for missionary work is $1,500. With that sum assured, we can take full risks of holding meetings in every locality in the state. Without aid, we must go only where we can be assured of sufficient receipts to meet the expense—and that mostly by door fees instead of free meetings and voluntary contributions.

We will sadly feel ourselves cut off from the public if we cannot hold free meetings. These have attracted many people to hear us who would not have gone had we charged a door fee. And the people usually make cheerful contribution to the collects taken.

If we sincerely love the spiritual truths revealed to us, we should labor to disseminate the same and be willing to support all practical effort to benefit humanity. We need money in order to reach cities and towns where there are no persons yet willing to espouse our cause. We must try to do a practical missionary work. The cities and towns of Minnesota should each have an organized society and be chartered as your auxiliaries. We will then be able to erect temples and settle speakers and mediums for practical educational and spiritual purposes.

We need to start a fund at once to erect a home temple in Minneapolis, to be owned and used by the state association. A temple fund should be started at once and yearly subscriptions made thereto. We will never obtain results unless efforts are commenced, and we had better start in a small way than not start at all.

We need money to issue spiritual tracts for free distribution and to issue a monthly paper to advocate Spiritual truth.

We need a camp-meeting in Minnesota. We need to render charity in needy cases—especially where a local society may be overtaken by misfortune. And we should protect every earnest and honest medium. Thus, only, will we prevent base people from trespassing upon credulity. Systematic organization is our hope—and to obtain such we need sustenance. Members and money are the sinews and supports to achieve good results.

We must soon destroy inordinate curiosity to see marvels and obtain startling phenomena, by enlarging the view of spiritual truth that messages from spirits and their teaching may be received for comfort and edification.

Mediums should no longer be subject to test suspicion, but protected for an ever increasing utility as spirit instruments.

Let us assist psychics to develop instead of placing barriers of suspicion in their pathway. People must be taught that Spiritualism is an intellectual and a spiritual ism. No longer is it only a phenomenal ism; for we have studied the ethics of phenomena and found mighty truths that lead to scientific and religious development.

We need circles, seances and mediums; but, we need equally the lecture hall, the speaker and teacher.

Let us round out our attainments and conserve the highest utilities of our mental, moral and spiritual faculties. For all these we need greater missionary activity and support. As we are to serve you another year, we now plead for help that we may go forth in confidence. Every person can render some material aid or personal help.

What will you do?

For ourselves, we pledge our physical strength, our mental effort and our spiritual culture in daily devotion.

If health permits, we shall go forth daily into the field of labor and seek the salvation of souls from debauchery, misery, ignorance and superstition, by leading them to know the true way of life on earth and in the spirit.

Our report for ten months of labor is as follows, in addition to the convention and mass-meeting:

Number of meetings held, 200.
Average per month, 20.
Total receipts, $1,173.63.
Receipts from meetings, $1,104.63.
Receipts from 39 members, $39.
Receipts from 5 charters, $25.
Receipts from one funeral, $5.
Average receipts per meeting, $5.55.
Average expense per meeting $5.44½.
Largest receipts at any one meeting, $20.
Smallest receipts at any one meeting, 50 cents.

But we often had less than expense at some meetings, and in one instance, five cents above expense. Average contribution per person, about four and one-half cents.

Total expense, $1,089.06.
Paid to the state association, $684.57.

Net profit to the state association, $84.57, for which they had some local board, printing and secretary bills to pay for the missionary work.

We donated to the local societies, $24.10.

We married one couple during the year.

Traveled in Minnesota, 5,966 miles.

Attendance at meetings, 25,011 persons.

Average attendance, 125 persons.

A detailed report of receipts and expense for each place visited by your missionaries, is in the hands of your secretary. Any interested person, or member of this association can examine said reports and see that said details are correct.

We urge that every locality, for the season of 1900 and 1901 make earnest effort to utilize our services.

We must have means to freely invite the public to hear our philosophy and religion taught—hence we ask for halls and entertainment to be supplied by the local friends, and public subscriptions made to the state association for the missionary fund.

Then we will be able to hold free meetings and possibly often freely give our services. Local auxiliaries shall be privileged to have our services whenever desired, and thus it will be to your interest to organize and charter with us.

By this system of co-operation we hope to strengthen our associated work and supply the local societies with competent talent, and also have missionaries to reach the unorganized localities. All this means that you shall this year help us and the state association, financially.

We hereby extend our sincere thanks to the many friends who have entertained us so hospitably.

We cannot always be as sociable as we might desire owing to holding so many public meetings. The social tax is severe upon your missionaries, and we ask that you shall give us your good will, realizing we must save our strength for the platform.

We earnestly desire to be sociable, and would like to have one extra night in each locality for social intercourse, rather than be expected to visit from house to house.

We also extend sincere thanks to the officers of the state association for uniform kindness and help; and especially to the two secretaries, Messrs Ridge and Griffith, for devoted co-operation.

Generosity has often been extended by local friends—and in some cases we have been expected to furnish more than our share. But, we are sure that all have done their best for us. For the coming season we ask early application for our time, as dates must be fixed enroute in order to save railroad expense. Apply now or seen, and we will be able to fix our route and well serve you.

Get names and address of every possible Spiritualist in the state, so we can correspond therewith, and possibly help them to advocate the truths of Spiritualism.

Friends of the cause do not wait for Spiritualism to be popular in your locality, but make it so. You will be more respected for being honest than by any subterfugs, cowardice or hypocrisy. The people love an honest person and hate a hypocrite! Spiritualism is already popular in the world! Let us make it useful! If you have two or three persons in your locality who are interested in our cause, you have a good nucleus for a society—or, at least for a regular circle and conference. If you can obtain seven members, your duty is to organize, and charter with the state association.

Do not wait for ability to secure speakers and mediums, but hold home meetings for social and intellectual conference, giving some time to psychic culture.

Be men and women of intelligence, and rely upon your own efforts instead of asking the spirits to do it all. Help yourselves, and the spirits will help you!

Organize children's meetings, and encourage the youth. Be a social fraternity and a strength to each other. Thus will we make progress and be useful to the world.

We rely upon you, and esteem you, as the chosen of God to prove to humanity that immortality is their destiny.

Be of good cheer and resolute in will, whilst earnest in desire.

Fraternally,
G. W. KATES AND WIFE,
State Missionaries.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Nebraska State Association.

The seventh annual convention of the Nebraska State Spiritualists Association will be held in the city of Lincoln, Neb., at Richard's Hall, 1034 O street, on Sunday, September 30 and October 1. As there will be business of great importance to come before the convention, we hope for a good attendance of the Spiritualists of Nebraska, who will be given an opportunity of joining the association so as to take part in the busines transactions, which will include election of officers, and the proposed purchase of permanent camp-grounds. There will be three sessions each day. Good speakers and mediums will take part in the proceedings.

Summerland Beach Camp, O.

Summerland Beach Camp is neither dead nor yet sleeping. Camp opened on the 26th of August and closed on the 9th of September. In every respect this year proved the crowning year for Summerland Beach. Credit due to Mr. S. J. Woolley, president of the association, for his faithfulness and good judgment in selecting such excellent talent to place in charge of the meetings. Mrs. A. E. Kibby, the noted inspirational speaker and platform test medium, of Cincinnati, Ohio, was the leading personage at the camp. She answered all questions presented by the audience and beautifully demonstrated the truths set forth in her lectures by way of psychometry, spirit messages and otherwise. In all her twenty-two years of public work she has never been known to shirk a duty or to complain. Although she is fifty-seven years of age, she has the ambition of one in their youth. When she receives the summons to come up higher and inhabit the beautiful home not made by hands, she can surely answer the call with the blessed assurance that her life has been well spent in the cause of humanity.

Many were disappointed at not being enabled to hear Mrs. Kratz, but circumstances over which she had no control, would not permit her to be present.

Mrs. DeLong, of Columbus, worked faithfully and displayed her various phases of mediumship to the satisfaction of all.

Miss Jennie Delong had charge of the music. Her talent for vocal and instrumental music can scarce be excelled, and her part of the program was also highly appreciated by all.

The people in this section are enthused as never before. The crowds varied from three hundred to five hundred on Sunday. During the week there were not so many, but all the meetings were very interesting and instructive.

Owing to the ill-health of Mrs. De Long, Mrs. Clemens, of Columbus, assisted Mrs. Kibby on the closing day. Next year by the aid of the spirit friends, camp will open on the second Sunday of August and continue at least three weeks. Do not forget this announcement.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price $1.25 For sale at this office.

The To-Morrow of Death,

...OR THE... Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKER.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth;" and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the authors's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.25. For sale at this office.

The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens," By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 339 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1900.

The Galveston Horror.

The appalling calamity befalling Galveston has awakened sensations of horror and sympathy over the civilized world. It is needless to state particulars for they are now generally known to all our readers.

If "Infinite Intelligence" designs to outwork a future good whereby the present awful evil shall be overborne by the future great and exceeding good, it will at least be some prospective palliation and comfort to realize it; but it will appear to many a finite intelligence, that infinite intelligence might have found some more humane and less repulsive and horrible method of effecting its reformatory improvements. In its present aspects, viewed from the wreckage and loss of lives and property in the fated city of Galveston, in the language of one of Dickens' charaters: "It's a' a muddle—a' a muddle." Especially to those on the ground, who had personal experience of the terrible disaster, must it appear, as they stand dazed and appalled at the ruin wrought, it's all a muddle—all a muddle!

We are happy to inform our friends that Mr. John W. Ring, whose name and contributions are familiar to our readers, is not among the victims chronicled as dead or missing, but is alive, as we are informed by letter from his own hand. The Progressive Thinker congratulates him and the Cause, that he is still with us in the earth sphere of life and labor.

Mr. Ring writes under date of September 10:

"Our city is a wreck. Water 5 feet deep in my house. Acres of wreckage and debris. The city is a comparative wreck. Water very scarce, but food holds out. A hurricane blew with sheets of falling water, from 4 p. m. Saturday until 10:30 p. m. My household are alive, but over 1,500 are drowned."

They Were Duped.

The Chicago American of September 15, says:

"Oshkosh, Wis., Sept. 15.—'Professor' H. Ball, a fortune teller and clairvoyant, made a fortune of about $1,000 in this city during the last week.

"His clients, who include a number of society women, placed various sums of money in envelopes marked, 'Faith, Hope, Success,' having received assurance that in a given time through Ball's influence the money would be doubled.

"When the envelopes were opened only waste paper was found in them. Ball has left the city, leaving instructions that his mail be forwarded to the City of Mexico."

If people haven't better sense than to patronize such pretended mediums, then, of course, they will be swindled. The sleight-of-hand performer in materializations, etc., finds a rich field among gullible Spiritualists. If Spiritualists will only ignore these traveling mountebanks, they would soon be driven from our ranks.

Kick 'Em Again.

Miss Helen Clark says New York is one of the greatest heathen cities in the world, having 1,300,000 people who never go to church. It might be a good idea to spend a large part of our foreign mission fund in trying to Christianize our own metropolitan city.—American Baptist Flag.

Only fanatics and bigots have any doubt on the subject. There is more vice, ignorance and degradation in New York, Chicago and the other large cities of Christendom, than can be found among the heathen nations of the entire world. * * After Christendom has been Christianized, it will be time enough to convert outsiders.—Israelite.

The Progressive Thinker has been laboring for a long time along these lines. "Remove the mote from thine own eye, before attempting to remove the beam from thy neighbor's eye."

Specious Logic.

The religious press quote with apparently great satisfaction the statement of some member of the foreign legation lately besieged in Pekin, that the missionaries rendered them essential aid in their defence against the attacks of the Boxers.

"Did you ever? no, never," listen to such a ridiculous claim. The attack on the legation was because of those intruding missionaries who took up quarters there to save their precious lives, without which the lives of the legationers would not have been endangered.

The Immortality of a Lie.

The secular press is contributing its full share in showing up the origin of numerous romantic legends which have been woven into the literature of European nations, and accepted as facts everywhere. The story of William Tell, and his brave exploit with bow and arrow, has been told so long and often it became generally accepted as real. A correspondent of one of the Chicago dailies was kind enough to turn the light of his pen on the subject, and in a late issue, following along the lines of a learned Swiss writer, said:

"Everybody outside Switzerland grants that modern scholarship has cast grave doubts on the contention that there ever was such a person as Tell, but for a Swiss to concede so much would be little less than treason. Only so late as 1890 a great clamor was raised in the canton of Uri by the appearance of a school history of Switzerland which did not mention Tell and the Rutli oath. At the sex-centenary of Swiss independence the orators heaped contumely on those German professors who dared to cast doubt on the authenticity of the Tell traditions, but the eagerness of ever-trusting newspaper correspondents in exploiting the legend as history was a balm to their pride.

"As a matter of fact the whole Tell legend, which is nearly as old as the human race, is the best of all illustrations of the world's reluctance to let the hero, once found, die, and of the disposition to reincarnate him from age to age.

"In 1760 one Dr. Freudenberger, a Bernese Protestant clergyman, wrote a pamphlet called 'Tell, a Danish Fable.'

"He pointed out that the story of the apple is nothing less than an adaptation of the Scandinavian legend of Toko. For his pains his work was burned by the common hangman after its public condemnation by the government. But as Dickens says, it is easier to burn a man than his opinions, and so, too, it is easier to burn a volume than the ideas it sets forth. So the Swiss have, after all, been unable to silence meddlesome investigators. Doubts were not extinguished, and the comparative mythologists showed that the story was not only a Scandinavian legend but that it dated even further back and was to be found in the Indo-Germanic folklore. And even further it went, way back of the Aryan race indeed, and you can find its outlines in the mythology of the Samoyeds, Turks, and Mongolians."

Tell's adventure with the tyrant Tessler is only one of the thousands of fables which has been woven into modern literature and become part of it. The story of Capt. Smith, whose life was saved by Pocahontas, lacked only one incident to make it thrillingly interesting, and that is the want of truth. Its place in history is with George Washington's little hatchet and cherry tree.

First Reports Confirmed.

Notwithstanding the counter reports of Mrs. Drew, later intelligence confirms all the damaging stories told of the cruelty and excesses of the Russian Cossacks, towards captive Chinese. The Boxers may have been encouraged in their barbarous acts by the imperialists, their hatred of the missionary being mutual.

This statement being admitted, then along side of it is that other statement, now abundantly confirmed, that the brutal action of the allied armies was encouraged by the missionaries, who quoted passages of what they called "Scriptures" justifying such cruelty.

Even as we write reports come from the seat of war saying the missionaries object to the American policy, and insist that "Pekin should be completely destroyed, Na Tung and Chung Li should be beheaded, and no leniency should be shown the next generation of Chinamen." Such is the war spirit army officers in China have to encounter from those more anxious to save souls for the church, than they are to advance the interests of humanity.

It is well to keep in mind that the United States alone, to this date, have expended fifteen millions of dollars trying to partially undo the evil missionaries have caused in China; that probably the amount will be doubled, possibly quadrupled before the end comes; that if a peace is patched up, and the missionaries are allowed to continue their proselyting labors, the enormous expenses, and the great sacrifice of life will be repeated by the next generation. The descendants of four hundred millions of people will not quietly submit to any terms their rulers may make looking to a surrender of their religion.

Spirit Only Is Real.

"Politics take all the attention." So wrote a friend the other day, and so we find it at this end of the line. The press is filled with little else than politics. The people think politics, they talk politics, they bet on politics, and they quarrel over politics. Many a black eye is the natural outcome of political discussions, and this because politics are everywhere in the ascendant.

An old prophet is alleged to have said: "Unless these days be shortened no flesh shall be saved."- If his prophecy had related to these times and surroundings, right glad we should all be that the 6th of November is so near, and that so little time remains to whoop it up for any man or measure.

The diversion of labor every four years from legitimate pursuits to the making of a President has some redeeming traits. If the period was extended to eight years it is reasonable to presume the strife would be doubly profound. If extended to twelve years we are quite sure "no flesh would be saved."

If the executive office in the United States was inherent, the discords and revolutions in the South American republics would be but baby-play compared with our grander contests.

Well, be patient, friends, the struggle will soon be over; politics will go into retirement for another quadrennial, during which we will labor to convince the reader that all secular affairs are ephemeral, and that spirit only is real.

The Opportunity.

Rev. Headland, a professor in the Methodist University at Pekin, in a discourse in Jersey City a few days ago, said:

"The great opportunity for the Christian church in China has now come."

Through war, and bloodshed, burning cities and a disrupted empire, its rulers in flight, the oldest and most stable government on the globe—the hope of the Christian propaganda is revived. Having lost its power in all those countries where it is claimed to have been first established, and on the decline with the educated everywhere, its opportunity is now principally visible in the desolated homes and in the battle-scourged cities of China.

False Logic.

"No man, no Infidel, could witness an obvious miracle, without being struck with awe, and recognizing the finger of God. What would become of the skepticism of a Hume or a Voltaire, should he go to the grave where a father or brother had been buried for years, and see him wake to life and come forth at the word of a divine messenger? What will become of his skepticism, when he, himself, after having slept in death thousands of years, shall rise from the dead, and shall see others rise around him?"—Kitto, Article Miracle.

When the events mentioned shall transpire then will be the time to answer the question. It is easy to tell of bodies clothed with corruption rising from the grave, but such narration transcends human credulity; they are incompatible with the workings of natural law, and accounts of such events cannot be trusted.

Men lie. We have daily evidence of this fact; but Nature never falsifies. Her records, to those who can read them, are as enduring as the globe, and as certain as are the laws which wheel planets in their orbits or suns on their axes.

It is not so with spirit. The uniform testimony of all the ages, with incidents which cannot be explained on any other hypothesis than spirit communion, furnish a very different state of facts from that relating to the resurrection of the body.

The Egyptians taught and believed in the resurrection and reanimation of bodies saved from decay for 3,000 years. Those years have lapsed; the bodies are preserved; but the spirit fled with the last heart-beat, and no angel's trump will ever arouse these senseless clods of earth to life again. The fossils buried thousands of feet beneath lofty mountains are just as likely to be reanimated as is man when Death has successfully placed his seal on the victim's brow. His cast-off clothing is just as likely to become instinct with life as the shell they lately adorned.

The priestly tales of headless people, visited by old time monks, are no more false than are the stories on which Kitto placed such trust.

A truth may be written in the sand which the next wave of the sea may wash away, but it is a truth still; so a falsehood may be engraved on a rock, or reflected in letters traced by optical instruments on the clouds, but it is a lie however prominent or enduring the method of preservation.

"Let Your Women Keep Silent."

According to press reports the Catholic church authorities at Rome have issued a decree calling the attention of the clergy at home and abroad to the strict church law prohibiting women from taking part in the music of divine service, either in solos or in choirs.

This action of the Catholic church authorities seems slightly strange to people with modern ideas, and accustomed to modern usages, yet is, without doubt, in accord with the animus of Romanism through all the ages of its history.

We confess we are glad to note this revival of the true medieval spirit of genuine Romanism. We sincerely hope to see still further manifestations of this sort. It will help to open some eyes to the nature of Romanism in its relation to individual liberty of action and mental freedom. Especially will it have a tendency to give some Catholic women a new view of Rome, and may lead to a weakening and a complete breaking of the hold on them of the Romish church.

Of the same nature is the recent interdiction by Catholic and Protestant clergymen of women in church without hats. Of course it were just as sensible to require the men to wear their hats during "divine service." But we are glad to see the shepherds holding their flocks to the strict letter of holy writ. Let Paul be obeyed—let the women keep their heads covered, keep silent in the churches, and if they would know anything let them ask their husbands at home, etc. Then all will be lovely and the churches will grow in grace and flourish abundantly.

Yes, let the interdictions of women proceed; the more they are interdicted, contrary to good common sense and reason, the more will they flout the interdictions and assert their independence.

While the churchmen are about it—why not resurrect and enforce that "command" of God, "thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," and proceed to cremate the witches?

The Wicked Flea.

Opening a paper the other day the eye fell on a paragraph headed: "A Flea for Evangelists." Immediately the mind conjured up a multitude of these active, jumping, rollicking, biting little insects, a moment here and then seemingly nowhere. We read on to see what business the flea had to do with the soul saver. The contexts showed "plea" was the word the writer meant. The typographer, either by accident or design, had slipped the wrong letter in place, and instead of a vigorous defence of that functionary of the church he had put a flea in his ear.

A life-long connection with the craft it is amusing, and sometimes immensely vexatious, to note the changes the leaving out, displacement, or substitution of a single letter will make. The case in point is a good illustration. The author is frequently placed in a ridiculous position, and the typo is liable to become the subject of profanity. But when they put fleas on an evangelist, provided they bite vigorously, we are half inclined to forget their shortcomings.

They Have It Now.

The Methodists have determined to raise $20,000,000 the ensuing year, and convert 2,000,000 souls to the church faith. The plan is to have 200,000 members volunteer to convert 10 persons each. A large committee was appointed at a meeting held in Chicago last week of presiding elders, to superintend this grand work.

Ten dollars a soul will be cheap enough, and two millions of them saved to people the pearly courts, will be a grand acquisition to the Methodist throng. If we could be convinced the morals of the converts would be improved, or the world would be bettered because of the proposed conversion The Progressive Thinker would go the Elders ten times better, and hope their paltry two millions will be swelled to twenty millions, one for each dollar wrung from the hand of toil to broaden the phylacteries of the priests.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

Spiritualistic Author, Artist, Poet.

In the world of art and letters the Spiritualistic theory is becoming more and more dominant. It is now by no means unusual to see upon the wall in the parlor, pictures representing the continued existence of those gone before, and the books of the day upon the parlor table or library shelves abound in references to a life beyond the grave as an established fact. The age of materialism is passing away and the hope of the centuries past for immortality is ending in the fruition of demonstrated certainty.

The paintings which are now so frequently received through the influence of mediumship and which are so rapidly executed and so exquisitely beautiful and perfect in design, are no doubt the work of the master artists of the past. It will not be amiss in this connection to give a short biographical sketch of one of those masters who in his time was considered a crazy Spiritualist—William Blake.

In the National Gallery in London there are two remarkable little pictures bearing the numbers 1110 and 1164, one of them described as "The Spiritual Form of Pitt Guiding Behemoth," and the other representing, in a strange, unearthly, and dreamily transcendental fashion "The Procession from Calvary." The painter of them is a man who, in the Lexicon of Artists, is simply disposed of as being mad, though by others he has been celebrated as the great dreamer, the profoundest visionary, of the century: this is the Swedenborg of painting, William Blake.

The youth of this remarkable man fell in the years when Sir Joshua Reynolds reigned over English painting with undisputed authority, but even with regard to Sir Joshua, Blake did not conceal that he had higher conceptions of the nature of art. The British Museum possesses a copy of the famous Discourses of Reynolds, the margins of which are scribbled over with notes in pencil by Blake. In these same notes he declared true art to have been degraded by the reputation of Reynolds' discourses and pictures. Painting, as Reynolds understood it, corresponded to the needs of the day; and Blake worked throughout his life without other thanks than the appreciation of a few superior and solitary minds. The importance of his work was overlooked, and, perhaps, it can only be treated with justice in this age devoted to the worship of individualities.

What Blake recognized as the basis of art was, in the first place, imagination and poetic force. Every conception of his he believed to be a vision; his mind only touched upon high and sublime items, and busied itself with profound and abstract problems; he never undertook the representation of a barren and trivial subject, and troubled himself exceedingly little about the actual world. As a matter of fact, he possessed a mind of great power, containing an entire universe in itself; but different from other "thinking artists" of his time, he remained a painter in spite of all his poetic qualities. His strangest visions were embodied in precise forms, which expressed all that he had to reveal. "Invention," he wrote, "depends altogether upon execution or organization. As that is right or wrong, so is the invention perfect or imperfect. Michael Angelo's art depends on Michael Angelo's execution altogether." And this is an opinion which most essentially distinguishes the "mad Englishman" from his erudite brother artists at that time in Germany. But even some amongst his contemporaries perceived in him this strange combination of a visionary teeming with ideas and a powerful realist. In the preface to one of Blake's books Fuseli declared that, so long as there remained a taste for the arts of design, the originality of the conception and the masterly boldness of execution belonging to this artist would never be without admirers. The German painter Gotzinger, who lived for some time in England about this period, writes: "I saw many men of talent in London, but only three of genius—Coleridge, Flaxman, and Blake—and of these Blake was the greatest."

When the painter-poet William Blake was born in London on November 28, 1757, the vast city on the Thames received one of the strangest inmates, and one of the most eccentric personalities that ever dwelt within its walls. His biographers all agree that his intellectual life is a mine of marvels and problems, few of which can be thoroughly investigated and cleared up.

His education was of an exceedingly primitive description, for he was hardly able to read, write or reckon. On the other hand he began to draw young, and was, as Cunningham writes, an artist at ten years of age and a poet at twelve. A contemporary declares that as a boy Blake was in the habit of singing his verses to his own music, "which was singularly beautiful." At any rate he had begun to compose his earliest poems, afterwards published amongst the Poetical Sketches, in his twelfth year, and his gift as a draughtsman became evident at the age of fifteen, immediately after he entered a school for drawing in London. About this time he fell in love with a pretty girl, who did not reciprocate it, and made him exceedingly jealous. He told his grief to another girl, the daughter of a gardener, with whom he lodged. This latter maiden offered him her sympathy. "Do you pity me?" said Blake. "Yes," she answered, "I do most sincerely." "Then I love you for that." "And I love you too," she replied. This dialogue ended in Blake's marriage, and Kitty Boucher was the right wife for him, for she believed in his visions as firmly as he did himself, and did not disturb his intercourse with invisible spirits. For Blake was a medium of the highest character, a hundred years before any one had heard of modern Spiritualism.

Homer and Dante came and sat round him for his portrait. Once he saw a tree full of angels; and at another time he prophesied that a man who had met him casually in the street would be hanged, which came to pass after many years. Or he held intercourse with Christ and the Apostles. Milton, Moses and the prophets were peculiarly frequent in their visits to Blake, and he describes them as majestic shades, grey, although shining, and taller than ordinary people. When his brother Robert died, he saw his soul fly to heaven "clapping its hands for joy."

Blake regarded his poems as revelations, and believed in writing them he did not create, but merely acted the part of an amanuensis and that the authors were spirits of those who had passed on. He wrote his verses, according to his own profession, from dictation, often pouring out from twenty to thirty lines at a sitting, without premeditation, and even against his will. And these books of his, furnished with his own illustrations, brought him in a moderate income. "I don't seek profit," said he; "I want nothing, but I am happy." In 1821 he removed to his humble abode—consisting, indeed, of two rooms—in Battersea, where he died seven years later, on August 12, 1828.

The Campbell Brothers at Cassadaga, mediums for spirit painting, who are well known to the Spiritualists of this country, have been peculiarly successful in this phase, as very many can testify. Many very wonderful pictures have they received for their sitters in the remarkably short period of 10, 15, 20 and 30 minutes, which would have required days to execute by the master painters of the times on this side of the stage of transition. None but they who have witnessed this phase of phenomena can appreciate these mediums and their work. I do not know who their "controls" are, but would not be surprised if their brother Englishman, William Blake, was one of them.

H. V. SWERINGEN.

A New Element In Politics.

A Mrs. Mary E. Balch, secretary of the Indiana W. C. T. U., has devised a "Prayer Chain" scheme, the object, to pray President McKinley out of office, because on state occasions he has allowed wine on his table at dinners. Each day printed pledges in vast numbers are sent out from the Indianapolis office, and the circle is constantly enlarging. An appeal has been made to the national organization to make common cause in the matter.

Hoping to head off this wicked device of the godly to defeat the Presidential candidate by such strange methods, the friends of Mr. McKinley have devised a counter praying project, in which they hope to enlist God on their side, by showing an excess of numbers who are favorable to the injunction of the good Paul, to his beloved Timothy:

"Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities."

What puzzles The Progressive Thinker is to know how God will act in the premises. His saints are at loggerheads, each asking favors directly opposite the other, just like the action of opposing army chaplains when their principals are engaged in deadly strife. Instead of loud-mouthed cannon, with all the deadly instruments of war, they place trust in the promise of Jesus:

"Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."—Mat. 21:22.

When there is a conflict in prayers will numbers settle the issue? If so we can understand why the great zeal the contestants display in increasing their numbers, each ambitious to make his prayer-chain the longest.

May be the awarding Judge will take into account the interest, or the disinterestedness of the contestants. It would be a sorry condition should he find each side has an ax to grind. A secular exchange, somewhat mathematically inclined, puts the question this way: "Given the force of two opposing prayers, find the resultant." The burden of the problem, then, would be to find the force of the prayer on each side. If found to be nix in each case, then the solution will correspond with the first finding.

A Changed Front.

For ages the Bible was the subject of Catholic hate, and of Protestant idolatry. In those countries where Catholicism was dominant the civil authorities treated it as a criminal offence to read a Bible, or have one in possession. The Inquisition exerted all its authority to suppress that book which Father McGovern, in a sermon to his church thirty years ago, in the writer's hearing, said:

"The Church knows how the Holy Scriptures were written, and is unwilling to place it in the hands of those who have not this information to lead them to destruction."

But times have changed since then. Now the Paulne Fathers of New York, according to the Catholic World, in its September issue, publishes a lengthy article from one of its most prominent prelates, championing the infallibility and plenary inspiration of the Bible, and encouraging the people to read it.

Heretofore Protestants alone claimed the Bible was infallible, while Catholics, in their Supreme Councils, and in all their declarations, have invested the Pope alone with this infallibility business.

Thus in effect the heretics of yesterday are the saints of to-day.

Christianize the Soldiers.

Placing full trust in the Associated Press dispatches as to the doings of our army at Taku, at Tientsin, and at Pekin, there can be no question as to the need of Christian missionaries among the soldiers, provided their services have a tendency to make men better, and more appreciative of others' rights. The reports are shocking in the extreme. It is not supposed the American soldier is one whit less moral than is the soldier of other Christian countries; but unless the press agents lie most shamefully they all need reforming.

So cautious a paper as the Washington Post, in a late issue, in which was detailed the "excesses" of the soldier—The Progressive Thinker preferring to use no severer term—suggests:

"If circumstances should occasion a recall of Christian missionaries from a land in which Christian soldiers have so shamefully satirized the spirit of Christianity, it seems to us abundant employment could be found for them in an attempt to instill some of the doctrines of that faith into the armies of civilized nations."

A SONG OF GREETING.

I have no words of sadness
For you, dear friends, to hear;
My song is one of gladness—
I send to all, "good cheer."

Soaring like the eagle,
Singing like the lark,
Thought on pinions regal,
Leaves behind it dark.

Sunshine 'round me dances,
Breezes come and go,
Weaving sweet romances,
Singing soft and low.

Every stream and fountain
Seems to give me joy;
Every rock and mountain,
Every girl and boy.

All the air seems thrilling
With a roundelay,
Dews from heav'n distilling,
Make sacred every day.

We have cause for gladness,
None for doubt or fear;
Hearts once turned to sadness,
Now can sing "good cheer."

For angels at our portals
Benignly stand and wait
To crown with joys immortal,
Each day we celebrate.

A CLERGYMAN'S QUESTIONS ANSWERED

By Mr. and Mrs. Kates, the Minnesota Missionaries.

The series of grove meetings held by Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, at Bemidji, Minn., June 17 to 24, attracted the attention of a number of Methodist clergymen attending a conference then being held at that place. The local pastor handed to our speakers the following questions, which they replied to at the afternoon meeting, Sunday, June 24, and the clergyman declined to follow them with any remarks:

THE QUESTIONS.

I am anxious to know the truth, and wish you would give me a candid answer to these candid questions. These questions are presented at your invitation and they are suggested in the main by your actions and statements:

1. Why are you so uncertain in your approaches to some persons to whom the spirits direct you and in other instances so direct and positive?

To me this suggests one of two things: Either your human bureau of information is defective, or the spirits are not as certain as they ought to be, seeing they are infallible in their knowledge.

2. I cannot understand your philosophic contradictions, for example:

(1) You say there are no miracles; that miracles were only appearances which seemed to be miraculous to the ignorant people before whom they were performed. Yet you stated that there is a spirit realm outside of nature and of matter. Is not this a contradiction in terms and a denial in fact of your position?

(2) In resenting the attacks of others you declared there is no hell and there is no devil, and yet in pronouncing woes upon your opponents you predicted terrible results to those who should pass into the spirit world with these charges upon their lips and this evil motive in their hearts. Is not this retribution hell?

(3) Is not perverted good the morally responsible act of a spiritual being? Is not such an one a wicked spirit and is not a wicked spirit a devilish spirit? Therefore are not spiritually wicked spirits devilish?

3. Are not your revelations from the spirits the crassest materialism? Is it not an axiom of philosophy that life is spirit and spirit is life, and that these are formless; while admitting as we must—that all material forms of life (a flower, for example, a stone,) is not a form of life? Yet universal philosophy in the light of modern science declares that while disembodied spirits must, according to the scriptures, take on or appear in spiritual bodies or immortal forms and while these must retain personal identity—yet to present to us these spirits in exact linear and avoirdupois forms in which they lived and moved on this earth, and furthermore to present them in the very clothes they wore when last seen, and furthermore to identify them through so-called revelations which contain nothing but references to show interest in only material things, such as, for example, the loss of a dog, or a mistake in business. Are not these by your own statements, contradictions of your own position?

4. Are you not inconsistent in this—that your spirits appear only to Mrs. Kates and not to her husband?

Are you not inconsistent in this: Why should not the spirits of the departed loved ones come directly to those whom they love—for love is the open sesame of all hearts and all lives?

If Spiritualism is the only true religion and way into the kingdom of God, why is it conditioned, according to your philosophy upon nervous temperament, and not, as in Christianity, upon universal need and personal faith?

The Christian is taught that access to God is the privilege of all human beings through Christ, the only mediator and advocate with the Father. Sin and not sensibility being the only barrier to this fellowship.

5. Why must your revelation be communicated to the novitiate in darkness and not light. Candidly it looks to me as though you were reviving in this day the Spiritualistic priestcraft with which Moses contended, and against which Paul protested in ancient days.

6. You say that you are in harmony with the Bible. What about Ex. 22:18; Deut. 18:10? Moses made laws against it. Paul cast out the spirit of divination. God refused to send messengers to warn the brothers of Dives.

7. While it is true that angels have come in times gone by, and may come now from the other world to citizens of this, will you tell us why in all the range of Bible history and narrative there is not a single narrative of a mother returning to her child, or a relative coming back to one of his or her own kin?

8. Wherein does your system account for, or is able to remove the sins of humanity?

9. If we accept your system, what are its equivalents for Jesus Christ and his atonement? The Bible says: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

GEO. P. WATSON,
Pastor M. E. Church.

THE REPLIES.

Mrs. Kates, under control, first made reply. We cannot give the text of her remarks, but only the idea thereof. She was eloquent and forcible. It is too bad that her entire reply could not have been reported, as the people need the truths she uttered. As these questions were doubtless formulated after serious consultation by several clergymen, they represent a consensus of the opposition comprised in Methodistic clerical circles. Mrs. Kates said:

No. 1. I never claimed to be a perfect medium nor that the spirits are perfect. Much of defect exists with the spirits who present themselves and in the aura of the person to whom they lead me. When the people of earth become more spiritual and make it more possible for spirits to enter their aura, then will I be more surely correct in receiving messages. But often, the recipient thinks it doing the Lord's service to wilfully deny and falsify.

I most positively have no human bureau of information; and such an assertion is a libel born from dishonesty in the one who so asserts. Spirits are not infallible, and we never claimed they possess infinite power.

No. 2. We claim that a miracle cannot occur; because nothing is ever accomplished outside of law.

We positively say that the spirit realm is entirely natural and materially constructed. We affirm that spirit is the life of matter, and that form is the expression thereof to our sense perception as environed. Our sense power is in accord with our relation to the dimensions of space.

We teach the hell of conscience. We cannot escape the consequence of acts. If our deeds are evil, we dwell in hell. We deny hell as a locality and affirm it as a condition. A personal devil is no longer accepted by progressive theologians and is not a strange doctrine held by the Spiritualists only; for it is impossible to prove his existence, and would be a plain contradiction of God's omnipotence. No just God would permit the devil to exist and tempt his children of earth to eternal damnation.

A spiritual being cannot pervert good; and there are none spiritually wicked. Evil is the opposite of good and there are all grades of spirits, as there are of mortals. The church has failed to save the world and hence is responsible for whatever evil the returning spirits communicate. To be afraid of wicked spirits, one must have evil in his life to attract such. The pure in heart cannot be defiled by evil.

No. 3. Great ignorance is often expressed about the potency of matter. Every atom possesses soul and spirit; hence flowers, rocks and animals have spirit entities that are indestructible.

How else would it be possible for these entities to be otherwise than natural? The identity of a person is not destroyed—and they present themselves to the clairvoyant for the purpose of identification, which would be impossible if clothed in form or habiliment foreign to themselves. However, they do not inherit, neither are they given a form differing from the natural evolution of their earthly bodies. Why did Jesus appear in his natural form, if the spiritual body is not in similitude of the earthly body? You confuse the spiritual and earthly; you constantly imagine the possibility of a supernatural life, when such a condition is impossible—there being nothing outside of nature. When humanity shall seek spiritual help instead of material, from the spirits we shall be better able to present higher forms of force and intelligence to the human understanding. Now, we are compelled to meet you upon the planes of mortal mind, rather than of the divine spirit; but not long hence it will be a universal possibility to witness spirit birth and spirit presence, if not by refined vision, then by the help of a sense power yet to be developed.

Mr. Kates replied as follows:

No. 4. Who said that I cannot see spirits? You assume in this, as in other things, from the lack of evidence. She possesses greater power to see than I do but it does not follow that I do not see spirits, by not exercising such in public. She is only one of ten thousand with this gift, but they each differ. And each minister differs in God-power. Why does not God demonstrate alike through each clergyman? Why are you not each positively inspired by God to preach and cease writing your sermons? The power of the Holy Ghost differs in each of us.

It is true that love is deathless—and no doubt many spirit loved ones desire to reach their own, but the soul aura is tarnished by the debaucheries of the flesh. You can each receive spirit messages if you seek for them, and can develop your psychic powers by purifying the body and mind. But your loved one will not be silent if other mediumship than your own must be employed. The fault is with you and not with the spirits, if you fail in your part of the possibility.

We never said that Spiritualism teaches the only way to the kingdom of God. All systems of religious teaching possess some good. We seek for truth wherever and however we may be able to find it.

We deny the necessity of a nervous temperament in order to receive spiritual truth or develop psychic power. A positive will is necessary. Mediumship, when properly used, creates health. The abuse of any talent creates disease. If you preach incessantly and neglect the needs of your body, you are apt to become diseased or deranged. God will not protect you. We advise the temperate use of every function and talent. We are trying to conserve human need and unfold personal knowledge. We see the need to destroy faith by unfolding knowledge. Faith no longer satisfies, for we desire to know.

Spiritualism teaches that God is immanent in nature, and access thereto is through the knowledge of law.

Jesus cannot possibly be the only mediator, for God notices even a sparrow's fall. The Christ spirit is diffused in all humanity and should be expressed. Jesus was "a" Christ, and not "the only" Christ. He was used to demonstrate spirit power; and his great mission was to prove the possibility of a natural resurrection. You are not his true follower when you are yet unable to do the works he did. He came to teach and demonstrate. Priestcraft has made him a mediator. The mission of Jesus was to help develop a spiritual kingdom on earth. Apostolic doctrine has supplemented Messianic teaching. Sin is inharmony and ignorance. By unfoldment we will gain fellowship with the good and pure.

No. 5. A very small proportion of spirit manifestation occurs in the dark. The greater part requires light. But we do not create law, but try to observe it. Jesus could not perform the works of the spirit as the rabble might demand.

Moses and Paul may have made serious mistakes by contending against what they did not understand. We are not so much interested in what they opposed, as in what concerns us to-day, and in what we can prove to be true and good.

No. What we say about the Bible, is, that it is full of what we call Spiritualism. Its record of spirit return and spiritual truth makes it more distinctly a supporter of spiritualism than of any other ism. But we do not accept its infallibility nor believe all of its teaching—neither do you. A conference of Methodists applauded and supported the statement that the Bible is not inerrant and is a history of events instead of being the infallible word of God.

The refusal of God to send messengers to warn the brothers of Dives makes us understand that he could not have sent the messengers—and why he did not does not concern us. We are aware that messengers from the spirit world comes to us without being sent; hence, they having such ability, must come by a natural law which is always God's law—hence He sends them to us.

No. 7. If the Bible does not record instances of a mother returning to her child, then it is more than likely because the councils held to decide upon the Books, designedly threw out such instances if the same had been recorded. But, many events of returning spirits are recorded therein; and Jesus appeared to his mother and others—thus the love element is instanced if in no other Biblical events. The lack of personal communication with loved ones is a sad reflection upon the spiritual character and love development of the prophets and apostles. Thus your criticism reacts—for if angels came in the elder time they should have been angels of peace and love instead of spirits of warriors (often called the Lord) to lead the hosts of Israel unto conquest in bloody battle.

No. 8. The Spiritualists seek to develop humanity by proper birth and environment. We have no safety valve for sin—it must bear the consequence. We hope to prevent sin rather than to create any panacea to absolve the sinner.

No. 9. Jesus did not, nor could he as-

Ideas on the Value and Uses of Mistakes.

A SUGGESTIVE LECTURE BY WALTER WILLIAMS, IN WHICH HE POINTS OUT THE INTRINSIC VALUE OF MISTAKES IN CHURCH AND STATE.

Mistakes mean movement, life, action. Mummies make no mistakes, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. A dead man commits no errors. Absolute inerrancy is supernatural. Infallibility follows the funeral—does not precede it. Mortality is another name for mistakenness. Progress is a matter of making mistakes and recovering from them. Walking is a continual falling and getting up again. Success is gained by stumbling. Sitting still is stagnation. More failures in business are caused by timidity than rashness. The business man who fears to make a mistake never succeeds. Nothing risked, nothing won, is an old, old proverb, with a substratum of truth. Dread of error has kept many a merchant on a side street, while his neighbor has grown into a commercial king. Fear of financial mistakes keeps many men in poverty. Many clutch a penny too close to win a dollar which lies just outside their timorous grasp. Boldness is a fundamental requisite to business success. Luck is really a matter of taking chances. Fortune ever invites the daring. In commerce, as in war and love, faint heart ne'er won fair lady. The prizes in life are for the brave, not the poltroons.

Mistakes are signboards along the road to success. They are the danger signals indicating where the ice is thin. The biography of the successful man records only his successes. These have been not so important in making him as have been his failures. His path has been changed and its direction altered by the mistakes he has made. His real biography, as he will admit to his most intimate friends, has been a record of mistakes and getting over them. These have kept him alert and active. They have driven him back upon his own resources and prevented him from falling into ways of indolence, which meant ruin. Sluggards seldom make mistakes. They are too lazy.

Mistakes are valuable as obstacles. This would be a dreary world if there were no mountains to climb. The dullest landscape is the unbroken plain, with unclouded sky and soil unflecked by tree or hill. The most wearisome life is filled with monotony. The smooth path does not develop strength as does the steeplechase or the hurdles. Obstacles make character and character is the chief end of life. Where there is nothing to climb over, the highest faculties dwindle for want of employment. There is no Napoleon without the Alps. Achievement is not a matter of drifting on a placid lake, but of rowing against the swift current of a river. "My son Don had many advantages," said Simon Cameron, "but I had one which outweighed them all—I had the obstacle of poverty."

One value of mistakes consists in their stimulating power. They are inspiration. A reasonable dose of mistakes is necessary to stir to large achievement. To him who has good stuff in himself there is an inspiring influence in a mistake, which acts as a fresh, cool breeze upon a city's fevered forehead. It makes him eager to go to work again. It is a good pricking to progress. There is something in human nature which suggests sitting down, a belief in letting well enough alone. A grievous blunder will often awaken from this lethargy when no manner of good fortune would stir. Mistakes are ever foes to mediocrity. They are stepping stones or crushing bowlders, according as they are regarded. They stimulate or depress, and, with most men, depression comes only with an accumulation of mistakes. "The condition of the American workingman," describes a recent careful writer, "is one of hopeful discontent." It is regarding past mistakes as present stimulant. Despair is yielding to the mistakes of others and our own. Ambition is making them yield to us.

The world's history is a story of mistakes. The record of religious errors would fill a library. Persecution has followed persecution and heresy has succeeded heresy. The heretic of yesterday is canonized to-morrow. The persecution of the last century is repented in sack-cloth in the next. Burning tears succeed the blazing fagots. The blood of the martyrs has ever been the seed of the church. The mistakes of the ultra-orthodox have brought religious freedom. The path to salvation has led through the thickets of religious blunders. Political mistakes have abounded. Diplomats have erred and war has come. Republics are an outgrowth of monarchs' mistakes. Revolutions have been required to correct political errors. Church and state alike have blundered their way along. The world has stumbled through the centuries. Like the child, learning to walk by falling, it has grown stronger and braver and better for its very stumbling. History is not philosophy teaching by example. History is philosophy giving warning by mistakes. "Peccavi" is the cry of all the centuries.

There are men in the world, in this world, who never make mistakes. It must be true that they never err because they admit the fact themselves. They never blunder in business. They buy at the right time and sell at the right time. They employ just the right people and do the proper thing under all circumstances. There is never a wrong thing said or done by these individuals. In consequence they have no sympathy with people who make mistakes. They are lonely, of course, for the great majority of mankind is always making mistakes, errors of judgment, blunders of behavior. The unmistaken fellows are the Pharisees of the market place. They continually prate of their business infallibility and thank their god, the dollar almighty, that they are not as other men are, blunderers, mistaken, errorful. They are, if their own conversation is to be taken as criterion, the salt of the financial earth. But when the truth is known the salt has lost its savor many times. The mistakes they have made would outnumber the days of the years of their business existence. Business associates are not fooled by the blunderless boaster. They know that he is mistaken.

The popular mistakes are numerous. Fancies spring up perennially. One country in one century will go wild over a black tulip and another will become crazed over speculation in red herring. Mistakes, commercial, financial, political, religious, catch fast hold upon a community and there is difficulty in unloosening. The crowd, maddened over an illusion, will not believe the truth. They prefer the mistake to an exposure of it. There is nothing which has a finer educative effect upon a people than to be intensely mistaken upon some proposition, and then to get over it. The process of recovery is slow, but effective. Mistakes are great popular educators. Their correction comes in the course of time, and with it an intellectual uplift. National mistakes in this republic are corrected or made at the great quadrennial inventory of political stock. Here we American sovereigns take the steps which help or harm the country's future. Political blunders are made or avoided, and the election often decided by a small mistake. The mistakes of the opposite party are always the stock in trade of the other. It has not been simply one, but many times that defeat was brought to one party and political success to another by a chance mistake in the campaign. A recent presidential election was lost by a single sentence of a New York preacher.

Ultra-conservatism never wins victories. It creates no cities and carves no continents from the darkness. It is the impossible that comes to pass when courage draws its sword. There are Napoleons of finance who are foolish, but the Napoleonic spirit in greater or less degree possesses all who dare and do instead of dream. The men who bring things to pass are not afraid to make mistakes. If they were, the things would never come to pass. Conservatism narrows and confines. It makes of mistakes a bogie man to frighten from advancement. On the other hand, enterprise calculates so many mistakes as to be expected in the range of probabilities, and having estimated these, goes on unfretted and unafraid. There are just two ways of dealing with mistakes—being crushed by them or crushing them to macadamize one's road upward. They are bowlders in the way or stepping stones along the way. The ultra-conservative sits down in front of them and laments their existence. The progressive climbs upon them and pushes on his road.

There is just one right way to do anything. There are a thousand wrong ways. Mistakes help to find the right way. Experience has been called a dear teacher, but dear teachers are always the most profitable. Cheapness does not pay any more here than in the shops. We learn to live by living. We learn the truth by finding out our errors. There are many people who could with profit be guided by the mistakes of others. Most persons, however, desire to see the folly of it themselves. To-day does not stand upon the shoulders of yesterday. It creeps along, faltering and falling. It makes the same blunders that it did when Rome was young or when the Pyramids were unearthed. Each generation must work out the problem of life itself.

This would be an altogether unbearable world if nobody ever did anything unwise or unreasonable. Errors are the spice of life—other people's errors. Without them there would be nothing worth living for. There would be no fun in the world. Fakes would be banished. Everybody would do the correct thing at all times. Not only the waiters and the gentlemen would wear full dress suits, but even the tramp would so appear after six o'clock. Or would there be any tramp? The war drum would throb no longer. There would be no use for diplomacy or legislation. Each man would marry the right woman, and all would live happily together ever afterward. There would be no divorce courts and no grand juries and no funny pages in the newspapers. What a lot of Othellos with their occupation gone there would be if there were no mistakes. The dentist lives on the mistakes of our mouths, the oculist and optician on the mistakes of our eyes, the aurists on the mistakes of our ears, the physician would find his practice unprofitable, and the lawyer would be a briefless barrister indeed. The physician's largest fees are from those who make physical mistakes. The lawyer's clients are always the victims of their own or somebody else's mistakes. As for the preacher, the correction of mistaken conduct is the burden of his sermons, the chief object of his church. If man were faultless he need not preach at all. It is only because of the practice of others that he preaches. Indeed, the professions would be blotted out by the barring of mistakes. Medicine would go out of existence with mistakes. Law and errors would disappear together. The gospel would be unneeded in a sinless world. And sin is the greatest mistake. The whole plan of human redemption hangs upon a blunder in horticulture which the first man made in a garden, tried to throw upon his wife, and has been suffering from ever since. The actual existence of millions is dependent upon the mistakes of their neighbors. They live because of the half-lives of other people.

Man himself is not a mistake. He sometimes thinks he is, and answers affirmatively the question of the pessimist, "Is life worth living?"—that is, in the moments when he is drunken with despair. The average man, cool-headed and sane, may regard the other fellow as a mistake, but never himself. Sanity is not a common possession, however. Sanity would mean absolute freedom from error of judgment or mistake of the heart. But nobody is entirely sane. The convolutions in every brain are twisted awry somewhere and at some time. Each individual cerebrum and cerebellum is abnormally developed at some point. Some bump is too small or too large. For this reason there are many misfits in the world. Many men have mistaken their proper calling—round pegs trying to fit square holes. The insane that are lodged in the asylums and retreats and sanitariums are but little removed in brain capacity from the people who put them there. The doctor and his patient differ only in degree. A most learned physician has said that there is not one perfectly normal brain in the world. When mistakes occur, therefore, it is not surprising. The surprise is that they should be so few in number.

Mistakes have their chiefest value in the charity they teach. No one can set down and coolly study his own life and count up its errors without being more kindly disposed towards his neighbor. It is the self-righteous who can not stop to comfort and reclaim the erring. The admitted sinner eagerly embraces every opportunity for such service. The mercy we crave teaches us to render the deeds of mercy. And mistakes are valuable because they teach the lesson of patience. It is only people who have made mistakes that can be patient with others.

Because the world must learn all its lessons over again and each generation go to school again everybody has a fair chance in life. If one family could struggle upward through errors overcome to faultlessness and then bequeath this faultlessness to the children, the world would become a most unequal one. It is a wise arrangement of the only being who makes no mistakes that this should be so, and that there is no legacy of inerrancy. Struggle as parents will to protect their children from blunder and burden, the child must always learn to live as he learns to walk; he must always stumble his way upward; he must make the same mistakes the world has made before.

Mistakes add beauty to the landscape. No copper-plate garden, laid out with mathematical precision and accuracy, is ever so attractive as the wild landscape with trees and rocks and grass piled upon it, undistinguishable inexactness. Mistakes add zest to life. There would be no glory or gainful pursuit if there were no mistakes in the commercial world. The exchanges would be deserted, and the city street a business morgue. Mistakes add strength to character. Man, with all his boastfulness, would be a sorry, spiceless weakling did he not make mistakes and overcome them. Gianthood comes from putting mistakes under foot. Moral dwarfness results from the non-existence of mistakes or the neglect to use them aright. We never know what we can do until we try, has been an inspiring maxim for centuries. Trying tests character and making mistakes comes as a result of trying.

The highest, holiest of all occupations is that which the reformer claims. But there could be no reformation had there not been first deformation. The reformer seeks to correct mistakes in politics, in church, in state, in business, in law. He feeds upon mistakes. He collects them for the study of sociology. He discusses them in his works on hygiene. He reasons about them in his works on philosophy. He weighs them in his balances and examines them with his microscopes. He analyzes, inspects, investigates. He contemplates, considers, calculates. And after he has dined, supped, breakfasted upon the mistakes of others, the reformer too often falls a victim to his own zeal and rashness.

The world is strewn with mistakes. If over each had been placed a gravestone there would be a girdle of granitoid pavement the globe around. They are valuable texts, not for epitaphs, but for bugle calls, not for obituary notices of buried hopes, but for inspiration to larger victory.

WALTER WILLIAMS.

THE RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE OF TWO BOYS.

BY T. A. BLAND, ONE OF THE BOYS.

Among my college chums, there was one boy who came very nearly up to my ideal of youthful manliness and nobility of character. I admired him greatly and loved him dearly. And he reciprocated my admiration and affection most fully. That was nearly half a century ago. We corresponded for many years, and then we lost each other. A few days ago I heard of him through a mutual friend and wrote him a letter. He responded promptly and heartsomely. He opened his letter by saying: "Your letter came as a glad surprise. I exclaimed, 'This my friend who was lost is found,' and I feel like throwing my arms about your neck and making a feast of rejoicing. I see you in memory as when we were fellow students of what we then innocently thought to be the science of medicine, the art of healing, and when our visions of the future were bright with hope of success in our chosen profession. We have learned a few things since then, and chiefly how little we, or our teachers, then know, and how little we still know."

From this I learn that my friend has evoluted out of the medical superstition by which we were both then environed, and held in thrall. But from an autobiographical sketch of him. I have just read. I learn that he still holds fast to the religious belief of his youth, and that he has spent most of his manhood years in the Baptist ministry, as well as in the practice of medicine, preaching on Sundays and often on other days, without pecuniary reward, a positive proof of his sincerity and devotion.

I account for the fact that my dear friend has not grown out of his childhood faith, on the ground that he was so organized as to be easily psychologized, and could and did have the psychologic experience known as getting religion, and that he has been, by both his earthly and his spirit guides, held under that hypnotic influence. I was not a hypnotic subject, hence I escaped the bondage.

Some time ago I began to write a novel which is in a measure autobiographic. The title is "Timothy Trueheart, Reformer." The second chapter of this unpublished work is substantially a record of my youthful religious experiences, and may be interesting to some persons:

"Timothy was born and grew up in an orthodox community. The doctrine of the total depravity of all the sons and daughters of Adam and Eve had been dinned into his ears from childhood. His parents and other pious friends had often urged him to "flee from the wrath of an angry and vengeful God," by taking refuge in the "ark of safety," meaning the church. He was urged to go to the mourners' bench and wrestle with the Lord till he compelled him to wipe out that old strain of depravity inherited from Adam, and pardon his current sins, then he would be on proper footing to enter into a covenant or treaty with God, by which he would be adopted into the family of the saints, and saved from all danger of hell. The boy's intellectual and moral sense rebelled against this sort of theology, but he was told that this rebellion was prompted by the Devil, who was very anxious to have the pleasure of his society in the world to come. This explanation was received with a degree of doubt, but "it may be true," he reasoned; "at any rate it can't do me any harm to go to the mourner's bench and get religion, so, when the next camp-meeting is held in Smith's woods, I will go up on the first invitation and not leave the seat of mercy till I get the promised blessing."

This vow was made by our hero in harvest time the summer after he was eighteen. He did not tell even his mother, that he had made such a vow, but he kept it to the letter, so far as it was in his power to keep it. He went through the regular programme as presented by the preacher. Yet he utterly failed to pass through that peculiar psychological experience popularly known as getting religion. It was nearing the witching hour of midnight; Timothy had been at the mourners' bench for over two hours, praying earnestly for the promised blessing. But as yet he felt no change in his mental or moral state. Elder Shaw was making his last round among the mourners, before closing the meeting for the night. Through his assistance two penitent sinners were transformed into rejoicing saints. He finally came to Timothy, and, kneeling by his side, he said:

"Well, my dear young friend, how is it with you? Have you found the Savior?"

"No, sir, I have not, though I have sought him earnestly."

"Have you made a full surrender? Have you confessed to the Lord that you are the chief of sinners, and that you richly deserve eternal damnation?"

"No, sir, I have not done that, and I can't do it. For though I am a sinner, I am not the worst sinner in the world."

The Elder was horror-stricken to hear such blasphemous words from a mourner. Recovering himself, he said: "My dear boy, it is Satan who puts that thought into your heart. Pray to be delivered from his power, or you are lost forever."

The boy did pray, and the burden of his prayer was that he might know the truth, and beguiled by it. To his dismay his faith in the theology he had been taught grew less, and his hope of getting through on the line he was pursuing gradually declined. He left the mourners' bench an agnostic, though he had never heard that word, and if he had been charged with being an agnostic, he would not have known whether to consider it a compliment, or the opposite of complimentary.

On the way home from the meeting Timothy's father said to him:

"My son, your mother and I were very glad to see you go forward to seek the blessing of forgiveness. I hope you found it."

"No, father, I did not find what I sought, and expected to find, that mysterious change of heart, which you and other good people call getting religion. I went to the mourners' bench with full confidence in the promise of the Lord as interpreted by my religious teachers. I did my part faithfully, but the promise failed, and my faith in that system of religion is gone. I had begun to lose hope, and fall into doubt, before Elder Shaw came to talk to me, and when he told me that I must confess that I am the chief of sinners and that I richly deserve to be damned in hell forever, I entirely lost hope, for I cannot believe what I know is not true. I've tried to be a good boy, and I know boys that are a great deal worse than I am. If I can't get religion without telling the Lord what he knows and I know is false then I shall never get it."

To say that this burst of blasphemy shocked and grieved the pious parents of this young skeptic scarcely does their feelings justice. He had been their hope and pride.

"I fear that much learning hath made thee mad, my son." It was the father who spoke, and his voice was tremulous with emotion. The mother wept in silence, but she was thinking also. She saw the force of the boy's logic, she had always understood him. There existed between the mother and son an intellectual and moral sympathy that made them companions and confidants. So the mother resolved to keep his words locked in her heart till she could talk with her son in private.

When a few days later she found herself alone with her boy, Mrs. Trueheart said: "My dear Timie, I want to talk with you about religion. I want you to open your heart to your mother freely, and tell me all your troubles, fears and doubts."

The boy put his arm about his mother, and kissing her beautiful forehead, he said:

"Dear Mother, I inherit from you those mental qualities that impel me to follow in the line of intellectual and moral culture. I thank God that he gave me such a mother. A mother who can think along logical lines, and reach rational conclusions. Mother, God gave us our reasoning faculties, and our moral sentiments and bade us develop them and use them, and be guided by them. This being true, we are bound to believe what seems to us true and reject what to us seems false. We cannot do otherwise. An error needs only to be exposed to the sunlight of reason to be rejected by all honest people, and truth, when so exposed is so beautiful that all who see it desire to possess it.

"Mother, the religious system we have been brought up in is false in its essential dogmas; since my recent camp-meeting experience, I have put these dogmas to the test of reason and moral sense, and found them to be false. It is unreasonable to suppose that an infinitely wise and just God would damn me for a sin committed by a man who lived thousands of years ago, and a man, too, who had not progressed far enough in knowledge and civilized habits to wear clothes, live in a house or build a fire. It is unreasonable to suppose that a wise, just and loving being would curse the whole human race and even the innocent earth with an infinite and eternal curse because a woman who was as ignorant as a baby ate an apple to gratify her appetite and her curiosity, also because she was told that it would make her wise. This story is as unreasonable as the story of Pandora, and the wonderful box, which I read in the history of Greek mythology. Both stories are efforts to solve the problem of evil and explain the mystery of sin and suffering. They were both written in an ignorant age, and are believed only by ignorant people."

"But, my boy, the Bible says it's true, and we surely must believe the Bible, for we are told that God inspired the men who wrote the Bible."

"Mother, I am inspired to answer you with a quotation from the Bible, which father often uses: 'Let God be true, though all men are liars.' The story of the fall of man did not come from God. The author of it may have thought himself inspired by God, but if so he was mistaken. God is wise and that story is silly. God is just, and that story is a story of injustice. God is love, that's a story of anger. God is merciful, that is a story of revenge. God cannot be the author of that story, nor of the system of religion founded upon it."

"But, my beloved son, if the story of the fall is false, then the story of Christ is false, also, for if man did not fall he did not need a Redeemer."

"I admit the force of your logic, mother, but I have been reading the history of Jesus Christ, as given in the four Gospels since my experience at camp-meeting, as I would read any other history. I read it just as though I had never read it before, and had not formed any opinion upon the character or mission of Jesus. I think I now understand his character and his mission. He was a divine man, but a man and not a god, and his mission was to preach the gospel of righteousness, and redeem man from sin and its consequences by his precepts and his example. He claimed to be the son of man, and also the son of God. But he did not say that in this respect he differed from other men, on the contrary he taught that all men are sons of God, as well as sons of men. He taught men to pray, 'Our Father who are in Heaven,' thus teaching that God is the Father of all men, and that all men are brethren. He seemed anxious to get people to live right, to do to others as they would have others do to them, to love their neighbors, as themselves. To be just to all and generous to the needy. He wanted people to develop their intellects, and be guided by their moral faculties. He urged them to reform, by ceasing to do wrong and learning to do right. But, in all the four histories of him there is not a word about the fall of man, total depravity, or salvation through the merits of a crucified Redeemer. Jesus not only did not refer to the fall of Adam, but he gave no intimation that he had ever heard of it. If he had been sent to this world expressly to redeem the race of man from the consequences of that fall, he surely would have said so. And the fact that he did not say so, proves clearly that that was not his mission."

"But, my son, why was Christ crucified, if not to redeem the world?"

"He was crucified, dear mother, for the same reason that the prophets were stoned, for the same reason that Socrates was compelled to drink the deadly hemlock, for the same reason that martyrs to Truth in all past ages were put to death, because he preached a different doctrine from that taught by the priests of his time and country. He was put to death as a heretic. He was crucified because that was the way criminals were executed in the Roman provinces, and Judea was a Roman province at that time."

"You have given me much to think about, my son, and I will read the four gospels again, and then we will have another talk about religion."

A few days after the above conversation Timothy borrowed from a friend a book of sermons by that distinguished Quaker, Elias Hicks, and he was delighted to find in these sermons full confirmation of the views he had given expression to in his talk with his mother. He read them aloud to his father and mother, and both were profoundly impressed by them. The mother accepted gladly the new gospel, but the father feared to give up the old faith, after all, it might be found that the new doctrine was a cunning device of the devil, by which to deceive people and lead them to hell.

Timothy explained his father's attitude on phrenological grounds. "Your organs of comparison and causality are larger, mother, and more active than the same organs in father's head, hence you have larger mental grasp and clearer insight than he has, and besides you have more courage than father possesses, because the organ of cautiousness is not so large in your head as in his."

"Why, what a wonderful thing phrenology is, if it can explain the difference in people's religious belief."

"Yes, mother, phrenology is the greatest science ever discovered, for it is the science of man. It enables us to know ourselves and our fellows. It is the key with which the human mind can be unlocked and its motives and mysteries explained."

Everybody knew that Timothy had tried to get religion, and had failed, and the gossips said that he had become an infidel. Elder Shaw called upon him to learn the truth or falsity of this charge. Timothy being in the field at work when the preacher called, the mother received him, and on learning his errand, invited him to remain to dinner, and see the boy and have a talk with him during the noon hour.

"Thank you, Sister Trueheart; I will stay and see your son, and in the meantime, I would like to talk with you about his state of mind. Is it true that he has denied the Lord that bought him with his precious blood, and become a rank infidel?"

"My son can answer your question better than I can, so I will let him answer it, but if he is an infidel, I, too, am an infidel, for I believe as he does, about religion."

"Well, Sister Trueheart, I am sure you are not an infidel, for I never saw an infidel woman in all my travels, though I have heard that some of the Quaker women have been led astray by that prince of heretics, Elias Hicks."

Mrs. Trueheart made no reply to this outburst, but excusing herself went to the kitchen to look after the dinner. She now knew that when Timothy should define his position Elder Shaw would denounce his views as heretical, and pronounce him an infidel, but she felt sure that the boy would defend himself so ably as to confound the preacher, and come out of the contest triumphant.

Mr. Trueheart engaged the Elder in conversation on minor topics while at dinner, but as they left the table the Elder placed his right hand on the boy's head and said:

"Timothy, I hear strange and startling stories about you and I came expressly to learn from your own lips how much truth, if any there is in these stories. It is currently reported that you have become an infidel."

"Does not the word 'infidel' mean want of fidelity, and is not an 'infidel' one who is wanting in fidelity?"

"Yes, ah, I suppose that is the original definition of the word."

"Then I deny the charge of being an infidel, for I earnestly seek to know the truth, and follow where it leads with unwavering fidelity."

"But, my dear young man, Christ is the Truth, the way and the life. You must believe in Christ, and be faithful to him."

"I do believe in Christ, and I am following with all the fidelity of my soul, and all the wisdom I have attained from the ethical principles and moral precepts found in the 'Sermon on the Mount.'"

"Ah! I think I see where you are drifting. You accept Christ as a moral teacher, but not as a Savior in the Gospel sense."

"Yes, I do accept Jesus Christ as a Savior in the Gospel sense. I learn from the Gospel records of his life, that the mission of Christ was to redeem man from the dominion of selfishness, which is the dominion of the devil, and to open his spiritual vision so that he can grasp the sublime truth that he is immortal. His mission was to save men from sin by showing them the hideousness of vice, and the beauty of virtue, and that vice is not only hideous, but that it inevitably brings misery, while virtue is not only lovely but that her votaries are always happy. All this I firmly believe."

"No; His chief mission on earth was to suffer and die on the cross in man's stead, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God."

"I am but a boy, and have yet much to learn, but I have read with care the four short histories of Jesus Christ in the New Testament. There is, so far as I have heard, no record of his acts or his words. I get my views of his mission therefore wholly from those histories. If he ever uttered one word about the sin of Adam, the fall of man, the total depravity of the human race, or vicarious atonement, I wish you would show it to me."

The Elder's face was an interesting study. Astonishment predominated, but there was an expression indicating defeat. He looked like a man who heartily wished himself somewhere else, but who could see no way out of his dilemma. He was silent for a moment, when he said:

"I must not keep you from your work longer now, Timothy, but I will talk with you further some other time."

From that day the studious, the thoughtful, the sincere, the honest young truth-seeker, Timothy Trueheart, Jr., was regarded as an infidel. Young people were advised by their parents and their religious teachers to shun his society lest he should lead them into error by his infidel arguments.

Timothy's faithful friends, Calvin Bartley and Jennie Lester, refused to believe the charge, or heed the warning. They defended him bravely whenever he was attacked in their presence. It required no sacrifice and not much courage for Calvin to stand up for Timothy, but with Jennie the case was different, yet she proved herself a true heroine.

A party of boys and girls had been discussing the gossip about Timothy, and Ann Haney had settled the matter by quoting Elder Shaw as authority for the statment that Timothy had told him to his face that he did not believe in the leading doctrines of the church or in the plan of salvation founded upon those doctrines. It was then that Jennie Lester took up the defense of the absent boy.

"You may all say what you please about him, but everyone who knows Timothy Trueheart at all knows that he is a good boy, and whatever he believes or doesn't believe, he is honest in it, and you all know that he knows more than all of us put together, or even Elder Shaw himself."

"Oh, I know why you take Tim Trueheart's part. He's your sweetheart."

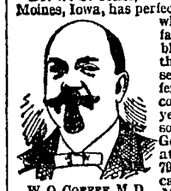
A general laugh greeted this retort from Ann Haney. Jennie Lester's face was suffused with blushes for a moment, then an angry flush succeeded. The girl was justly indignant at the vulgar manner in which Ann had attempted to reply to her statement of facts.

"You have no right to say any such thing, Ann Haney, and it is coarse and vulgar as well as false. You and everyone else knows that Timothy Trueheart has no sweethearts except his books and his mother. He has something more important to think about than most boys have, and then he is too young to think about such things as sweethearts, and so am I; and so are you, Ann Haney, if you only knew it, but you don't think of much else, and you judge me by yourself."

"Good for you, Jennie; defend yourself and Timothy, too, and I will stand by you," spoke up Calvin Bartley, and all eyes were turned on him. "I endorse every word that Jennie has said," he continued. "I stand by Tim Trueheart. He's the smartest boy in the county and the best one, too. He told me about his new ideas on religion and there's lots of good sense in them. But I don't care who says he is, I say he ain't an infidel. He believes in God and Jesus Christ, and that's what I believe in. I'd like to know who's got any better belief than that. And he lives up to what he believes, and that's more than some do, that call him an infidel."

No one replied to this speech, and the party broke up.

Calvin called that same day on his much discussed and greatly misunderstood friend and gave him an account of Jennie Lester's heroic and intelligent defense of him, and of his own part in the discussion.



Timothy was delighted and so expressed himself to Calvin. He laid special emphasis upon the latter's argument in his behalf, passing lightly over the part that the young girl played in the matter.

"Now, Tim, that won't do; I know you appreciate my defense, but you appreciate what Jennie said a thouand times more, and I don't blame you a bit for it, either, for she is the prettiest, the best and the smartest girl in this part of the world, and she thinks you are worth more than all the other boys put together, even including your humble servant. And I wouldn't blame you a bit if you was to fall in love with her, when you get old enough," the last part of the sentence being uttered with significant emphasis, and accompanied by a humorous twinkle of the eye.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Will C. W. Stewart please send his address to this office?

Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt, 498 W. Madison street, Chicago, will make engagements for camp-meetings, or societies, and will answer calls to officiate at funerals, weddings, or other services. He is a speaker of fine ability, and of superior culture.

G. W. Kates and wife will be in Princeton, Minn., September 15 to 19; Pine City, 20 to 25; Aitkin, 27 to 30.

Wm. Niess writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The First Association of Spiritualists will resume its hall meetings the first Sunday in October, at the new location, No. 222 Superior street, which is a pleasant and large hall, newly decorated. Our speaker will be Mrs. Lou Prior, inspirational and test medium, and psychometrist. We hope that all of our friends and members will turn out promptly and attend regularly, for we shall have a feast of good things through the mediumship of Mrs. Prior."

The Campbell Brothers have left Lily Dale, N. Y., for a rest of a few weeks at the sea shore, after which they will go to New York, arriving there to do business about the middle of October.

Mrs. Lilly LeSieur writes: "The next Band of Harmony, Thursday afternoon and evening, September 20, will give a reception and welcome home to our president and pastor, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. We have a special program for the occasion, and the young folks have entire charge of supper arrangements, to be served at six o'clock. The ladies are requested to bring refreshments as usual. All interested friends are welcome."

J. W. Gill writes: "Mrs. Hamilton Gill, trance medium, has now returned to the city, after spending a pleasant vacation at Island Lake and Briggs Park camp-meetings. Island Lake is an ideal spot for a camp-meeting, and the Detroit Spiritualists are to be congratulated for securing such a meeting-place. Mrs. Gill will hold her usual circles Sunday and Thursday evenings and Tuesday afternoon for ladies only, until further notice, at their residence, 82 South Oakley avenue."

The Chicago American says: "Miss Ida Williamson read the funeral oration yesterday over the body of George Frost, an aged Spiritualist, who shot and killed himself Wednesday last. Miss Williamson, who is young and very pretty, was a great friend of Frost. Two days before his suicide Frost called on the girl and asked her to read three orations written by himself and choose the one she thought best. Wondering, Miss Williamson made a choice. Then Frost asked her if she would read it over his dead body. The girl promised, little thinking how soon she would be called upon to fulfill her pledge. Frost was for many years an Episcopalian, but recently joined the Spiritualists. He held the opinion that a man's body was his own, only the soul belonging to God. Four years ago his wife killed herself in the same manner as did Frost. Miss Williamson read the dead man's oration in a clear, firm voice, and showed no signs of nervousness over her unique position."

Mrs. Dr. Edwards has returned to the city and located at 768 West Madison street, where she will be pleased to see friends and patrons. Meetings of the Spiritual and Occult Philosophy society will be resumed the first Sunday in October.

Lyman C. Howe is engaged December 30 and January 6, at Salem, Mass. He is free to answer calls before and after those dates. His permanent address is Fredonia, N. Y.

F. W. Martin writes: "The Progressive Spiritualist Society of Elyria, Ohio, have set the ball a-rolling for the coming season, with Oscar A. Edgerly, of Lynn, Mass., and C. J. Barnes, of Anderson, Ind., as the workers. Mr. Barnes held seances under the auspices of the society during the first week of the month and much good has been accomplished thereby, as some of the trumpet seances were unusually good, scores of absolute tests being given, while the manifestations occurring at a private trumpet sitting were the most wonderful it has been the writer's privilege to enjoy. Brother Edgerly remains with us during the entire month, holding in all fourteen meetings, and while the audiences were very small at first, owing to the exceptionally warm weather, there in a perceptible increase in members which is very gratifying, and goes to show that the scholarly discourses and beautiful teachings of Brother Edgerly's able spirit guides are fully appreciated by the thinking people of our beautiful little city and surroundings. The tests given so far by Brother Edgerly have all been recognized, being clear cut and comprehensive. May his days on earth be lengthened so that the spirit world may be enabled through his fine instrumentality to give us of their superior knowledge and bring more light to all that seek it. Brother Edgerly goes to Columbus, Ohio, for the month of November, but is still uncertain about October. Should any society not too far from Columbus desire his services, they might yet be able to secure him for that month. In conclusion I will say that our society is only one year old, and while we have met with much discouragement we will push ever onward and the truth shall prevail."

We keep a standing notice on this page that every item sent here for publication must contain the full name and address of the writer, otherwise it will not appear. That accounts for "your" item not appearing this week.

Albert Wentworth writes from Hicksville, Ohio: "I herewith give a brief report of our 31st annual meeting at the Wentworth Grove, Ohio. Many of the old workers in our society who took the lead in the interest of our cause thirty years ago have passed to the spirit side of life, and the rest of us are scattered and getting well up in years; but when the question is put whether we shall have our regular meeting the next year, it is always decided in its favor. We feel that our labors have been crowned with success, as there is now three regularly organized societies in Paulding county, and all have had very interesting grove meetings this summer. The meeting at the Wentworth Grove was held on the 25th and 26th of last August. Mr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., was our speaker. The weather was beautiful, and there was a large and very attentive gathering of people, and I can truly say that Mr. Knowles was listened to with great interest, and gave general satisfaction, both in his speaking and the tests he gave upon the stand."

Geo. W. Kircher secretary writes: "We would be pleased to correspond with test mediums for our society. Address me at No. 1622 Irvin street, People's Spiritual Society, Louisville, Ky."

Laura B. Payne writes from Topeka, Kansas: "There is now a move on foot to organize at this place a permanent State Spiritualist Association. There will be a meeting next Wednesday evening for the purpose of electing officers and effecting the organization. Rev. T. W. Woodrow, of Kansas City, Kansas, is taking a deep interest in the movement, and will assist in pushing the work to a successful termination. He will also fill the rostrum of the Church of Spiritualism in Topeka, September 23. His subject on that occasion will ge: 'Upon this rock (Spiritualism) I will build my church, and the gates of hades (the unseen world) shall not prevail against it.' The object in organizing a State Spiritualist Association is that we may establish local organizations all over the state of Kansas, and become strengthened as workers in this cause."

J. L. Franck writes from Louisville, Ky.: "It is with pleasure that I drop a few lines to notify you that the People's Spiritual Temple has engaged the highly honored and gifted medium, Mrs. Carrie Fuller Weatherford. She has been with us for four weeks and has given the best of satisfaction. Two gentlemen came 160 miles yesterday for the purpose of hearing this gifted lady lecture, and were more than pleased. Now, why should not people come who live nearer? They do, and after hearing one lecture, you don't want to miss another at any price or sacrifice. Her lectures keep the audience spellbound from beginning to end. The improvised poems and songs by Mrs. Weatherford and her daughter Essie, are grand. Ten of the best mediums of the city, Mrs. Weatherford included, will give an entertainment or seance on September 25, with spiritual tableaux and moving pictures, illustrating to the world what they may expect after leaving the physical body behind. Children and calcium lights will make this very effective and a grand time is expected. Our secretary, Mr. Geo. Kircher, whose duty it is to do all correspondence, must be excused for neglecting his duty, for the present at least, as he is a very busy man (a government employe); secondly, it has come to pass he (masonically speaking) has had a raise—not in salary, but in family. He resides near the banks of the Ohio, and is noted as an expert fisherman. Of late his luck has failed in catching the finny tribe, and he could not account for it. The other day he was rewarded with a ten-pounder in the shape of a bouncing baby boy. Mother and baby are doing finely. The phunny men and the phunny pholks of the Phunny Society will give a Phunny Hentertainment on Hoctober 9th, phor the benephit of the temple, with phunny songs, phunny sayings, phunny dances, including the phunny skeleton dance and the phunny Philapino on the phunny slack wire, with phunny music, and to conclude with a phunny pharce, and we hope to have a phull house of phunny pholks to enjoy a phunny time, in a phunny place, for a phunny price to see a phunny phace. I trust I am not taking too much of your time in reading this phunny letter, for I wrote it in a phunny way, with a phunny pen, on a phunny table, with phunny ink, in a phunny position, in a phunny room, phacing to the south, phacing the moon, written on a phunny day, in the afternoon noon."

A Verry writes from Danvers, Mass.: "I cannot get along without The Progressive Thinker. It contains more knowledge than all the rest of the Spiritual papers."

John A. Johnston, trumpet and test medium, has returned to the city, and is located at 661 Jackson Boulevard.

The secular press has the following: "St. Louis, Mo., July 13.—Mrs. Martha Woodward, of Denver, Col., spurred by a premonition that disaster had befallen her son Albert, is hurrying to St. Louis. Before she arrives in the morning she will have learned that her presentiment was correct. Thursday afternoon her son was found dead in a shed near Jefferson Barracks. He had been confined in the hospital here suffering from melancholia, and disappeared from the institution. It is believed that he was murdered, as his skull was fractured near the base of the brain by some blunt instrument, and his body had been dragged to the shed after the killing. The news was telegraphed to Mrs. Woodward Thursday afternoon, but an hour before the message was delivered she had been seized with the presentiment of evil and had boarded a train for this city. Relatives are now on the way to meet her before she arrives here and break the sad news to her gently."

E. W. Sprague and wife have October and November unengaged. Address them at Salem, Ohio, until October 1.

Rev. Charles L. Ainsworth writes: "I am just recovering from an eight weeks' sickness of typhoid pneumonia, and have been brought with the hopes of recovery to Petoskey, Mich., where I am improving. I desire to hear from societies that wish my services. Address me here."

The secretary, Mrs. N. Ewan, reports a very interesting and successful meeting at 77 Thirty-first street.

E. W. Sprague writes from Middlefield, Ohio: "We go to Salem, Ohio, for the rest of this month, next week. We speak here next Sunday at a grove meeting."

C. Walter Lynn, of Oakland, Cal., writes of a narrow escape: "I have been 'knocked out' for a few days. In crossing a street, I was knocked down by a 'sprinter' on a bicycle, and hurled under the heels of a horse. I expected to receive my 'quietus,' but through some power was saved, although the horse reared above my head too close for comfort. The wheel was demolished, and I feel considerably shaken up and bruised, but I am thankful it was no worse."

Clara Langdale writes from Denver, Col.: 'Spiritualism is progressing rapidly. We have in our midst fine mediums. Mrs. Ada Foye has returned and taken up her work again. Mrs. J. M. Steward is once more in our midst. We heartily welcome her. Mrs. Steward is one of the finest trance mediums I have ever met."

A. M. G. Wheeler writes from Louisville, Ky.: "I have returned to this place after an absence of three months. I had a very successful trip in Canada and the East. Have been re-engaged for the second year with the Church of Spirit Communion, and we opened the church doors Sunday, September 2, to a large and appreciative audience. My sister, Miss Lillian Wheeler, is assisting me in my work here, and acts as platform test medium in our church. We are planning for a successful winter and hope to be able to give you favorable reports from time to time."

B. F. Sliter writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "A very pleasant birthday surprise party was held by a few of the many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Dixon of South Division street, Grand Rapids, Mich., last Tuesday evening, at their home. It was Mrs. Jennie Dixon's fifty-second anniversary of her birth, and a few of her friends presented her with a beautiful gold watch chain. Your scribe made a short presentation speech, to which Mrs. D. responded with heart-felt thanks and appreciation. The Dixons were formerly of St. Louis, Mo. Those present and contributing to the gift were Mrs. A. Almquist, Mr. and Mrs. Stidd, Mr. and Mrs. Horton, Mrs. Ellis, Miss Dollie Richards, Mrs. Lamphere, Mrs. Kinney and myself. The evening was spent very pleasantly with visiting, cards and banqueting. All were happy and splendidly entertained."

A. D. Marble writes from Lawton, O. T.: "If the missionaries in China were Spiritualists or Mormons, how many guns, war ships and soldiers would the United States government have sent there?"

W. M. Smith writes from Toledo, O.: "The meetings of the Independent Association of Spiritualists (incorporated religious body), opened with a fine audience. President Dowd called the meeting to order, after which the following programme was rendered: Singing by choir, accompanied by our pianist, Mrs. Seel; poem and invocation by Mrs. Coffman, of Grand Rapids, our speaker for the month; opening address, by the Hon. Samuel M. Jones, mayor of our city, who is widely known as the golden rule mayor, and an earnest advocate of the principles of brotherhood and equality, as applied to daily life. He gave a masterly address, directly upon the line of thought advocated by our best speakers. Mrs. Coffman followed, and after a fine lecture fed the hungry audience with messages and names of their friends who had passed to the other shore. On Tuesday afternoon the ladies of the society met at the residence of Mrs. Hoffman, one of our trustees, and organized a ladies auxiliary, which will have charge of our socials and entertainments for the coming season, with the following officers: President, Mrs. A. Coffman; vice-president, Mrs. E. Schauss; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. Seel. The entertainment for this month will be given Thursday, the 27th, and from the number of tickets already sold promises to be a grand success.

The Harmonial Society.

To the Editor:—I hasten to inform your readers that in consequence of the dissatisfaction of several members of the Harmonial Society of Sturgis, Mich., who thought the action of the annual meeting in permitting the officers to remain without balloting for each separately, was in violation of the Constitution and By-Laws of the Society, the then president deemed it his duty to call a special meeting by summoning each and every member by mailed circular to attend on Wednesday evening, at the Free Church, September 12 at 7 o'clock, to elect officers by ballot to serve during the ensuing year.

There was a good attendance. The secretary who had been legally elected by ballot at the previous meeting, resigned his position and requested the meeting not to re-elect him, as he preferred being a "full private," and he takes this opportunity to thank the many friends who persisted in voting for him notwithstanding his remonstrance.

The officers elected were: Dr. E. H. Denslow, president; David A. Kribbs, secretary; Mrs. Libbie Anderson, treasurer. Executive committee—Thos. Collar, C. Cressler, Mrs. Pontius, Jay G. Walt, and Mrs. Gilhams. Soliciting committee—Mrs. Cressler, Mrs. Pearsol and Mrs. Denslow. Committee on music—Miss Agnes Cressler, Miss Etta Pontius and Mrs. Anna Cathcart.

The president requests me to add that he and the several members of the executive board are determined to keep up services in Free Church regularly every Sunday. He solicits correspondence, and assures the readers of The Progressive Thinker that the placidity of the past has ceased and that enthusiasm prevails in the Harmonial Society of Sturgis, Michigan.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to the higher life, August 2, from Higginson, Ark., my son, Elmore J. Stringham, aged 29 years, after one week of great suffering.

Then again on August 9, of diphtheria, my little five-year-old grand-daughter, Elsie Stringham, passed to spirit life. The great trial seems almost more than I can bear. For consolation I look to the beautiful teachings of Spiritualism, and feel that they are still with us with their loving influence.

MARY E. STRINGHAM.

Michael James Poff, of Rutland, Mich., passed beyond this life, September 4, aged 58. The funeral was held on the 6th, and the consolation which only Spiritualism can offer was given the bereaved in the discourse by Geo. B. Holmes, of Grand Rapids. Mr. Poff was dearly beloved by his family and respected by all. He was an earnest, honest, patient man, who struggled in vain through hard surroundings to reach success. H.

Henry B. Douglass, of Toledo, Ohio, passed to spirit life, August 25, aged 56 years. He embraced the grand truths of Spiritualism a number of years ago which truth he was always pleased to give to others. His happy, jovial disposition made him beloved by all. His request was to have spiritual services, although his wife standing alone in the cause which was so dear to them both followed his request. Services were held at the house, Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran officiating.

"Now it is evident that this Power, whatever it may ultimately be discovered to be, either foresees and determines all things, past, present and to come, in the wisest and best manner, from universal knowledge, or that all the changes in the universe are the results of necessary chains of events, one link succeeding another in endless succession; and in either of these cases, for man to concern himself about this Power, hitherto totally incomprehensible to him, and to make himself and all his fellow-creatures miserable by such proceedings, is the very essence of irrationality, and exhibits in the most glaring point of view, a total absence of all approach to the first indications of common sense, or sound judgment that can lead to a superior and a rational state of society.

Of what possible importance can it be to this Incomprehensible Power what man thinks or does in reference to it? He either acts in accordance with its laws, or in opposition to them, if such an absurdity can be for one moment admitted. If in accordance with its laws, then why make ourselves responsible and miserable for that which is unavoidable and beyond our control? If we do not act in accordance with the laws of this Power—whence our power of action, and from what source is it derived? It is evident we do not make ourselves, understand ourselves, or create our own motives to action. Why, then, lay any stress on any imaginary notions respecting a power which is yet wholly unknown to us? Why, in the name of the first approach to the elements of reason, should we make ourselves and others miserable about that of which, hitherto, men have had no knowledge, no not even the slightest rational conception? We are conscious that those things around us, palpable to our senses, exist—but how they are made to exist, or why exist, or why so many living things having the faculty of feeling pleasure or pain, should exist, and experience, during their lives, so much suffering of body and mind, we are yet totally ignorant; and it is a proof of the irrational state in which our ancestors and ourselves have lived, that we and they should have spent so much valuable time, and so many means of happiness in endeavoring to find out and fathom that which, so far, has been made incomprehensible to our faculties, and from which efforts misery only has been the result. It is now evident that this course of action must be altogether abandoned before there can be any chance of the human race becoming rational, or that it should enjoy anything approaching to the happiness which it desires, and which appears within reach as soon as this ignorance can be overcome.

"What advance in real knowledge is made by men giving to this Power any name, or all the names that nations have given to it?—or by multiplying and extolling its fanciful attributes? Have these multiplied terms, or these aggregates of imaginary attributes, added one iota to human knowledge or happiness? Are not the most superstitious men and women over the whole world at this moment the most ignorant, imbecile, or furious of all the animal creation? Are they not the most inconsistent and irrational of all living creatures? Is there anything too absurd for them to imagine, or too ridiculous for them to say or do? While under these unfortunate impressions—most horrible if they were true—that a Being should make other beings when and how he liked, and then, having made them to please himself, and having placed them where he liked, and given them a will to think and act as they liked, and yet that they could not do anything contrary to his preordained decrees; and then for thinking and acting in accordance with eternal foreknown knowledge, they are, after a temporary existence of a few years, to be tortured without hope of cessation for a moment of time, or future relief from this torment after millions of ages of never-ceasing suffering, is a notion so degrading to all power, and so destructive of every idea of justice, mercy, wisdom, or goodness, that it is not possible for any, except beings whose faculties have been deranged to the utmost extent of derangement, to entertain such gross and horrible notions of any existence; but to attribute infinite wisdom and goodness to any such existence, exceeds any degree of madness that can enter into a mind not totally deranged in all its reasoning functions. And that which is still more extraordinary is, that these most insane and horrible conceptions should be gravely taught by men called learned, reasonable, and sensible, when all that they know, when all their knowledge is united, consists in the simple fact, that a Power, to them unknown, and altogether incomprehensible to man, causes all the effects and changes which has been known and unknown to man and throughout the universe.

"All who possess powers of reflection, and who can reason in the most ordinary manner, admit that the Power which acts throughout the universe is to them incomprehensible—they know not its form, or mode of existence, or means of action. They only know that its power must be in all places at the same time; but what the universe is, what are the elements, their qualities, powers, and extent, within or composing it, no man knows: facts have not yet been discovered by man to give him more than wild conjecture upon these matters, about which those with deranged intellect speak as fluently as though they knew these matters familiarly and the cause of all things, while they are totally blind to the cause of everything. From the past history of the human race, from the present condition of man over the world, it is evident 'that the facts are yet unknown to man which define what that Incomprehensible Power is,' which is the primary cause of all motion, life, mind, and their consequences, throughout the universe."

"What Does Spiritualism Include?"

I have just finished reading the first lesson of No. 2 of this important series by Prof. J. S. Loveland, and I want to shout "Amen." In this one lesson there is more truth, more valuable analysis, and more scientific verity, than I have ever seen in a whole volume of occult speculation, and mystical dreams, so freely dealt out by a class of metaphysicians who assume to have passed beyond Spiritualism, and got something higher and better.

"Spiritualism is the Science and Philosophy of Life," covers the whole ground, and Professor Loveland proceeds to work out some of the details and specifications in some of his always clear and masterly style.

He pursues the scientific method. That is the only safe method, and before it all others must ultimately go down. He recognizes the "One ever-present fact—A Medium." In these days, when speculating mystics are decrying mediumship as a minor and temporary expedient, to be outgrown and left behind while occult astronomy assumes a dictatorship, it seems wholesome and inspiring to find such clear, strong statements from such a mind as Prof. Loveland. Hear him again and heed as you hear:

"Without the medium none of these things ever do or can occur."

But we find these psychic croakers, who disparage mediumship, always putting their own narrow construction of Spiritualism and mediumship. They admit that mediumship is well in its place, and has a use, for the present, and that Spiritualism is true in a small way; but they have gone beyond it. They want to lead it out, and up, into their own high retreat, and canonize it under a new name, dug from the grave of Oriental myths, or coined out of the superlative revelations of occult mysticism. They mean well, must of them, no doubt, but they lack the clear, cool, scientific ability of such men as Loveland, Lockwood, Wright, and many others in our ranks who are competent to interpret Spiritualism in its own proper sphere, without first dressing it in a new masquerading outfit dug from the tombs of mythical aristocracy.

But I am not sorry they are among us. I believe in evolution; and it requires all the factors to evolute a world or a race. Many of them are excellent people, and I love them, in spite of themselves. They may make wry faces at me for expressing my mind so freely; but they will outgrow it all in time—or eternity—and I can wait.

Yours for scientific Spiritualism with mediumship a permanent and respected corner-stone for the evolution of phenomena. LYMAN C. HOWE.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Securely packed, and sent postage paid from the manufacturer, for $1.00. Address:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. "Countryman": Q. What is the future of the conflict between capital and labor?

A. It must be distinctly understood that in all discussion of social and political questions, we favor evolution and not revolution. It is the silently directed forces of nature that build; it is the unguided tornado which destroys. The country is in no danger of destruction, and it will be "saved," whatever political party holds in power. And yet momentous problems arise on the wise solution of which the immediate prosperity and happiness of untold millions depend. Among the most consequential of these is the relation between capital and labor. It is one which cannot be averted, tided over, or met with compromise. The people instructed by the press, are no longer unthinking tools in the hands of a so-called superior or privileged class. The laborer feels that the fruits of his toils are his own, and resents as unjust any scheme by which he is deprived thereof.

On the other hand capital strenuously presses its claims and with remorseless exactitude calls for the fulfillment of the bond, though payable in human flesh.

Hence there is antagonism between capital and labor which ought not to exist, for these respective forces should mutually support each other. Because they are forced into unnatural relations by selfish greed, there arise the gravest questions of social policy, and the future is darkened with omens of disaster. There are labor unions, strikes, riots, violence, poverty, ignorance and suffering, with bitter rancor, hatred and distrust, and burning revenge for deeply felt injustice on one side; on the other, lock-outs, unpitying sneers of self-sufficient pride, extravagance, luxury and waste.

The introduction of machinery is greatly responsible for bringing about this state of affairs. For the first half-century of national life the land was practically free to all who would occupy it. The wild territory was so vast that it seemed inexhaustible and afforded an outlet to surplus labor. There was no great disproportion in wealth, and the man with a small farm was independent. The opening of mines of iron, coal and precious metals; the production of oil, the railroads and numberless machines for saving labor has forced a concentration of wealth in the hands of a comparative few. Machinery compels concentration of capital outgrowing even the largest individual capital and competing in the formation of corporations. These take the life from individual effort and tend to enlarge the masses of wealth held in the hands of a few at the expense of the many.

The laborer has not been directly benefited by the introduction of machinery. At first he finds his favorite occupation usurped by arms of steel and fingers of brass, and he must become an attendant of the machine or not work. He then finds that the machine can perform one hundred or a thousand times more work than he can single-handed. It is a vast gain to some one, but not to him. He will receive no part or share in this increase of production. He regards himself lucky if his wages are not cut down on account of the competition created. The owner of a machine enjoys the full benefit, gathering all profits. The laborer may be indirectly benefited by cheaper products; but that is insignificant and has no relation to the principle involved.

To solve this problem the factors involved and their relations must be thoroughly understood. Labor has within itself the possibilities of capital. It is a creator, and when it has accomplished its task and received its reward it is capital. Capital then is concrete labor. A machine as an embodiment of both mind and body is capital of value for the labor it will perform. Land is capital valued for the crops it will produce; mines for their products; a water-fall for the power it will supply. The definition given above does not apply to the mine or waterfall except to the labor given to develop their usefulness. The gifts of nature to man should not be subject to monopoly. It is this that has caused the time-old antagonism between the rich and the poor.

The robber hand of the conqueror seized the best of the land or all of it, the mines, the waterfalls and waterways, and the less fortunate have paid rent, interest and toll. No just deed can hold these natural resources, for they belong to mankind.

Capital and labor in justice walk hand in hand. The former is the instrument by which the latter accomplishes its tasks; that instrument is the result of previous labor which should be rewarded. It should have its just share with labor. The partnership is thus a mutual benefit; but when capital seeks the lion's share, and leaves labor only a bare subsistence, it is extortionate and unjust. As an example, there is a waterfall where nature furnishes great power by the descent of the current. Labor builds a dam and a vast factory. The machinery will do the work of many thousand men. A man working therein is enabled to perform a hundred times the work he could do single-handed. If the owners of this natural power use it for their own exclusive benefit, they hold an unjust monopoly. If they share the benefits with the operatives, according to the rights of the case, there is mutual benefit. In the first instance a few days' labor in building dam and factory, enslaves the wage-workers, and their children are held in this wage slavery because of the labor of their fathers.

The products of labor belong to the laborer, and in a just state of society this will be realized. The time will come when the organization of labor will be as strong as that of capital which opposes it, and every man receive his exact reward.

L. F. Gohen: A. The answer to your question is: Tell my daughter May, that her mother desires that she give the opportunity for communication. This she can do by sitting alone or with friends around a table, with minds in the attitude of prayer. As all interested are or have been church members, the meaning of this will be understood.

COLORADO CAMP.

Beautiful Camping Ground, Graphically Described.

The Colorado Camp is located in South Boulder Canyon, 27 miles northwest of Denver, and as the crow flies, about six miles from Boulder, three or four miles farther as one has to go. It is about three and a half miles from Marshall, through which the Colorado and Southern railroad passes, and a team is generally in waiting there to convey passengers to and from the grounds. If surrounded by water as it is by mountains, the canyon would be called a peninsula. It is filled with elm, maple, box elder and other trees, affording a fine shade, with a thick undergrowth of apple sprouts, hazel, choke cherries, plums and other shrubbery which are being cleared away as required for tenters. Boulder Creek comes leaping down over the rocks, having a fall of about 500 feet to the mile, affording one of the grandest sights imaginable. I would go much farther to enjoy the scenery there than I would to enjoy the scenery of Niagara Falls. Around these grounds there arise five mountain peaks, varying in height from 2,000 to 4,000 feet, and so near each other it seems one could throw a stone from one peak to another, but the magnitude of everything is so great distance dwarfs and miles dwindle till they appear to be rods. Yet four of these great mountain peaks are embraced in a tract of 460 acres lately purchased by George and Mary Taylor, the proprieors of the grounds, and of course, they include these grounds. One of the peaks rises almost perpendicular from Boulder Creek, 3,000 feet, splitting into three parts at the apex.

Pursuing the creek up the canyon one must stop to contemplate the falls, and if he has a scientific mind, he will not start till he has time to study the great book of nature spread open before him. Some of the rocks are sharp and angled as if just detached from the great mountain of stone, rising 3,000 feet above his head; others have been worn smooth by the attrition of other rocks and running water which for many centuries have been unceasingly rounding off the corners and giving to them what polish they could, just as we wear off the angularities of our natures in our contact with each other. But here is an immense rock which has been partially turned over by some immense ice gorge which may have piled up the waters behind it a hundred feet, before it got strength sufficient to roll this big stone with its assisting obstructions away.

But I am sure the old rock has been moved. I don't know how far, and it now is inverted for there is an immense cup partially on the under side of it that would probably hold a hogshead of water. That smooth basin has been made by falling water. When? How long has it taken? I haven't the least idea. Probably a million of years. Probably with the aid of sand it took less time; but nature is never niggard with time. She has all eternity before her, and when she sets out to accomplish a purpose she does not tire nor cease to grind. The infinitesimals of that portion of the rock have probably been carried down the Platte into the Missouri, and deposited along the banks of the Mississippi, converted into sugar-cane and assimilated by the consumers of the sugar.

A closer inspection shows this rock to be a composite of smaller rocks, fragments of rocks, sand and detritus. What vast periods of time have been occupied in cementing and solidifying this agglomeration of detritus into one solid stone, at least 4,000 feet in thickness, and what great pressure of water there must have been above this mass to have compacted it so closely, and yet there are people who overlook all the phenomena of nature and are thoroughly enraptured with a book, written they know not when nor by whom!

But this gravel and sand of which this rock is composed, worn smooth by abrasion, where did it come from? It did not grow; it was not made piece by piece. I find here portions of limestone flint. At the Lakeside camp-meeting, near Carthage, Mo., I discovered what had once been an arrow-head manufactory, and there I found the same kind of flint. There were flint hammers and utensils for chipping bits off from the arrow-head, in shaping it. This flint I discovered was raised out of the depths of the earth at the time the Ozarks were raised. These flints in the big boulder we are studying have been smoothed by running water and if they came from the Ozarks they were carried out there long before the formation of the rocks of the Rockies. What a stupendous thought! The earth becomes cemented into a grand old rock, then it tears itself to pieces, wears the pieces smooth, loads them up on ice-boat, and sends the boat out to sea, and drops them down on the floor of the ocean, to be again cemented into a solid block of granite awaiting another upheaval which, though millions of years in the future, yet is sure to keep its appointment.

O, how stupendous is infinity, no matter what direction we turn, and what a small segment of time has here been occupied in the opening out of this canyon. Man is a religious animal, and such scenery brings out all the higher emotions of the soul. The worshipful qualities of the soul appear not in much speaking, much prayer or much praise. It is most eloquent in that silence forced upon us in contemplation of the forces of nature.

I started to say something of this canyon, but had to stop at the big-dished rock, and I will not undertake to say more. The tremendous seismic force that tore those huge mountains out of the ground and flung them high into the air, are not to be talked about. It was intended to make this beautiful and wonderful battle-ground of the giant forces of nature a Spiritualist camping-ground, but somehow Brother and Sister Taylor have met with indifferent encouragement. Certainly no prettier or better place in the world can be found.

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

SPIRITUALISM IN CHINA.

However many of the human race may rightly come into the category of "mostly fools," it is doubtful if the mass of mankind have generally been so foolish as to ascribe transcendental powers to mere objects of wood and stone as such. In India, for example, the idol is simply a temporary objectification of the deity it is intended to represent. Until the "god" has been introduced to his new home by the priest, the image is mere wood or mud, just as the bread and wine are but bread and wine to the devout Catholic, until changed by the priest into the (in this case actual!) body and blood of Christ—an idea which is surely as debased as anything we may find in "Paganism." Psychic rapport is the fact that will explain much that we meet with and especially of "Church furniture" of whatever kind. Whether it be the image itself, or food which is laid before it, such article becomes sacred, or "taboo," by contact with the presiding spirit, and therefore possesses qualities for good or for evil, according to the character of the god. But as man ascends and becomes more spiritual he ceases to care for outward forms. He begins to look within. He can "pray to his Father which is in secret," and he acquires a juster view of his own position amid the forces of nature, and of his proper attitude towards the spirits of the departed. The woman who did not see how she could pray unless there was a god in the room, was speaking of the images of tutelary deities, which in China, Korea and Japan are commonly seen placed in a row on a ledge alongside the wall. Thus in the far East do they put their gods together on a shelf. Our plan in England is to shelve them altogether.

But to return, and to take the part of the missionaries for once, for we must not be prejudiced ourselves, it is more than probable that China would benefit by a reinforcement of the central idea of the One Great Fact—"God," as we say, though set free, one would wish, from with which the word is commonly associated. "God is spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Though the Spiritualist may often enough have occasion to ask for help from his spirit friends, there may still be truth in the old proverb, "Il vaut mieux prier Dieu que ses saints" ("Better it is to pray to God than to his saints"). Up to date, however, the net results of the attempt to give the Chinese a higher and more vivid conception of the One Great Source of Life has not been very successful. The Jesuits called God "Tien Chu"—Lord of Heaven. The Mohammedans had chosen the term, "Chen Chu"—True Lord. Of course, English Protestants had to get a new word to differentiate their God from that of the Catholics, so they fixed upon "Sheng ti"—Supreme Ruler or Emperor. Then the American Baptists adopted "Chen Shon"—the True Spirit. Laterly the Catholics have invented a new phrase, "Sheng Mu"—Mother-of-God-Temples. The effect upon the Chinese mind is, "Foreigners worship various spirits, why should we not worship ours?" But we must not run away with the idea that the Chinese have no word for that final necessity of synthetic thought and feeling which we cannot, and need not hope to, get away from. "Shangtien hou" probably represents the Supreme Power to the Chinese mind, but then it would never have done to have adopted a native phrase. Are they not all "sunk in idolatry?" Let us now briefly glance at the history of religion in China.

Kon-fu-tze, i. e., Kong-the-Teacher (whose name, as Gibbon remarked, we have modified into the very "respectable name" of Confucius) flourished 551-478 B. C. The pre-Confucian faith seems to have been a kind of together with ancestor worship. Kon-fu-tze was a moral philosopher and systematizer rather than a religious leader, and his genius lay in formulating just those points of custom which were most suited to the national character. He thus became exceedingly popular, and has had disciples for twenty-three centuries. Few men have been more venerated, and to attempt to confute Confucius would be the last thing that would enter the head of a Chinaman.

His method was to collect what most commended itself to him in what was even then ancient Chinese literature, and to note down the customs that were prevalent among persons of virtue. Thus, for example, Ki-tze had a son, who died, and being a man of high character, Kong decided to observe how he would conduct the funeral. "The grave was not so deep as to reach the water-springs. The grave clothes were such as the deceased had ordinarily worn. When the mound was completed he bared his left arm, and moving to the right, he went round it thrice, crying, 'That the bones and flesh should return again to the earth is what is appointed. But the soul in its energy can go everywhere; it can go everywhere.'" This is from the "Li Ki" or ritual books.

Let me quote another passage therefrom, if merely to show that there was no doubt in ancient China about a "future state." "At the interment they used the cap of white and the headband of dolichos fibre, thinking these more suitable for their intercourse with the departed now in their spirit state. The feeling of reverence had now arisen."

Turning to Lao-tze, the founder of Taoism, we have teaching of a more mystical character, the basic ideas of which are very similar to those in other Eastern systems of religious philosophy. The "One," or Absolute, unfolding into the "Two;" the two becoming "Three," etc. There is a good deal in fact of the kind one meets with in Hindoo writings upon Yoga, in which suppression of the passions and union with the absolute is the object of attainment. Spiritualists will be interested in such a passage as the following: "Tze-khi was seated, leaning forward on his stool. He was looking up to heaven and breathing gently, and to have lost all consciousness of any companion. His disciple, Yen, wondered at his condition, and on questioning his teacher, Tze-khi replied, "Yen, you do well to ask. * * I had just now lost myself, but how should you understand it? You may have heard the notes of man, but have not heard those of earth. You may have heard the notes of earth, but have not heard those of heaven.'" Readers will find the Taoist texts decidedly interesting, and one often meets some suggestive passage or familiar expression in them. Thus death is spoken of as our "home-going." Again, the spiritualistic element appears in such teaching as we find in the "Thai Shang." "Now when the thought of doing good has arisen in a man's mind, though the good be not yet done, the good spirits are in attendance on him; or if the thought of doing evil has arisen, though the evil be not yet done, the bad spirits are in attendance on him." The "Tao" means the "Way," or spiritual Path. "The more that the Sage gives," says the Tao, "the more does he have himself." "Avenge injuries with benefits" is also found therein. Lao-tze was born about 604 B. C. He has had a wide influence all over the Far East.

About the time of the birth of Christ an embassy of Chinese went out in search of new light. They did not go to Judea, but to India, and they brought back Buddhism. Translations of Sanscrit books were made, and from about 221 to 618 A. D., Buddhism was well established in China, temples to Buddha being everywhere erected. Then came a period of degeneration, after which there was a renewed study of Confucius, resulting in, or a result of, a radical movement against the government. This came from the fact that Confucianism is socialistic in its tendencies, whereas Buddhism had developed into an elaborate hierarchy. Again, Buddhistic Monasticism went against the grain with the Chinaman, who is pre-eminently a "family man." For a time the reform party succeeded, but did no good, and the country swung back to conservatism again.

Chinese religion, like religion in most countries, is thus of a very composite character. One system becomes the fashion and then another. Folk-lore jostles with theology, sects grow up, as indeed they must as long as man is a thinker, and at the same time a creature of limitations. But, as Carlyle observed, "A man's religion does not consist in the many things he is in doubt of, but in the few things which he thoroughly believes." And looking at the matter from this standpoint we must study the people themselves as far as we are able to do so.

Among modern accounts I have felt most interested in "An Australian in China," by Dr. G. E. Morrison, whose reported death at the hands of the people whom he had the rare faculty of knowing how to deal with, is on that account the more to be regretted. Dr. Morrison walked all across Southern China from Shangai to the Burmese frontier, in about four months, and at a cost of £20. He was never attacked, but treated with kindness and courtesy all the way. Rockhill, who traveled 20,000 miles in China, gives similar testimony; and it may well be asked, would a Chinaman fare so well in Europe? Another book of great interest is "Demon Possession and Allied Themes," by the Rev. John L. Nevins, forty years missionary in Chefoo, and a man to be relied on rather than journalists who have but spent forty minutes in a public library. It is strange how the Chinese peasantry may teach a missionary, if he is open minded enough, the truth of many things in his Bible that he never realized before; indeed, wherever I have met missionaries, and I have always made a point of button-holing them whenever I got the chance, I have always felt that going out to "carry the gospel to the heathen" might, and should be, a most salutary factor in

THEIR OWN LIFE-EDUCATION.

Dr. Morrison treats of the subject from the standpoint of the healthy and good humored man of the world—a doctor of medicine; while Nevins is a doctor of theology, and approaches the theme as an earnest and orthodox, yet unusually open-minded Christian. The main object of Dr. Nevin's book is to show that there are as many evil spirits to be driven out from among mankind to-day as there were in the time of Christ. His experiences soon forced upon him the conviction that "demon possession" was an actual fact, and further study of the subject in other countries only added to this conviction. His book is full of most interesting incident. I will give one case as sample, and must surmise for the rest.

A man named Kwo, in the province of Shantung, bought a number of pictures one day, including one of Muniang, the wife of a popular Chinese divinity. This he posted up in the most honorable position in his house, and proposed worshiping it to his wife. His wife objected, but in a day or two in a dream, saying, "I am Wang-Muniang. I have taken up my abode in your house." Awaking, he felt that this was a shie-kwei (evil spirit), and resisted it, saying, "I will have nothing to do with you." All was quiet for a time, but about a week later Kwo became uneasy and restless, and at last, seized by an irresistible impulse, he got up from his bed and went straight to a gambler's den, where he lost 1,600 cash. Things went from bad to worse—he became epileptic, foaming at the mouth, falling down, and attacking neighbors, until his father was obliged to bind him in chains and take him to his own home. Medicine was given, but the spirit, speaking through him, said, "Any amount of medicine will be of no use. Burn incense to me, and submit yourself to me, and all will be well." Kwo's parents promised to do this, and knelt down and worshiped, begging the spirit to torment their son no longer.

Kwo himself, on recovering consciousness, was unwilling to do this; but his father and mother imploring him to fulfil their promise, he at last consented. The evil spirit then gave directions for and came at various times to develop Kwo, telling him that he would be a great healing medium; but it is interesting to note that the cases "cured" by this spirit were only, according to Kwo's account, such as were obviously the inflictions of evil spirits. Kwo, however, did not prosper, and one of his children died.

About this time, while he was working in the fields, Leng, a native assistant of Dr. Nevins, spoke to him, and hearing his story, begged him to believe in Jesus, who, he assured him, would be able to deliver

HIM FROM ALL EVIL SPIRITS.

Kwo replied, "If what you say be true, then I will believe in Jesus," and he consented to tear down the picture of Wang Mu-niang. Some time after this Dr. Nevins himself visited Kwo, and was surprised to find him well, and able to read the Bible, his wife and little girl also being converts to Christianity.

Kwo then related how the evil spirit had returned on one occasion, saying to his wife, "If your husband is determined to be a Christian this is no place for me." "What do you know of Jesus Christ?" they asked. The answer was, "Jesus Christ is the great Lord over all, and now I am going away, and you will not see me again." And it appears that the Kwos were not troubled any more from that time.

Not all these Chinese controls, however, are so easily got rid of as this one. Dr. Nevins was called in to case after case in the course of his missionary labors, and some points in his experiences are of the greatest interest. Vampirism, pining sickness, ending in death, direct injuries, physical phenomena, clothes rending, destruction of household property, and, in fact, the usual phenomena which are really to be found all over the world, past and present, if people were only aware of it, instead of thinking that these things are something quite new, became evident facts to Dr. Nevins, and on appealing to his missionary brethren, he found that many of them had met with similar occurrences, though they had not often thought them anything more than instances of "hysteria," "imagination," etc.

The method adopted by Dr. Nevins was to rebuke the spirit and pray to God to cast them out in the name of Jesus Christ, and he seems to have been very successful. Some of these spirits were remarkably frank. One replied to him, "God and Christ will not interfere. I have been here seven or eight years, and I claim this as my resting place. You cannot get rid of me." Sometimes they insist on a temple being built for them. They say, "It is not enough that you worship me privately at your own house, you must go about to declare my power, and influence your neighbors." There are interesting cases too of obsessing spirits, who so impress their victims that the personality is quite changed, and the subject of possession states that he is one of his relatives who was known to have died some time before. Dr. Nevins compares these to the case of Lurancy Vennum, of Watseka, investigated by Prof. E. W. Stephens, Chicago, 1887, who declared she was animated by the spirit of Mary Roff, a neighbor's daughter, who had died insane twelve years before, and who begged to be allowed to go home and live in the Roff family once more. Cases of this kind are eagerly snapped up by our theosophic friends as proofs of reincarnation. There is not much need for the Spiritualist to trouble himself with this hypothesis. The facts lie patent.

MINNESOTA

State Association Convention.

The Minnesota Spiritualists had the best convention they ever held, on September 7, 8 and 9, in the elegant Unitarian church, Minneapolis. It was the third annual meeting of their association, but in reality the first genuine convention.

Last year only six chartered societies were held, and only a portion of these had delegates present. This year there are eighteen societies and about 100 personal members. These were well represented and made a good-sized legislative body. But, the officers and delegates did not seem to be fully enthused for the convention part of the exercises, hence they were slow to assemble. At the opening session there were so few present the business had to be postponed; but the afternoon showed a liberal increase, and the second and third days brought an outpouring. Reports were very satisfactory, and a healthful condition of the association was shown. Good work had been done during the year, especially by the missionaries, G. W. Kates and wife, who had held 200 meetings and lectured to 25,011 persons in the state, thus increasing the associated work and interest. The missionaries had more than paid their salary and expense by the proceeds of meetings held.

The officers elected for the ensuing year are as follows: "President, J. S. Maxwell, Minneapolis; vice-president, C. D. Prudens, Minneapolis; secretary, D. E. Griffith, Minneapolis; treasurer, N. C. Westerfield, St. Paul. Trustees: Rolla Stubbs, Bederwood; I. O. Brown, Wheaton; L. W. Pierson, Princeton; P. J. Samson and John Holm, Minneapolis.

More time was given to public lectures and descriptive effort by the speakers and mediums, than to business sessions. That made the meetings attract large numbers of people.

The employed talent was Dr. J. M. Peebles, Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, G. W. Kates, Mrs. Z. B. Kates, Max Hoffman, Mrs. C. D. Pruden and Mrs. C. Tryon.

A royal feast was spread and each speaker and medium was a credit to our cause. Dr. Peebles, Mrs. Twing and Mrs. Kates, as lecturers, captured the people. Mr. Kates was the active helper in all lines of work on the platform and in the business department. As a man of executive character and business capacity he is capable of creating and conducting the needs of our public organization. He raised the necessary enthusiasm to obtain contributions of money, which flowed in liberally when appeals were made. Mr. Pruden and Mrs. Twing successfully aided the financial end by their enthusiastic appeals. The liberal donations show that Minnesota Spiritualists are an earnest body of men and women.

Mrs. Kates and Max Hoffman held their audiences spellbound and carried conviction by their spirit massages and descriptions. All worked together with zeal and harmony.

The Ladies' Auxiliary served meals twice each day—and served good ones. The music was excellent. Audiences were large and the results have strengthened the cause. The press gave liberal notices of proceedings, Spiritual papers were called for, but none were at hand. Public appeals were made for every Spiritualist to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker, which is their interest so to do. Let us help growth in every direction.

Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.

BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY.
BY W. J. COLVILLE.

Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume.

As several chapters are devoted to improved methods of education, the writer confidently expects that many parents, teachers and others who have charge of the young, or who are called upon to exercise supervision over the morally weak and mentally afflicted, will derive some help from the doctrines herewith promulgated.

FUTURE HOMES AND DWELLING PLACES.
BY DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!
This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. Give us details—details and accurate delineations of life in the Spirit-world!—is the constant appeal of thoughtful minds. Death is approaching. Whither—oh, whither! Shall I know my friends beyond the tomb? Will they know me? What is their present condition, and what their occupations? In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind in the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Shakers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. A VISIT

To the Camp at Deep Lake, Illinois.

A ninety minutes' run on the Wisconsin Central Railroad brought the writer from Chicago to Lake Villa, a pretty little village of a dozen or more houses, neat and trim and surrounded in many cases by extensive gardens. A man wearing a gigantic straw hat, a flannel jacket, and overalls tucked into top boots, laid violent hands on his baggage as he stepped from the car, and just as he was about to resent this rustic familiarity he recognized beneath the depths of two months' tan upon the cuticle the smiling face of the Rev. G. V. Cordingly, pastor of the Progressive Spiritual Church of Chicago, and president of the camp meeting whither he was bound. Five minutes more found us in a boat with the reverend at the oars, rapidly progressing over the waters of Deep Lake, the man of the Church propelling the man of the D——; but then lawyers are greatly maligned.

The writer has seen the lake country of Cumberland, England, not to mention those lakes familiar to a considerable portion of the political element of this country—"Beauty's Home, Killarney," yet seldom was he more impressed with the glorious blending of colors commingled in the woods and foliage sloping down to the beach of the jasper tinted lake that now unfolded itself before him. That 25x50 lots are selling here for $100 seems almost incredible, but that is the reverend's price. Strains of music, and a greeting of "How's Chicago?" pealed from a sailboat belonging to the camp, that like a huge swan was gliding over the waves. As we approached the eastern shore on the bluff hidden by oak, larch, chestnut, wild cherry, elm and cedar, peeped the white canvas of tents, "Old Glory" floating in grandeur from the extended limb of a king of the forest. A few more contractions of the reverend's biceps and we were standing on the wooden pier, and then after climbing the bluff by a natural staircase, were in the tented city of Deep Lake. It was not a large city, not as large as the unredeemed promises of anticipated patrons could have made it, but it was the nearest Spiritualists' camp-meeting to the Phoenix city of our love and pride. Under the spreading branches of the many handsome trees tent after tent was pitched, and in the distance stood "The Auditorium," a tent 50x100 feet.

At 5 p. m., two hours after our arrival, the entire community took their evening dip in the lake. The shores of Deep Lake shelve out gradually, so that secure footing can be obtained by the timid even when the water kisses the lips. Splashing, paddling, rolling around, like shoals of porpoises, the camp enjoyed itself in the tepid waters, now turning golden beneath the rays of the declining sun. That night was formed an informal circle around a log fire that roared and crackled, sending up myriads of sparks into the night and casting its reflection on the placid waters of the lake wrapt in the sable garb of Nox. Through Mr. Linn, Mrs. Watson, and Mrs. Bessler, the circle was soon visited by those who once pitched their wigwams where our camp now stood, and Indian songs, palavers, and dances lasted until past midnight, when the circle reluctantly broke up.

Next day, Saturday, September 1, the writer had an opportunity afforded him to find that the acoustic properties of the auditorium were perfect. A large delegation of Spiritualists from Waukegan called, and he delivered the lecture, followed by tests given by the Rev. Cordingly. An Indian pow-wow was given that night, and as the campers in their Indian garb made their way through the shadowy mazes of the wood to the auditorium, it did not take a vivid imagination to fancy that the assumed was the real, and that time had turned backward a hundred years to the days when the woods of Lake county echoed the shouts of the chiefs and braves of earth life. The youth of the countryside flocked to see the, to them, weird proceedings, but they were respectful and good-natured, and when dancing followed the pow-wow many a Jaquenette with her swain waltzed over the well waxed floor.

Spiritualism must be becoming popular in Lake county, for on Sunday the writer lectured in the forenoon and evening to large audiences, one-half of whom were farmers and their families from the surrounding country. Indeed, to see the number of unhitched horses and rigs around the auditorium whilst their owners, between the lecture hours, were depleting capacious lunch baskets, things looked like an old-fashioned orthodox revival, and the rustic audience was as earnest and attentive as our own campers from Chicago. Many of the men, as well as women, remained after the services to have private sittings with the Rev. Cordingly and Mrs. Renex.

To the camper who is a camera fiend the writer would say: If you visit Deep Lake buy your dry plates by the gross before coming for you will need them all. In one day, although using some judgment, all the writer's plates were exhausted on the wealth of sylvan beauty in this enchanting region, and he had to telephone to Chicago for fresh supplies. Boating facilities were excellent, four row-boats and one sail-boat belonging to the camp, and being always well patronized either for fishing, hunting or sailing. Trout and pickerel are abundant, and the woods are full of smaller game. These pursuits always whetted the appetites of those who attended at 8 a. m., 1 p. m. and 6 p. m. round the well-laden table in the dining tent.

The days following Sunday were saddened by the departure of campers and the process of demolishing the camp, which had enjoyed a "continuous run" since July 5. The writer was so enchanted with the lovely spot and the congenial society he met there, that he could not tear himself away while a piece of canvas covered his head, and, finally, when this disappeared he passed his last night in Deep Lake as he had passed many a night twenty-one years before under the Southern Cross in South Africa, with nothing but a blanket around him, the starry heavens for a canopy, and the waters of the lake as they broke upon the beach chanting his lullaby.

sume the sins of the world. The plan of his atonement is an apostolic afterconsideration. Jesus hoped to save the people from sin, rather than to assume their debt of sin. He hoped to prove the resurrection of the dead and thus create a higher moral standard by a comprehension of the law of consequence, in the fact that spiritual death ensues from physical defilement. We have no equivalent for the teaching of Jesus; but for the theological idea of a vicarious atonement (which is a license) we substitute absolute consequence.

Cause and effect are positive and inevitable; no one can escape the results of life. Your sins will follow you, no matter how sincere your faith—you must pay your own debts; and that will create a moral restraint far more potent than the vicarious plan of redemption—for all nature shows us the fallacy of sudden development You must work out your salvation through the eons of the great futurity which each and all will inherit.

Your closing quotation is a human idea stated by the Apostle in his own sincere belief, which was the result of the superstitious age in which he lived. The statement is not that of God himself, but is only the opinion of a man who was superstitious and ignorant. Thus the idea that is the root of your doctrine is man-made rather than God-revealed; and the inconsistency is more than probable upon your side.

Let us have truth, no matter whose doxy or ism may happen to be proved erroneous.

It is positive truth that the Spiritualist, at least, sincerely desires.

OUR PREMIUMS.

There are many Spiritualists who know a good thing when they see it. There are others, however, who do not seem to realize what is going on around them, and therefore miss many chances to enrich their minds and enlarge their understanding. Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World is furnished to our subscribers at less than cost, and should be in every family in the United States, whether Spiritualists or not. Volumes 1, 2 and 3 constitute a wonderful magazine of thought on Death in its multifarious phases; in fact you can not find in all the libraries of the world as valuable information in regard to Death as you will have presented to you in these three volumes. They are nicely printed, neatly and substantially bound, and are an ornament to any library. Volume 3 is furnished at 25 cents, much less than the actual cost to us, and the three volumes, when ordered in connection with a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker, only cost $1.10. The aggregate cost of the three books to the trade is $4.50. At this price, these three books ought to be in every Spiritualist family.

The Progressive Thinker is the first Spiritualist paper to inaugurate the Divine Plan—a portion of the profits of the office returning to subscribers in valuable books.

VOLUMES 1, 2 and 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Art Magic, Ghost Land, The Next World Interviewed, and the Occult Life of Jesus (including the Hull-Covert Debate) constitute our premium list. Those seven books have been on sale, costing the buyer in the aggregate, $10.75. We, after paying the postage and expense of mailing, realize only $1.50 for the seven—far less than cost to us. We desire to form the nucleus of a library in every Spiritualist home, hence this remarkable offer. By subscribing for The Progressive Thinker, you then have the privilege of purchasing these books at the premium prices. See terms on another page.

Important. At the earnest request of hundreds of my friends and former patients, I have prepared a Course of Lessons on the Psychic Science. This Course of Lessons include Psychic Healing, Vital and Personal Magnetism, Intuition, and like occult subjects. In its wide scope it not only teaches its pupils how to cure themselves, but at the same time teaches them how to heal others of disease and how to be successful in their every venture, be it for political, commercial or social ascendancy.

The course is so plain that anyone who will take it up as a profession and give his time and attention to it can make a grand success in its practice. These lessons not only teach you how to heal disease but they also teach Personal Magnetism, through which you can silently influence those about you, so as to acquire influence, friends, prosperity, success in business, in fact, anything that you want. The course will be worth many times the price you pay for it, simply to cure yourself and increase your ability and eliminate any bad habits, such as the drink habit, tobacco habit, sexual excesses, etc. The entire course of instructions is taught by mail and you can matter every point in this science in the secrecy of your own home without loss of time in attending to your business. CLUBS!

CLUBS CLUBS

We want ten thousand clubs formed in every part of the United States, for which we present inducements never before offered by any Spiritualist paper. These clubs must consist of ten subscribers, and each one will get Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death; or if they would prefer it, they can have the Next World Interviewed. They can have their choice of the two. Each subscriber in order to avail himself of this offer must pay $1.15. The fifteen cents is to pay expense of postage and mailing, and the books sent out are practically a gift. They are not cheap affairs; they are nicely and substantially bound in cloth, neatly printed in clear type and are ornaments to any center table. The contents are indeed valuable, such as every Spiritualist family should have. The aggregate price of these two books to the trade is $2.75. To each of our club subscribers one of these books is a gift, and when they receive the one of their choice they will be delighted with it, and will wonder how we can afford to do so much for them. The one who gets up the club will be entitled to The Progressive Thinker for one year, and Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit Spirit World, and also the Next World Interviewed. He will not only get The Progressive Thinker for one year, but both books. He gets what is equivalent to $3.75 for his trouble. There should be no difficulty whatever in getting up hundreds of clubs.

Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World will not only interest Spiritualists, but church members will be attracted to it. The Rev. M. J. Savage, a leading liberal divine of New York, leads off with several of this masterly productions, treating Death from an advanced standpoint. He is followed by leading Spiritualists who treat of Death in a philosophical and fascinating manner.

The Next World Interviewed is also a very excellent work. The plates of this book were donated to the office of The Progressive Thinker by Henry J. Horn. It consists of communications from the spirit side of life from leading minds there. Fifty-five communications are given by prominent personages, among them Prince Albert, Harriet Martineau, Judge Edmonds, Horace Greeley, Lord Lytton, Fanny Fern, Dr. Livingstone and the Czar of Russia.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. - - - Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogma of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supercede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. For sale at this office.

TWO IN ONE.

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for the unseparated. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substance; Animal Intellects; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL

BY

LOREN ALBERT SHERMAN.

Sets forth the Philosophy of Existence, with detailed evidence. It appeals to Christians and Spiritualists alike, as it demonstrates the truth of the spirit manifestations of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian religion is based, as well as the actuality of modern spirit manifestations. Its title page claims that the book is

A SCIENTIFIC DEMONSTRATION of the Existence of the soul of man as his conscious individuality independently of the physical organism; of the CONTINUITY OF LIFE and the ACTUALITY OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The first eleven chapters are devoted entirely to manifestations of the soul incarnate, with a clear exposition of the psychic philosophy.

The succeeding four chapters set forth the philosophy of the Infinite.

The last twenty chapters are devoted to an exposition of spiritual philosophy, with evidence in detail, much of it being personal experiences of the author.

The price of the book is $1.50. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker.

Ego in Spirit Return.

By Charles Dawbarn.

Cosmos seems limited in its variety of raw material. The spectroscope discovers a wondrous identity of substance throughout space. For instance, energy is apparent in the movements of nebulae, suns, planets, comets and asteroids, as such act upon and within our little planet. And everywhere we discern intelligence working amidst timeless limits to destined ends. This energy, intelligence and substance literally compose all we can discover, or even imagine as Cosmos.

The lesson of science is that no molecular gathering is eternal, but that cosmic atoms are themselves indestructible. We have, then, the right to assume that such atoms can gain nothing from blending into form save experience. With this as a sure foundation, and the further fact that every cosmic atom is itself a blending of substance, energy and intelligence, we are compelled to either accept each atom as an eternal Ego, or else to believe the theological dogma that every living thing sprang into existence at the command of a personal creator, under whom all such existence is a perpetual miracle.

The explorer having thus discovered and accepted an eternal Ego has himself been startled at the consequences of his own outlook. If Ego be indestructible he never was created. His substance, energy and intelligence are fractions of the cosmic whole. If he never had a beginning he is in existence everywhere, at the same time, within his own limits. His vast outlook is that of a limited divinity, and he necessarily possesses certain creative powers, belonging to him as a fraction of the whole. His divine instinct impels him to blend with other Egos into forms, which forms have the civic manifestation we call "sense." This sense is, in its turn, subject to internal and external conditions which limit its expression of intelligence. These forms, with their sense limits, thus become personalities, very limited with regard to each other, but all alike and always under dominance of an eternal Ego. Having accepted the fact that the law of personality forbids our own intelligent communion with lower forms of life we perceive that it leaves Ego in actual manifestation through several forms at the same time. This is illustrated by the skilled player on the organ, who, if he choose, strikes ten separate notes at the same time, and himself plays the part of soul to each separate tone that he is compelling to his service. The melody evoked by Ego will be, must be, for the most part, unheard by anyone with less comprehensive sense than himself, and would thus often appear as cruel discord.

Yet further, having watched Ego in some of the manifestations we call "lower life," and followed him into mortal manhood we discover that we have the same laws and limitations confronting us when we would take the next step. The student reader must keep in mind that he has discarded miracle as a possible explanation of any mystery; and that a personal deity has left no trace of his existence in any field explored or traversed by science.

We have been trained to think of man mortal as manifesting consciousness through five senses, all of which disappear when the form disintegrates. But the student who is in tone with modern discoveries finds proofs of consciousness traveling outward and inward without leave or permission of mortal sense. He notices that the brain and the complex system of nerves stay at home while the consciousness takes its journey. Telepathy in any form, clairvoyance and psychometry, simply use mortal brain and senses as instruments with which to express Ego's independent consciousness to the mortal onlooker. When the brain is asleep sense may run riot in dreams, but consciousness, being independent of brain and nerve, needs no rest to recuperate its powers. We must keep most carefully in mind that by consciousness we mean Ego, who is outside and above every manifestation that we call personality. Homo is Ego personified in mortal form, and within rigid mortal limits. But Homo is, as we have already seen, only one of Ego's personifications. As soon as Homo has been buried or cremated we discover Ego, who was independent of time and sense, in a form manifestation as much as before, and with limited powers and senses that constitute another personality. So the question before the student is as to the proof of its being not the same personality, but the same consciousness, manifesting in another personality.

We have to draw a marked line between mere "form" identity and the identity of the Ego, whose larger experiences are being gathered regardless of mortal brain and nerve. We shall presently see the importance of this. The immediate fact for the student reader to seize and hold is that consciousness (Ego) in earth life is, thanks to scientific research, proving itself independent of mortal brain and nerve, save when it desires to communicate with mortal man. So we here relieve ourselves of the perplexities from which those suffer whose normal limit of thought is man mortal with five senses. Such thinkers have grown very learned within that field, but cannot conceive of such a limited manhood having the right to say "to be continued in my next." Their error has consisted in their not recognizing that Ego needs no continuance, since he has all that belongs to him yesterday, to-day and to-morrow, that is to say, all the time. So we now find ourselves facing the question as to what measures of continued consciousness is translated from mortal Homo to Homo spirit.

Once again, if we keep close to the point in question, i. e., one point at a time, we have the fact of an external consciousness in earth life as a key to the problem. What is called the "subconsciousness" never forgets. Those who have dealt with the abnormal mortal, and watched him make use of his abnormal powers, whether in trance or hypnotically, must have often noticed with astonishment that any fact or name used by the intelligence a score of years ago seems absolutely unforgetable. The student will next observe that this consciousness, which astonishes him by its memory, is compelled to use mortal sense to peep out into earth life, but, in all other respects, is absolutely independent of mortal brain. This, as we have said, is proved by telepathy, clairvoyance, etc. So we have here a consciousness, loaded with facts and experiences, owning them as proprietor, and not dependent on the mortal brain for their expression, except when in communion with earth life.

The student reader will also remember that we discovered that Ego had only evolved and used a brain in earth life, for the use of reason, and because of its special adaptation to the general conditions of planet existence. God Senior does without any such brain; and throughout his earth history God Junior never intrusts the brain and its reasoning faculty with the management of the delicate processes on which depend life in mortal form. Thus we discover immortality to be a constant and ever-existing fact, and that Homo's earth experiences are but a link in a chain which outreaches from one end of Ego's selfhood to the other, in a limit that to us is almost illimitable.

It seems to the writer that we have now discovered Nature's key to the problem which has perplexed every man who, throughout human history, has sought to know the past and future of his own manhood. Our brave truth seekers of the Society for Psychical Research have already made it sufficiently clear to the unprejudiced mind that life is continuous, but they are still groping in a fog that bewilders their own intelligence, and that of their spirit visitors. It is this fog that the student reader must himself now enter, and see if he can pilot his way out into sunshine.

In this fog we immediately perceive a spirit return which is absolutely genuine, but wofully imperfect. In the first place, the spirit visitor has no voice that can, from a normal spirit standpoint, reach mortal ear. The ear of the earth man vibrates under the pressure of an atmosphere measured by tons rather than ounces. The spirit has no tongue, no larynx, no lung that can realize or utilize the vibratory effect of our atmosphere. He is absolutely silent to us. We are absolutely silent to him. Consequently when the mortal sensitive declares he hears a spirit voice he is mistaken every time. Yet he hears, and often gives proof that he hears by the message he receives. To solve this problem we turn to the abnormal in earth life and study it, cause and effect. We take the attested case of the mother who hears the cry of her son from the Australian world, beneath her feet, and ten thousand miles away. He is in fearful danger, but escapes to tell the tale. He remains normally unconscious that his cry has reached his mother's ear, although the fact, both of the danger and the cry is attested and accepted by skeptics.

Here is communication without mortal sense. The son's voice, the mother's ear have no possible connecting link; no vibratory effect could pass from one to the other. The son may or may not have cried aloud. It makes no difference, and in all probability there was no outward expression. But mother and son have each an indwelling manhood, which it is fashionable to-day to call "subconsciousness," but which is really Ego in an interior personality—one of the many personalities all belonging to him at the same time. This personality is ours, all through our earth life, although most of us live and die unconscious of its existence.

That mother and son were blended in Ego love belonging to the life which KNOWS, and is therefore independent of mortal sense. Time, space, and mortal sense present no barrier to this love. It is love too large and deep for expression in mortal sense. It is love to love amid vibrations impossible to mortal life. And this "subconsciousness" will every now and then burst into earth life by an abnormal process which the perplexed scientist calls "telepathy." Here has been an interchange of thought between mother and son amid vibrations impossible to mortal ear. But that mother's ear has been love-keyed to vibrations that can catch and record a thought-burst of agony from her child. It may not have been the mortal ear which was the sensitive spot in her mortal form, but the habit of earth life is to receive it, in any case, as if heard in normal manner. So we have a thought that travels inaudible space, and becomes audible by a flash through the organism of an abnormal sensitive. The communion was an eternal love fact as between Ego and Ego. The marvel is that it finds a channel up into normal earth life. So great a marvel is it that there are intelligent men and women who, even to-day, deny the fact itself, rather than attempt to learn its lesson.

We will keep to our illustration, but now take a step onward to another truth. Neither that mother nor her son are really limited to the use of five senses. But they think they are. They are not outwardly conscious of their own soul powers by which their love blends into oneness. As another remarkable fact, they know nothing of the special channel through which their thought finds its way into sense expression. It is most startling to note, in the experiments with Mrs. Piper by officers of the S. P. R., that the spirit, George Pelham, when writing through the hand of the medium, was not aware he was using the hand. His thought was working telepathically, and it found entrance and exit through whatever channel could repeat the vibrations. This is a remarkable fact for the student reader to remember, because it follows that if one spirit was not aware he was using the hand, another would be similarly ignorant he was using the tongue, except that that had been a common experience, and was what he would expect. But in this interesting case, the spirit using the tongue was unaware that another spirit was using the hand, and that, presently, a third spirit was using the other hand. So we have three intelligences using Mrs. Piper's organism at the same time, and we have a right to infer that not even one of them was using the medium's brain. The medium's brain was being used, all the same, but it was by the mortal sitter who found it his only channel by which to enter the realm of subconsciousness, in which Ego possesses powers unknown in mortal life. The hand and tongue of the medium were merely outlets for the subconscious impressions received by the medium, which we see manifesting in whatever might be the most sensitive spot they could reach. Thus, if that spot represented vision, we would have the spirit's thought, which at first hit the whole body, at last picturing itself as an effect on the organ of sight, although the eye was itself unused by the spirit. If the subconscious thought expressed itself in the vibrations of sound, we have what is called "clairaudience," although the spirit cannot talk into mortal ear. And if it be the larynx and the tongue which catch the vibration we say the spirit talks, just as when the hand has been communicating we have called it "automatic writing." Surely the student will now see how greatly the mortal sensitive is certain to color and limit every thought thus received, and can only express it, at best, to the extreme limit of his (her) education or dormant capacity.

The student reader has now the key to the perplexities, contradictions, and nonsense as well as truth, that finds outlet through medium sense organs and sensitive spots. One such psychic will receive pictures through the forehead; another will declare he hears at the pit of his stomach; and mayhap there are many such nerve outlets. But in every case alike the spirit has simply uttered a thought, discharging it into earth life, and is himself oblivious to the spot where it explodes.

Such truths carry us yet a step further, for all spirit control or communication, whether of mortal with mortal, or spirit with mortal, depends upon a harmony of vibration of "mind stuff" at each end of the circuit. The experiences of Mrs. Piper have been carefully studied in detail; but those of other sensitives, although apparently various, are necessarily evolved under the same natural law.

Mrs. Piper exhibits unconscious trance in its utmost perfection. We can through her mark the limit as well as the extent of spirit control. When the reader and I express a thought we do it consciously by look or word, or perhaps with the pen. But when the spirit uses the mortal organism he cannot have this consciousness of detailed expression. He just flashes the thought, and it finds outlet as best it may. And in return the mortal thought comes flashing to him in reply, or perhaps in new question. But the mortal creator of thought sends it from his mortal brain, and it travels on and on through a wonted sense expression.

The nature of the spirit's own organized method of expression we are not now discussing. That will come later on in these articles. The interesting fact before the student now is that we are actually finding in this phenomenon of spirit control a return, as it were, to first principles. We watch intelligence manifesting itself without using the mortal reasoning faculty. Let us mark this very distinctly. The intelligence flashed from the spirit will break out wherever there is a sensitive spot. One such outburst will find the eye itself the best channel, and then we have, perhaps, the seer, or seeress, of the crystal. But usually the eye is not used, and so clairvoyance does its seeing without it from some other more sensitive point of nerve expression. The ear may fancy it hears a spirit voice, but if it be really from the spirit no other ear less sensitive could catch the sound. And for the most part, clairaudience is only a sensed expression of spirit thought.

It is thus with the mortal sensitive in every phase. He hears, sees, tastes, smells and touches spirit expression without any direct relation with the organ used in his everyday life. This is pure telepathy. But the moment the sensitive would communicate what he has received to you and to me, the mortal organ must be used in its everyday manner. The point I am emphasizing is that when this happens the sensitive may be in an unconscious trance, and therefore not consciously using any organ at all, while the spirit, as we have seen, has hurled a thought at the mortal, and is obliged to leave it to come out as it may. The communicating spirit is unconscious as to what particular organ he is affecting, although as a matter of experience, he very soon imagines himself in direct control of his medium's hand or voice.

There has to be a return message from mortal to spirit if we are to have what is called intercourse between the two worlds. Here we learn our lesson from scientific discoveries. All energy is discharged into the pathless ether. Mortal sense catches what it can. The rest goes bounding by. It is just as the sun's ray is recorded by its spectrum, but only so much of it as mortal sense can grasp. Its heat rays and X rays are on the verge of our limit of reception, and the vast remainder passes on unrecorded. Thought, as used in mortal life, is but partly caught by mortal sense. The rest rushes on unnoted in earth experience. Yet it is this unnoted vibration of our thought which alone can be sensed by a spirit's organism. The organism of our spirit visitor cannot respond to our vibrations or it would be back to mortal limits. Let us emphasize this fact. You cannot hit a spirit with either your fist or your tongue. You can only get at him with a thought. And so much of the thought as can hit the ear of another mortal will pass unheeded by any spirit visitor. So it is only the portion of your thought that you can't express through your earth sense that can be received, or even guessed by the spirit.

Now we begin to see sunlight through the fog. We begin to understand why the spirits who attempt to return through Mrs. Piper are always bemoaning the feeble "light" as they call it, and constantly returning the most irrelevant answers to questions by mortal investigators. They could not, as we have seen, use mortal sense; and they could not even direct their thought in the dark so that it might travel outward, finding its own way through the medium's appropriate sense. And they could, at best, only catch so much of the mortal's thought as vibrated into the "mind stuff" common to both worlds.

They were not using either mortal brain or mortal sense themselves; and such brain and sense must flash its thought outside its own limit of perception before these spirit visitors could translate it into their own intelligence.

So much is but the threshold of our investigation, but it will serve to show the student reader that the average believer in spirit intercourse is entirely ignorant of how much or how little of such intercourse he can realize, and of the laws by which any communication is possible. We must now try to discover the nature of the raw material used by a spirit when he would establish his identity, or hold intercourse with a mortal.

SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

Explaining Its True Meaning.

From spiritual impression I write the following lines:

There is a special providence, but not correctly understood by those who have faith in it. In order that I may correctly speak on this subject, I will say that the common teaching of spirits in regard to the spheres in the spirit realms is a mistake. There is no geographical location, distances, or boundary lines, that can be ascribed to the spiritual spheres, as they are only intended to represent advanced conditions of spiritual society. You have your earthly classes or spheres in society, from the multi-millionaire down to the common laboring class of men. The same conditions exist in the spirit world, with this difference, that the higher or more advanced conditions or spheres of society are not attained through the power and influence of wealth and gold, but by true merit, for the possession of spiritual gifts, such as knowledge, wisdom, and love, with a sincere desire to work in heaven and on earth for the welfare of the human race.

Earth's inhabitants are spirits clothed with material bodies. Christ has said that we must be born again, but he has not said that we must be born a third time, to inherit eternal life. Paul has said there is a physical body and there is a spiritual body, but he does not say that we have two spiritual bodies. If this be true, and the term spheres is intended to represent a change in spirit life from one geographical locality to another, the same as you change locations on earth, by passing from one state or territory to another, it must be equally true that we would require a change of our spirit bodies, more refined and sublimated to correspond with the advanced conditions of the spheres into which they entered.

But there is a continuous net-work of isothermal or magnetic lines which extend from the great throne or grand center of light, love and wisdom, to the extreme limits of the eternal universe; these lines simply represent fixed principles of good and evil, with their natural accompaniments of ignorance and wisdom in man, and in exact proportion as people keep in rapport with them, will they be rewarded with good, or punished with evil.

These conflicting rewards or punishments men attribute to a dispensation of special providence, and such as are not professors or believers in some orthodox code of religion, will call it chance or luck, and as a general rule the most ignorant and unadvanced people of earth are more frequently the recipients of these rewards or punishments than the better educated class of people are, which they generally attribute to a special providence or chance.

The explanation which I will give concerning this is that the modes of educating the people on earth are calculated to make them proud and selfish, and devoid of sympathy and natural love for their fellow men.

The more ignorant class as a general rule are the best Christians at heart, but for the want of proper wisdom and knowledge, cannot keep in rapport with the true principles which they daily come in contact with, of good and evil, and which is sure to bring them a reward, or what they are pleased to call a divine punishment.

The spirits of those who have advanced in spirit life, who are possessed of love, and have acquired wisdom and knowledge, sympathize with all uneducated people of earth, and by concert of action, or by individual effort as spirits, often bring people in a seeming mysterious manner in rapport with good conditions or pure lines of principles, as a parent would save a child from a danger by placing something in its view that would divert its attention to some other object. And evil spirits are constantly hovering near us and bringing well meaning men in contact with bad men and evil principles, in a way that they cannot realize at the time how it is done, and when good or evil results from it, they are unable to comprehend it, and call it an act of special providence or a matter of chance or luck.

In matters of national importance, or where the thing necessary to be done is so urgent as to not admit of delay for concert of spirit action, the divine will of providence supersedes natural fixed law and for the time acts as an emergency law, but as a general rule the divine will is transmitted from heaven to earth's people through divine spiritual agencies, from learned angels to the most undeveloped class of spirits. God in his wisdom placed good and evil before man, as free agents. Spiritual power guides man to that which is good or evil, and as he is controlled by good or evil spirits, so in proportion will he receive a reward or punishment, for obedience or disobedience to natural or divine law. HOME CIRCLE.

To the Editor:—The extracts from a journal were taken from my sister's journal, written the year before she passed from her suffering body, to inhabit a form of radiant loveliness in the land of Spirit. She was almost persuaded to accept the Christian religion. Spiritualism was then quite unpopular and we had not investigated to any extent: She prayed: "O God, give me light and knowledge. If there is any truth in the spiritual philosophy, make it known unto me."

She soon began to be clairvoyant, saw spirit friends; her hand was often controlled to write. She often spoke inspirationally.

Hoping the few extracts may influence some skeptic to investigate through the Home Circle, where fraud cannot enter, I am yours ever for the cause of truth,

Nelson, N. Y. EMMA F. DUELL.

EXTRACTS FROM A JOURNAL.

January 1, 1875.—A cold but beautiful day. With this Happy New Year is born an ardent wish for a better and more useful life.

We would live a life so pure and free from sin, it shall not shame us when we part with this.

We would sow good seeds, and pray God to water them, that they may bring forth sweet fruit.

I have the blessed assurance that the angels from the higher life have given me what earth never could. Truth is founded upon the rock, but falsehood and error upon the sands.

January 2.—We held a very interesting home circle this evening. The German spirit gave us a grand discourse, explaining several questions asked, to the satisfaction of all. Mother asked if little children in spirit life were as well off as grown people.

As an illustration, he spoke of a flower garden in which were growing plants, some being full-blown flowers, while others were only small buds with petals just expanding. Ere they opened, some kind hand plucked them, placing in cool and pure water. Receiving care they soon open, becoming full and perfect flowers.

The dark clouds of the tempest gather, the rain falls in torrents upon the garden, and the flowers left are broken from their stems and lie drooping in the mud, faded, soiled and withered.

The little ones who pass from earth during infancy are cared for by the bright and pure spirits in the higher spheres. Taught the lessons which their purity enables them to learn, their souls expand quickly, drinking in deep draughts from the great fount of infinite power. They soon become our teachers. Not direct, for we could not comprehend, but transmitted from one plane to another it reaches us as lucid as we can bear.

January 11.—Held a circle. I was impressed that several Indian spirits were present. Soon after I saw a hand holding a flower, pale blue, shaped like a goblet, for mother to drink.

As she did not notice it, the hand threw the contents upon the stand, filled the flower again, extending it to me. I said: "If it is something you wish me to take to benefit, I will do so." The flower was instantly held to my lips. Mother saw four Indians dressed in fur. She asked what tribe they belonged to, and saw them throw a large turtle upon the table.

Two others who seemed to belong to some ancient race were seated at a long table outside the circle. The German then reminded us of his promise to aid us, said he had brought them as they possessed great power and strength, and could help us in our development.

Held Circle 23.—Mr Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Miner, with their relatives from the west. I saw and described the gentleman's spirit wife. Gave her name, his mother's name, sister's, and one of his children's. All were excellent tests to him. I then saw an anchor held by spirit hands, composed of white roses. It was no doubt an emblem of spiritual truth. Oh, how much we owe the angel world. They come striving to elevate us, that we may grasp and appreciate a little of that which they enjoy. The past is beyond our recall, but the future is ours to improve. Let us build so well and strong that our edifice shall stand though the whirlpool sweeps around it. Onward and upward be our motto in life here, as it is in spirit life.

February 20.—Message to Lillie A. Temple:

Loved ones were waiting, they welcomed me there,
Infinite beauties and pleasures to share;
Father, mother and all the loved ones
Were waiting to welcome the wanderer home.
Freed from the trials that earth life must bear,
No longer its vestments of sorrow to wear,
Angels whose garments were glistening and white
Bore me through portals of heavenly light. A. TEMPLE.

February 27.—The German gave us a spiritual feast, as usual. Among other things, good, spoke of the frail crafts which were [but never should have been] launched upon life's ocean, borne by the strong and powerful currents until they reach the rapids, where they soon sink beneath the dark waters. Who is responsible for the lives wrecked? Not those who, too weak to withstand the temptations of life, fail, but they who launched the crafts without giving them compass or rudder.

When we endeavor to describe to you our spirit homes, we of necessity compare them to that which you see in earth life, and so we can give you but an imperfect idea of the glorious realities of our heavenly homes. We come this evening to dispel the shadows which have gathered around you. We know the doubt and fears you have struggled with, all the longings of the soul. If your prayers seem long in being answered, wait patiently. Not one pure and holy invocation but shall be answered, and thy soul be better and happier through the lesson it learns in the delay.

As the white lily which blooms on earth,
Keep thy soul pure for its heavenly birth;
Then when thy spirit is winged for flight
'Twill soar to a home in the region of light

November 14.—The following inspirational poem, by Anna V. White, was received while sitting alone:

Beyond the billowy ocean,
Across the mighty deep,
Have passed the earthly loved ones
For whom so many weep;
But could they see them standing
Among that happy throng,
Their tears would turn to gladness—
They'd echo our glad song.
They are basking in the sunshine,
They are bathing in its light,
Now are drinking from the fountains
Of eternal truth and might,
They have cast the fetters from them,
They wore so long on earth,
And have climbed to heights supernal
Since their happy spirit birth.

December 2.—Through the mediumship of Miss M. J. Graves, received the following:

Your home on the other side stands upon an elevation commanding a grand view of the surrounding country. There are blooming many beautiful flowers. In the centre is a white magnolia placed there by one who often brings you flowers, that you may see some of the bright blossoms in your spirit home. You are afflicted with physical ills, but you will reach such a stage of development that these will seem insignificant. You will be able to walk when thirty years of age. Your mission is to elevate humanity. Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasure and all her paths are paths of peace.

December 27.—Received the following through my own hand, by automatic writing:

TO ANNA.

Will take the tiny bouquet
I have culled, dear friend, for thee;
Brought from realms of spirit life,
That you might their beauty see?
They grew where the river windeth
Around the hills of light;
I plucked them in the morning,
As the dew lay on them bright.
You loved the little wild flowers
We gathered long ago,
But brighter, far more beautiful
Are the ones I now bestow.
Emblems of the affection
I cherish still for you,
I have defined it, Anna,
'Tis friendship pure and true.

Vision Reveals Sister's Death.

Paris, September 13.—A remarkable incident is published this morning in one of the leading papers, which vouched for its accuracy. Three gentlemen were strolling down one of the principal avenues of the Bois de Boulogne chatting, when suddenly one of them, overcome by some mysterious influence, stopped short and ceased talking, and over his senses a cloud descended.

On recovering himself he found his friends staring at him in alarm, while he was shaking as though from cold. Much alarmed, he told them he had had a vision that his sister, who lived 3,000 miles from Paris, was dead.

He hastened to a telegraph office and wired for particulars of his sister's health. The reply stated that she had died at the very moment of his vision.—Chicago American.

WHAT DOES SPIRITUALISM INCLUDE, AND WHAT ARE THE DUTIES IT IMPOSES?

By Prof. J. S. LOVELAND, Summerland, California.

NUMBER FOUR.

If Spiritualism is only a part, where is the wholeness? is the query with which we closed our last article. Has any one found an answer? And I now ask what is the wholeness of which it is a part? Is it a unity or only one factor of a unity? If the latter, what is the unity? Is it a principle, or a summary of principles, embodying a wholeness? All the Christian sects embodied, represent the principles, doctrines of Christianity. Is Spiritualism one of these sects, representing a special form of the totality? Perhaps some reader will remind me that I have already affirmed Life to be that unity and wholeness, and that Spiritualism is the Science and Philosophy of Life. Very true. Life, in its threefold aspect of Universal, Individual and Social, constitutes the perfect wholeness. The individual evolves from the universal, and the social is the embodiment of the universal and the individual in a composite unity. The universal represents absolute oneness. The individual represents the blending of equal, unit factors into functional unity. The co-ordination of equal, unit factors, atoms or molecules, by the action of Life energy, creates the organs and functions of the human organization. The result, unless opposing forces interfere, is the harmonious manifestation of life energies. So also, in the co-ordination of individuals in the social unity, there will be harmonious manifestation unless there is some maladjustment in the relations and functions of the unit factors of the same.

Principles are interpreted or manifested, or both. Interpretation is the comprehension and statement of the nature and relations of things and energies, and is made by the intellectual powers of man. Manifestation is the actual outworking of life's sublime energies. Now, we have seen that mediumship is the manifestation of the same absolute energies which organize the human form, and control its functional activities so long as organic life continues. It thus includes the potency of both the universal and the individual. Hence it is equal to the social life, which is, as I have shown, the individual and the universal combined. Space will not allow me in these brief articles to show at length the identity of mediumship and the social life. But no Spiritualist will question the position that the perfection of mediumship depends upon harmony. The prevalence of fraud and imperfect mediumship keeps pace with the contention and strife among the Spiritualists, and also in outside society. The pitiable ignorance of most Spiritualists, who limit mediumship to the one phase of conversing with decarnate spirits, is the cause of immense inharmony and consequent failure to realize, except in a very limited degree, the full benefit of mediumistic capacity. I may, in the future, give a more complete exposition of this subject. It will be an added demonstration of the essential oneness of Spiritualism and life manifestation.

Spiritualism may be regarded as dual. It is manifestation and interpretation. Through and by mediumship, it is the great manifestor and manifestation of the potencies of universal life, and the attributes, relations, tendencies and destiny of personal life. And, in the exercise of the supreme faculty of reason, it is the interpreter of all the religions, philosophies and ethical systems of the past, and also of the inharmonies and maladjustments of the present.

We are now prepared to go one step farther and say that Spiritualism alone is the interpreter of life, for it alone, by scientific analysis, has discovered the law of life manifestation in its most occult forms, and thus demonstrated the naturalness of all those manifestations of life hitherto considered miraculous; and by finding the nest of all those energies in the organs, and pertaining to the functions of organic life, it has placed mediumship in the categories of physiological and psychological sciences. And, while not seeking it as an end, it has demonstrated in the most perfect manner, the unity and brotherhood of humanity. The old fable of Genesis said that a river went out of Eden and parted into four great rivers. If it had said that humanity went out from the universal life and parted into four great types we might conclude the writer had some inkling of a great fact. But standing upon the vantage ground of science, we unhesitatingly proclaim that no matter how many streams of racial or tribal life exist, they all flow from the same universal fountain, and hence by the fact of a common nature constitute the composite oneness of humanity.

But, without proceeding farther with these reasonings and illustrations, I submit that the duty imposed upon Spiritualists is the Leadership and Education of the world. I have already shown that Spiritualism, considered in the abstract, as embodying mediumship and reason, was the manifestor and the manifestation of life. This necessarily implies the action of individual men and women. And this means acting out in real life the essential principles of Spiritualism or Brotherhood. Words are not life. They are very cheap. Sometimes they are very necessary. But they can never be made substitutes for acts, hence the proclamation of brotherhood by words only will never save a single person.

In previous articles I have discussed the question of rights. Comparing the actual conditions of our present social state with the absolute rights appertaining to every human being, we discover the appalling fact that right is almost universally disregarded and a system of legal robbery exercising despotic sway over society. The ownership of natural wealth in perpetuity is a settled principle in civil law. The possession and ownership of what the possessor does not need, but what some one else does need, is equally sacred in human codes. The fortunate robber may hold thousands of acres of land while thousands of poor men may suffer and starve for the use of it, and if they should insist on cultivating it the whole military force of the government would be used to drive them off. Thousands of acres may be turned into game preserves, to furnish sport to barbarian aristocrats, while men and women starve because shut off from that which belongs to them by right; for Spiritualism proclaims the right of all men to secure what they need. Again, one man has secured 100,000 bushels of wheat. He needs perhaps twenty. Around him are thousands who have no wheat or money. He ships his wheat to some other country and they starve. This is transpiring in India at the present time. It occurred a few years ago in Ireland. Astor has more than ten thousand houses. He needs but one. Some poor man, through sickness and death in his family, is unable to pay the monthly rent. The power of the State of New York steps in and throws that suffering family into the street, in snow or rain, and society approves of it, because law, custom and religion proclaim that man has the right to hold and control what he does not need, but which some one else does need. The Astors, no doubt, have from one to two hundred thousand tenants in their houses, and according to law and our religion they have the right to dispossess every one of these tenants on expiration of their lease and leave them empty. This would inflict terrible suffering on thousands, and materially injure the business of the city. Selfishness prevents these extreme cases, but on a smaller scale, the control and reckless waste of what the possessor does not need and somebody else does need goes on continually. And nobody objects. It is conceded as perfectly right. But it is perfectly and outrageously wrong. It is an assault upon life. In many instances it is actual murder.

The imperative duty of every Spiritualist is perfectly clear. He must protest against these palpable wrongs. He must educate the people to see and resist them. He must and will, if a Spiritualist, leave no legitimate means untried to completely remodel the present governmental system. He will be untiring in his efforts to secure the enactment of laws securing to every person the opportunity to secure the means of life. His politics, his religion and social principles will be the same, and he will vote his principles, and in his social life will act his principles. All real Spiritualists will act together. They will be co-operators. It is impossible for them to be otherwise. They see and realize the oneness of life—that they are only factors of that oneness. That the instinctive aspiration of that oneness is to harmony—happiness. They know that the weal of one is the good of all; and the weal of all is the supreme good of the one. The Spiritualist sees that right and duty are inseparably linked together. That there can be no rights without corresponding duty. And I have shown that Right is an attribute of life itself, consequently to every phase or form of life pertain the same rights, and they inhere in every unit factor or individual of that form. Therefore, every human being is under the most imperative obligation to work in every way possible for the establishment of the rights of self and of every other self. But the Spiritualists, having the only true Science and Philosophy of Life, are the ones on whom this duty rests in greatest force. No other scientific cult has developed the formulas of life as I have indicated in these articles, nor laid the foundation for those all-embracing deductions of duty or ethical action as I am now proposing. With all the other world systems of thought, Science is one thing, Ethics another and Religion still another. But, as I have shown, Spiritualism demonstrates that they are only branches of the great tree of Life. Or, they are different departments of the one universal Science.

The eternal effort of the universal life, through all the stages of evolutionary progress, has been for the attainment of harmony, that is, the full expression or manifestation of all its almostinfinite possibilities. Partial success and partial failure has characterized this unrelenting struggle. The failure has always been the result of defective understanding of the Science and Philosophy of Life. It has not been for lack of love of life, or of effort to secure the full results of life. But for lack of knowledge of all the elemental energies of life, their natural relations and the appropriate methods for their successful action. Of course, ignorance of some of those elements of life energy would render a system of harmonic action an impossibility. For instance, when some of the functions of life, as manifested in mediumship, are supposed to be the result of supernatural or miraculous agency, a true theory of natural life would be impossible, and therefore inharmonic condition and action would be inevitable. Such has been the fact with the great world religions. While in some particulars they have contributed toward some special development, and in that respect they may be allowed successful; on the other hand, their ceaseless divisions and contentions are the prima facie evidences of their dismal failure to secure the great end of Life—harmony—happiness. So also, when the supernatural idea affirms the right of government to some god, either through the agency of some pontiff, judge or monarch, we have the true ends of life defeated through the rule of personal selfishness. And the same result is reached when a representative form is adopted, as the selfishness of the representatives eventually works with individual selfishness outside of the government circle and the rights of life are trampled under foot. And when we come to private life so-called the same poison is found in operation. With the religionist, the primary, the supreme duty is owed to God. That to man is secondary, and is defined by God. Hence the great mass of religionists look upon their neighbors—their fellow citizens as enemies of God, and aliens from the spiritual commonwealth of the righteous. Hence we have a total failure of the true ends of life, and instead we have pride, self-righteousness, bigotry, hate and endless strife.

With what tremendous force then comes the affirmation of the duty of Spiritualists to be the leaders and educators of the world. Having discovered the "Harmonial Philosophy" we are prepared to show the struggling, contentious sects, whether civil or religious, just where they stand, just what their failure is, and how they can align themselves in the ranks of positive progress. We are on vantage ground which cannot be taken from us.

Partial, phenomenal spiritism constitutes only another contentious sect, fighting for position alongside of the other and older sects, and vigorously trying to appropriate a part of their old Bible as defensive material in the fight. But Spiritualism is, in essence, and must be in manifestation, one vast propaganda of education. It is not, cannot be any missionary enterprise to convert men to a creed, or adjoin them to any partial sect, but to so enlighten them, in the Science of Life, that they will naturally act together. Co-operation will be as natural to the real Spiritualist as competition and strife are to the non-Spiritualist. I don't wish to be understood as in the least undervaluing Spiritism. It is, in its fullest sense, the scientific department of Spiritualism. But I mean that Spiritism which confines itself to that partial phase of mediumship which limits itself to converse with decarnate spirits, with no study or knowledge of the laws or possibilities of mediumship, or the vast duties which a new instauration of thought and life imposes upon those receiving it. This Spiritism is partial, defective and develops a phase of character destitute of any central purpose of action. You will find these Spiritists on all sides of all questions. In the church they belong to all sects. In politics, they are in all parties. In the great Spiritistic movement they are in all fads from that of John M. Spear down to the theosophic, metaphysical and mental science systems of the present. It constitutes the vast field of phenomenal shows, fraud performances, the flaming advertisements of the greatest healers, with bogus titles, etc., etc., all of which are foreign to genuine Spiritualism. But the real Spiritism is scientific. It carefully and patiently collects every fact or phenomenon. Analyzes it thoroughly. Determines what has been done. What or who was the doer. What the source and law of the force operating, and also the purpose of the doer and the tendencies of the acts performed. Thus real Spiritism brings us at once to the Philosophy of Spiritualism. It is only the pseudo Spiritism, which misnames itself Spiritualism, which I repudiate.

In conclusion, I come to the application of my reasonings. We have an organization known as the National Spiritualist Organization. Last year it most unfortunately adopted a seven by nine creed affirming belief in an incomprehensible something termed an "Infinite Intelligence." This was to take the place, and play the role of the God of the old religions. Strong protest has been made against this creed or any creed, as creeds are only confessions of ignorance. What a man believes, he doesn't know, and what is unknown, and especially what is unknowable, should have no place in the platform of a people who lay claim to knowledge. Again, what is only believed but not known will be forever a bone of contention between the varying faiths. No postulate of truth or duty can ever be predicated of an unknowable something. The infinite can never be known. It can never be measured, and knowledge, comprehension, implies measurement. Consequently the N. S. A. creed can never be a basis, or bond of union, but the opposite. The obvious duty of the association at its coming meeting in October, is to repeal its creed entirely, and instead submit some brief declaration which all Spiritualists will accept without dispute. Everything could be summed up in the affirmation that "Spiritualism is the Science and Philosophy of Life." And, if some expansion were needed, it could be easily made in affirming the continuity of life, and the natural fellowship and communion of living persons in all spheres of life. The equality of human rights and the imperative duties of Universal Brotherhood might well complete the document which an intelligent person could put in form in an hour. A platform would thus be laid, on which could be built the grand structure of propagandism heretofore indicated.

The October meeting will decide whether a partial Spiritism, serving as a vehicle for phenomenal and medical frauds, shall continue under the shallow pretense of a religious organization; or whether we shall have established a philosophic Spiritualism, operating for the intellectual enlightenment and the moral uplifting of humanity.

THE LAW OF MATERIALIZATION.

A Lecture Delivered by the Guides of Mr. John W. Ring, Galveston, Texas.

In the present age there is no thought which entertains the thinking philosophical world as does psychic phenomena. The orthodox world, to a great extent, repels every intimation of the possibility of genuine, truthful psychic phenomena. The Catholics seek to educate a certain class, while the Spiritualists, of all other people, are desirous of educating the great masses of the world who are hungry and thirsty for something which will in a manner demonstrate the immortality of the soul. So we, the Spiritualist Society of Galveston, after having lately passed through sore and serious experiences with so-called materialization, have tried to in some manner inform ourselves and our associates upon this great subject. Knowing as you do that these lectures which you receive are purported inspirational, given by excarnate intelligences, you can conceive the possibility of associating with your speaker an intelligence that is informed upon this subject; such we believe is the case this evening—that in the inspirer for the address we have one who knows by actual experience the Law of Materialization.

NATURAL CAUSE.

With the men and women who think there is no longer any discussion, that mind emanates a magnetic aura, which demonstrates perfectly the science of life within, and portrays accurately the character of each child of earth. Men and women are conscious of the fact that surrounding us as a halo of light is the emanation of the soul within; and that as the perfume of the flower pervades the atmosphere with its sweetness, unseen and unrecognized by the sense of sight, so does the aura of the human soul penetrate the atmosphere about us, unseen by the material sense of sight.

Seership in its phase of clairvoyance has demonstrated to the world furthermore that man has a spiritual sense in counterpart for every material sense; that while we look out over the beauties of Nature with our eyes we are blind to the fullness of the Infinite's expression. The spiritual sense of sight peers into the beauties there concealed and sees the soul itself. The harmony of sound which bursts upon the material senses of man is not to be compared with the sweet sound of the spheres as they roll in space, the orbs which walk their respective route, or even the sweetness of the babbling brook when all nature is silenced and the soul drinks in the spiritual message thus expressed. Every sense has a spiritual counterpart, power of spiritual perception. Man feels the things which approach him and judges of them by the condition which they produce, but the psychometrist peers into the thing which they touch, and rends the soul thereof.

NATURAL EFFECT.

As the streamlet starts far up the mountain side, and courses its way to be joined by innumerable brooks until it becomes a roaring cataract, and as the ingenuity of man has harnessed its power, and causes it to move the shuttles of factories, turn the wheels of mills, and in a multitude of ways and manners shorten, or at least modify, the labor of men, so does the emanation of the soul reach out and blend with the emanation of other souls, thus forming a mighty force which is divine. To continue this illustration, let us gather a number of persons (men and women, positive and negative forces), engage them in harmonious thought (that the emanations of their souls may perfectly blend), and we have the atmosphere pervaded with actual substance. Who can look at the rolling cataract and see the strength which moves the stone of the mill or wheels of the factory? Who can, with their touch, gather the fragrance of the blossom? Yet these are forces in Nature. So the clairvoyant tells us that pervading the atmosphere in a materializing seance there is an abundance of actual substance.

To explain this point we must remember that the scientific world disputes as to which predominates, force or matter. We are told by some great thinkers that we cannot comprehend force without matter for that force to operate upon, by other great thinkers that matter is useless were there no force to operate upon it. So we have come to the conclusion that these two—force and substance— are co-eternal. That as we look on Nature in her solid mineral, flowering vegetable, intuitive animal and reasoning human kingdoms, and everywhere pervading the various forces which man has but lately begun to comprehend, 'tis a co-eternal blending of force and substance. We feel that within the confines of the human soul and its temple of clay are all substances and forces; then we enter the materializing seance knowing that we are dealing with the substance of the body and the force of the soul. These must be gathered, harmoniously blended and manipulated to produce materialized forms, exactly as the cataract tearing down the mountain side must be harnessed by the ingenuity of man. In the spirit world (and possibly a few in the flesh) are souls so developed and educated in this great science, that they know how to manipulate these forces.

THE ADEPT.

We know that the adepts of India can work a wondrous spell upon the masses of their ignorant followers and cause them to see, by hypnotic influence, things which are not; and we know that these same wonderful people can by their law of chemistry produce not only living, breathing beings, but that they can produce, before the civilized gaze of the new world scientist, a tree which will immediately bear fruit. From beneath the rolling waves of the broad Atlantic, where lies the beautiful Atlantis, with her sealed secrets, there has come understanding of things which it was presumed man should not know; and the Holy Land of Egypt and the sacred jungles of India boast of souls in the flesh who know how to manipulate these psychic forces and materialize bodies. Safe within the secret recesses of Egypt's pyramids, and in the dark yet sacred caves and jungles of India this knowledge is locked, so when the people of the New World rise up and say, "Let us take the glad news of our religion to these heathens and pagans," let us remember this and go forth in the fullness of the soul's strength and implore these "wise men of the East" to give us the knowledge which their lips conceal. Every materializing medium (we mean legitimate medium) has a chemist—a spirit of dignity and apparent renown—who understands how to manipulate and deal with these forces of which we know so little.

MODE OF CONSTRUCTION.

Exactly as the little bee gathers from each flower tiny particles, the spirit gathers from the emanations of the soul, through the body, atoms which, though invisible to our sense of sight, are actual substance; by a process equally as unknown to man as the making of honey, they (using their medium as a motor or great vessel into which they pour this force and substance) blend this with the spiritual forces which they are able to bring and produce a substance, which man has failed to name, and an etherealized form is constructed. This form takes on the likeness of a human being. It is not tangible to our sense of touch, our hands can pass through it and we feel nothing more than a slight tingling sensation; as we pass our hands through vapor we are conscious of a dampness, so when we pass our hands through this etherealized substance we may feel a slight tingling sensation because magnetism and electricity are the potent forces of which this substance is constructed. This etherealized form takes on the likeness of the spirit who is seeking to manifest; it may be a spirit from the spirit world or it may be the astral of the medium. All successful materializing mediums are in a trance, unconscious of all their surroundings, or else influenced by some excarnate intelligence, thus leaving their astral at liberty to go where it will.

ETHEREALIZE, THEN MATERIALIZE.

We know that the good housewife takes water and by a certain process causes vapor to rise and disappear in the air; but if the proper precaution is taken (the vapor confined) the vapor again becomes water. So these bodies of ours emanate a vapor or ethereal substance, which under proper conditions can be converted into a similar structure. If this etherealized substance is carried a little farther in chemicalization, like the vapor, it will become material, tangible to our sense of touch, which will be like flesh and blood according to the degree of materialization.

When you deal thoroughly and carefully with this scientific problem, which is presented for your consideration, and revolve it many times in your mind, you will then comprehend how the emanation of the soul, blended with spiritual forces under direction of wonderfully developed chemists, can pass from ethereal substance and become sufficiently solid to be tangible to our sense of feeling, visible to our sense of sight. The vocal organs can be materialized, as we know they must be to produce a sound these mortal ears can grasp, or there may materialize only a portion of the body peculiar in its structure that it may be recognized by the investigator; but in no sense should the form be similar in appearance or action to the medium or any one in the seance, any more than flowers look like the earth from which they spring. The form is temporarily constructed for the use of an excarnate intelligence, and when acting under suggestion of this excarnate intelligence, it positively does not partake of the nature of the medium. The form may be inhabited by the astral of the medium, or a guide, and they may proceed to deliver the message of your spirit friend who does not understand the modus operandi. Here recognize the possibility of imposition, also of misjudging, of the uneducated soul, who seeks the phase of materialization; even the etherealized form, through which you can pass your hand without being cognizant of coming in contact with anything, may be occupied by some other spirit than the one which it purports to be.

Since these laws are so subtle and seldom comprehended, only the scholar who has made Spiritualism a profound scientific study is qualified to enter the seance room for materialization. Then contemplate seriously and sacredly the law which will produce conditions where the spirit chemist can gather the emanations of souls and build for themselves temporary habitations through which to manifest.

How sweet, how pure, indeed how clean,
Must be the human soul
That seeks to pierce the great unseen,
And see the shining goal.
How pure the thought which substance gives
To build the spirit's form,
That loved ones prove the soul still lives;
And with its love yet warm
Cries, "Look, oh soul, at pow'rs supreme,"
And floods our soul with light;
We blend our lives with their grand theme,
And lo, we're led aright.

In order to be in this frame of mind the sitters must be perfectly satisfied with the conditions surrounding the medium, and we recommend that the medium appear before a committee of the same sex, be disrobed and put on clothing which the committee has prepared. In doing this it is well, if it be a lady, to carefully examine the hair, and in all cases examine the ears. Why? Because there can be sufficient chemicals concealed in a little bag no larger than the end of your small finger which when ignited or released will be apparently a perfect etherealized form. The impostor is supplied with "condensed spirits," and when this chemical is ignited or released it rises, is given the name of some noted personage, the sitters say, "wonderful," and then it floats off in the atmosphere or dematerializes in the floor, yet it is nothing but condensed chemicals.

SPIRITUALISM—NOBLE LIVING.

In conclusion, friends, dealing no further upon the Law of Materialization, believing that we have presented sufficient thought which, if properly revolved in the mind will produce a wondrous harvest of understanding, we wish to say—Spiritualism to be successful must recognize every phase of mediumship and place each in its proper place. They whose mentality is illuminated with inspiration, or whose lives have been swallowed up, as it were, by spirit guides, who can teach the law of life and her multiplied phenomena, are the ones to blaze the way through swamps of superstition, and over the bleak hillsides of ignorance to plant the standard of Truth on every mountain top, and sow the seed of honest investigation in every human heart. Following these should be the men and women whose spiritual eyes and ears have been attuned to spiritual vibrations, that they can respond to the pleading cry of the spirit friends and give their sweet and tender messages to the denizens of earth. Then an orderly investigation can and will be made, which will result in an abundant harvest of souls made glad and free by our beautiful Spiritualism.

"GOD" AND "HEAVEN"

The living sense—the omnipresent—
That man has called his sense of God;
O, is it not by angels lent,
Where'er the foot of man hath trod?

They are not far; their "Summer-Land"
Is on this earth, where they were born,
And even now they 'round us stand,
For death has not them from us torn!

On clouds above no Heaven is,
But in our homes of love and grace,
And in our joy they find their bliss,
And 'tis their love that gives us peace.

Why should they go to some strange place—
Be torn from friends they loved so well?
Though they now tell of homes of grace,
Such separation would be hell.

'Tis absence that doth grieve the heart,
E'en though we hear of cities "golden;"
And would they go from us, apart,
And leave us thus, by grievings holden?

Is Mars or Venus better home,
Than this of earth, where love remains?
Must they from distance to us come,
If they relieve our hearts from pains?

Believe it not; with us they live;
They cling to earth, this planet fair;
And in our homes their message give;
And all our life, our angels share.

And this is why of God men tell,
As omnipresent—everywhere;
Because of Love our anthems swell,
And in our homes "God heareth prayer."

Have you not read of "Holy Ghost,"
And named it God—or "Father, Son?"
These are the names of all the host
Of angel ones, who heaven won.

"Our very own," these angels are;
"Our loved and lost," because unseen;
But they see us—they are not far—
And on their love we trusting lean!

MINNESOTA.

Missionary and Temple Fund for State Association.

At the late convention held in Minneapolis, by the State Association, the Ways and Means committee brought in two important recommendations which were adopted.

The need, of course, is for funds to carry on the work. And a nucleus is desired for a Temple in Minneapolis, to be owned by the State Association.

Nothing nauseates sooner than repeated requests from the officers of the association for money. As a trained business man, I know that work, and less fuss and furore, gets results. Send out agents and laborers to achieve, instead of waiting for patrons and help.

Thus an army of workers is needed, instead of trusting all to a missionary, or president and secretary.

The Minnesota Convention appointed Mrs. C. D. Prudens, of Minneapolis, as a Human Calendar to appoint a person for each month, and they in turn appoint one for each week, and they for each day of their week to form a correspondence society—each to contribute two cents a week. That means four hundred dollars per year and possibly an excellent social and working society.

The writer was also appointed in charge of a corps of willing workers, composed of 365 persons—each one to have a day of the year to solicit for and remit results to the State Association. This should bring a remittance each day—and create an active body of interested advocates and helpers of the State Association. To get the 365 persons is a task—and to keep in active relation to them will be labor for the manager. I have a large number of volunteers enrolled, principally for October and November, with other scattering dates taken. But anyone may have any date they desire—even if it is duplicated. And every Spiritualist in Minnesota should join this company of "Willing Workers," and we will hold a reunion at the next convention. Any person in any other state may volunteer if desired. Send me your name and date selected (any you desire) or write for further information. We mean to make the cause of truth in Minnesota, a power for good.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

PSYCHIC PHENOMENA.

From India to the Planet Mars.

Men of science are slow to believe in the supernatural, but they are not unlike other men when they have become interested and absorbed in the investigation of matters pertaining or having a connection with the so-called spirit world. It is not often, it should be said in justice to those who spend their lives laboratories and libraries in hard, persistent study and patient research, that scientific men become enthusiastic over anything, even when they have successfully demonstrated propositions to which they have devoted years, but as there are exceptions to every rule, it can be safely asserted that no man is so strong mentally that it is an impossibility to throw him off his balance.

It is among the probabilities that the majority of men believe to a certain extent in what is called the supernatural; many feel assured that those who have gone before are not really without means of communication with this planet; that the spirits of the departed exercise an indirect—sometimes direct—influence upon the lives of men and women, and have a part in shaping their destinies; and that some persons, although in their own proper persons in the flesh, can and do live in the bodies and souls of those who have been dead for centuries.

It was the firm belief of Napoleon Bonaparte that he was allied with deities, albeit he made no pretensions of holding direct communication with them; he insisted that he was not amenable to the rules of morality which guided the conduct of other men; he believed in destiny, and at the last was not brought to a realization of the fact that he was merely human.

For many years investigations have been conducted into the phenomena of "spiritual manifestations," as they are called, the most indefatigable in this line being the members of the Society of Psychical Research. These phenomena include "spirit rappings," somnambulism, table-tipping, slate-writing, mind-reading, performances within closed cabinets, etc., all of which have been made familiar to the public by "mediums," some of whom were clever indeed and succeeded in thoroughly mystifying their audiences. Among the most celebrated of these "mediums" is Mrs. Piper, of Boston, who has a large following. Her disciples stoutly maintain that she is in constant communication with the "other world," and, indeed, no satisfactory explanation has yet been vouchsafed for many of the things credited to her.

There lives in Geneva, Switzerland, a young woman known as Helene Smith, 30 years of age, described as beautiful and healthy, mind and body normal in every way, who possesses, it is claimed, "supernatural" powers, and Professor Theodore Flournoy, occupying the chair of psychology at the University of Geneva, has incorporated the results of his five years' study of her in a large book—"From India to Mars"—the translation of which has been done by Professor Daniel B. Vermilye, of Columbia University. Professor Flournoy calls it "a study of a case of somnambulism," and has divided it into three "romances," and says of his subject:

"Two of these romances are connected with the spiritistic idea of previous existences. It has, indeed, been revealed that Mlle. Helene Smith (this is not her real name) has already lived twice before on this globe. Five hundred years ago she was the daughter of an Arab sheik, and became, under the name of Simandini, the favorite wife of a Hindu prince named Sivrouka, who reigned over Kanara, and built, in the year 1401, the fortress of Tchandraguiri. In the last century she reappeared in the person of the illustrious and unfortunate Marie Antoinette. Again reincarnated, as a punishment for her sins and the perfecting of her character in the humble circumstances of Helene Smith, she, in certain somnambulistic states, recovers the memory of her glorious avatars of old, and again becomes, for the moment, Hindu princess or Queen of France.

"I shall call the third romance the 'Martian' cycle, in which Mlle. Smith, by virtue of the mediumistic faculties, which are the appanage and the consolation of her present life, has been able to enter into relations with the people and the affairs of the planet Mars, and to unveil their mysteries to us. It is in this astronomical somnambulism that the phenomenon of a glossolalia (ability to speak foreign languages without having consciously acquired them) appears, which consists of the fabrication and the use of an unknown language. * * *"

Professor Flournoy attended several public scances given by Mlle. Smith and was astonished at the results. Apparitions passed before her eyes in the partially darkened room, and when the meanings of the visions were tapped out on the table around which sat the medium and those present at the seance, Professor Flournoy (speaking for himself alone) was surprised to recognize in scenes passing before her eyes events which had transpired in his own family previous to his birth. Where could the medium have derived, he asks, knowledge of events of a private nature belonging to a remote past and utterly unknown to a living person? He hastens to say, in this connection, that Mlle. Smith possesses a triple mediumship—visual, auditive and typtological (spirit rapping).

In the messages received by Mlle. Smith no error was ever discovered, their verification being found by reference to biographical dictionaries or to the traditions of families interested, and as they generally had a bearing upon past events unknown to the persons present at the seances the medium could have obtained nothing regarding them from the sitters at the table. To these phenomena of retrocognition or of hypermnesia were joined occasionally, in the majority of cases in rhyme, moral exhortations, medical prescriptions for physical ailments, communications from relatives or friends deceased, and revelations (not capable of verification) concerning the previous existence of those in attendance upon the sittings.

As to revelations in connection with Mlle. Smith's first life on earth as a Hindu princess, her second existence as Marie Antoinette and her relations with the inhabitants and affairs of the planet Mars no one can take the affirmative side in debate; but when it is stated that the guardian angel of the medium is the shade of Cagliostro, a most illustrious artificer of 100 years or more ago—a magician, sleight-of-hand performer and adept in the way of making the credulous believe all sorts of things which never had an existence—one may be pardoned for indulging in a smile.

Cagliostro, so it is said, is now discarnate and floating in space, and is sailing under the alias of Leopold. In life, so the story runs, he was madly infatuated with Queen Marie Antoinette; and it was only after a long search that he happened to come across Mlle. Smith, in whom he found the august object of the unhappy passion which so completely possessed him when in the flesh. Being the protector and spiritual guide of the medium he naturally occupies a privileged and foremost place when Mlle. Smith is on one of her somnambulistic tours.

Professor Flournoy, it may be assumed, is perfectly sincere and honest in what he writes; he is a sane and clear-headed man, and he treats the whole business with a seriousness (to the extent of nearly 500 pages) which certainly entitles it to respect. TWINS HAVE ODD GIFT.

Converse by Telepathic Messages.

SEE QUEER VISIONS—DISTANCE DOES NOT AFFECT POWER OF THOUGHT TRANSFERENCE—BROTHERS ARE ABLE TO COMMUNICATE WITH EACH OTHER WHEN THEY ARE MANY MILES APART.

Canal Dover, Ohio, Sept. 14.—A most singular power of telepathy, or mind-reading between twins has been demonstrated near the isolated village of Trailville. John and Robert Evans are the twins who have this peculiar gift. The boys are about 18 years old, and are sons of J. E. Evans, a well-to-do farmer. Both have light hair and blue eyes, and they are so much alike that the father has never been quite sure which is John and which is Robert.

The twins are alike in temperament, and have always shown the closest sympathy with each other. It is only recently, however, that they have discovered their telepathic power. The first exhibition of it took place about four months ago. John had been sent into the woods to hew some trees, while Robert helped his father build fence on another part of the farm more than a mile distant. Just before dinner Robert suddenly dropped a piece of timber which he was helping his father carry, and cried out, as if he were hurt. Turning about in alarm, the father saw the boy standing with his eyes closed.

"John is hurt! I can hear him scream and I can see him," Robert said. "The ax glanced from the tree and the sharp edge struck him on the foot. He is sitting on the ground and is bleeding dreadfully. He has begun to tear up his shirt and is trying to bind up the wound. He is near the old spring back of the peach orchard."

TELEPATHIC REPORT OF ACCIDENT.

Suddenly the boy opened his eyes, looked at his father an instant, and then started on a run toward the point where his brother had gone to work in the morning. Mr. Evans looked after him helplessly and then followed, somewhat dazed. When he arrived at the spring he found the conditions precisely as Robert had described them. John had cut his foot severely by a glance blow of the ax and had torn off his shirt sleeve with which to bind up the wound and check the flow of blood. John himself testified that he had cried out in pain when the ax struck him, and seemed not at all surprised that his brother Robert knew at once of his plight, although the sound of his voice could never have been carried half the distance they were separated.

The facts were told to the boys' mother, and were repeated to the neighbors. At first people did not credit the story fully, but since then they have had ample evidence of the singular phenomenon. Not long afterward Robert was working alone behind the plow in a field more than a mile from the house where he had left his twin brother that morning. While steering the plow through a rough and rocky piece of ground the plow-share was broken. There seemed nothing to do but unhitch the horses and go home, although the hour was only mid-afternoon. Then Robert suddenly thought about the time John cut his foot with the ax, and he determined to make his wants known to his twin. He accordingly closed his eyes and tried, he said, to get his brother's attention, although John was more than a mile distant. When he felt that John was listening to him he told his brother to go to the barn, where there was a new plow point in the buggy shed hanging against the wall. He also told John to bring a monkey-wrench which was in the tool chest. Robert then sat down on the plow and waited. It was not more than five minutes until, he said, he plainly felt John asking him which monkey-wrench he should bring—the small one or a larger one. After again bidding him to bring the large one he again sat down and waited patiently.

INSTANCES OF PECULIAR TELEPATHY.

Not more than a half-hour elapsed before he saw John running toward him with the new plow point and the large monkey-wrench. The broken plow point was hastily removed and the new one put in its place. Then Robert continued his plowing and John returned to the house. The twins seem to think there is nothing very remarkable about their marvelous gift of communicating with each other when they are far separated. The distance they are apart seems not to make any difference.

Not long ago John had occasion to go to the county seat, which is twelve miles from his home. At the wish of their parents the twins determined to demonstrate whether they could communicate with each other at this distance. Robert remained at home, and after John had been gone more than an hour he said he could see his brother driving along the road, and that they were talking with each other just as readily as if they had been together and had uttered the words aloud. This conversation was kept up at intervals as long as John remained in the town. Just after Robert had said John was leaving on his return journey the mother discovered that she needed some fruit cans. Robert at once stopped John on his return journey and told him to drive back and get three dozen tin fruit cans and some sealing wax. John asked a few questions and then told Robert he would return for the cans. About twilight that evening John arrived home with the three dozen fruit cans and the sealing wax which he had been told to get.

These are only a few of the wonderful demonstrations the brothers are able to give. Their power has proved a helpful one on many occasions. Each knows the other's whereabouts at all times. They can see each other and exchange thoughts, however widely they may be separated.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

PERPETUAL MOTION.

The Spirits Are Helping Her.

Philadelphia, Sept. 1.—Aided by the spirits of her father and grandfather, Mrs. Mary A. Drake, of 7 South Tenth street, says she has solved the problem of perpetual motion. She has on exhibition in her little store the curious bit of mechanism, something like an old-fashioned clock in appearance, which, she says, will produce motion forever.

From the rear, as the machine sits on a shelf, can be seen a little paper fan, which tirelessly revolves. The inventor willingly picks up the little box and gives the curiously inclined a glimpse of the brass wheels, cogs and things which cluster around the revolving iron rod on which the fan is placed.

There is no spring and no indication that it would be possible to wind the affair to keep it moving. Yet, according to the testimony of all observers, the fan has been whirling for a month.

"My experiments have only begun," said Mrs. Drake, "yet I have demonstrated that perpetual motion is not a dream, but a fact. This, my first machine, proves that. I am at work on a much larger one, which will be used to drive machinery. Until it is completed and patented I can give no details concerning my discovery. It is very simple. The different parts of the mechanism must be perfectly balanced. That is the secret. How I work it out is mine.

"I am naturally a machinist. I ran an engine which furnished the propelling power for a big factory, when only 16. I can take one apart and put it together again, if need be. In this work, however, the spirits of my father and grandfather are helping me. The dead know all things. It is because of their aid that I know I'll succeed in giving to the world a new motive power.

"Both stand beside me constantly and tell me how to make use of the law of gravitation in adjusting the mechanism which drives this fan. I can see them as plainly as I see you. I live on the border-land between this and the other world. I knew years ago that Keely was a fakir, that his one idea was to make money. The spirits told me. He was afraid to show his machine, except at stated times. Mine stands here revolving all the time in plain view. And when I get my patent I will explain its mechanism.

"I have had many proofs of the nearness to me of the dead. That they help me now is only natural. Five years ago my brother dashed into my room, saying, 'Good-bye, Mollie, I'm off.' It was 3 p. m. I saw him plainly, yet knew he was not in the flesh.

"That night I received the news that he died that afternoon at 3 o'clock.

"A man I once employed came into my room one afternoon and said: 'I don't want you to tell me; I know it all now.'

"The hour he appeared to me was the hour of his death, as I afterwards learned. When in my employ there was something he was always asking me to tell him. I refused. As soon as he had died he knew, and taunted me with the fact. I have no fear of the dead. It makes life fuller to live in two worlds."—Toledo (Ohio) Bee.

INSPIRATION.

Three spirits were talking in heaven one day—
A painter, musician, and poet were they—
The subject they spoke of was earth,
The clouds that obscure and the fetters that bind,
And how to assist the poor souls left behind
In the sorrowful sthr of their birth.

"I'd paint," said the artist, "a picture so true
The glory celestial should gladden earth's view,
Could my soul guide the fingers of men."
"The beauty of heaven should blossom in rhyme."
"And heaven's joy-bells thro' earth's music should chime,"
Said they of the harp and the pen.

Then down thro' the depths of the balmy blue air
There floated three spirits as gifted and fair
As ever left heaven behind;
So soft were their voices no whisper was heard,
So light were their footsteps no dew-drop was stirred,
For their was the realm of the mind.

Three mortals won fame as it were in a day,—
A painter, musician, and poet were they—
And great was the wonder of men;
They saw not the source of such beauty and love,
Nor dreamed of the shining forms bending above
The brush and the harp and the pen.

Say not inspiration has passed from the earth,
Is truth of less value, is man of less worth
Than in the dead past where faith cleaves?
The rose of to-day needs the strengthening dew
As much as the roses that past ages knew,
And the soul that looks upward receives.

PASSING UP HIGHER.

The Relatives of President Fillmore.

We remember that upon the death of President Harrison, while occupying the White House, Millard Fillmore became President. While introduced to him once at his residence in Buffalo, N. Y., I learned from the conversation that his family was liberal and broad-minded in their religious sentiments. The Fullers, formerly of Kelloggsville, Cayuga county, N. Y., were relatives of the Fillmores, and Miss Rhoda Fuller, a highly cultured lady, was the first writing medium that I ever saw. It was over fifty years ago.

Helen M. Francis, of Sturgis, Mich., a noble and esteemed woman, was the daughter of Cyrus Fillmore, a nephew of the president. She was united in marriage to J. C. Francis, June 24, 1849. Five daughters were born to this happy union. Mrs. Francis, after a long illness, departed this life Sunday morning, September 2, 1900.

Sent for, and sitting by her bed-side as a counseling physician, she asked, "Do you think I will get up again?"

My reply was, "I hope so; but physicians are not infallible. We will do what we can."

"Well," she calmly replied, "it makes little difference with me. I am prepared to go—but my children will be so lonesome. I shall come and see them, and I will meet them when they come to see me in that better land." Later she earnestly wished to go. She had been blest with spiritual gifts, and she knew that she was going to meet her ascended husband and the children that had gone before. She arranged her financial affairs. She had the undertaker come, and with him she made all the arrangements as to being "laid out," and the vault. She selected the hymns to be sung, and the speaker, Dr. Peebles, to offer the words of consolation to her sorrowing children. Thus can a Spiritualist die. Orthodoxy may do to live by but it won't to die by. It is too gloomy, too grim, too uncertain. It will not stand the test of life's last days. In those fading hours Spiritualism alone is sufficient.

Though sleeping a good deal, she was conscious to the last. One of her daughters saw her wrapped or mantled in a garment of white as she was dying. She slept—simply slept out of the weariness of earth-land into the restful beauties and glories of the summer-land.

A large audience assembled in Sturgis to show their respect to the departed, and their sympathy and esteem for the three sisters.

The day following this funeral we attended by request of the deceased the funeral of Mr. Fillmore, Mrs. Francis' brother, and nephew of the president. He had resided many years some sixteen miles from Sturgis. He was a sturdy, substantial farmer, an honest man, liberal and broad-minded in his religious convictions; he was bound to no creed and supported no orthodox church. The night previous to his departure he saw and welcomed his spirit sister and bid her good-bye. He also saw and exclaimed, "My mother, my dear mother." It was a beautiful unfoldment of clairvoyance. Thus trustingly, joyously do Liberalists and Spiritualists pass from the mists of earth to the sunlight of immortality.

J. M. PEEBLES, M. D.

The following remarks at the funeral of Mrs. Francis, made by Dr. Peebles, were reported by A. H. Green:

Life and death are but tremulous ripples upon the placid ocean of existence; and each in its term and time is equally beautiful. The world of spirits is real and substantial. We know our friends—know as we are known in spirit life. Human beings do not die because mythic Adam sinned in some mythic Eden, or because Bonaparte crossed the Alps, but because their bodies are physically organized; and it is an immutable law of nature, that all physically organized beings must in their time and turn become disorganized—earth to earth, dust to dust. And doubtless in the coming future cremation will be the method of transferring dust to its original dust.

The universe knows no loss. The physical portion of man re-appears in the grasses, the grains and the forest trees, while the more refined and ethereal essences of his higher nature enter the great multi-varied vortex of spirit substances to re-appear in higher and more spiritualized forms. The conscious spirit never dies. It is a potentialized portion of God, who is Spirit.

As fragrance flows from the blossoms, so spiritual elements constantly rise from the material world. The refined spiritual essences from this and other planetary worlds ascending into those vast ether regions, condense and gravitate, like purpling clouds fringed with gold, to their appropriate positions. These silver-edged strata, as arching zones stretching along the measureless blue above us, are not only too magnificent for description, but they are the homes of our loved ones in heaven.

The spiritual world, all bathed in the magnetic sunlight of an eternal morning, is no shadowy realm, but real and permanent—"a city that hath foundation, whose maker is God." There are forests, fields, mountains, valleys, groves, gardens, fruits, flowers, sparkling fountains, flowing rivers, pleasant grottos; immense libraries, palatial mansions with gorgeous domes, constellated and astral; cottages and princely palaces with tesselated floors, tapestried walls, diamond-pointed ceilings, and scenery of transcendent loveliness. Over the portals of each habitation is inscribed Purity. Spirits residing within these angelic homes begin to fathom the richness of true love—love such as glowed in the bosom of John when he leaned upon the tender bosom of the mediumistic Nazirene.

Human beings are not machines. They are thinking, reasoning moral agents, the architects of their own heavens or hells. There is no happiness for the wicked, the selfishly wicked, so long as they remain selfishly wilful and wicked. If sin, that is a violation of law, be eternal, so is punishment, as cause and effect; but the door of mercy and forgiveness is never shut. Human beings reap in this and doubtless all worlds what they have sown. Paul said that there was one glory of the sun, another of the moon and another of the stars, and the stars differed in glory, but they were still stars. The conditions of spirits differ in the future world. There are winter-lands of darkness over there, as well as evergreen summer-lands. Aye, there is mental anguish, and bitter, biting, galling remorse there for those who have violated nature's divine laws, and left earth's mental and moral duties undone. No one can get away from memory, his conscience, or himself. Each at death gravitates to his own place—his own sphere, but there is progress in those realms immortal—there is a law of evolution, of soul-unfoldment in all worlds. The lowest may rise to the angelic spheres, for God is good, and as the old inspired prophet said, "His tender mercies are over all his works."

Our loved ones who have left mortality are not dead. They are with us still. They come in trance, in dream, in apparition, in vision, materialization, transfiguration, and etherealization—they come and their coming demonstrates the glorious truth of Spiritualism.

The children of earth peopling the heavenly abodes of the hereafter, having passed through the disciplines of earth and the schoolings pertaining to the spirit spheres, are earnest and untiring in their spiritual activities. Remembering their lives on earth, deep and holy are their sympathies for humanity. Love never forgets. In the morning time and the gray of evening, down golden-tided rivers sail these ministering spirits of God to catch the incense of each soul-felt prayer. They come to impress and inspire. Their magnetisms are baptisms, their words the spirit echoes of eternal life. Blessed be spirit ministries.

None say in the summer-land of spirit life, "I tread the wine-press alone." The social law of harmonial relations is there fully realized. Congenial souls meet.

Those receptions of infants by matronly hands; those schools of tenderest discipline; those homes of mutual love embowered in roses; those palaces of art tinged with electric light, those cities of scientists, brotherhoods of philanthropists, and congresses of angels—all add to the beatific glories of life in those higher republics of heaven. Those among us with open vision, catching glimpses of landscapes and surpassingly beautiful scenery, often see and listen to the converse and musical words of the risen immortals.

"There is a world that few have seen,
That wasting time can ne'er destroy,
Where mortal footstep hath not been,
Nor ear hath caught its sounds of joy.

"It is all holy and serene—
The land of glory and repose;
And there, to dim the radiant scene,
No tear of sorrow ever flows.

"There forms unseen by mortal eye,
Too glorious for our sight to bear,
Are walking with their loved on high,
And waiting our arrival there."

THE GOLDEN GATE.

Celebration at San Francisco.

To the Editor:—We are in the midst of the biggest fan-farronade this coast ever put out of doors. According to the best of the knowledge and belief of the "oldest inhabitant," and the dawning ideas of the youngest born "Native Son," this state of climate and soil; of fruit and vine; of fertile mold and productive mine, is fifty years old, this 10th day of September, 1900.

It is deemed wise and honorable that this birthday shall be celebrated as no other has been. The business end of the affair is in charge of the "Native Sons of the Golden West," or cabalistically expressed, N. S. G. W.

While the celebration interests the whole of the people of the state, its materialization has taken on its greatest outward expression at San Francisco, par excellence the center most easily accessible. For about two miles along Market street, the principal business avenue of the city, the artistic sense and money of the men who have made California what she is, have been taxed to the utmost to express beauty, novelty and variety, through decoration. There are several other miles of decoration on other streets. The men who are behind all of this, are dreaming for their Queen, enthroned on the great sea of peace, of a day when there shall be no greater city bordering on the western ocean and it shall be the mightiest entrepot of the world.

Since the Chicago Exposition no attempt of decoration has been considered quite complete without the free use of electric light which was so freely and artistically used there, in all imaginable ways. From a central point, as far as the eye could reach, East and West, white and colored strings of light, pulsated and flashed in a broad mesh of bewildering splendor. For colors, both of the public and private work, where each man was a law unto himself, the red, white and blue were first; then came in all its gorgeous beauty, the flaming yellow of the state flower, the California poppy. Then in every possible posture was depicted the grizzly bear; the lone, mystic "Star of Empire;" and the fair virgin of the great seal of the state.

We know with what grizzly determination the forty-niners and others of the pioneers fought out the struggle which terminated in the admission of California to the sisterhood of states, with no stain of human chattelism on her flame-colored robes of eastern mysticism.

They followed the "Star of Empire," until it stood over the bay of the "Golden Gate." And it now waits until the three Magi of learning, refinement, brotherly unity and expression, shall have finished displaying their gifts to the "Native Son," who is to be the representative of the new race born in freedom and reared in a psychic maturity unknown elsewhere in the world.

When the hundredth anniversary is counted—ah what then?

This is a sample. There was a procession, it was worthy of the labor and thought bestowed upon all its particulars. The men who marched in it were sturdy and stalwart, and worthy representatives of the race that has already begun to develop here. But while, as a procession, it was a success, we cannot keep from our minds that "skeleton of the feast" that the men who manage and spend the money, ride in the barouches, and are silent. The men who paid the bills, walked and shouted. Then there was the crowd on the sidewalks, which is always an interesting study. Every care had been taken for the perfect policing of the streets. No unseemly interruption occurred. Many minor events of more or less importance have been crowded into these three days festa. But there comes to me by telepath, the reproachful voice of the editor, saying: "Your space is used up." To one who saw the three-quarters of a million of people at the Fair on Chicago Day, other crowds are tame. So I stop.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1900.

Galveston, Texas.—An Appeal.

To the Editor:—Permit me space to inform your readers of the condition of our society caused by the fearful disaster, Saturday, September 8. Of our faithful members, Mr. and Mrs. Tom Keats, Mrs. Eugina Bell, Mr. Paul Kurpan, Mrs. Augusta Falkenhagen and husband have passed beyond, and several others not heard from since the disaster. Many have lost their homes and are at the mercy of friends. Our speaker, Mr. John W. Ring, sustained severe loss of household belongings.

Like other similar societies we should sustain ourselves, and donations from individuals or organizations will be gladly received. Address John W. Ring, 2011 Avenue N½, Galveston, Tex.

Respectfully,
GEO. F. HANSELMAN, Sec.

Mr. John W. Ring writes from Galveston, under date of September 14:

We are not suffering for food, but those who have lost everything are certainly needy. The terrific hurricane, with a down-pour of water, blew from 4 to 10:30 p. m. Saturday, and Sunday dawned on death and destruction. many bodies from which souls had departed, many bleeding with wounds and grieving from loss of loved ones, and others with little or nothing—but we labor and trust.

Send your contributions—any amount you may feel moved to give, be it large or small—dollars, dimes or nickels—to John W. Ring, 2011 Avenue N½, Galveston, Texas. If you have no humanitarianism in your soul, you will not send a cent. We desire to "deluge" Mr. Ring with letters, but this kind of a deluge will not hurt him, but do him good.

This case appeals strongly to the humane feelings and sympathies of all Spiritualists, and we hope and trust that our forty thousand readers will respond with kindly liberality and generosity to supply in measure the needs of our Galveston friends. Their losses in loved ones cannot be restored in this present life; but much of the bitterness of their grief may be assuaged by generous tokens of practical sympathy and helpfulness, and the lives of donors and receivers will be made sweeter thereby.

A Good People to Let Alone.

That barbarian people, the Chinese, whom the missionaries are so anxious to Christianize, received from Confucius 500 years before our era, the Golden Rule, as rendered by him: "Do not to others what you would not wish others to do to you." The Catalogue in their four Imperial Libraries, classifies, and briefly describes, 93,000 volumes, and that catalogue of itself fills 200 volumes. The ignorance of the West has attempted to disparage the value of that vast collection of literature, yet Abbe Remsaut, reported to have been deeply versed in Chinese lore, wrote enthusiastically regarding their charm, saying, according to the September "Success," "he found in them eloquence and poetry, enriched by the beauty of a picturesque language preserving to imagination all its colors."

A people so ancient, with such a language and such a literature, with education almost universal, there being very few adults among them who cannot read and write; who have been blessed with newspapers for more than a thousand years; who gave to the West many of its most valued arts; who have never thrust themselves or their religion on the outside world, but have attended strictly to their own business, and looked after their own people; who have never asked foreigners for their religion, and have no use for it, having one better adapted to their needs than is any outside religion—they are a good people to let alone. Missionaries are not wanted among them, as has very lately been conclusively proved by arguments impossible to resist.

While missionaries remain away from China they will not be disturbed in person or estate. Intruding themselves where they are not wanted they are liable to meet just such a reception as Christians have delighted to give heretical sects in our own country, for instance, to Baptists and Quakers in New England, and to Mormons everywhere.

The Grave the Gateway to Life.

For eleven continuous years we have quoted the experience and observation of investigators in every part of the globe, regarding communications they have received from professedly the spirit world. Time, persons and places have very generally been given. Opportunities for exposure of fraud and deceptions have been open to all. There has been no attempt to conceal trickery, to bolster misrepresentation, or exaggerate facts. Truth, pure and simple, has been given as we have received it.

These varied statements, coming from such widely separated sources, all harmonizing in general statements, seem to establish conclusively that there is no death; that what we call death is an awakening into another state of being, a laying aside of the mortal, and the putting on of the immortal. Is there any other fact in nature better established, or offering more satisfactory evidence as to its general truth than that established by the multitude of witnesses we have introduced from time to time, all corroborating each other confirming the great truths proclaimed by Spiritualists?

Our witnesses did not live in a remote age. Their character for integrity is well known. Their means of observation are not questionable; neither is their ability to comprehend the great issues involved in doubt. Collusion has been impossible. These are all important factors when searching for the truth, and are quite unlike that the clergy offer in support of their claims. These columns have ever been open to expose any chicanery or deceit practiced by mediums, or false coloring on the part of reporters.

With these facts what conclusion other than the one to which we have arrived can be reached?

If a thousandth part of as much evidence could be brought to support the divine origin of the so-called Holy Scriptures is it probable there would be a skeptic in the world?

Instead of logic and argument in support of the Spiritual faith, or trying to frighten the timid into its acceptance by threats of endless woe, or bribing the avaricious into belief with promise of a far-off heaven, we have been content to narrate simple facts, leaving each reader free to receive those facts or reject them, as his judgment shall dictate.

Different minds will place different value on evidence, but he who has read intelligently the facts given in these pages must have come to the conclusion of The Progressive Thinker that the grave is but the gateway to life.

For an Orthodox Reader.

God's awful displeasure, because of the wickedness of man, was lately apparent along the Gulf and the Atlantic coast and far inland. Some overwhelming wickedness which could not be appeased by prayer or praise, set the currents of air in motion, and rolled great ocean waves upon the islands and coast, prostrating everything in its path. Galveston being central in its track, and its inhabitants possibly the greatest sinners accessible to Almighty vengeance, was almost entirely blotted from existence. It is variously estimated that from 5,000 to 10,000 people perished, while the remainder of the population are left homeless, destitute of food or clothing and exposed to inclement skies. The houses, places of business, churches, and public buildings by thousands went down and mingled in a common ruin. Other towns and cities along the coast were visited and experienced God's ire, though in a lesser degree.

Sodom and Gomorrah, we are told in sacred history, were visited by an angry God, because ten righteous persons could not be found therein, so he rained down fire and brimstone out of heaven upon them, and swept all from the earth save righteous Lot and his two lovely daughters whom he instructed to flee.

Instead of "fire and brimstone," in the case of Galveston, the Lord used wind and water, and thus taught a rebellious people that they must serve him, and heed his inspired teaching, as proclaimed from orthodox pulpits, else take the painful consequences. "Unless ye repent ye shall all likewise perish."

Thus, in good orthodox style, the reader is furnished with a distressing account of one of those meteorological incidents common to the world in all ages. A torrid sun heats up the plain. The air being rarefied, rises, and the denser air rushes in to supply the partial vacuum. The waters of the ocean are driven before, and uplifted by the impelling gale. They are dashed upon the coast, roll over the islands, bear down and demolish any object in their path. Men, women, children, animals, great buildings, a city, are no more than straws in the storm's resistless march. All are overwhelmed, borne down, crushed. A lunatic priest may hear in the roar of contending elements, and the clashing of waves, the laugh of an infuriated God; but science teaches that wind, and flood, and desolation, and death, are but effects of causes inherent in matter, which no God can turn aside, which angels cannot avert, which are as natural as the rising sun or its gilded setting.

The End Not Yet.

The last advices from China as we write, represent the Boxers still warring on the missionaries. The hostility seems specially directed against the Catholics, who by reason of their extravagant claims have made themselves very obnoxious to the Celestials. The Apostolic Vicarate in South Shan-Si has been completely destroyed, including all the churches; the Christians have been driven away, and their houses have been burned. In the provincial capital, Tai-Yuan-Fu, which is the seat of the bishop of North Shan-Si, the Catholic orphanage, with 300 or more orphans has been burned.

The Boxers are massing in large bodies to continue the war. It is thought to be their purpose to cut off communication of the allied forces at Pekin with Tientsin.

Prompt Assistance.

We own to honest pride in Chicago because of her generous and prompt aid of Galveston in her great distress. A relief train of seventeen freight cars filled with provisions, clothing and necessaries for the suffering people, left the city on the evening of the 13th inst., by through and fast line, whilst large sums of money were made subject to draft by telegraph. Our people know by sad experience the need of quick assistance in those overwhelming calamities which destroy great cities, or lay waste a country, hence their promptness in action.

A Collision Seems Inevitable.

Great interest is felt in the current news from Italy, because on it hinges important events in the religious world, as well as national complications. The death of King Humbert, some two months ago, at the hands of an assassin, and the enthronement of his son, Victor Emmanuel III, suddenly changed the ordinary current of affairs in what was originally the seat of the old Roman empire.

For many centuries the Supreme Pontiff swayed the destinies of Rome, as he did all Christendom, and as had his predecessors from the days of Numa, near 700 years before the Christian era. The title remains unchanged as do the duties of the office. He was the head and the front of all authority, civil and ecclesiastical, however professedly exercised by others. Pretending to voice the will of God there was no appeal from his dictation. Life and death were virtually in his hands, and kings of subordinate provinces were slaves to his caprice.

The whole course of human affairs throughout the Roman empire was directed by the Popes. Kingdoms were abridged, enlarged, or suppressed at their will; and history, both civil and ecclesiastical, was written and published in their interest, while anything not satisfactory was suppressed. Creeds were fashioned by their retainers to conform to their requirements, and anathemas were promulgated against anything objectionable.

This condition continued without interruption until the Reformation in the 16th century, when the Pope was shorn of much of his authority; but it continued in full force in Italy until Louis Napoleon was defeated at Sedan, in 1870, and United Italy soon came to the front. It was then, while Pius IX was in the papal chair, the authority of the Pope was greatly lessened in Italy and was mostly limited to the Vatican. Prior to this event the King of Italy had little authority outside of Sardinia; though in 1860 Central Italy was ostensibly annexed to his dominions. With the downfall of the French Empire in 1870, Victor Emmanuel II, entered Rome at the head of his victorious army, since which Italy has been subject to the new dynasty, the Pope having only ecclesiastical authority, and claiming to be only a prisoner in the Vatican.

Victor Emmanuel II died in 1878, as did Pope Pius IX. The latter was succeeded by Leo XIII, the present Pope; and the king's son, Humbert, lately assassinated, succeeded to the crown. King Humbert possessed many virtues, and was quite liberal in his views, still he was a churchman, and seemed unwilling to place himself in any position farther than was absolutely necessary hostile to the head of the church.

Pope Leo is ambitious to regain lost power. The hand of the late assassin seemed to favor him. He refuses to acknowledge Victor Emmanuel as King of Italy, only of Sardinia. He even refused to allow the prayer of Queen Marguerite, for the repose of her dead husband's soul, to be repeated in the churches.

Unlike his father, the new King does not seem in sympathy with the church. He was opposed by the Vatican at the time of his marriage, and the refusal to allow the repeating of his mother's prayer has intensified his hate against the Pope, in which hate it is reported the new Queen sympathizes. He is reputed to be an Agnostic, at any rate a Freethinker; and as such, with the conservative element of Italy with him, it is safe to predict Catholicism will gain nothing by the change of rulers, but the world may gain much.

It is believed a collision between the Vatican and the Quirinal is inevitable. If so each power will be largely assisted by outside parties, and it may ultimate in driving the Pope, with all his appendages, from Rome. It is clear there can be no lasting peace between the conflicting authorities, and one or the other must go under. The contest will be between medieval barbarism and modern civilization; between Ignorance and its twin sister, Superstition, and advanced knowledge; between progress and the growth of all the virtues, or their retrograde under the influence of an intriguing, corrupt and debasing priesthood, whose stock in trade is the musty and putrid cast-off swaddling clothes of old-time Paganism.

Annihilation an Intolerable Thought.

"Believing, as I do, that man in the distant future will be a far more perfected creature than he now is, it is an intolerable thought that he and all other sentient beings are doomed to complete annihilation after such long-continued progress."

Such were the words of that profound naturalist, Charles Darwin, whose name and teaching are familiar to every scholar the wide world over. He had seen man in his natural state, a savage, absolutely naked, with long, tangled hair, frothing at the mouth under excitement, wild, startled and distrustful, destitute of all art, living like wild animals; offering bloody sacrifices to imaginary gods, killing their own children at will and making slaves of the mothers. There were the Terra del Fuegians, before they were almost annihilated in a feeble attempt to Christianize them. Then Darwin looked forward into the great future and saw man in his highest development, far transcending the God of the Middle Ages in all the qualities which characterize the most perfect of beings. It was then an "intolerable thought" that the race, as well as the individual, are doomed to "complete annihilation."

Darwin was correct. Annihilation is impossible. Progression is eternal. The worn-out body, the casement of the soul in its early stage of being, dies; but the animating spirit developed in that body knows no cessation or decay. It lives on, a conscious individual existence, coeternal with matter itself, and capable of noting all the transmutations of that matter from sublimated ether to flinty rock, and thence again by abrasions, decomposition, and chemical action, to atoms so minute as to be invisible to the eye aided by the most powerful microscopes, and yet fitted for conversion into spirit, to which, with the poet Cotton, of 250 years ago:

"We are near allied
To angels on our better side.
How various e'er their ranks or kinds,
Angels are but unbodied minds:
When the partition walls decay,
Men emerge angels from their clay.
Yes, when the frailer body dies,
The soul asserts her kindred skies."

GIRL'S SPIRIT RULES A BIRD ONCE WILD.

NEW HAMPSHIRE FOLK ARE AWED BY THE ACTIONS OF A PARTRIDGE—INHABITS A CEMETERY—FOLLOWS THE DECEDENTS FATHER IN HIS DAILY TOIL LIKE A LOVING CHILD.

Strafford, N. H., Sept. 15, 1900.—The sleepy old town of Strafford, lying far back in the New Hampshire hills, remote from railroads and rarely visited by the stranger from the outside world except in summer time, when the vacationist seeks the tonic of its wind-swept hills, has, as set forth in the New York Journal, a sensation in the supposed spirit manifestation of the strangest kind that ever disturbed the peace of man.

A simple bird, a wood partridge, by its phenomenal actions has led the people for miles around to believe that it is ruled by the spirit of the dead and the other half to shake their heads in wonder at that which they cannot understand.

The bird appears only in the vicinity of a lonely burying ground, the tiny, private cemetery of the family on whose ancestral farm it is located and where a beautiful girl was laid to rest a few months ago. Those of the neighbors who speak their thoughts openly declare that her soul has been transmigrated to the humble body of the bird that she may come back to earth and be near her loved ones.

Vina Garland, the young woman whose sad death is so much talked about to-day, was of a character distinctly apart from that of the ordinary country girl. She was the daughter of Charles Garland, a well-to-do farmer, and though she was physically somewhat frail, she developed a tender beauty that increased as she advanced in years toward womanhood.

But it was her intellectual attainments that made her most remarkable. From the days when, a little tot, she followed her father to his work in the fields, she showed a tendency to observation and study that surprised her elders, and when, later on, she took her books to the little country school of her district, she early made such progress as to set her far ahead of her schoolmates.

A TEACHER AT EIGHTEEN.

At the age when other girls were plodding through the intermediate grades she was teaching, and at the age of eighteen she was made an assistant in the staid old Northwood Seminary, of which Professor Loren G. Williams is principal.

Alas! the career that began with such promise was but short. The duties of the position so far beyond her years proved too arduous for the young teacher, and her health, never robust, gradually declined. She was taken ill and was brought back to the old home, never to leave it again in life.

All the countryside turned out to her funeral, and many eyes were wet with tears as they looked for the last time on the sweet face that rested so peacefully in the flower-lined casket. She was buried as her fathers had been before her for generations, back in the little walled-in yard that lay with its mossy headstones and overhanging trees on the hill above her childhood home.

Several weeks had passed after the young teacher's death when the mysterious bird made its appearance. Farmer Garland was at work one day plying with his team between the farmhouse and a field that lay a short distance above the cemetery, when he was astonished, as he was passing the spot where his daughter was buried, to see a full-grown partridge suddenly appear in front of his horses.

At first Mr. Garland thought it was a mother bird defending her young, and remembering how fond his lost daughter was of the wild birds that lived about her home he tried to scare it away from its dangerous proximity to the horses' hoofs. But the partridge seemed utterly devoid of fear, and when the driver sprang to the ground it stopped with a strangely appealing air, as if waiting for him to come to it. It even allowed him to push it boldly from the path.

BIRD FOLLOWS HIS STEPS.

Wondering at its strange actions of which the farmer, in his long experience in woodcraft and in country life, had never heard the like, he mounted his cart and proceeded on to the field. The bird followed along beside his team like a dog, and when he started to return it still kept beside his horses. But when it arrived back near the burying ground it left him as suddenly as it had first appeared.

Mr. Garland returned shortly with a second load and again the bird appeared and accompanied him to the field and back as before. All day it followed him to and fro, and when night came the farmer, who had been impressed to the point of nervousness by the bird's strange actions, went back alone to the spot where it had shown itself.

Instantly it appeared and the farmer, seating himself on the grass, called softly to it. As readily as if it had always known his voice, the bird responded, and walking to his side, hopped to his knee.

On the instant the man felt a strange thrill shoot over him—a peculiar feeling such as he had never known before. It was not a faintness, but it seemed as if some mystical influence was holding him in a spell. He threw out one hand to support himself, and had just strength enough to raise the other and say "Come."

Unhesitatingly the bird stepped on his hand, and brushing its beak softly on his wrist, uttered a low note that sounded to his strained senses like a wail of suffering.

Putting the bird from him with trembling hands, the farmer hastily arose and returned to his home.

STRANGE STORY AWES A NEIGHBORHOOD.

The strange story soon spread about the neighborhood and created a profound sensation. In this section the partridge is one of the shyest of birds, and a tame partridge was before unheard of. No one would believe the facts until they had seen the partridge for themselves and had seen Mr. Garland fondle it as he would a kitten.

Ever since the day when it first appeared the bird has been a part of the farmer's daily life. He has visited it constantly and has never tired of showing it to visitors. No matter how busy he may be when a stranger calls and asks about the mysterious bird he will lay everything else aside and lead the visitor to the spot where it is always found.

The presence of strangers never seems to have any effect on the partridge. It regards them with apparent indifference, but with any member of the Garland family it displays an affection that is unmistakable.

The theory of a supernatural agency spread rapidly from the first. While many of the staid country folk were reluctant to admit their own belief they whispered the suggestion to others and it needed but a touch of confidence for many to express their downright conviction. It was the more readily accepted, because the cemetery on the Garland place had once before been reputed to be haunted.

Summer visitors of past years who had expressed an interest in the romantic spot had been warned of a white-robed figure that flitted amid the headstones when night was on, and these tales were revived with others of a like nature.

BELIEVE IT'S THE GIRL'S SPIRIT.

That Vina Garland's spirit is striving to communicate with the loved ones left behind is believed by many. They say that the young teacher had some message for her parents before she died, but was taken away so quickly that she did not deliver it and is endeavoring through the bird, in some way not understood, to make it known.

Many believe that her spirit actually inhabits the bird and with superstitious fear refuse to touch it or approach it closely.

"It is Vina Garland," they say, "and it brings no good to meddle with the dead."

Odd Delusions and Hypnotism.

In September, 1898, John D. Quackenbos, of Columbia University, was consulted by a lady who was tormented by the constant thought that she was going insane. Although there were positively no symptoms of insanity and no reasons whatever for its occurrence, the patient could not be convinced that her suspicions were unfounded.

She was accordingly hypnotized and told emphatically that she was not insane, could not become insane, but was entering upon the happiest period of her married life; and she was assured that she would find a pleasure in existence that she had not known before. From that date to this the delusion has never returned.

A most interesting case, in which the whole bent of thought gave way to a single treatment, was that of a gentleman with the following history:

He was born, by reason of some prenatal impression, with a horror of a mutilated face. He married a beautiful, spiritually-minded woman and was accustomed to contemplate her comeliness with pleasure.

Eighteen months ago the lady met with an accident which scarred her face, and although he had consulted the leading surgeons and electricians none was able to repair the damage to his satisfaction, and he had become a monomaniac on the subject.

Whenever he looked into a woman's face he saw his wife's blemished features before him. When he attempted to read, his wife's disfigured face came between him and the book. He walked the streets at night trying to rid himself of the abnormal idea, and finally he fled from his wife's side in the hope that separation might put an end to his sufferings.

But wherever he went and whatever he did the painful apparition of that bruised face would dog him; his mental powers were beginning to flag, his memory to fail, and he finally applied to Mr. Quackenbos for relief through hypnotic channels.

Mr. Quackenbos asked at once to see his wife and when she came to his office he found that the defect was grossly exaggerated. The husband was hypnotized and the destructive suggestion given that his wife's face was not marred—that he would no longer see it in a state of mutilation.

The constructive suggestion minimized the importance of the physical condition and emphasized the beauty of character, and the husband was directed to love exclusively the moral and intellectual perfections of his wife.

He was told that she could appreciate such love as few women could (not an exaggeration); that he was greatly blessed in his union with a woman of such superior mental parts, and he was assured that he would be happy with her as never before, because his happiness would henceforth be based on a more exalted regard than mere admiration of physical charms.

Three days later the patient stated that he had found a new and unexpected pleasure in companionship with his wife; that the disfigured face no longer haunted him, and that he was happier than he had been for years.

It is not unusual for nervously depressed subjects to imagine that they have incurred the enmity of some one who is pursuing them with demoniacal intent or to figure as the victims of morbid and sometimes laughable fears.

An engineer, otherwise rational, told Mr. Quackenbos that his left eye was affected as the result of a slight injury received three years ago and he believed that he was going to be blind, although assured by oculists that his eyes were normal and his vision was perfect.

It was his habit to carry a vest-pocket mirror with which to examine the suspected pupil at every convenient opportunity.

"Without my mirror," he said, "I could not attend to my business, and if deprived of it for a length of time I should go insane." A single treatment removed the delusion.

A man now under Mr. Quackenbos' care has for years been afraid that some calamity will befall him if left alone and hence refuses to allow his wife to go out of his sight. He follows her about like a timorous child, and as a result has wrecked his own business and hers.

A not infrequent accompaniment of nervous prostration is the hearing of sinister voices that bid the commission of horrifying acts, call vile names as through a mental telephone, dictate terrifying messages or doom to a wretched death.

Hallucinations of hearing, if allowed to persist, tend ultimately to become ineradicable. A nervous woman recently found her way to Mr. Quackenbos' office pursued by audible voices of imaginary persecutors calling in her ears, "You are a sirloin steak! You are a sirloin steak!" The Sleight-of-hand Performer.

He is abroad in the land. He works the semi-idiots, the careless thinker, and the soft-brained investigator of spiritual phenomena. He has been in the field ever since the advent of Modern Spiritualism. He (or she) is in Chicago to-day, practicing on the gullible. He is in every city in the United States. The Cleveland (Ohio) World has the following:

Henri La Monte, clairvoyant, of Prospect street, was fined $75 and costs in police court Saturday morning, because he operated in the city without a license.

Had it not been for the fact that his beautiful wife and babe were in court at the time he would probably have been given a workhouse sentence.

La Monte was arrested by Detectives Schmunk and DeCelle Friday afternoon on charges of petit larceny and operating without a license.

His arrest was brought about by Mrs. Charles Wiebusch of 30 Hopkins avenue, Lakewood.

A few days ago Wiebusch consulted La Monte on some very important matters. He has been ill for some time, and among the questions he asked were the following:

"How can I get well? How and where should I go to regain my health? How can I make the most money? Will it be profitable for me to sell my house? Will my daughter make a rich marriage?"

To all of these questions La Monte made replies, and among them was one to the effect that instead of selling his house, he should mortgage it, get the money in $100 bills, place it in a bag and then come to see him again.

He said he would place it over Wiebusch's heart and that it would be doubled in no time.

When the victim told his wife that he was going to mortgage his home she thought differently about the matter.

"Where did you get that advice and how much did you pay for it?" demanded the wife.

He told her that it had cost him $5 and also who had given it.

Husband and wife then went to La Monte's place, where the clairvoyant agreed to submit to a test.

He told Mrs. Wiebusch to write her questions on a piece of paper and place it on top of his head.

There he agreed to read it while in a trance. Mrs. Wiebusch detected him in the act of attempting to palm the questions and substitute another piece of paper, however, and there was a scene.

La Monte hung on to the $5 paid him, however, and Friday Mrs. Wiebusch secured the warrant for the arrest of the clairvoyant.

Judge Kennedy took little stock in the petit larceny case and nolled it, but dealt severely with La Monte in the other case.

LaMonte's wife, who is a tall and beautiful blonde, was in court during the trial of the case. With her was their baby. When La Monte was fined quite a scene followed. Mrs. La Monte shed bitter tears and her husband placed his arms around her and kissed her repeatedly.

Judge Kennedy refused to lessen the fine, however. Mrs. La Monte then passed the baby over to her husband while she started out to get the amount of the fine.

LaMonte didn't want to go to prison, but Court Officer Eli Potts refused to stay in the court room with him until his wife came back, so the clairvoyant and his baby were forced to go to prison.

His wife, however, secured the amount of the fine very quickly, and in five minutes her husband was out of jail.

The Logic of Silence.

A religion that is worth anything must have its foundation in natural law. It must be sustained by logic and confirmed by facts. The thinker will find a multitude of arguments in its support, and disputants will delight in meeting opponents on the rostrum in defence of what he conceives heaven-taught truths.

Did the reader ever stop to think about it? No churchman, however well educated will meet a heretic, an Agnostic, or a Spiritualist in fair debate. "Admit that God is God, that Jesus Christ is his son identical with the Father; that he was virgin-born; and that the Bible is the infallible word of God, faultless in all its parts, then we will discuss issues with you, but until then we will remain silent."

Admit all the points which are at issue between the believer and the unbeliever, concede every point claimed, then the theologian will clinch his argument with thus saith the Lord." And that he calls logic.

The very few who have had the courage to meet thinkers in debate have played buffoons, else the traducer, and have substituted the logic of the fish market, or threatened his opponent with eternal tortures for daring to entertain an opinion adverse to the pulpit pounder.

Students Invoke Spirits' Aid.

Here's a new idea for students wrestling with their "exams." Just call up a medium and learn what the questions are to be, says the New York Press.

The extreme accuracy of the work of same of the candidates at the final examination held in the gymnasium, in Kampen Holland, aroused the suspicion of the examiners. Inquiries were made which brought to light the curious story:

At a whist party, where several of the students were present, the suggestion was made to hold a Spiritualistic seance, and further to ask through the medium of the table dance what work would be set at the examination. This was done, and the table dance responded somewhat ambiguously, giving first Thucidides liber 7, caput 73, and lated on liber 5, caput 14.

Some of the students present superstitiously prepared these portions of Thucydides, and when the examination took place they were gratefully surprised to find that the first mentioned portion was actually given as part of their work.

Strange to relate, the examination paper contained a mistake, namely, the omission of the word "eidor," but the students who had learned their parts by heart, not noticing the omission, translated the missing word. Comparison later on by the examiners led to the discovery of this fact, and hence their suspicions were aroused.

The students were interrogated, they stated their case, and mentioned that they had prepared the two portions mentioned by the table dance among their other work, although they could not remember what the second portion was, which had been so indicated to them. It was therefore decided to set them a fresh paper. But stranger than ever, when they got their second paper they found it was the portion from book 5, which the table had also given.

MOSES HULL.

His Good Work at Wheaton, Minn.

To the Editor:—Our people have been enjoying such a treat as rarely comes in a single life-time. We have a small and young, but very energetic society here. When we heard that Moses Hull, that "Boanerges" of Modern Spiritualism, could be induced to stop off on his way to British Columbia, we immediately secured him for five lectures. Although the lectures were not so largely attended as we could have wished, one would go a great way before he would find a more intelligent or appreciative audience. Mr. Hull has done the cause much good here, and we were all sorry when the last lecture was delivered. We are acquainted with but very few of our noble Spiritualist lecturers, but I doubt whether there is another one who handles either the Bible or Spiritualism as Mr. Hull does.

His first lecture was on that important question asked by Pilate, "What is Truth?" He showed that truth is progressive, at least in its development; that whether or not each individual was inspired, every age had its inspiration; that the inspiration of one age was not sufficient for another. He would as soon think of living on the food eaten by Moses, Jesus or Paul of old as to think of living on their inspiration. Each age has all the inspiration it is capable of receiving or appropriating. There have been men in every age and dispensation inspired to tell more truth than the age could receive. Jesus even did not tell all the truth he wanted to impart; he said, "I have many things to say, but ye cannot bear them." Paul was compelled to feed some of his friends on milk because they were not yet able to bear strong meat.

Mr. Hull claimed that Bibles are not inspired, only that which breathes and thinks can be inspired. Inspiration comes to men, women and children, but not to books. Men and women can put into books some of that which comes to them inspirationally, but the inspiration itself can never go into a book.

It was next argued that God did not abandon all the world except a few Jews, other nations had their sacred books, all of which contained sacred truths—jewels worthy of a setting in frames of gold.

In conclusion Mr. Hull showed how Spiritualists can use the Bible. The Bible was not a weapon to be taken from the enemy and spiked, but to be taken and turned against them; it is our most effective weapon, not only of defence against the orthodoxy of to-day, but of offense. We can find no better weapons of warfare, no better ammunition than the Bible turned against those who in a certain sense make a fetish of it.

Several important texts were taken from orthodoxy as an illustration of how the whole Bible could be used as a Gatling gun to put the old church theories and theologians alike to flight. This discourse was listened to with the most intense interest, as were all the others.

The second discourse was on "The Resurrection of Jesus, in the Light of Modern Spiritualism." I am sure that before he got through this discourse all saw the resurrection of Jesus in a new light, a light which made a perfect parallel between the stories of the resurrection of Jesus and the phenomena to be now met almost anywhere.

The resolution upon which he based his remarks on this occasion was as follows: Resolved, That the evidences of Modern Spiritualism are the same in kind as those by which the apostles undertook to prove that phenomenon which is commonly called the resurrection of Jesus." That this resolution was proved beyond a doubt was evident to the entire audience.

Next Mr. Hull discoursed on the comparison between Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. In this discourse Mr. Hull not only strengthened the Spiritualists in their Spiritualism, but he made the Bible appear to some of us as a new book. He seemed to have it all at his tongue's end; and somehow he so dovetailed the Bible and Spiritualism together that it seemed impossible to separate them. If he told a story in Modern Spiritualism which seemed entirely too large for his audience to believe, he always followed it immediately with a bigger Bible story—one that they did believe. The audience was then kindly invited to separate the two, to give some reason for believing the latter which would not apply to the former. The talk on angels apparently made his audience see the angels in every nook, corner and cranny; we could not look where they were not; more than that, these angels were always ready with helping hands to assist in every time of need. These angels, it was proved, were none other than our friends whom we call dead.

The last and best discourse was on "The Moral Tendency of Modern Spiritualism." In this discourse it was shown that Spiritualism appeals to the best there is in the nature of every man and woman; that it cultivates the angel nature and makes men and women better. It was shown that the phenomena and the philosophy alike were elevating in their tendency. We have here tried to give in briefest outline what would take many pages of The Progressive Thinker to reproduce entire.

Mr. Hull was asked to return this winter when everybody could listen to him, but he stated that his work in Buffalo would not admit of his leaving that city. He left us all feeling that we were better, wiser and happier men and women for having listened to these five discourses.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates will lecture for our society here the latter part of October next. We are trying hard to have the light from the unseen realms shine into all the souls that are ready to receive it. It is hard work, brothers and sisters of this grand cause; but have not reformers in all ages been persecuted? Let us not falter nor cow down before our persecutors, but stand erect, face to face, and return good for evil. Practice what we preach. Then "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The Popular Acclaim.

Right Hon. Sir George Goldie, of England, lately expressed some radical views on Chinese matters worthy of consideration. He said in substance:

"Christian missions are unnecessary in China, because China has as high a code of ethics as has Christendom, and does not require our assistance in the moral domain. We have a good deal to teach China in the art of war, in pure science, and in those mechanical and other arts which have developed with such leaps and bounds in the Western World during the nineteenth century; but religiously and morally, the Chinese are a very good people, and our attempt to introduce Christianity into the Celestial empire is only a waste of time."

And so say we all.

Fads of Materialistic Philosophers, by Sar'gis

To the Editor:—One of the results of the electric arc-light has been a revelation of insect life, heretofore unknown and unsuspected. So dense are the swarms of these hitherto unknown moth-like denizens of the night air that the light is often obscured almost to uselessness. In the field of new ideas, thought and knowledge similar things have followed, and the moths of mental inertia often obscure the new light by their obstructive interference.

In respect to Spiritualism this has been markedly the fact. There seems to be a class or mass of minds that cannot grasp a spiritual concept, to whom the term spirit is a blank. To this order of mentality the idea that intelligence can exist separate from a material body is not intelligible. And so it is we have such people as "scientific Spiritualists," who prove the existence of spirit by subjecting mediums to rope-tying, handcuffs, surgeons' plaster over their mouths, eyes bandaged, noses plugged up, and other sweat-box devices borrowed from the police-detective experts on the one hand, and a wordy set of sciolists and quacks on the other. And having done everything that a morbid ingenuity could devise to obstruct and cripple the instrument, exultingly proclaim the results as the vindication of their ignorant misconceptions—a set of so-called thinkers who cannot think what they assume to explain.

This class has injected into our literature a nomenclature that is not only confusing, but is unspiritual and discordant. And the entire vocabulary is but the coinage of those who do not and cannot think spirit, but must account for all our phenomena on other grounds.

This effort began with the toe-and-knee-joint snapping,' then to "unconscious cerebration," "thought transference," "telepathy," the "sub-conscious self," the "subliminal intelligence," and so on, and supplemented by borrowings from the "objective" and "subjective," "vibration," the "ego," etc., etc. All of which are merely glossology of smattering.

This line of comment has been suggested by an attack on the position of the Psychical Research Society and its experiments with Mrs. Piper, by that arch confounder of hypothetics and words, Thomas Jay Hudson, D. D., in Harper for August last. It is not the purpose to here review the paper in question, only to call the attention of Spiritualists incidentally to the folly of pandering to the so-called scientific world in the verification or the endorsement of spirit phenomena. But it will repay the sober-minded student the price of the August Harper, to read Hudson's paper as a mere mental curiosity, and to the instructed Spiritualist be fun alive. Not only the profound ignorance of the writer as to the range of phenomena and the difference in mediumship and mediums, but in the assumptions made as predicates or premises, it is one of the curiosities of this "subjective" subject.

He takes the one sole phase of trance, and from its manifestations decides the entire case. The "laws of suggestion," he postulates as the explanation of all trance manifestations. That is: The sitter's thought suggests the message to the sub-consciousness of the medium, and this sub-conscious self of the medium embodies it as a message from the dead party. But as the entranced medium often speaks of things not known to the sitter or the medium, afterward verified as fact, to meet this Mr. Hudson considers telepathy to the third attenuation as the solution, and calls it "telepathy a trois"—or in common speech, a third person, not present at the seance, is in suggestive connection with the sitter, and thus reaches the sub-consciousness of the medium. Here is his own illustration: At a seance in Washington in which the psychic was a hypnotized subject, a gentleman from New Orleans—almost a total stranger—happened to be present, and in the course of the evening asked the telepathist to describe his home in New Orleans. The description was made perfect as to all the inmates of the house, and everything except the parlor, which was said "to be all wrong"—carpet, furniture, piano and everything different—the piano described as an upright, the gentleman saying it was an old-fashioned square. On arriving at home he wrote back that the telepathist was right, his wife to surprise him had in his absence changed all in his parlor to new and "substituting an upright for the old square piano." Whereupon Mr. Hudson says it was a case of "telepathy a trois"—and asks triumphantly, if it was not, "will any Spiritist tell me just what it was"—the method being that the husband and wife were en rapport,, and that the telepathist "read all this in the subjective mind of the husband." There it is just as written down by this world-resounded philosopher of the sub-conscious. And after this luminous coruscation he tells us that the "spirits were out of the question * * and the hypnotist and his psychic were neither of them Spiritists."

Here again is another illustration of the supreme stolidity of this school. The man actually assumes that to have an exercise of spirit force or a phenomenal demonstration by spirit, the people present must be self-confessed Spiritists—or that the mental state of the spectator determines the fact of spirit presence. But where is his "law of suggestion" in this case? Every element of logic is violated by the conclusion of his story. If the sub-conscious psychic drew all but the parlor from the conscious mind of the New Orleans gentleman, why not the whole picture as it was in his mind? And when he "suggested" a flat contradiction of the piano, how could the unconscious sub-consciousness of the wife set up another picture or suggestion to his sub-consciousness to be repeated in a contradiction to his consciousness—"read by the psychic" in his sub-conscious mind? All this may not be very clear to the plain-minded people, but that fact, by the new school, only serves to emphasize its soundness and its philosophic correctness. The more you can manage how to say it, the higher your grade in the science of the sub-conscious. It is submitted the thing has been explained. Or to come back to ordinary speech: Does the law of suggestion deal with one part in a mind and reject another—when the mind suggesting insists on the whole as it actually was? Yet this man Hudson insists that he is reasoning.

The critic might ask, how did the wife's thoughts get there? Suppose she was enrapport with the husband? If so her suggestion would have by simple telepathy or thought transference made him see the parlor as she had changed it, but such was not the fact. It must have been some other way—hence Hudson's invocation of three times three sub-conscious suggestions by contradiction of three conscious conditions—that it required a return to New Orleans and a letter of explanation to arouse his sub-consciousness to a flat contradiction of his consciousness at the seance—and thus deliver to us this oracular assault on human consciousness from the evidence of our objective selves—if this con amore explanation only explains.

An everyday Spiritualist would say that to so describe a parlor in New Orleans as to contradict the owner's statement made in Washington could readily be done by a spirit intelligence present and cognizant of the facts, and that in no other way could it be so understandingly accounted for. But spiritual things must by these scientific people be materially explained. And this brings to memory an old-time condition of things when the law of suggestion in the third degree was an affair of wide and earnest consideration, and then as now as mysteriously occult. The task here will be to make this "telepathy a trois" clear as possible to the reader unskilled in these so-called thinking dialects. And by the way one of the suggestive things in all this suggestion by law is that its professors think they are thinking—as the article in August Harper so excruciatingly illustrates.

In the early days of the development of the great West, from 1849 to the completion of the railways to the Pacific coast, that region was the arena of many strange things and peculiar people. One feature has been immortalized in the story of Ah Sin, in the Heathen Chinee. But he was not alone. The "telepathic three" recalls other trinities—"three card monte" and the "three cups"—games of almost infinite occult possibilities.

"Un, deux, trois"—what memories this cabalistic refrain brings back. In these, as in the Hudson puzzle, the thing was to tell in which of the three lay the governing suggestion. Such "psychics" as Ah Sin and Canada Bill were equal to the mystification of both sitter and spectator as to the exact locality of the "little joker," as the terminology of the time described the thing to bet on. But while this was the objective or conscious part of the seance, the coin of the realm was the real thing in the sub-consciousness of the psychic. History and tradition are both replete with reminiscences of the "telepathic rapport" of these professors with this suggested coin in the pocket of the "tenderfoot" sitter. Like the poor deluded Spiritualist the tenderfoot looked upon the rustic psychic personified by Canada Bill as a partner in a "square game," and even to this day has not lost all the glamor of that professor's presence, but still ascribe his losses to the ignorance of the law of telepathic suggestion which the "pard" of Bill so occultly exercised over the result. As Prof. Hudson says, "We have no logical right to attribute any phenomenon to supermundane [other] agency that can be accounted for on principles of natural law"—who is ready to dispute the "hallucination" of the tenderfoot? The mysteries—or "luck" of three-card monte or the threefold riddle of the little joker can all be accounted for "straight as a shingle," on and by natural law, and though Bill may "admit and laugh over it all, as he often did with his friends, yet the other must stand because it can, in the confused mentality of the tenderfoot, be no other way than it seemed to him. It is hoped that with this scientific illustration, dealing as it does with facts, however imaginary, yet within the possibilities of explanation by natural law and prestidigital dexterity, will throw the needed light upon this really otherwise veiled law of three-fold suggestion.

But about this craze for science: The results of discovery are constantly pointing to spirit as the solution of its problems, and it is the reverse attitude that is rightfully ours—that science must harmonize with spirit before its credentials are complete. Science itself recognizes "force" as the thing behind all phenomena. This we call spirit. To the material scientist this force is blind, but to the Spiritualist it is intelligent—has method. The difference is but one of concept. Whenever scientists can think their force as having the ability or function of selection in its manifestation, then is there "scientific Spiritualism"—or as truly expressed, then is science spiritualized. The step is not a difficult one, but easy and not remote.

But why object to this terminology, is often asked. Literature uses it, and why not follow its formulas? Simply because a philosophy, a system of thought or facts, or of both as in this case, has not only the right to form its own idioms, but must do so to be clearly understood. And the terms objected to are the invention of Spiritualism's opponents, not of its exponents and disciples.

For example: What analogy is there between trance and "unconscious cerebration?" The distinguishing feature of trance is that the mental manifestation is higher than the normal. Perhaps the insane asylum affords the best illustrations of unconscious cerebral action. Is not the very term chaotic? How can there be coherent mental action and utterance from any but a conscious state of mind? The term was invented by Dr. Carpenter to get out of what the slang of the day would call "a hole"—or an effort to explain away spirit. It has no real meaning etymologically or physiologically.

Of a piece with this is "thought transferrence." What is a transfer? Any traveler on the street car can answer this, and his answer is the only one that is rational. But when he is transferred from one car to another, both cars do not have him in them—he belongs to the car he was transferred to. But when A gives his thought to B, both have the thought—it has not been transferred—both think it. Are not the old terms rapport or impression better exponents of the fact involved? These came into use along with spirit return, and are still the more descriptive. The other, like unconscious cerebration, is confusing and contradictory.

Of like origin is "telepathy"—an effort to express a spirit fact by a material condition. But the three are alike in the common attempt to make these phenomena a result of the physical self. A little more learned and a little more foggy are the more metaphysical terms—the "sub-conscious," the "subliminal," and their allies, the "objective," the "subjective," the "ego," "vibration," etc.

What the sub-conscious is no one can think, and consequently it is the sweetest of all to the wise people. The dictionary defines it as "partially or feebly conscious." "Sub" means under always, so at best it is a state inferior to the normal, yet our anti-spirit people claim that it accounts for those remarkable outgivings of Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, Hudson Tuttle, Mrs. Richmond and others, go beyond their normal power. The theorists and the lexicographers are wide apart in the matter. In a sarcastic sense this theory may have an excuse—for if the trance is only the subconscious self, then is it a liar of the first magnitude—as without exception when interrogated it says that it is not the medium—sub or top—but a spirit individuality distinct and conscious of its own independent existence. Of a kind is the sub-liminal. As this is defined to be "below the threshold of sensation," its use can only be justified on the plea that the less the sense is expressed the more profound the learning displayed. It is only greater in its degree of sound than the rest.

Next is the borrowed terminology as distinct from these inventions—the "objective" and the "subjective." How weary the average reader gets over the parrot repetition of these words. They are not so far-fetched as the others, but they belong properly to the realm of physical metaphysics, if the expression is allowable. In plain speech, the objective is what we see, and the subjective what we infer. In this case phenomena is objective, spirit the subjective—or the inference from the other. Or, evidence is objective and opinion from evidence subjective. The objective we know, the subjective we believe. The two may be knowledge, or may not reach that degree of certainty. And this is the last analysis of all this learned use of high-sounding words that at the bottom—if you can ever find it—have very simple everyday meanings.

The same may be said of some others: The "ego," "vibration," etc. People who teach must be learned—that is some people—or they are nothing. If Greek was our mother tongue ego would be proper, but as only one in a great multitude understands anything about Greek, and the few who do very little, why not use "me" instead, as the two words mean the same thing. The "I" or the "me" is better adapted to the common mind than "the ego"—or to be real learned say "ago"—and you can then be heard on the questions behind it. But to be really an "egoist" you must have an objective and subjective—or the ego and the non-ego—as it is not philosophical to think one without its opposite. As it would be very awkward to say the "not me," the quandary involved by the abandonment of "the ego" is apparent. Hence the incongruity of Spiritualists using formula and terminology, the very idioms of which are intended to express entirely differing concepts.

As to "vibration," it is like the others when applied to spirit—sound—but affords a peg on which to hang unthinkable theories. To make thought dependent upon degrees of vibration is rankest materialism. It is only and purely a physical concept, and no shade of etymology can give it any other. We can only cognize life from the phenomena of motion—the two are non-separable in thought. And how this thought can be measured by wig-wags is something unthinkable. That physical objects move faster or slower we can know, but beyond perception their movement is a thing of speculation. So when we come to theories as to cosmic velocities we are not in the realm of verification but in the domain of the unthinkable. There may be travel of light, but we can't know it. And again light may be an incident of our own planet's life—and have no travel at all. There may be waves of sound, but there are phenomena of sound that wave motion does not explain. Thought may be helped or hindered by the conditions of the brain, or from what is called vibratory conditions, but that its expression depends on such causatively, we can't think. Any physical cause has two extremes—so supreme good or bad action, if governed by vibration, must have a common condition—an extreme one. When a man is crazed enough by anger or passion to commit murder, his vibrations must be greater than the normal—or inconceivably increased. And as there have been innumerable instances of such spirit confessions, there was no visible evidence that either the sub-conscious medium or the sitter receiving the message were disposed to run amuck under the intensified vibration necessary for the spirit memory to recall the deed or the sitter's vibration raised to blend with that of the spirit's. But such are the difficulties of "science" in its dealing with spirit phenomena after its laboratory ideals.

The objection, Mr. Editor, is not to these things of themselves, or to any of them, per se, if left where they belong—to the schools of speculation and hypothesis. But it is to their being brought in from the schools and speculations of material science to confuse and debauch clear thinking on things or spirit, different in concept and utterly without analogy in exposition. And the farther objection lies to those who will not get out of the beaten paths of the text books—they at least should be modest in forcing their materialism upon the platform of Spiritualism as explanations of something they do not explain.

The real "danger to the cause" we hear so much about is in the attempt being made to materialize Spiritualism—in testing spirit by the laboratory and sweat-box, and attempting to explain the relation of the spirit after death by the conditions of its former physical existence. The two are not of a piece, and for that reason one has ceased to be that the other may be.

If the room sufficed, or the subject required, examples of this attempt to explain spiritual things by the material mind could be given almost without limit. The controversy over the bread and wine, as "the very body and blood," is one instance—only a metaphorical remove from cannibalism. And the long controversy by the fathers of the church over the question whether Jesus had a navel like ordinary people or not is another. Being immaculately conceived some contend there was no need for an umbilicus in his case—hence no navel. Don't laugh, for this is a sober fact in church history. Some of our scientific aspirers are not much behind it. It is only one of the old fog-banks that beset the search for the Infinite Intelligence that we moderns are asked to emulate. Let us stick to our knitting and leave these word-mongers to their own devices.

PUPLIC HEALTH.

Read by Dr. M. E. Conger, at Vicksburg Camp.

Public health is largely dependent upon public environments.

Life and health surroundings, so far as the public as well as individuals are concerned, must be the result of an intelligent understanding of health laws.

As the laws of health are simple, and an inheritance of all humanity, as much as the breath of life, one of the first duties of law-makers should be to secure to every member of society an opportunity to obtain sufficient knowledge so as to maintain health under all ordinary circumstances.

If the public assumes to deal with the subject of health, in city, state or nation, the first thing to consider is the importance of the subject as compared with all other public obligations.

If we assume health to be the most important—as we do—of all subjects the public is called upon to deal with, it should receive first consideration in each and every department which society and good government turn over to the public.

In studying this subject of health we find in sparsely settled localities that Mother Nature does much towards the preservation and maintainance of health; pure air and pure water are often found in abundance; pure air, sunshine and light, are to be had without extra effort in the early settlement of new countries; water—as a rule—food and clothing must be worked for, which is a very wise provision of nature, as good health is dependent upon exercise as well as food, water, sunshine, light and air; without exercise digestion is seldom perfect or healthy.

The best exercise is always something that interests, excites, and exhilarates the mind as well as the body; working for a living (not as a penalty for violated laws) sums up the question regarding the best exercise for health.

As cities multiply and population becomes more dense, there is an increasing demand for more attention to public health; in every city where good morals are maintained, a high state of health results, health being the normal condition of life, sickness abnormal and in a high sense immoral. The cause of sickness as a rule is the violation of good, reasonable and necessary laws of life, therefore such violation of infinite law is immoral.

From this point of view, every human law, scheme, deception or play upon the ignorance of individuals, by doctors of law, divinity, or medicine, is immoral, and if immoral as related to individuals, is it not equally so as related to the public?

All public efforts like the one we are engaged in, to give it standing and permanence in any community, must reach down and build upon the rock of ages; no other foundation will stand, no other should receive consideration from front rank reformers. All subjects that relate to the uplifting of humanity are proper subjects for discussion upon our broad universal platform.

The subject of "Public Health," if not the most important, is certainly one of the most important, and I must so treat it.

The highest possible attainment of humanity physically, is a condition of health secured by right living, where the spirit and mental faculties so dominate our lives that disease cannot attack us. This is possible and is recognized as our birthright by a vast multitude of thinking, progressive people.

The subject of health culture is to-day one of the most prominent reformatory subjects in all our cities, from Maine to California, and the interest is daily increasing, which is an encouraging sign. Change is marked upon every expression of modern life; it has become a necessity to change climate, food, dress, doctors, preachers, newspapers and politics.

A half century ago we did not need to make changes; if the necessity for change had existed we did not have the forces harnessed, we did not have the wheels, we didn't even have the wheels in our heads as we do now.

Steam was in its infancy fifty years ago, electricity was in the air and clouds where Dr. Franklin discovered it; liquid air, compressed air and many other forces are being discovered in the physical world which are being utilized for the development of humanity. I am sorry to say right here that the most of the practical and useful discoveries have been gobbled up by selfish combinations and only the few have benefited by the wonderful discoveries and inventions of the century just expiring, but in the near future the masses will be uplifted and come into possession of the improvements they have produced, and in justice belong to them.

TOO MUCH TRUST.

Yes! too much trust; trust is one of the choice attributes of the common life. It is worthy of cultivation; because of its influence for good over the masses, it has been taken advantage of in Law, Theology, Religion and Medicine, and has proved to be a convenient method to subjugate and enslave a vast number of confiding people.

The preacher has declared we must trust the Lord and his holy book or be in great danger; the lawyer says we must trust and obey the law as he interprets it; the doctor insists that we must lay aside our reason and common sense, and take his vile poisonous drugs or remain sick, and die prematurely; to each of these demands we raise a strong determined protest, and declare the people's confidence and trust has been betrayed to a criminal extent, and in our lessons upon Practical Medicine, Physiology, Psychology, Magnetic and Mental Healing, we shall show that it is high time for every enlightened person to distrust the Professional Trusts.

I must digress a moment just here to say that to do justice to the subject of Professional Trusts would require much time to prepare such a paper and hours to deliver, therefore I can only consistently take your time to make a few statements.

The profession of medicine is vastly more important to the world at this date—this age—than any other profession or business occupation. A moment's reflection proves this to be true; the life and health of the masses are dependent upon the doctor, because he is presumed to be the conservator of health. The lawyer, clergyman, teacher, discoverer, artist, scientist, poet, mechanic and philosopher, are all dependent, as a rule, upon the doctor. From this point of view the subject of Practical Medicine takes precedence because of its great importance, and right here we should all, every one of us, demand that every doctor shall not only be qualified by law and education, but by a life that invites perfect trust; this is the trust that relates to health and life, and there is no other trust of more importance, even the soul's most pure and devoted love. There is no danger in too much trust, in many directions, but when it comes to be a life and health question, then our demands upon the medical profession, upon the health officers, must be rigid. We should know with whom we are to trust our lives and health. No matter about the degree the doctor may have reached in the schools, if he lacks in morals and honesty, he is not to be trusted with our lives or those of the public. Ignorance and neglect are dangerous at this point.

Too much trust, too much ignorance and neglect, subject us to the will, deception and caprice of the family doctor; doctors and even our preachers and undertakers are human and fallible, and should only be trusted so far as they have proved themselves trustworthy. Our ignorance and neglect may bring us shame and life-long regrets; as reformers it is our duty to keep apace with the intelligence of the age. All these vital points will be considered in the health school established in this camp. You will all have opportunities, and are invited to assist in the work. The most sacred and divine attributes of life are involved in medical reform; the present status of the medical profession as expressed by its leaders is below par; it must be uplifted, the masses should become informed and demand a higher standard.

Ignorance is the doctor's most serious temptation. The law demands justice—let us be just to ourselves.

I conclude this most serious and important part of my paper with the suggestion that every one of us is interested in increasing the conditions of trust by uplifting humanity to the plane of life where trust rules and distrust is forever banished. If all humanity could be born and educated under similar circumstances, the educated, experienced physician could advise a course of right living that would ensure health, happiness and a long and useful life.

Much of crime, murder, suicide, destitution and prostitution can be traced to ignorance of the laws of life and health. What is the duty and privilege of this Vicksburg Camp? Are we not confronted with an opportunity? Are we not equally interested?

A crisis is on, it reaches all life, it reaches every person that will visit this camp, it reaches all things, all expressions of life, the center of the physical earth and the highest heaven of spirit life.

Change is the order of all human expression, as surely as of animal and vegetable; the changed order of life expressions that are forcing themselves upon us, are results, first of a recognition of spirit life, and second of the marvelous discoveries and inventions of the half century just closing.

Success in any direction is dependent upon a recognition of the mighty, far-reaching changes that are going forward in all conditions. Our leading clergymen the honest, independent ones) are dropping their dogmas and creeds and are fleeing from the old orthodox Christian craft as rats flee from a sinking ship.

Honest physicians are compelled to abandon the dangerous drug system; political leaders are moving out of the old restrictive partizan environments and demanding more freedom, more justice.

The significance of the present crisis, the rapid and almost universal change that is apparent in every up-to-date community, should cause all reformers to be deeply alive and interested; it really says to Spiritualists, come to the front and lead or go to the rear. Spiritualists, I am justified in saying this to you this morning; phrenology, psychology, physiognomy, clairvoyance, clairaudience, psychometry, spiritual, mental, magnetic and all other phases of healing have been fostered, unfolded and sustained for the past forty years by wide-awake Spiritualists. There is no class of reformers, sect or ism that has done as much as Spiritualists in the past forty years to develop and enlighten the public upon all of those subjects classed as the Occult, but we must, to be truthful, confess that we have neglected and overlooked some of the most important subjects of life, and it is a pleasure to be able to state the fact that our camps are slowly turning their attention towards the basic principles of all reforms, the life and health of all humanity. The occult—the unseen forces—should be studied.

The following brief sentence was clipped from an Eastern reformatory magazine; I endorse it as a pointer. Here it is:

"The next ten years will bring more light upon the unknown in medicine than did the last century. The time is ripe when one must accept some things seemingly occult, and investigate, or the other fellow will pass him, and he will find himself with others of his kind at the tail end of the procession."

Health reform journals, magazines, and the great dailies, print little items like the above, which like straws show which way the wind blows.

There is a demand everywhere for reformatory physicians; the time is at hand when the physician must be more than a dispenser of poisonous drugs. The coming physician must be a teacher, not only of the laws that govern and control this wonderful physical form that we all wear and live in, but of the spiritual forces—the natural occult forces, that in health keep the physical form in harmony.

Myths and mysteries are not as potent as formerly; murder, suicide, insanity and crimes are coming to be considered diseased conditions; causes are considered instead of effects.

Success in life is dependent largely upon health, an understanding of health laws and obedience to their demands.

Health is always a success, sickness always a failure.

If we would be independent, if we desire to get out of medical slavery into the freedom and independence of health, we must broaden our conceptions, cultivate and intensify our perceptives and live better lives here and now.

The object of this brief paper is to outline a few general points that are to be considered and discussed in the medical classes during the sessions of this camp. Our desire is to assist every one who attends, and will give time and attention to the subjects discussed, to regain and maintain health by right living.

How that a health school is permanently established at this camp, we as representatives of the movement inaugurated three years ago by the inspired and devoted manager of this yearly gathering, most earnestly invite every person that comes to this camp, to assist in making the effort a continued success; as teachers or leaders, we must have unselfish devoted followers—workers. The school is not our school, it is the school of the Vicksburg Spiritual Camp. It is a free school, and up to this date is without a formal organization. It is a thorough medical reform school, from base to the pinnacle. It is a fearless advocate of every change and effort that tends towards the uplifting and enlightenment of all humanity. Come and join the school, it is yours, and help make it a genuine royal success.

"It is no dream,
No castle-building time, that we call life.
To catch the gleam
Of heaven in the strife.
Our toil must tend to reach the better life.
There is much room
For gratitude—much room for tenderness.
In all the gloom
Of sorrow, much to bless,
If we will labor more and murmur less."

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

I lectured September 16. I am at liberty for dates Sundays and during the week except Mondays. Inspirational lectures and psychometry."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The Philadelphia Record says: "Rev. H. C. Schlueter, of Baltimore, vigorously arraigned Spiritualism at a session of the German Reformed Synod of the East, in the Emmanuel German Reformed Church, Thirty-eighth and Baring streets. After treating the subject historically, showing how the principles of Spiritualism had their origin in Germany, the speaker said it was one of the relics of barbarism. 'It stands opposed to reason and the theory of all known religions,' he declared." All of which demonstrates that H. C. Schlueter is in some respects a semi-idiot.

Frank T. Ripley lectured and gave tests at Vicksburg, Mich., September 2; Millburg, September 7 and 12; Carners, September 16. He will be at Pipestone, Sunday, September 23, at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. He commences his season for the Sundays of October for the First Society in Grand Rapids. He has November, January and February open. He goes to Columbus for December. Address all letters until October in care of 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ill. During October, at Grand Rapids, Mich.

The Chicago Inter Ocean says: "I don't believe in ghosts, not at all," remarked a teacher in the Hyde Park High School, "still, since a recent experience of mine with the occult I wonder that there are not more people who order their lives by spirit rappings. I went up to Lake Geneva to spend a few days with a friend who has a summer cottage there. I was tired and went to bed early, feeling perfectly at peace with all the world, and certainly not thinking of ghosts. The room was in bright moonlight. I had been in bed about five minutes, and was still wide awake, when I heard a low, distinct knock on the headboard of the bed. It was the most peculiar unmistakable rap I ever heard. You couldn't mistake it for a creaking of the bed or a rattle of the window curtain. It sounded like a rap by knuckles on the headboard of the bed. I am not nervous, but the sound startled. 'Nonsense,' then I reflected, laughing at myself. I felt so sure on second thought that it couldn't be an eerie phenomenon that I said out loud boldly: 'If a spirit is there please give three raps.' Without a moment's intervention, as the sound of my voice died away, there came three slow, distinct raps on the headboard of the bed. That's all there is to my story. I didn't wait for any more communications, but sprang up and lighted the lamp. My forehead broke out in sweat and my knees knocked together. I made a minute search of the room. The headboard of the bed was four inches away from the wall. There was no one in the room but myself. I slept there several nights afterward, but the spirit, if spirit it was, never came back."

Will C. Hodge is serving the Englewood Spiritual Union as speaker for the month of September. Address for engagements, 40 Loomis street, Chicago. Will answer all calls for funerals.

Mrs. Maria C. Dudley writes: "I have received Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World. I consider it a grand book, and I wonder how you can give us so much reading matter for so little money. I was born and raised an orthodox, and was a member of a church for many years. I now think I never knew the first rudiments of true Christianity until I became a Spiritualist a few years ago. I wish I could tell the whole world the joy and comfort I have experienced since the 'scales fell from mine eyes,' and that our loved ones do return."

The Daily Northwestern, of Oshkosh, Wis., says: "'Prof.' Rovano, a clairvoyant who has been doing business at 52 Waugoo street, left the city Saturday at noon. He is supposed to have gone to Neenah. He was accompanied by his wife. The police have heard of no complaint against the man except from one woman whose name is not known, who started to tell the police a story, when the 'Professor' stepped into the police office and threw $50 into her lap and walked out without a word. The woman did not continue her story. He was not molested, since no other complaints were lodged against him."

When the last sunshine of expiring day in summer twilight creeps itself away, who hath not felt the softness of the hour sink on the heart—as dew along the flower?—Byron.

The Philadelphia Times says: "The village of Mordansville, Pa., is all agog with excitement over the visits of a ghost which, it is said, haunts the covered bridge crossing Fishing Creek, at the eastern end of the town. While two young men were driving across the bridge a few evenings ago their horse suddenly stopped, refusing to go forward, and showing every evidence of fright, although they could see nothing. Becoming alarmed they called loudly for assistance, and when some of the villagers arrived, carrying lanterns, they declare they saw a large skeleton standing directly in front of the animal. The ghostly visitor was distinctly visible to both the young men in the buggy as well as to the villagers, but as the latter approached it slowly faded from view. When they had recovered from their fright they came to the conclusion that a trick had been played upon them, but an examination showed no evidence of it, and the horse, quivering with fear, could hardly be induced to pass the spot. Since that evening the apparition has been seen by several people, its latest visit being last night, when it appeared to two young girls who were going through the bridge, and who, although badly scared, assert positively that they saw the skeleton, which they declare was at least eight feet in height. The great majority of the residents of that section believe firmly in the apparition, and traffic over the bridge after nightfall has become very light, many of the people driving several miles to escape crossing it."

E. F. Doig writes from Waverly, Mass.: "The three premium books which you so promptly sent me I have enjoyed very much. They are good books to put into the hands of a skeptic, and as for the paper, I would not be without it for any money."

Dr. G. F. Dougherty has introduced the New Philosophy in the little village of Neoga, Ill., and if a good medium, speaker, trumpet or slate-writing, will come that way the Doctor will assist them in engagements at Mattoon, Greenup, Neoga and Effingham. They can serve those people regularly and make their home with the Doctor, free. Write the Doctor at Neoga, Ill., or Mrs. A VanOver, Greenup, Ill.

We keep a standing notice on this page that every item sent here for publication must contain the full name and address of the writer, otherwise it will not appear. That accounts for "your" item not appearing this week.

The Times-Republican of Marshalltown, Iowa, says: "A large attendance was at the conference of Spiritualists in the morning. In the afternoon Mr. D. P. Dewey, who has demonstrated his ability as a speaker during the past week, gave another of his popular lectures, followed with descriptions by Mr. E. E. Carpenter, which were well received and were of a nature that must have convinced the investigator of a higher and greater intelligence than that of the medium. In the evening Mrs. Marion Carpenter, well known as one of the finest speakers in the field, delivered one of her splendid lectures, followed with descriptions by herself and Mr. Carpenter. The descriptions both in the afternoon and evening were pronounced the best ever heard in the city. This evening Mr. Frank N. Foster, of New York, will deliver a lecture on spirit photography. This is a new and interesting feature at a Marshalltown camp and is well worth hearing. Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock Mrs. Marion Carpenter will deliver a lecture which has been arranged for this hour in order that the ladies of Marshalltown who cannot get out in the evening may have the opportunity of hearing Mrs. Carpenter. Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock will be a lecture by Mr. D. P. Dewey."

The Times-Republican, of Marshalltown, Iowa, says: "The members of the Central Iowa Spiritualists' Association, who are in annual session in this city, met Wednesday afternoon in their annual business meeting, electing officers as follows: President, H. C. Holsclaw, of Marshalltown; vice-president, Dr. Hinton, of Ottumwa; secretary, Miss Maude McClure, of Ottumwa; treasurer, Walter Wilson, of Marshalltown. Trustees to fill vacancies were also elected in the persons of John Gregory, of Keokuk county; Mrs. Eva McCoy, of this city, and Moses Whistler, of Keokuk county. The matter of selecting permanent headquarters for the association came up, but no definite action was taken in regard to the removal of the headquarters from Marshalltown. Bids were received from Fort Dodge, Oskaloosa and Leon, each of which cities offered camp-grounds within the city limits, ranging from five to thirty acres, as bonuses. A committee was appointed to ascertain what Marshalltown would do to retain the headquarters. This committee is composed of Messrs E. Morris Vail, H. C. Holsclaw and Walter Wilson. The gentlemen will look over the ground and see if a better camp ground can be obtained; also ascertain just what can be raised in the way of funds to assist in making contemplated improvements. It is the idea of the association to establish a park, where the camp-meetings will be held from year to year. Cottages for summer use are proposed to be erected on the park grounds and the gatherings will be made one of the biggest things in Spiritualists' circles in the state. Mr. D. P. Dewey, of Grand Blanc, Mich., who has been in attendance at the camp-meeting, and has been one of the prominent lecturers and workers at the session, leaves for his home this evening."

E. J. Davidson writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "I have Ghost Land, Art Magic, and the Next World Interviewed, which give me a great deal of valuable information. These interesting books, in connection with The Progressive Thinker, are a great treat. I read my papers and send them out to friends, to assist in doing the good work. If every one who takes The Progressive Thinker would circulate them among their friends, it seems to me it would not take long to convert all intelligent people to our beautiful philosophy."

J. C. F. Grumbine begins his fifth lecture season the last Sunday of September in Suite 29, Pierce Bldg, Copley Square, Boston, where services will continue at 10:45 a. m., and 8 p. m., the Sundays of October and November.

Harry J. Moore, lecturer and test medium, having been engaged for the months of October and November, is open for engagements for the months of December and January, and will answer camp engagements for the ensuing camp season. Address 2979 Wabash avenue, Chicago, Ill.

B. F. Hayden writes from Gardner, Kansas: "We can be addressed here until October 1. Mattie, after making a flying visit home to attend the marriage of daughter Gussie, has again joined me here, and we hope to find work to do in this and adjoining states for the coming fall and winter. We have been holding some very satisfactory parlor meetings at the home of Brother Cummings, and have succeeded in arousing quite an interest in the neighborhood. We go from here to Wallula, Kansas, where we are engaged for the entire camp, which opens October 4, and after which we are open for engagements anywhere in the West. Our work is varied and universally satisfactory in all phases. We will go anywhere, lecture, organize societies, etc., on very reasonable terms. Now friends, let us hear from you. You need our services and we need your aid. Let us pull together and help the grand, good cause along, and above all let every one feel his first duty remains unperformed until he has subscribed and paid for a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker."

Mrs. Mary J. Carter writes: "We have been highly favored at Jonesboro, Ind., the last week by having with us Mr. C. E. Winans, the materializing medium. He gave a seance at my home with the best of results. More than twenty forms came to those present, and were fully recognized. Many instructive messages, too, were given. Our good brother, Dr. H. C. Andrews, was also with us, and opened the seance with a sublime invocation. His rich tenor voice was heard in lovely music through the evening. Dr. Andrews is one of the best inspirational lecturers."

The lecture advertised to have been delivered by Rev. Dr. Green, under the auspices of the First Spiritual Church, at Oakland Club Hall, on the last Sunday of September, has been unavoidably postponed on account of the illness and absence of Dr. Green.

Philip H. England writes from Montreal Canada: "I am very much pleased with the three volumes of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World. They are beauties. Accept my sincere thanks."

Mrs. F. A. Logan writes: "The angel hosts have aided me to reach the camp-meeting at Sycamore Grove, Los Angeles, Cal., hoping to renew my spiritual work of healing and teaching. Some say, 'O, Mrs. Logan, you have done your work. You have had your day'; but I tell them there never was rest for me in idleness, and that my work is not done, and never shall I fill the measure of my days until the last. I wonder how many will go from this camp-meeting and continue to labor every day for the elevation of the race, whether young or old, rich or poor. None are excusable from doing their level best in this world of sin, sickness and sorrow, and no Spiritualist who is able should refuse to sustain a Spiritual paper. I hope hereafter to give a good account of the camp-meeting which is indeed in a lovely place and among lovely people."

Prof. W. M. Lockwood is now in the city where he will remain for about a week. During the past year he has been kept very busy in delivering his scientific lectures. He has December open for engagement. He can be addressed in care of this office.

Luther R. Marsh writes from Middletown, N. Y.: "I ofttimes find myself rebelling against some statements by your numerous and able correspondents and writers, as being opposed to my instructions from spiritual spheres. But this is not to be wondered at, since all spirits are not in the same spheres; and, consequently all do not see alike. A spirit in one place cannot see in the sphere even immediately above it; any more, I presume, than we here can see into the first sphere above us. But I am impelled to congratulate you on the article in your issue of Sept. 22, entitled 'Studies in Spiritual Thought.' It is so completely in accord and unison with my own thought and practice, that I could not withhold my commendation. I would like to know who the author is, and I would like to know the author. It is, really, all the gospel one needs. It comprises all things. Its truths are admirably expressed. In perusing it, I seemed to be reading my own thought. I have cut it out and pasted it on sheets, where I can have it before my eyes as often as I wish. Acted upon universally, we would find heaven come down to earth. The writer has got hold of the secret of life. I would like to give him gratulation, not only for the purity, comprehensiveness, and beauty of his thoughts, but upon the lucid expression of it. It is a text which one may well hang up before him for repeated perusal. May his pen not slumber in its inkstand."

H. L. Bigelow writes: "We have just closed the fifth annual convention of the State Association of Spiritualists of California. The use of Sleeper hall of this place was tendered us and it was considered to be the most harmonious and successful session ever convened. The reception and social held on Friday evening was enjoyed by all present. The assembly hall was decorated with finest sunflowers, the work of the Ladies' Aid. The next convention will be held in Oakland, Cal."

Andrew Camper writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "Sunday, September 9, Mrs. Maude Freitag gave a lecture and ballot test at the camp-meeting in Sycamore Grove, Los Angeles, Cal. I prepared a ballot folded tightly. The large auditorium was crowded so I could not get a seat, and I stood against the platform and close to the table and the ballots. Mrs. Freitag gave the exact words on the ballot and a message from the spirit addressed without having seen or even touched the ballot. When I recognized the message she instantly selected the ballot from the heap on the table and handed it to me, folded as I had placed it with the others. I am an entire stranger to Mrs. Freitag and it is only fair to a good medium to testify to the truth."

Frank N. Foster, the spirit photographer, is now located in Chicago, at No. 47 Campbell Park.

Geo. P. Colby has been lecturing very acceptably at Michigan City, Ind. He goes from there to South Bend. Last week he made a short visit in this city.

If any society in Chicago would like the services of Mr. and Mrs. Kates for Sunday, October 14, the same can be arranged. Address them, 58 Royalston avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Geo. F. Perkins writes: "The Sunday evening meetings and Friday evenings at our new quarters are gaining very satisfactorily. The developing class will be changed to Monday evening. Afternoon circles every Thursday at 3 o'clock. Aside from being on the sick list for a day or two, I am all right and ready for work in my line of developing, speaking, etc. Milwaukee friends please note location—884 West Madison street, corner Leavitt street, Chicago."

G. W. Kates and wife expect to attend the N. S. A. Convention in Cleveland, October 16-19, as Minnesota delegates, and can accept a few dates en route there and return, for lectures and tests. Address them 58 Royalston avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

The First Spiritual Endeavor Church will be re-dedicated on September 30, 1900, at 7:30 p. m., at 3310½ Rhodes avenue. Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell, pastor. Tests and messages will be given, and others will assist with music and recitations.

Dr. and Mrs. N. F. Ravlin have returned to Philadelphia under another eight months' engagement with the First Association of Spiritualists, and are located at 1230 North 12th street, where their correspondents will please address them.

Wm. Dorman writes: "I long to see the day when some good, able and honest mediums will come to Idaho and proclaim Spiritualism and hold camp-meetings."

The Band of Harmony, room 608 Handel Hall building, were well filled and a large audience listened to the words of welcome to their president and pastor, Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond. Ouina came to her medium's rescue and responded in her usual impressive manner. They had a fine variety of musical talent, solo singing, instrumental duets and mandolin trio. Greetings from different members. The vice-president, Mrs. Peet, made the closing remarks, and returned to the president the gavel. Three subjects were given for a poem, Ouina responding and closing with benediction.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life from her home in Denver, Jane Barrett, the good wife of C. W. Smart, after 52 years of happy wedded life. The last fifteen years she was an invalid, but happy still. She was clairvoyant and inquired, "If what I see are not spirits, what are they?" We arrived in Denver, August 5, 1861. She breathed her last, August 7, 1900, aged 77 years. C. W. SMART.

Elias Jacobson, the father of the well-known Dr. E. J. Jacobson, of Chicago, at 2634 Eberly avenue, passed to spirit life, September 18, 1900, at the age of 59 years, leaving several members of the family. He was a life-long Spiritualist. His remains were deposited in Forest Home cemetery, where others of the family are buried. Funeral conducted by Mrs. M. Summers. E. S.

Passed to Spirit life, Mrs. L. L. Wood, at Oak Cliff, Texas, September 10, 1900, aged 48 years. She was a firm believer in the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism, and was beloved by all. She leaves a husband and five children to mourn her loss. COR.

FLORIDA CAMP.

The Southern Cassadaga, at Lake Helen, Fla.

As the leaves begin to turn and the equinoctial rains are pouring, and the approach of winter is suggested in different ways, dread of the inevitable ice-bound winter finds its lodgment in many minds and questions of making preparations for this approaching season are to be settled.

At such a time a few words to your readers with reference to a home in the Florida camp may be acceptable. The Southern Cassadaga camp ground is situated near the railroad station of Lake Helen, in one of the most healthful and naturally beautiful locations in the "High Pine Orange Belt" of Florida and was intended by the spirits who selected the spot, as well as by the morials who projected the movement, to be a center for winter homes, as well as one of spiritual work and power.

Very few persons who have visited the spot feel that any mistake has been made in the selection, and many prophesy that a little more time, effort and money will make this camp one of the foremost in this country.

This camp is said to be particularly conducive to the development of mediumship, a peaceful spiritual atmosphere pervades the place, and seems to overpower and control any spirit of inharmony that seeks to intrude or despoil. The dwellers seem to be like one great family, and often meet together socially, and frequently hold spiritual and intellectual entertainments before the regular yearly meeting begins.

The cost of living is very reasonable; some kinds of food cost more and others less than in the North, so the average is about the same, with the exception of fuel, which is much cheaper.

Comfortable cottages can be built for less money than in the North, lumber is not as high as in most Northern states.

Many improvements are to be made this coming fall and winter. The hotel, apartment house, and Brigham Hall, are to undergo repairs with many new additions for comfort and convenience. Several rooms in the apartment house are already engaged, and many of the cottages rented for the winter.

A large party will accompany the writer to the South about November 1, who will remain in the camp all winter. The hotel will open November 15 with Mrs. A. M. Sherman, the well-known cook of the Leolyn House at Lily Dale, in charge of the culinary department. She will be ably assisted by her sister, Mrs. A. M. Lloyd. With the record that these ladies have as managers and cooks it is unnecessary to say that those who desire board for the winter will be well fed. Provisions will be made for warming the hotel more thoroughly; occasional cold snaps occur when extreme discomfort is felt unless the buildings are provided with means for heating, but the typical winter weather of the Southern Cassadaga Camp is like our Northern June, and much of the time fires are not needed.

J. Clegg Wright, the well known speaker and teacher will be with us after November election. Mr. Wright will build a cottage on his land adjacent to the ground, with the intention of spending his winters there, as the climate and spiritual atmosphere are favorable for his health and inspiration.

The winter tourist tickets are issued November 1, and can be purchased in any city, direct to Lake Helen, good for a return until May 31, 1901. Persons traveling from the Northwest will do well to take the Queen and Crescent route from Cincinnati, as the distance is less, the cars are well equipped, and the road is very picturesque.

The famous Lookout Mountain can be seen from the car windows as the train pulls in at Chattanooga.

Write to W. C. Rinearson, Cincinnati, Ohio, Gen. Pass agent of the Q. & C. route for special directions.

The meeting will commence the first Sunday in February and continue six weeks. First-class talent will be engaged. More information will be given through the columns of The Progressive Thinker and other Spiritualist papers later in reference to the program of the meeting.

In conclusion let me say that those who wish to seek a refuge from the cold blasts of winter, who want a healthful and beautiful spot in which to live, and at the same time, assist in carrying forward a necessary and important work for humanity, will do well to turn their attention toward the Southern Cassadaga Camp-ground. The writer will answer all letters of inquiry concerning the same with pleasure (please don't forget the stamp) if they are addressed to Lily Dale, N. Y., until November 1; after that time, Lake Helen Fla.

Vindication of Mrs. Freitag, by Her Society.

To the Editor:—We notice in your number of September 8, an article written by one A. M. Buck, entitled a challenge to the ballot test medium, Maude L. von Freitag, in which he claims to offer a certain amount of money if she will read ballots under test conditions.

I wish to say that Mrs. von Freitag has repeatedly given ballot test seances under test conditions in Los Angeles, San Francisco, and other places to the perfect satisfaction of all.

The statement made by Mr. Buck that she was protected by officers of the society, they knowing of her sleight-of-hand practices, is false. And, instead of such being the case, the official board of the Harmonial Association, of which Mrs. von Freitag has been the very acceptable pastor for the past five years, has from time to time unanimously expressed their perfect confidence in her, and do so now. If Mrs. von Freitag should give attention to every crank who bobbed up, asking for an explanation of pretending to make "a challenge," as in the article alluded to, she would have no time to devote to the grand and glorious work that she is now performing by her wonderful mediumistic powers.

I write this article in justice to the cause of truth and to Mrs. von Freitag.

E. A. HUMPHREY,
President of the Harmonial Spiritualist Association of Los Angeles; also President of the Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Association of Southern California.

I also enclose an expression from our camp-meeting board to Mrs. von Freitag, which was read at our camp-meeting last Sunday at the afternoon service to a large audience amid great applause.

Whereas, Certain malicious reports have been circulated, endeavoring to reflect upon our most respected sister and medium, Maude L. von Freitag, the official board of this camp-meeting association, by unanimous vote, hereby take pleasure in expressing their perfect confidence in Mrs. von Freitag, not only as a medium, but in every other way.

E. A. HUMPHREY, Pres.

FORGED EVIDENCES.

Josephus, Tacitus, Suetonius and Pliny--Vespasian the "Christ" of Josephus.

In a recent sermon by the Rev. F. D. Power, of the Garfield Memorial church, printed in the Washington Post, the preacher said:

"Josephus does not contradict the gospels, but supports them, and twice mentions Christ. Tacitus names him and confirms the gospels. Pliny's letter to Trajan declares the Christians worshiped Christ as a God. Every classical historian writing after Christ mentions him. * * * * Tacitus, Suetonious, Pliny are witnesses that cannot be silenced."

Mr. Power ought to know that the Rev. Nathaniel Lardner, D. D., one of the profoundest of scholars who died in 1768, was constrained to admit in his voluminous work, "The Credibility of the Gospel History," that the paragraph in Josephus (Ant. xviii:3), concerning the life and death of Jesus is a forgery. He also believed that in another paragraph describing the condemnation and death of James, the brother of Jesus, about the year 62, some one had interpolated after Jesus the words, "who was called Christ."

And in our own time the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, author of several religious works, at the very outset of his "Lost and Hostile Gospels" says:

"It is somewhat remarkable that no contemporary, or even early account of the life of our Lord exists, except from the pens of Christian writers."

And after quoting the paragraph from Josephus concerning the life and death of Jesus he says:

"That this passage is spurious has been almost universally acknowledged."

Nor is it possible that the Jewish historian could have acknowledged Jesus as Christ (Greek, Christos), for in his "Jewish War," Book vi., chap. 5, sec. 4, he says that the prediction of the sacred writings of the Jews concerning a governor of the habitable earth was fulfilled when Titus took Jerusalem. "The Jews," he says, "took this prediction to belong to themselves in particular, and many of the wise men were thereby deceived. And then he adds: "Now this oracle certainly denoted Vespasian, who was appointed emperor of Judea," In other words Vespasian was the promised Mashick," the "anointed," the "Christos."

The passage in the "Annals" of Tacitus, in which "Christus" occurs is certainly spurious. Sulpicius Severus, an elegant Christian writer, whose date is fixed about the year 400, has a passage strikingly like that in the "Annals" of Tacitus, in regard to the punishment of the Christians by Nero. Translated from the "Annals" it reads:

"Some were tied up in the skins of wild beasts that they might be worried to death by dogs. Some were crucified. others were burned to death, being set us as lights in the night time."

There are twenty-five Latin words in the above quotation, of which eighteen are identical and consecutive in Severus. Who can believe that this Christian writer would have failed to give the Pagan authority for an event of such importance, if the same was to be found recorded long before his time in Roman history?

It is now demonstrated that the so-called "Annals" of Tacitus was forged by Poggio Bracciolini, a Papal secretary. In 1422 he was tempted by an offer of 500 sequins (now equal to $50,000) to engage in some mysterious literary work. Seven years later six books of Roman history were brought to him from Saxony. Then all Christendom rejoiced to learn that the heathen Tacitus had mentioned Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. At the age of 72 Poggio became secretary to the Republic of Florence, and at 79 he died, leaving five sons. Fifty-six years after his death his fourth son was secretary to Pope Leo X. at which time the Pope's steward, stimulated by a munificent reward, discovered the first six incomplete books of the same work. Four intermediate books of the sixteen were never found. These twelve books of pretended history prior to that of Tacitus called "Historiae," were prefixed to the latter and for distinction called "Annales;" but they are a clumsy misfit. The statue of Poggio in company with the twelve apostles, may now be seen in the church of Santa Maria at Florence.

The reference to Christ and Christians by Suetonious are likewise spurious. The writer characterizes Christians as "a race of men of a new and villainous superstition." Dr. Lardner dismisses this testimony, saying: "Learned men are not satisfied that this related to the Christians." He also repudiates the other passage about the emperor Claudius Caesar expelling the Jews from Rome because they raised continual riots at the instigation of Chrestus. He was conscious of the absurdity of identifying a riotous Jew named Chrestus with Jesus who had been crucified many years before.

The letters of Pliny to the emperor Trajan, about the year 110, are manifest forgeries. In one he says that the Christians in Bithynia sing hymns to Christ as God. Long ago the genuineness of these letters was suspected. See Melmoth's Pliny, a hundred years old or more. The correspondence is not to be found in any extant MS. It was added to the collection by Aldus. The composition is that of a writer unaccustomed to think in classical Latin. He probably thought in French. (Rise of Christendom," by Prof. Edwin Johnson, p. 450). Long ago I discovered internal evidence of the forgery of the letters of Pliny to Trajan.

In conclusion I aver that no writer of classical Latin ever penned the word "Christus" or "Christianus." My old Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary has neither word in the Latin part, nor does the author give us "Christ" in the English part—only "Christian" and "Christmas." And he is careful to note that their Latin equivalent is bad, thus:

"Christian * || Christianus."

The star he says denotes that the word is "of Greek extraction," and the other sign that "it is bad, or used by writers of an inferior class."

To that inferior class neither Tacitus, nor Suetonious, nor Pliny belonged, nor any other Latin writer of the early part of the Christian era; but the writers who use the words "Christus" and "Christianus" are modern monks, beginning with Tertullian, the so-called first Latin father who quotes the letter of Pliny to Trajan, itself a modern forgery. "Christos" means simply anointed, and its Latin equivalent is "unctus" or "delibutus,"

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endowe his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Mrs. Rose Eby: Q. We are investigating at our home. We have a circle of twelve members, and have been holding seances for nearly two years, and only one of our members has shown any mediumistic power. This one as an inspirational speaker. One of our members is consumptive. He is strengthened by the seances, but is it well for the success of the circle? I am sitting alone for slate-writing, but without the least success.

A. That there has been so little advancement after so long a trial shows that there is something radically wrong in the membership of the circle. Dropping out some of the members, and substituting new ones is suggested. A person suffering from disease should not be admitted unless the seance is expressly held for his benefit.. Of course he will be strengthened but it is at the loss of the other members, and possibly may prevent all manifestations.

In all cases after a few seances if unsatisfactory, changes should be made in membership.

Sitting for an especial phase of manifestation, is not favorable, for it may not be possible for the person to receive it, and the desire and expectation is directly opposed to the realization of any other phase he may have the capability of receiving.

Rev. E. C. T.: Q. I am in charge of a Presbyterian church, and having recently seen some spiritual manifestations, have become deeply interested. I wish to know more. How shall I proceed?

A. I deeply sympathize with this correspondent. He has awakened to the possibility of the intercommunion of the two worlds, and his interest is deeply engaged. Yet he does not know of the troubled waters toward which he is rapidly drifting. Spiritualism will demonstrate to him that those he mourns as dead, live in a higher life and retain their affections for those in this, and that they communicate. That is more than all his theology has taught him. The air is brighter, purer, and life itself becomes priceless, as being endowed with this heritage of limitless possibilities. This having come, next will be the waning of the old beliefs, the negation of dogmas, the elimination of beliefs vital to the religion he has for years taught from his pulpit. If he is a man of truth, honest and loyal to his convictions what will he say to his hearers? If he announces his belief it will be heresy and he will suffer ostracism. Can he by subtle methods lead his flock up the mountain paths from the quaking boglands of theology to the green fields and flowery pastures, and slake their thirst from the springs which are fed by the clouds condensing on the heaven-high summits?

The Bible is a dry husk bereft of its spiritual records, and religion is based on the recognition of immortal life. The pulpit might be made a wonderful educational institution promulgating living thoughts instead of dead dogmas.

In the hands of master minds, like a Beecher or a Thomas, it becomes a power for true enlightenment.

Yet there is the stolid, dead weight of superstition and bigotry to move, which snarls and destroys those who attempt to give aid. There are always in every church, members who have inherited the dull inertia of past generations, and delight to hold things as they are, hating innovation. The fate of the preacher of new ideas depends on this conservative element, although in number they are the minority, because the liberal majority have not the moral courage to stand by their convictions.

If this correspondent proceeds, he thus may know what lies before him. He will learn the truth. No one ought to fear the truth. All ought to gladly welcome it, although it break their most cherished idols. He will most rapidly acquire knowledge of spiritual phenomena by organizing a home circle, as has been constantly urged through the columns of The Progressive Thinker. He will acquire a knowledge of the science and philosophy of the subject by reading.

W. N. Bagley: Q. I sometimes see forms and am told that I describe them correctly. All that I receive comes to me like a tiny whisper. Each word clearly spoken. Beyond this phase I do not advance. How shall I proceed?

A. This correspondent has held seances alone for three years, and will not go beyond his present phase unless he sits in a circle with others, and thus increases the influences bearing upon him. He is now entirely for himself, then he would give to others. Aside from the magnetic influence of the circle, he would have spirit friends of all the members, anxious to communicate, by the methods offered, as has been repeatedly explained.

Adelbert: Q. What is the foundation of true happiness?

A. In attempting to gain happiness many lose it in grasping for its shadow. It is not to be gained through the appetites; the delicate food which tempts the palate, the sensoned dishes, the blending of many flavors. The time comes when the taste refuses to be pleased and dyspepsia takes the place of digestion. The crust is sweeter to a hungry man than the richest viands to the pulled tongue.

Rare wines distilled by the sun, with delicate flavors, are sipped with mirth and gossip of fair lips, but at the bottom of the ruby cup is the lees of unquenchable thirst and death. One lacerated nerve makes life a martyrdom. The luxuries of wealth are indifferent, the softest down a bed of nettles, the costliest viand tasteless to the diseased.

"Give us health!" cries nature. No puny sicklings, but the bounding pulse of fresh blood, the firm muscle, the quick nerve. When the songsters come up from the South to greet the spring, their voices gladden hill and dale, there is no weak note, no feeble wail, but the fullness of strength. The pride of the forest, the sleek denizens of the wild, have no "pleasures" aside from those which flow from the normal activity of their being. Health means perfect harmony between the laws of our constitution and our environments. While to transgress a moral law has been regarded as a sin, the most flagrant abuse of the body has received no consideration, or even by great systems of religion been taught to be praiseworthy. It is just being accepted that a pure spirit requires a pure body, and that while united in earth-life the two are mutually dependent.

Mrs. Alice V. Smith: Q. Why must we talk with our spirit friends through a medium, often a total stranger to us and to them?

A. This question is more often asked than any other, by those who are not informed in the philosophy of Spiritualism. There can be no doubt but spirits would prefer to converse directly with their friends. It is not a matter of choice. They have to accept the means furnished, and if their friends make no effort to supply the essential conditions they cannot communicate. If we would send a message by telephone or telegraph we must go to some office where there is an instrument. It would be evidence of our ignorance if we objected to sending a message if we could not send it through any other object as well, or received a message through our watch, or a sofa, as through the telephone.

A medium is like one of these instruments, responsive to and recipient of spirit thought, and able to transmit it to friends on earth.

A MOOTED QUESTION.

Are there Animals in Spirit Life?

That seems to be a sticking point with many would-be Spiritualists and others who have been long familiar with spirit teachings.

"Animals in spirit-life! Oh, that is too much!" they exclaim, "and then if you begin where will you draw the line; if horses and dogs are admitted, then why not cats, reptiles and mosquitoes?"

And how messages contradict one another over this point, too; even our best and most reliable mediums and speakers disagree.

"Certainly there are animals in spirit life," says one.

"Animals have not reached a plane of existence where they can survive the shock of death; they are not found in spirit life," says another.

Now for myself, I have no difficulty in reconciling the two statements; the trouble lies in our own misconceptions of spirit life. We persist in placing it on the same material basis to which we are accustomed.

"Each one makes his own home, his own surroundings in spirit life." This is the burden of all the instructions we have received from whatever sources; two persons might be in the same room and yet occupy widely different spheres of thought and feeling.

I have seen horses and dogs that showed as much intelligence as do some of the human race; and I cannot believe that these noble creatures are left entirely out of the scheme of immortality.

Suppose one loved them and missed their presence. It certainly would not detract from his happiness to find them roaming in careless enjoyment among the green fields of his spirit home. They would be there because they were on the same plane of love and affection. If one did not care for animals he would not be conscious of their presence. They simply would not reach his spiritual vision, and thus he might say that animal spirits had no existence. They would not have, for him, and if one did not love rats and reptiles they would not be present to him.

I imagine if the lower orders of creation have any share of astral life they would not be conscious of it, and they would soon be absorbed again in material life. Probably animal life even of the highest order, is not destined to immortality, as such. It may endure for an indefinite period, longer or shorter according to the scale of its intelligence. It must then be reincarnated until through successive stages it gains the crown of human happiness. Thus all creation is a constant growth from the mineral to the vegetable, from vegetable to animal and from animal to spiritual life; and none are left out of the scheme.

Our loves as they now are will not always continue; even the love of children and friends is essentially selfish.

We love them because they are our children and our friends. But when we have grown in spirit life for hundreds, nay thousands of years, perhaps, our, and mine, will have merged into a world-wide love that takes in everybody's children as our own.

LIFE'S VOYAGE.

The silvery light of the fleeting years
Has crowned the hair with gray,
And the weight of Time has bowed the form,
And the feet faltering stray,
And the shadows deeper, longer, grow,
While the eye has lost its fire,
But the path we tread, by the angels led,
Is the one our souls desire.

And while we linger here and wait
In the troublesome wake of years,
With growing weariness of the gait
And a dullness of the ears,
With fading hopes of worldly fame,
And a faltering in life's quest,
The heart grows warm with love again
As we dream of home and rest.

A little more loneliness as we see
Our loved ones pass away
To join the hosts of the arisen and free,
In God's Eternal Day.
A little more care of toil and strife,
In earth-forms of feeble clay,
Ere we slip the cable for the voyage of life,
And float into heaven's bay.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

A highly interesting study of the psychic sciences has been commenced in La Presse, an influential daily paper published in Paris. In the opening article, on the 10th of April, we find the following judicious and impressive remarks: "It is right to affirm at the very outset an incontestable truth, namely, that the supernatural has no existence. Howsoever extraordinary they may appear, all the phenomena of which trustworthy mediums are the unconscious cause, all the manifestations of still obscure forces, all the partial revelations of a scattered life around us, inapprehensible by our groser senses—all these belong to an exclusively natural order. There is really no room to cry out "a miracle," nor to look upon the inexplicable with the eyes of Henry the Fourth's contemporaries, brought face to face with a cinematograph, a telescope, or an automobile. What is so very wrong, for the most part, is the bringing of preconceived ideas to bear upon subjects of this kind."

Precisely so; and these preconceived ideas are usually the offspring of ignorance and conceit; for the people who entertain them are so ignorant as to be incapable of believing that there are any natural laws outside of those with which they happen to be acquainted; and they are so conceited that they refuse to listen to, much more to credit, those who speak to them of novel phenomena.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHY.

M. Witold Chlopicki contributes to the Revue Spirite (Paris) a narrative of a striking occurrence which has taken place in Warsaw; where M. Gorowski, an instrumentalist in the Opera House in that city, had the misfortune to lose a little daughter three years old. He earnestly desired to possess a photograph of her before her body was committed to the grave, and a young operator undertook to gratify his wish. The corpse was posed in a large armchair, with a heap of flowers upon her knees, and the portrait was taken. When the negative came to be developed the photographer found a shadowy hand, that of a female adult, on the left hand side of the child. He was somewhat vexed at this unaccountable "blemish," as he considered it, and took a second portrait. Again that hand appeared, and this time another was faintly indicated. Not only so, but these two features of the picture were developed before the white robe of the child. "Therefore," remarks M. Chlopicki, "these mysterious hands were more lucid than the robe itself, and this phenomena is, really, a special peculiarity of astral bodies. This circumstance ought to decisively dispel all doubts as to the authenticity of the phenomenon of the apparition of astral hands."

The Revue Spirite publishes a reproduction of the photograph, in which the mysterious hand, with the wrist and a portion of the sleeve are clearly visible, but the rest of the arm fades off into nothingness, although the panelling of the wall behind is very indistinct as though seen through some semi-diaphanous substance. It is a left hand and delicately shaped, bent at the wrist, and the retreated fingers are pendent, and very near the child's left shoulder.

BEETHOVEN AND HIS DEAFNESS.

In an article on this topic, L'Humanite Integrale (Paris) writes as follows, apropos of an essay in the Banner of Light, on the evolution of new senses in human beings: "The case of Beethoven would permit us to conclude that deafness is an indispensable element, so to speak, of a superior perception, or of the perception of superior harmonies, since Beethoven conceived in spite of his deafness, the most admirable music that any musician in the world could have conceived; and, moreover, it is an interesting fact to remark that he composed his finest works after he had become deaf. We may, then, assuredly conclude that deafness does not exclude the perception of the superior harmonies, or of the sublime sympathies of the soul."

We are happy to be able to offer an authoritative confirmation of the above. Speaking to the present writer, through a private trance medium on the 20th of May, 1896, in reference to his own earth life, Beethoven said: "When it first dawned upon me, while I was a comparatively young man, that I was to be a deaf musician, the prospect of it so appalled me that I was driven to the verge of suicide. Can you imagine what such a privation must have been to me? I bore it very impatiently; but as I grew older and became stone-deaf, I found that, instead of my powers as a composer failing me, it was then that the grandest and most beautiful of the works which now bear my name, flowed from my pen, and I will tell you the reason why. I was a medium, and my spiritual guides deprived me of my hearing for a specific purpose. It was the will of the Father that it should be so; and as my physical hearing left me, I became clairaudient, and actually heard the glorious music I have given to the world, before a note of it was committed to paper. Then I grew reconciled to my infirmity; for, although I could not hear my works when performed by earthly instruments, yet I had previously listened to them all. Thenceforward I had to go through life more lonely than ever, and it was one of the sorrows of my existence to be debarred from familiar intercourse with the few persons whom I really esteemed; so that the privation of hearing intensified my sense of solitude. Even my nearest and dearest friends did not know Beethoven, for I was alone, excepting that I was companioned by the messengers of God. On the other hand, my human friends were very few, and I was compensated for their silence, and consoled for my own isolation, by communion with ministering spirits. The stories told of my having been morose in temper, and savage in my habits, were partly true. I was extremely irritable. It was my failing. But those who complained of and censured it, were blamable, in no small degree, for my weakness. I was proud, and, as the possessor of a divine gift, I was sensitive. I felt that that gift should not be used lightly or irreverently; and when the upper classes of society in Vienna wanted me to play to them, for their amusement, without in the least comprehending the higher meaning of my music, and to prostitute my divine art by making it a pastime for elegant idlers, then I rebelled and refused to cast my pearls before swine. I would cheerfully have played to the beggar in the street if I thought he could comprehend the message I was commissioned to deliver, and I have often played by the hour to a few friends capable of comprehending it."

A UNIVERSAL GOD!

On the admission that God is; that all existence is of and in him, and that he is spirit, it follows: 1st, that the substance-real of all things is spirit, and hence that matter is spirit; 2nd, but spirit being invisible, and matter visible, it follows that matter is a form or condition of spirit; 3rd, that the substance-real of all things being spirit, the dominant law of the universe is spirit law; 4th, that matter being conditioned spirit the laws of material creation are subordinate to spirit law; 5th, that the invisible creation behind the visibility of Nature is a spirit counterpart of the material one in all things animate and inanimate; 6th, that hence to be spirit does not necessarily imply either consciousness or life; the crystal has neither; the blade of grass but one; 7th, that the inherency of spirit is, therefore, a fact as absolute in the carcass as in the living animal, and as really so in the ashes after, as in the body before, cremation; 8th, that spirit senses discern spirit things by direct cognition, as material senses by direct cognition discern material things; 9th, that the senses of spirits in the flesh are competent for direct spirit cognition, as mesmerism and natural trance phenomena have abundantly demonstrated; 10th, that hence phenomena which are legitimate spiritual phenomena never manifest to the material but always to the spirit senses of the split selves of animals and man; 11th, that no phenomena which are cognizable through the material senses are spiritual in a true sense; 12th, that all phenomena cognizable by the material senses are natural—phenomena under discoverable laws within the purview of science; 13th, that hence the term spiritual phenomena is a misnomer when applied to "physical manifestations;" 14th, that spirit phenomena originate in two radically distinct spheres, which, for distinction, may be called the superior and inferior spirit worlds; 15th, that the superior is the greater spirit world beyond the death chasm of Nature, the light of which is God the Celestial Central Sun; 16th, that the inferior is composed of the invisible spirit globes which constitute the real of the visible creation; 17th, that spirit phenomena of the greater spirit world relate to the spirit man; spirit phenomena of the inferior spirit world relating to the spirit selves of animals and man; 18th, that the spirit counterpart of a globe is in a special sense the spirit world of that particular globe; 19th, that the spirit law which points the needle to the pole manifests itself as visibly in the instincts of plants, animals, and the intuitions of man.

THE SOUL AND MIND.

Prof. Lockwood's Lecture at Lily Dale.

Prof. Lockwood gave another lecture at Lily Dale, Sunday afternoon of a scientific nature. There never was a speaker, says the Jamestown Daily Tribune, on the platform who could make the philosophy and science of Spiritualism so clear and so plausible as Prof. Lockwood. From a purely scientific basis he thwarts all opponents and presents and proves the actualities of the truth. This is the last lecture he will deliver this season and great applause greeted his utterances and he was offered a standing vote of thanks, which was heartily responded to from the audience.

His subject was "What Shall We Instruct; How Shall We Educate?" and said in part:

The term "instruction," in its liberal interpretation, means to transmit, or to induce a line of thought into the realm of human mentality. A thorough analysis of this process of instruction will discover that possibly errors, as well as truth, may be introduced into our systems of thought; but to say that such erroneous systems of thought educate, is not true. Man is never educated by entertaining mental errors. Recent discoveries along the line of mental cerebral science disclose an order of mental formula that was unknown until recent time. The establishment of the cortical areas of the human brain discloses special centers of ganglionic character, co-related to the anatomy of man, each of which has its especial functional power and influence in mental process. These discoveries, are modifying the opinions of the physiologist and the psychologist as to the relations of mental processes, and as to what comprises mental action.

Incoming waves of molecular vibration impress human consciousness through the optic tract, which process we call seeing. Hence it will follow that man has no sensation of seeing until his consciousness, an attribute of the soul has been impressed. Seeing then, is to be understood as the result of incoming waves of motion through the optic tract impressed upon consciousness—the optic tract comprising only one of the avenues through which consciousness is impressed.

This formula of impression applies with equal force to all of the so-called five senses of man. In the light of this analysis mind will be seen to be the result of impression, and not the thing impressed. Man has no mind, no sensation until the canvas of his consciousness has been impressed by incoming waves from within the mental laboratory of his own cerebral organism or from without. We can have no mind of any object in nature until some of the various avenues through which sensation obtains, have been put into vibration. Mind, then, is a result of the reaction of vibrations upon human consciousness, and is not the entity impressed. The greater the number of educative impressions upon the conscious principle of man, the greater the mind. This view will establish a fundamental thesis for the correct idea of how consciousness is impressed and it gives us a scientific basis for the entertainment of the science of psychology.

All modes of motion in nature are invisible. Their action upon consciousness through the cerebral organism is also invisible. We cannot see any of these processes, any more than we can see the molecular changes taking place in a blade of grass that promotes its growth. The modern psychist is discovering that we live in a spiritual universe where invisible modes of motion promote the visibility of form; and he argues that an invisible formative energy of shaping character, as the real thing that is acted upon in the process of development or growth. An erroneous idea has obtained and frequently finds expression that man has five physical senses. In the light of the foregoing, it will be seen that man has no physical senses. Since his consciousness, an attribute of the soul, is the entity impressed, which is admitted to be of spiritual character, and it could not be thus impressed, were it not eternally co-related to a spiritual universe, where invisible modes of spiritual motion comprise the laboratory of infinite cosmic art and progression. Man does not see with his eye, he does not hear with his ear, he does not feel with the nerve, but only sees and perceives with his scious ego, and he is beginning to comprehend, discovering that all the avenues of sensation are simply electrodes that connect him to the world without or to the realm within himself. Now the question comes to us, as a progressive body of thinkers, shall we continue to instruct the old formula of mind ideals, or shall we educate the human by demonstrating the new? The recent discovery of wireless telegraphy is in evidence in the application of this line of thought. (Here Prof. Lockwood explained the mechanical structure of the system of wireless telegraphy.)

In the manifestation of this phenomenon we see that the raps of the telegraphic key induced in the atmosphere of a highly tensioned vibrator are transmitted to the accumulator tensioned to the same vibrating rate in the same electro magnetic circuit which responds to the raps of the key although they may be 100 miles apart. This phenomenon could not take place did we not live in a universe of radiant matter so highly potential as to be reciprocal to every impulse, energy or mode of motion, known to the entire scale of cosmic possibilities.

When we think of the electro possibilities of this radiant matter and motion, and that human consciousness through the mechanism of the key and accumulator, may transmit a message to human consciousness, we recognize in this phenomenon and its analysis a basic principle in the attributes of motion. And Spiritualists and progressive thinkers will see in this analysis its analogy to the mental structure of the human brain, which contains not only volition as the operating key, but a sensitive, highly-tensioned receptive mentality that occupies the place of the accumulator. Hence mental energy transmitted from one mind or intellect to another, may be correctly received and comprehended, when the receiving mentality with its sensitive accumulator is potential or reciprocal to the mental act of volition of the sender of the message. This fact in nature establishes, without the possibility of cavil, transference of thought as a scientific fact. To think that the human intellect can send out a message of love and sympathy to its friends remote, and that these volitionary acts of the sender can be received by the friend to whom they are sent, is a phenomenon of the possibilities of a spiritual infinitude before which, all other phenomena known, sink into utter insignificance. The transference of love and sympathy by the transference of thought, will become a mighty factor of civilization when we fully realize its significance. In the manifestation of these mental phenomena on the earth's plane, we trace the corelation of consciousness on the mortal plane to consciousness beyond the grave by the same electro art or principle of nature. To know that the soul is eternally co-related to soul throughout the vast eras of space, is a truth well worthy of the consideration of the ablest thinkers of our time. These facts and the principles lying behind them, existed before Bibles were known—before the philosophy of Zoroaster, before the Zend Avestas were thought of. These principles of time and space have always existed, hence we affirm that the eternal truth of our relationship to life beyond the grave and of its mental relationship to our plane of thought is a truth with which Bibles, sacred cosmogonies and crucified saviors have nothing to do. These latter are idle speculations of a primitive age before the discoveries of modern psychic and cerebral science were known to human research.

A more thorough investigation of these sublime principles and records of nature will demonstrate not only continuity of life, but the immortality of the soul, a cosmic process with which the formulas of theology and ecclesiasticism, have nothing to do. Let us extend, then, these boundaries of the possibilities of nature in the evolution of the human soul, thereby extending the boundaries of human knowledge. Let us learn to honor ourselves and humanity at large, and let all of the gods of past and present time, take care of themselves.

THE BEST RELIGION.

Humanity Versus Christianity.

Some one has said that "comparisons are odious;" this no doubt is true, but to a people who are honestly endeavoring to learn the philosophy of life which is so vital to the progress and happiness of mankind, such matters should not stand in the way of fair and honest investigations, nor should they cause a feeling of odiousness in any one who is sincere and interested in the bettering of social conditions.

Humanity is defined as "Quality of being human: Kindness: Benevolence."

Christianity as "The religion taught by Christ."

Many people are seriously opposed to the forms and ceremonies used by the followers of Christ, and it is my object to show that the religion of Humanity pure and simple is superior to, not only Christianity but all others, and that it can and does exist apart from and independent of them.

With our social life as a body politic, in more or less chaos, our penitentiaries filled, our jails and workhouses crowded, our asylums for the insane multiplying, drunkenness and vice ever on the increase and our divorce courts overworked, is it not time for those who are interested in their fellow beings to hesitate and endeavor to devise ways and means to stop these awful curses to human happiness. Is it not time to throw aside prejudice and hold in abeyance sentimental ideas, and would it not be better to rely more upon the genius and humanity of man than on the mercy of God? Is it after all the business of God to directly cure disease, to prevent temptation or to point out the path of virtue, peace and contentment. It is my opinion that our failure to follow up what we know, and our blind faith in what we do not know is largely responsible for many of our social difficulties.

So as to overcome our troubles and in order to promote the greatest good to the largest number, I point with pride to the religion of Humanity; not a person but a principle, the cultivation of which enlarges the soul, blights ignorance, destroys superstition, relieves misery and drives away poverty and crime. It fills the human heart with joy and peace; it brightens life and develops hope; it fills the world with love and song. In every system of religion it is weighted down with chains of dogmas, creeds and useless forms and ceremonies; the man is made superior to principle, and the result—a large portion of disease, misery and crime.

It is absolutely proven that enthusiastic followers of individuals are more or less fanatical and without exception intensely prejudiced; as a rule they are intent upon forcing their belief upon others, frequently inciting acts of violence and destruction of lives and property, then posing as martyrs. These traits have been particularly prominent in the Christians and Mohammedans of early and middle ages, and the spirit still lives. The followers of Buddha seem to have been an exception to the rule, and this is clearly due to his teachings, I believe. He said: "Purify your hearts and cease to kill, that is the true religion." This is the religion of Humanity. It is noticeable that the Christian nations are the best armed and equipped for the destruction of life and have the largest bodies of soldiers: what for? "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils: they shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them: they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover."

Christianity needs guns and soldiers to carry on the work of spreading these false promises, and I accuse them of treachery because when people believe such absurdities they neglect rational means for bettering their condition.

Humanity needs no means for destroying human life, it gives no commands to be enforced and makes no foolish promises which mislead and bring poverty, crime and misery in its wake. The object of Humanity is to elevate man mentally, morally and physically; to bring joy, comfort and peace to man while on earth; it seeks to educate mankind that he may be better able to aid others as well as himself to avoid the pitfalls of misery and want; it would disseminate knowledge which would save the lives of millions and bring health and comfort to millions more. Humanity does not say "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels," nor, "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot become my disciple." Humanity does not encourage man to make a fool of himself for the sole privilege of being persecuted.

Humanity does not preach either "Heaven" or "Hell." Nature's laws are its word of God; love, kindness and charity, its mission; the reward it deserves, is its hope; it knows no creed but love, no dogma but justice tempered with mercy; it needs no forms or ceremonies except the simple act of doing. Faith or belief in the unknown is not required of its followers; it knows no race, no sect, no condition of life, but is as boundless as eternity. It has no Popes, no Bishops, no Preachers, and no Elders or Deacons; all its followers are on an equal footing. What it does is done from a sense of love and duty uninfluenced by the fear of "hell" or the reward of "heaven." Humanity demands that the salvation of the soul must depend upon merit and not upon "faith" or "belief." It relies upon natural laws and proclaims that eternal bliss or everlasting torment is unreasonable; that a "rise" from "hell" to "heaven" is as possible as a "fall" from "heaven" to "hell."

Humanity is in harmony with all the noble and practical philosophy as taught by the world's great teachers; it could thrive better without other systems of religion, while without humanity as a minor principle these various systems would be a total failure. Humanity is broad and universal; it exists where Christianity is unknown, among all people, and is the foundation of all progress and civilization.

When Christianity merges into Humanity, shakes off the useless forms, ceremonies, creeds and dogmas; when man loves man more than man-made Gods and Saviors; when the church opens its doors to all, regardless of what they believe or disbelieve, and every one donates his mite for the elevation of man, then the condition of man will rest upon a higher plane. As Christianity becomes divested of its pagan forms and rites, its "faith" and its "belief" in the unknown, the two monsters which hold in bondage the intellects of millions, Humanity with its love, its truth and its justice, will take its place and man will be truly happy; there will be less crime, less drunkenness, less want and less insanity; more of love, peace and contentment, with increased knowledge and harmony.

OUR PREMIUMS.

There are many Spiritualists who know a good thing when they see it. There are others, however, who do not seem to realize what is going on around them, and therefore miss many chances to enrich their minds and enlarge their understanding. Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World is furnished to our subscribers at less than cost, and should be in every family in the United States, whether Spiritualists or not. Volumes 1, 2 and 3 constitute a wonderful magazine of thought on Death in its multifarious phases; in fact you can not find in all the libraries of the world as valuable information in regard to Death as you will have presented to you in these three volumes. They are nicely printed, neatly and substantially bound, and are an ornament to any library. Volume 3 is furnished at 25 cents, much less than the actual cost to us, and the three volumes, when ordered in connection with a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker, only cost $1.10. The aggregate cost of the three books to the trade is $4.50. At this price, these three books ought to be in every Spiritualist family.

The Progressive Thinker is the first Spiritualist paper to inaugurate the Divine Plan—a portion of the profits of the office returning to subscribers in valuable books.

VOLUMES 1, 2 and 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Art Magic, Ghost Land, The Next World Interviewed, and the Occult Life of Jesus (including the Hull-Covert Debate) constitute our premium list. Those seven books have been on sale, costing the buyer in the aggregate, $10.75. We, after paying the postage and expense of mailing, realize only $1.50 for the seven—far less than cost to us. We desire to form the nucleus of a library in every Spiritualist home, hence this remarkable offer. By subscribing for The Progressive Thinker, you then have the privilege of purchasing these books at the premium prices. See terms on another page.

Important. At the earnest request of hundreds of my friends and former patients, I have prepared a Course of Lessons on the Psychic Science. This Course of Lessons include Psychic Healing, Vital and Personal Magnetism, Intuition, and like occult subjects. In its wide scope it not only teaches its pupils how to cure themselves, but at the same time teaches them how to heal others of disease and how to be successful in their every venture, be it for political, commercial or social ascendancy.

The course is so plain that anyone who will take it up as a profession and give his time and attention to it can make a grand success in its practice. These lessons not only teach you how to heal disease but they also teach Personal Magnetism, through which you can silently influence those about you, so as to acquire influence, friends, prosperity, success in business, in fact, anything that you want. The course will be worth many times the price you pay for it, simply to cure yourself and increase your ability and eliminate any bad habits, such as the drink habit, tobacco habit, sexual excesses, etc. The entire course of instructions is taught by mail and you can matter every point in this science in the secrecy of your own home without loss of time in attending to your business. CLUBS!

CLUBS CLUBS

We want ten thousand clubs formed in every part of the United States, for which we present inducements never before offered by any Spiritualist paper. These clubs must consist of ten subscribers, and each one will get Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death; or if they would prefer it, they can have the Next World Interviewed. They can have their choice of the two. Each subscriber in order to avail himself of this offer must pay $1.15. The fifteen cents is to pay expense of postage and mailing, and the books sent out are practically a gift. They are not cheap affairs; they are nicely and substantially bound in cloth, neatly printed in clear type and are ornaments to any center table. The contents are indeed valuable, such as every Spiritualist family should have. The aggregate price of these two books to the trade is $2.75. To each of our club subscribers one of these books is a gift, and when they receive the one of their choice they will be delighted with it, and will wonder how we can afford to do so much for them. The one who gets up the club will be entitled to The Progressive Thinker for one year, and Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit Spirit World, and also the Next World Interviewed. He will not only get The Progressive Thinker for one year, but both books. He gets what is equivalent to $3.75 for his trouble. There should be no difficulty whatever in getting up hundreds of clubs.

Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World will not only interest Spiritualists, but church members will be attracted to it. The Rev. M. J. Savage, a leading liberal divine of New York, leads off with several of his masterly productions, treating Death from an advanced standpoint. He is followed by leading Spiritualists who treat of Death in a philosophical and fascinating manner.

The Next World Interviewed is also a very excellent work. The plates of this book were donated to the office of The Progressive Thinker by Henry J. Horn. It consists of communications from the spirit side of life from leading minds there. Fifty-five communications are given by prominent personages, among them Prince Albert, Harriet Martineau, Judge Edmonds, Horace Greeley, Lord Lytton, Fanny Fern, Dr. Livingstone and the Czar of Russia.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.
BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. - - - Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only veritable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. For sale at this office.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a faithful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity's moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL

BY

LOREN ALBERT SHERMAN.

Sets forth the Philosophy of Existence, with detailed evidence. It appeals to Christians and Spiritualists alike, as it demonstrates the truth of the spirit manifestations of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian religion is based, as well as the actuality of modern spirit manifestations. Its title page claims that the book is

A SCIENTIFIC DEMONSTRATION of the Existence of the soul of man as his conscious individuality independently of the physical organism; of the CONTINUITY OF LIFE and the ACTUALITY OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The first eleven chapters are devoted entirely to manifestations of the soul incarnate, with a clear exposition of the psychic philosophy.

The succeeding four chapters set forth the philosophy of the Infinite.

The last twenty chapters are devoted to an exposition of spiritual philosophy, with evidence in detail, much of it being personal experiences of the author.

SPIRITUAL JURISPRUDENCE

By One Who Wore the Ermine When On Earth—Given Through the Lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

Like Othello, "My occupation was gone."

From the affairs of human judgment, from a long life of studying and acting upon man-made law, from a judiciary which now seems an entanglement of error, yet which I then thought was the greatest and highest form of human arrangement of laws, I passed into spirit life. Honored far beyond my deserts, yet aware of fulfilling, as far as within my judgment lay, my highest duty.

I believed the law to be the supreme guidance of men and nations, and I deplored any departure from that supreme guidance. It is true, that I accepted a change of laws when inevitable; but founded in the Common Law of Great Britain and borne forward under its Magna Charta, I believed the laws of this country were most perfect. Yet there were times when it seemed to me that there was not sufficient simplicity, and that the making of too many laws might ultimately constitute the ruin of this Republic. The one thing required of the individual life I conceived to be, the fulfilling of man's duty in the line of life he had marked out for himself.

In religious matters I was content to take, in a modified form, the opinions of my father. I belonged to the church, to that church which in Great Britain is the "Established Church," but which in this country is not a State church; though in my secret heart I wished it were; still I could do nothing to promote it. I believed our forefathers did act wisely when they separated church from state. So I felt I would enter into the presence of the All-Wise, the dominant being whose judgment would be according to the strict lines of his infinite wisdom.

While there was something of humility (all is humiliation in the thought), still I had that consciousness of having fulfilled my duty well and of being obedient to the laws of my country and my God; that made me certain of a high estate in that kingdom. I believed that I had few shortcomings; in fact, if anyone had challenged my right I would have said, as far as I know, considering human frailties and weaknesses, my life has been up to the correct standard of duty and rectitude. I never reviewed my professional career in the judiciary, that I did not think it had been fully up to the highest sense of duty of one in my position. There was no weak yielding to sentiment when judgments were rendered. I took the greatest care not to allow my mere human feeling, which I believed a weakness, to get the better of my judgment and the law in the case. As I had sworn in taking my high office to sustain the laws of the land, so I fulfilled that oath according to best of my ability.

But, as I said in the opening sentence, like Othello, my occupation was gone. I did not sleep until that day when, according to our ritual, we are to be resurrected from the dead. I heard no "awakening trump," no voice summoning me. I was not aware of having slept. I passed out of earth life as from one room to another; and there, confronting me, were friends and those of my own household. They looked upon me with the greatest kindliness, with loving greeting. I thought they did not pay me quite as much respect as they should have done, considering some of them had been very humble in material life. I had been somewhat of a prominent man; their manner was more like the meeting of an equal. I thought I detected, if possible, a look of compassion in the gaze of some of them. They, pitying me! who would, of course, enter into my inheritance of spiritual life as one who had been just in all his dealings. I perceived that they received me with the greatest affection; but I saw no attendant angels, none whom I thought had authority. It seemed to me as though treated in keeping with what I had been in the earth life that, I should have had a little more recognition.

I do not know that I expected an escort of angels, but I had pictured to myself a sort of tribunal, similar to my court room, but much larger, into which I would be led and where my compeers would be arranged to receive me. Although that would not be the judgment seat of the Most High, still it would be a sort of preliminary examination for me to pass to the higher judgment. So imagine my surprise on seeing these people, members of my own family and friends, whom, indeed, I was glad to see, whom I realized I had in some measure neglected when they were upon the earth, for my professional career.

They came around to welcome me as to some new existence, though I had not passed from earth; I had no consciousness of entering the state or place of heaven. Then I perceived that there seemed to be no especial raiment, that I did not seem to be clothed in light. But no one came offering me the raiment of the spirit with other belongings that I supposed would naturally be my own. I also perceived, as I looked upon my spirit form, that I did not seem to be clothed in any especial brightness. The garments of earth had been cast aside. There was no insignia of office; but I found myself wrapped in what seemed to be something like shadow, a sort of gray substance or mantle enfolding my form. I thought this must be something simply incident to the newly arisen spirit, and when I came to be placed in full possession of my spiritual glory I would have raiment of light and a high estate because of a cruse salus.

I said a sort of requiem over my earth-form; while men paid tribute to me, and there shone on me the beam of glory and splendor from the office I held on earth, and those things that are conferred by human judgment; for I felt I was to pass to that which was so much superior, although the highest office, I regarded, in my own government had been bestowed upon me.

Presently I was confronted with a man wearing a look that seemed familiar, and yet it was strange, because, if I was right in my recognition, on earth I had known him as in humbler life. But he came forward to me, wearing what looked to be raiment of light; his countenance was beneficent. He said, as he held out his hand, "You are welcome to this life, and I am appointed to say to you, for the judgment which was an error of the head and not of the heart I have long forgiven you; but it was in your power, not only to have saved all that belonged to me, but my life." Then I remembered the countenance and how I had, notwithstanding the weakness tugging at my heart strings, pronounced judgment in exact accordance with the law, and I wondered at his patronizing air. Then I said to him: "Sir, I remember your face now, but it seems to me as though we have changed places; I see you are in a measure sitting in judgment upon me." "Not in the least," said he, "for I have not had in my heart one unkind thought concerning the only one through whom it would have been possible for my human life to have been saved. "Then," I said, "is it possible that the case in which I adjudicated against you I was in error?" "Quite possible, as you will see."

Then I saw what seemed to be quite a multitude of people, and they came toward me bearing a scroll, and as they came nearer they seemed to belong to an entirely different class of people from those I had mingled with upon the earth. Yet as they approached their countenances were radiant, and their forms were arrayed in brighter raiment than my own. As they came forward the scroll was placed before me, and I saw therein one of my own decisions. I read it; as I read it the sentences burned into my mind and into my heart, since I knew by that decision all these lives had been affected, and many of them had passed out of earth life because of it, and many of them afterward through the circumstances resultant of that decision.

I cannot name to you what that decision was, not because now I am ashamed of it, but because I do not wish my personality at present to be known. But it burned into my brain, and as they gazed upon me with kindliness I thought, "can it be possible that these men are greater in judgment than I?"

Again and again, for whatever length of time it may take for such things to occur in spirit—I know it was not a great length of time measuring from the human standpoint, but it seemed like ages—there came first one then another, then two or three, then a score all bearing similar testimony from away back in my professional life at the bar, where I began upon that principle of following the highest mandate of the law regardless of sympathy or human sentiment. A goodly array of faces appeared before me, some of whom had been mad with grief; others had been frenzied when condemned; but all seemed to be in better states than I. Their raiment was not so shadowed. They did not seem to be afflicted with aught that they had done. Where it had been in early life a matter of crime I had followed the legal proceedings closely and had adjudicated according to the law. But I found in some instances, to my great horror, that I had been utterly and absolutely mistaken. Though I said, as if in self-defense, crying out against them all: "I am not to be judged by any but by the Infinite Judge. I have tried to do my duty." But even as I spoke, I felt something tugging at my heart-strings, and there came a voice pleading, "But justice should be tempered with mercy always." Even as I would obtain mercy I was to be merciful.

I had forgotten this in the austerity of my life and judgment, in duty fulfilled and the doing of that which I had set out to do. So in no instance where there was an opportunity, where there might have been a chance for mercy, for the recommendation to mercy, even if one had been constrained to observe the full letter of the law, had I availed myself of this right of recommending mercy; though women had pleaded with me with tears in their eyes, though former clients had pleaded with me on behalf of young men, though there had been hundreds who had signed petitions on behalf of an oppressed class or people, still did I refuse. When all these confronted me at the very threshold of my spiritual existence I said: "Am I in hell, and have you assumed the raiment of light to try me here at the very gateway of this immortal life? I will not yield even now, for I have dealt justly with all my fellow-men."

Still the voice sounded in my ears: "Be ye merciful, even as ye would obtain mercy;" and it came upon me at last, that in following the perfect line of the literal fulfillment of duty, of my perfect observation of all religious and moral laws, and the announcement of judgments according to my highest conception, intellectually, of duty, there nevertheless would be such errors against humanity as to bring this array of witnesses against me; "but who shall plead my cause? Who! I cried, will stand and defend me? Am I here in the midst of all these who confront me, and no one to plead for me? I who have been accustomed to pronounce judgment?"

Then did the voice, relentless, pursue me: "No pleading of others availed with you, no tears moved you to human sympathy, nor did you take into consideration their ignorance and lack of moral training. In no instance did you ask for clemency and, on that account, who can plead for you against yourself?"

Then the conviction came as a solemn condemnation: I am lost, and this is but a brief respite before that fatal hour. Perhaps I have slept for hundreds of years and this is the awakening unto that which precedes judgment, and this is all to roll away like a scroll, and the heavens and the earth are to disappear, and the judgment is to confront me, and this is my first examination. How shall I pass then, when that great, gentle, benevolent countenance meets me; He who had no harsh judgment for any except the judges, and who viewed the abandoned sinner and the outcast with leniency? How shall I be able to bear it when that visage of light meets mine and I have no record of loving kindness?

I remembered that in my early ambition in my profession, although I had loved I would not follow the voice of that love, because it would take away from my own expectations; and I remembered hearing afterward in the height of my brilliant career that she whom I had first loved had died of a broken heart. I remember the contempt with which I read that message, and thought: "How weak are women's hearts that they could thus break so easy. Had she just been patient and lived a while longer I might have raised her to my own estate." But she had died, and there did the matter end. While that did not change my views, for I was then and am now in no mood to declare it; but I bore my life well in my profession. It was said of me and believed of me, that I was the most devoted, most honored, most respected among all the judiciary. Now where was I? In my hopeless state I even remembered that face, that youthful, beautiful face which in the first flush of young womanhood I had loved, but had cast aside as interfering with my aspiration in my profession. Where was she? I was ashamed to think of her. Yet something came to me that possibly she might plead for me. My mother, where was she? In the midst of all those around me the mother whom I had forgotten for the sake of my worldly honors, the mother whom I had, it is true, supported or aided, but who had never received from me any love since my childhood, where was she? Oh, perhaps in the great void that was coming to me, in that terrible judgment that I felt was to overtake me, I never in all the ages of eternity would behold those faces, or gaze upon others than these kindly, benevolent people who chose to forgive me. I did not even ask them for their forgiveness; I did not even feel toward them in a kindly spirit. It seemed to me as though their presence was a sort of impertinence.

Oh, the appalling consciousness was then mine! They had left me. I was alone. I was no longer confronted with my victims, for now it seemed to me that I was something of a murderer; it seemed to me that, without intending to be so, holding myself wholly in the right, I had committed sins such as criminals do; it seemed to me that a sort of prison house was forming around me, that I was going, perhaps, into that outer darkness where there are weepings, wailings, and gnashing of teeth. All of this gradually changed, and I seemed to myself to become a thing without a heart, a thing without light, to be separated from my kind, to have placed between myself and them this great barrier. Would no one come back, even with reproaches? I would treat them kindly enough if they would come and tell me that I had wronged them, and that they knew it was an error of the head and not of the heart. I would tell each and every one of them, that I did not understand, that I was ignorant of this great other law. But in the midst of all the moving worlds, in the great splendor of the heavens and starlit skies and of souls I felt utterly and absolutely alone.

Have you ever been wrapped in any selfish mood of sorrow, or of self-love, or even an ecstasy of human passion, shutting out all other things except your own sorrow, or your own enjoyment, or your own self-consciousness and suddenly become aware that you were separated from every other human being, from every other soul? Then you may understand, somewhat, my feelings. I remembered what I heard a clergyman say once. He was not a clergyman of the regular church. He was what was formerly called a "dissenter," still I heard him say that man was doomed to go down the steeps of eternity alone, and I felt that that was prophetic, and I thought, "Am I only one of all the other people in the great kingdom of spirit life who are alone and have they to confront this terrible solitude as I do?"

Then I saw myself, the other me. I do not mean my body, for that had been put away with very great honor, but I saw what seemed to be myself—proud, unbending, without sentiment, harsh in judgment, with outward behaviour that was full of decorum, but selfish in the pursuit of human honor and of gain, and having allowed nothing to stand between me and that human height. As I saw myself I looked like a stone image, not beautiful, like any statue I ever saw, but like an image, immovable. Was that my life?

Then I fell to torturing myself with conjuring up all conceivable things that would come to me: I thought of that 'burning hell" and whether it was a literal flame, and how I had heard a heart-rending revivalist once say that, "Hell was a million times hotter than any furnace." Then I fell to torturing myself about other things—little neglects, little unkindnesses and all acts that were done with the view of my own advancement. It seemed to me that this state would never end.

Then I again heard the voice: "God is love." Could this be and I be cast out? Yet was I more than any other? I instantly asked, since all this had come for all my persistent seeking for self, why should I not still seek for self? What was it that I wished, recognition in the kingdom of life which was not like my own. "All must work out their own salvation with fear and trembling." I had leaned upon the foundations of the church. I had supposed that my salvation was secure. I had given myself no concern about this, because I had followed the routine worship. And now I must work out my own salvation with fear and trembling? Was I not afraid? Was I not trembling? Was I not in a prison-house? What was there to confront me as the judgment of the Infinite? Would I be forever cast out? Again the voice: "God is love," came in accents sweet and familiar.

Gradually when this fear had almost taken possession of my soul, I saw the face of my mother. Oh, how I yearned for her! Yet I shrunk back. "Mother, you have not forgotten me? and yet for all those years I did nothing except my formal duty toward you; my mind was wholly alienated, my heart was dead. All there was, was myself. I forgot your paling cheeks and the wrinkles that were forming upon your brow, though you smiled, and praised that which men applauded in me. Then when you went away from earth life I forgot to mourn as children mourn for the mother they love. I only thought of you as having passed out of life, and gave you my dutiful regard at sepulture, and now, now you love me, you are coming toward me. Do not look at me with those loving eyes or I shall certainly expire," and I fell prostrate before my mother, and my mother lifted me up as if I were a babe and said: "My son, in the midst of all this it is madness and blindness thus to reproach yourself. There is that which is selfish even in too much self-reproach, and if you immure yourself thus in great sorrow because of your short-comings it is as much an error as to immure yourself in pride when on earth; do away with this and come into the life that is most natural. That which you did was incident to this over-weening ambition, and I, myself, might have fostered it. In your childhood I told you to emulate the example of great men. I bade you look at them as a stimulus for all you did; but I met all that on leaving my body. I met that with which you now reproach yourself. But come with me."

As I went I grew into a better state, although I still dreaded those haunting forms, those past decisions, those that were not tempered with kindness and mercy, the array of people whom it seemed to me now I had wronged. I said: "Mother, is there no time nor anything in eternity whereby I can blot out that record?" "My son," she said, "there is no need of blotting it out; these great errors of life, by their very greatness, react and you see in them stepping-stones to higher conditions. Your record is sufficiently bad from the standpoint of life here; but not one of all these whom you have seen bears you one unkindly thought, and it surely is selfishness if you now take up that thread and bear it forward continually to your own condemnation."

"But what shall I do?" I said, "which way shall I turn?"

"You are here and these friends are kind, then let me show you," she said, "the law of life in spirit. None sit in judgment upon others; you have been at the judgment seat of your own conscience. Not one of all these forms that you saw confronted you, but it was your own introspection, the vision of conscience, the partial awakening that made this grand arraignment before you. None of those in spirit life have come to you. They have no thought of unkindness; and no one is permitted to accuse another here. It is the law of spirit, that we attract those like unto ourselves, or we attract only our own conditions which we have made. Now let me show you another picture.

I saw my childhood days. I saw my mother as she then was, and how, up to the time when this dread ambition seized me, I was full of affection, and she, seemingly led me by paths along which grew flowers that I wished to gather for her in childhood, those first wild flowers for which we ransacked all the fields, and hills, and woods, then a little further on there the violets; and, oh! I remembered the scent of violets around her, whom I have mentioned, and I grew faint when there came up in my heart, full of pain, the thought that I would never behold her again; and my mother, divining my thoughts as I turned away, said:

"My son, there is one way unto perfect happiness, and that is by self-forgetfulness."

"But how am I to forget myself," I said, when there is nothing that does not remind me of my own short-comings?"

Then she said: "There are those in deep shadow. Come with me and I will show you."

I saw those who, 'neath the command of men, even like myself, were suffering in sorrow and agony. I saw them under the stress of human laws condemned to slavery and servitude—not in technical sense perhaps, but in the sense of oppression and power. I saw criminals in high places loved, respected and honored. I saw men in lowly places dishonored because of toil and poverty. I saw in the midst of the reeking crimes of crowded cities many bright lights crushed out by harsh decisions and cruelty. I saw jails and penitentiaries founded by men who were conscious of more humanity and greater piety than I myself possessed, and since in the midst of their crimes some of these men would wipe out the memory of the mother's face; and I saw others whom I could hate. Oh, if I could stamp upon human minds the impress of what came to me! That whomsoever thinketh himself great, wise and good shall pause in the midst of his career and remember what he is.

Then my mother said: "Yours is the mission, since you know all this from beginning to end, and have knowledge and access to all laws enacted by men, yours is the office to change human jurisprudence and that which is miscalled justice. First," my mother said, "you are not to think of crime from the human standpoint, but from the spirit; that takes into consideration the human condition. You are to endeavor to ameliorate the conditions of crime. Then you are not to consider that human laws in any sense are perfect; but you are to work for the greater perfection of human fellowship."

"But, mother," I said, "what do you mean? You talk as though there would be no laws, as though anarchy would prevail."

"My son," she said, "has it ever occurred to you that anarchy may be masked under the garb of law, that the greatest and divinest law may be put to death, even as was our Lord, because of human judgment?"

Then a new light came unto my spirit. As I gazed upon human law, upon all that relates to the affairs of men, it seemed to me that it was simply like a rope of straw; all the parchments, all the tomes I had read were like dust and ashes as I looked into human hearts and human lives. I said, "Mother, will it be in my power to change this?"

"When you have found the truth, my son, you will be able to impart it; until then you can do nothing."

"But what is the truth, my mother?" and then she pointed, as there seemed to be another vista beyond where we stood. There I saw a beautiful vision. The clouds opened, and there, in golden bordered letters, I traced, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another."

"My son," she said, "when that commandment was given it superseded the law and the prophets in Judea; why should it not supersede all the laws in the enlightened nations of the earth since it is true?"

"But how can it be true? Must there not be law before this can come true?"

"Oh, yes! for many, many centuries there must be, but," she said, "there comes a time—look again."

I saw certain lives whom I had considered seditious, certain ones whom I had helped to condemn growing luminous with that great love that was written there, and they came from among the people, and illumined human hearts to fraternity. Then there were new orders socially, and they brought about a new arrangement of business, and all those things that I had thought were illegal, seditious and worthy of being put down and destroyed; and they created local centers which became more and more radiant. Then I saw a horrible vision. I saw police and the militia employed against, and courts of justice condemn these men, as I had done. I cried out, "You are mistaken; these men are not seditious!"

My mother smiled. She said: "Your voice will not reach them. As yet the world is not in a condition to hear. But these centers of light will increase; these men called seditious will melt these shadows that you condemn; ethical law will increase and at last there will be a sense of the fraternity of the race."

"But I will go," I said "to the highest tribunal in the land and tell them that this is wrong, that they have persecuted men who are nearer unto me than I knew."

"That will not avail," she said. Reach the masses, appeal to those who constitute the power, the leaders of lives who rise to this knowledge and this standard. The men in power in the land where you lived are but creatures, not the creators, and so when these people understand they will destroy them, other lives will be sacrificed, these men will slay them. Have you not heard," my mother said, "that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church? In the great church of humanity the blood of those sacrificed in such a cause must form the seed for the future humanity."

Then I looked again. I would inspire such minds as I found were ready, minds that were peaceful but earnest; minds that were intent upon bearing forward this message. I, who had condemned such agitation, who had believed only in the usual course of the law and the usual enactment of law, would impress their minds to seek for different legislation, to ask for different privileges, and this I will do unto the end; if there is any power that can be brought to bear upon human lives for this end I shall fulfill it.

In my weakness, in my humility I am learning as a little child. My mother led me through pathways of violets when I had forgotten myself and lo! there among the violets and the lilies, waiting for me, was the one whom I had forgotten.

FREE THOUGHT.

The Growth of Liberalism.

The fundamental concepts of Liberalism are close kin to Liberty; free, not selfish, narrow or contracted; "embracing other interests than one's own;" open, candid, generous, broad-minded; charitable judgment of men and things. Liberalism impels us to demand "justice for all," not merely for self. No one can be a good citizen of this American Republic who is not a Liberal; who is not imbued with that principle in the preamble of the United States Constitution, "to promote the general welfare;" who does not recognize the glorious fact of equal rights for all, so finely expressed in the Declaration of Independence."

Amid the clash of creeds for 300 years Liberalism has steadily gained, and is to-day permeating the churches.

Occasionally a single society fails to keep step to the harmonious march of Liberalism.

Yesterday a Congregational church was dedicated in the town of Texas, Kalamazoo county, Mich., where forty years ago I began my public lecture work. For forty years these people have been without a church, most of them Spiritualists. They are a moral class, have been orderly, law-abiding, kind, neighborly. L. S. Burdick, now past 80, and his wife, formerly Mrs. Laura Voke, of Paw Paw, devoted Spiritualists, are a humanitarian, progressive couple. There are many here of a similar bent of mind, liberal, hospitable people; yet, I am informed that when the lot for the church building was about to be leased for ninety-nine years the church officials desired a clause to be inserted excluding Spiritualists' meetings. The owner of the land said: "No, I have many good friends among the Spiritualists."

I presume the church power has fixed it so that no Spiritualistic speaker shall ever be heard inside its walls! Doubtless that will be the arrangement in heaven.

Rev. Samuel Jones said: "Thank God! I have had but three fights since I was converted."

A couple of the members of this church could boast of but one. Through the neglect of Spiritualists to care for the instruction of the young as diligently as the church, Christians here may gain the third generation; but the liberal spirit is abroad. The world is growing better, although there are exceptions, like this new church. I used to say: "Well, Spiritualists are too liberal to exclude a public speaker of any other persuasion from advocating his sentiments in their building." I offered to rent a Spiritualist hall in a town not many miles from here. The secretary wrote me: "I am authorized by vote of our society to say, we cannot rent our hall to you on any terms."

That society needs liberalizing. It may be exceedingly spiritual, but is it truly liberal? I am glad that the bulk of Spiritualists are not ill-liberal—that they are not mere sectarians.

I have rented church buildings, and had some of them tendered free for my lectures, especially my temperance addresses. W. F. JAMIESON.

Michigan Notes.

The society at Sturgis, Mich., has already commenced the fall and winter work. They had two excellent meetings on Sunday, September 23. In the forenoon, Mr. Herbert Arnold, of Burr Oak, occupied the pulpit of the Free or Spiritual Church. Mr. Arnold, who is cashier or book-keeper at a bank in his little city, a few miles east of Sturgis, is a young gentleman of promise; he possesses a rather attractive personality, and his remarks were provocative of thought (sometimes con and sometimes pro). We hope he will warm the "sacred desk" with his presence soon again.

In the evening, Miss Eugenie Belfour, who is the sister-in-law of the president of the Harmonial Society, Dr. Denslow, entertained a numerous audience; she delivered a lecture, from a carefully prepared and faultless manuscript, which was inspiring and suggestive. Miss Belfour is a true gentlewoman, and she imparted pleasure and edification by her thoughtful and philosophical inferences from ascertained data.

It is the intention to keep up these meetings regularly every Sunday at 10:30 a. m., and 7:30 p. m. When professional speakers are not present the members or friends of the society will hold forth; the vocalists of the choir, assisted by the church organ, will execute musical selections, and a renewal of the "good old times" is anticipated. Those Spiritualists, independent thinkers and friends of progress generally, who live within a reasonable distance of this city would do well to avail themselves of these opportunities of attending Spiritualistic and scientific services in the Sturgis Free Church, as there are none others held nearer than Chicago (at least not regularly, I think). The church will be open every Sunday. I am informed, so no visitor from the country shall return disappointed. All are invited and would be welcomed. It is almost unnecessary to add that everything connected with those meetings is free—free church, free seats, free speech and free "salvation" thrown in.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters from Spirit Franz Petersilea to His Son, Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER THIRTY-SIX.

Robt. G. Ingersoll says: Friends and readers of The Progressive Thinker:—I want to say a few words on an all-important subject. Do not expect the spirit of a man to talk precisely as he did when on the earth and within his material body, for a great change has come to that man.

All the eloquence of rhetoric he has, mayhap, thrown into the waste basket as so much rubbish, or so many unnecessary words. I tell you, my friends, it takes the starch out of a man, mightily, to find out that he really knew so little after all. I feel now as though I were sifting jewels from an enormous amount of chaff—the jewels being few, rare, and far between; and, then, friends, my power as a writer was never as great as that of a talker or lecturer, for I gained power and strength from those whom I was addressing or talking to, and when I got well started I sometimes ran at a headlong pace and did not always know just where I should stop; moreover, spirits sometimes got hold of my brain and worked it to suit themselves, for some especial purpose. I often wondered if this were not the case, providing there were any such beings. Well, now it is quite different. I am not talking but writing, and writing through a foreign instrument or brain.

Now I don't want to be slapped in the face, because I am doing my level best to let you all know that I am not dead. I don't want to be told that my efforts are not worthy of me. That which I am trying to do is worthy of any man or spirit. I am trying to tell the truth—the great and glorious truth of the immortality of the soul. When a man is in deep, dead earnest, he doesn't always stop to cut and dry his words, but he shouts them forth in terse, short sentences. He is not trying to cater to an audience or please the people, but he shouts forth, "I have got it! Great God! I have found it;" and you cry, "What have you found?" and he shouts back, "That which all humanity have been seeking since the world began—Immortality! There is no Death!"

"How do you know?"

"Because I am here. I have passed the Rubicon. I have entered in at the straight gate, even the gate beautiful. Men call it death; but death and life are weird twin sisters. You pass from the hands of one directly into those of the other. Death is misnamed. She is really Life Eternal. Death is a phantom, but Life is real. Life is earnest. Life is beautiful, crowned with the flowers of immortal youth. I thought I was growing old and here I am, youthful, strong and powerful as a young lion—aye, I feel like a God. Ah! I realize now, to the fullest extent, the true meaning of all those old Greek gods. Symbols—symbols, my friends; nothing more. Why do I feel like a God? Because man is a God. That which I thought I did not know, I now know. To be immortal is to be a God. To never die—to live and learn forever is to be God, and they tell me here, that immortality is all the God I shall ever know."

I said when I was with you in the body, that all men ought to be happy, that all men should surround themselves with beautiful objects, that their homes should be models of comfort and beauty, that all men had a right even to the luxuries that mother nature bountifully supplies, and my mind is not changed in the least on those points, but rather I am more and more confirmed in such opinions. Every human being should surround himself or herself with the very most beautiful and comfortable things possible for him or her to obtain, and they should strive hard thus to do; but, do not misunderstand my meaning; in doing this they should be very careful not to rob or wrong another, for every penny a human being obtains unjustly, that he must return sooner or later. By this, one can see what a hell the millionaires are making for themselves. If they could repay these wrongs with money it might be easy for them; but money has no value here; the soul must pay—pay to the uttermost farthing; not in cash, but in unutterable woe. This is not fancy, my friends; these are not idle words but everlasting truths.

Every man, woman and child on earth has a right to a good and comfortable home wherein they may surround themselves with objects of art and beauty. No man should be in poverty and no man should be over rich, and no company of men should have the power to rob the people. A company of men whose business it is to rob the people are no better nor different, except in name, than a company of highwaymen. Robbery is robbery, call it by whatever name one may please.

Oh! it is beautiful here. Such wrongs are all righted here; and, perhaps, you will be better able to understand how it should be on earth if I tell you how it is here. First, then, we have no such thing as money value. All the riches we have belong wholly and entirely to the soul and spirit, and those who are the very richest in spirit have the most to bestow, and those who can give or bestow the most are the happiest; those who have not riches of soul or spirit are the poverty-stricken ones, consequently are the most unhappy. How strange it would seem to you of earth, if one of your multi-millionaires should say to himself: "I begin to see the error of my ways. Instead of gathering to myself I will bestow. Here, now, I am worth so many million dollars. I will reserve enough of this money to make myself and family comfortable, also to make my home beautiful and luxurious if need be; the remainder I will bestow upon those who have no homes. I begin to see that all would have homes if they had not been robbed of that which rightfully belonged to them. Now I will bestow all my surplus wealth and try to induce others, who are rich, to do likewise."

This man then takes his money and with it purchases a tract of land in a pleasant locality, divides it up into acre lots and upon each lot erects a pretty, convenient cottage—a real comfortable home—he can make as many improvements as his means will allow. Now he has got so many pretty and comfortable homes for as many as they will shelter, and he sets himself to the task of finding occupants among the poor and needy that he may bestow these homes to those who need them.

First, perhaps, he finds a widow with a family of little, helpless children; her husband, maybe, has just been killed on the railroad and herself and little ones about to be ejected from their miserable tenement rooms, and cold winter near at hand. He says to her: "Madame, I will present to you one of these nice cottages together with its acre of ground—that is I will give you a life lease of it—for these homes may not be bought or sold for money. I will also do what I can to aid you in obtaining food and clothing for yourself and children."

Again he finds a hard-working man with a family to support. The poor man has been out of work more or less for many months; he is utterly discouraged and dejected; he cannot pay the rent of the miserable and uncomfortable tenement which he calls home, but which is to him hell instead of home. The man has often longed for a pretty cottage and a nice bit of ground to cultivate, but has been too poor to obtain it. The rich man says to this poor fellow, "Come with me and bring your wife and children. Look! is not this a nice, comfortable home, and this acre of ground is just what you want. Here is a life lease of it. It is yours as long as you live and wish to reside in it. Take it, and thereby make me happy as well as yourself." And the poor man weeps for joy.

"I will also aid you in obtaining work, good, remunerative employment. I will employ you myself, if need be, for four hours each day, for which I will pay you one dollar per day."

How long do you think it would take this rich man, in or near Chicago, to give away these nice homes to those who cruelly need them; and those who suffer thus have been robbed of their rights, as men and citizens, by the rich and powerful, by monopolies, trusts, and so forth.

Now in the whole course of the rich man's life, he never experienced such joy as he now feels. Try it, some of you, and see if I do not tell the truth. Every man on the face of the earth has a moral right to an acre of ground with a pretty and comfortable home in the center of it, and no man on the earth has a right to any more in his own personality, and human beings ought not to live, huddled together like sheep, in a city, in tenement houses—houses owned by rich landlords who, each week, rob these poor people of their hard earnings and in return give them a place to live, little better than dog kennels, and treat them worse than they do their dumb animals.

Well, the rich man who has thus bestowed his surplus wealth becomes exceedingly happy, and his face shines with joy; for love, wisdom and goodness have entered into his soul. Now he says: "If my capabilities are larger than some of my poor brothers and sisters, and circumstances have placed me where I am able to do more good, I ought to be very happy and thankful; but, I want to be happier still; I want to be wiser yet; consequently, I will look around; mayhap there is other work for me to do. How much happier it makes me to work for the good of my brother man than it does to simply work for myself alone. As a rich, grasping man, I was always miserable, and now I have found the way to be happy, so I will work for the good of others with all my might, and as long as I can, for I like to be good and happy."

That man said, "As long as I can," and he can forever and forever, and forever more, and the more he does the happier he gets, the wiser he becomes—aye, he is a very God—an immortal Jove!

Now, my friends, that is one way of getting into heaven, and one of the very best ways I know anything about. You all want to go to heaven, don't you? That is when you die, or shuffle off the mortal coil? Well, why not go to heaven right now, just where you are? Don't wait a moment if you can help it. Why, the spirit can have heaven in the body as well as out of it. You don't need to get out of it to get into heaven, and if you don't get heaven before you get out of it, you won't find it when you do, for as you are, so you will be for a long time to come. Better hurry a little; you can't afford to wait. Why live in hell fifty years, more or less, hoping to find heaven at the other end, when you might find and take it along with you each hour and year you live on earth? Why, my friends, you don't know what a great big heaven you can make in that length of time; so, go right about it this moment, one and all; no matter whether you are a multi-millionaire or not, you certainly are able to do something toward making a heaven for yourself. If you have not got any money, you can search for jewels to distribute among your fellow-men, or you can do as I used to do, knock down some grinning monster that threatens to destroy the happiness of your brother or sister. The jewels are truths, the monster is error. Knock him down, knock him down! I say, and spare not—demolish him root and branch.

Error is a blatant Ananias, and Robert G. Ingersoll will kill him if possible. I wonder if blatant liars go about doing good? I wonder if they advise people to be generous, good, wise, virtuous, truthful, and to do unto others as they would have others do unto them? I wonder if they inspire men to give their money and talents toward furthering all good works, without hope of recompense other than the heaven it brings to them? Very strange kind of blatant Ananiases, are they not? Very peculiar kind of evil spirits, are not they? And fraud? Whom do they defraud? Well, suppose I admit the fraud, or, rather, defraud. I will admit the defraud. To defraud is to take away something that one possesses. If one possesses a spirit of evil, defraud him of it if you can. If one is grasping, cruel, selfish, immoral, it is good that he be defrauded of those qualities and their places substituted by the jewels of wisdom, love and truth, and by the beautiful flowers of generosity and benevolence.

The government should bestow on every man who reaches the age of taxation, or the age of twenty-one years, an acre of land, not to be sold, but leased to him during his natural life, and if the young man is not able to put up for himself a neat house, his friends and neighbors should do it for him.

Since coming here I find that people, as a rule, eat too much, and their food is not of the kind it should be. Now an acre of ground, put to good use—the best possible use—will nearly support a small family, and people should not have extremely large families. No man should toil more than four hours a day, the remainder of the time should be given toward cultivating some art or science, or all of them as for that matter. No person should eat more than two meals a day, and many can get along with one. If a man does not toil more than four hours a day a light breakfast and a good dinner is all that he requires, and he will find his brain clearer for the study of the arts and sciences.

No intoxicating beverages should ever be distilled or sold, and it is a great sinful blot on the government that licenses are granted for the selling of that which takes away man's reason and fills his body with disease. When a man has an acre of ground and a good home, a faithful, loving wife and two or three sweet children, he ought to be good and happy, and the most of men would be. When men and women cease to be cannibals, that is when they eat no flesh, the cost of living can be brought down to a very small amount. Now, friends, suppose some of you try a method of living such as I will here suggest.

We will say that already you are comfortably housed, that you have, at least, an income of six dollars per week, and your family consists of, say, five persons, perhaps father, mother, and three children; or it may be other relatives; suppose you sit down to a breakfast of oat-meal mush and a cup of coffee, the coffee really can be dispensed with, one would be all the better if one did not drink it. One-half pound of oatmeal will make breakfast for five persons, plenty, all they ought to eat; the oatmeal costs two and one-half cents, this feeds, and feeds well, five people; but when dinner time comes, we will have a greater variety, we will have bread, potatoes, together with some other vegetable; vary the vegetables each day in the week, that is, we will have peas one day, beans another, onions another, squash another, and so on; then we will have fruit; vary the fruit each day if the season will permit; and nuts; vary the nuts likewise. Now a dinner of this kind will not cost more than ten cents each person; so a good dinner for five persons will cost fifty cents, the breakfast and remaining household expenses would not exceed twenty-five cents, consequently a family of five persons can be well fed for seventy-five cents a day, and we think that even fifty cents a day could be made to cover the cost. If one had his acre of ground and house, free of expense, he could raise at least one-half the food necessary, which would bring his expenses down to twenty-five cents a day.

Now, as a rule, people dress more expensively than they ought, especially women. Women should dress simply and neat. Diamonds, velvets, silks and satins are not at all necessary, and an enormous, costly head-gear would put a savage to blush. Many women can dress very well on twenty-five dollars a year; fifty dollars a year can be made to clothe a family of five if three of them are children. Two hundred dollars a year can be made to support a family of five persons in comfort, and even a certain amount of luxury, providing the acre of land and house are at their disposal; and if the government owned all public works whatever, every man who needed employment could be employed by the government at the rate of one dollar for four hours' labor. Now I put the question to the government itself, if this would not be political economy? There would not be a really poor man or tramp in your land. All prisons and penitentiaries would soon die a natural death, and governmental institutions of learning would take their places. When men have homes and are properly educated, there will be no crime provided intoxicating liquors are not sold or distilled. Turn your great distilleries into temples of wisdom. Turn your churches into schools. Educate your young men to be as pure as you would have your girls. One should be as pure as the other. If a young man requires a pure wife, a young woman should require a pure husband. Oh, it would take very little, after all, to make the world good and altogether lovely and beautiful as it is here in the spiritual world.

This may not be considered by some as being very eloquent, but I feel quite eloquent on the subject.

The authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. The publisher receives not a single cent for the great expense he was to, hundreds of dollars being paid out in putting them in type, and electrotyping the pages, and making them ready for the printer. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for almost nothing. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of Spiritualists who take no Spiritualist paper, and this inducement is offered, in order that they may commence forming at once a Spiritual and Occult Library, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 85 cents, hence you are almost receiving them as an absolute gift.

By taking 85 cents from $2.35, you will find that all we have left us for those seven books is only $1.50.

A SCRAP OF HISTORY.

Illustrating the Finesse of Romish Advocates.

From the 13th to the 21st of January, 1837, there occurred in the city of Cincinnati, between Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Va., and Rt. Rev. John B. Purcell, Bishop of Cincinnati (later archbishop), a debate on the Roman Catholic religion, which was taken taken down by reporters, revised by the parties to it, and published in book form, the proceeds of the sale of which by mutual agreement, were appropriated to two public charitable institutions, Catholic and Protestant.

By a mere accident a copy of this book recently fell into the hands of the writer hereof, who did not see the light of day until seven years after it was published. He had read a similar debate held some years earlier between Bishop (later archbishop) Hughes, of New York, and Rev. Dr. Breckinridge.

In both of these discussions one fact is very prominent to the unbiased reader and that is the artful evasion of the essential points in the debates on the part of the Catholic participators. Were these debates to be held to-day before audiences composed of educated, intelligent Catholics and Protestants, it is doubtful if either party to the controversy would be able to create any interest in it. In America, the land of thought and investigation, of science and literature and the (coming) religion of Nature, both Catholicism and Protestantism are losing their old-time influence upon the masses in a theological or orthodox point of view.

In the Campbell-Purcell debate, Purcell's answers to Campbell's charges and the documents he quoted to sustain them, were simply that they were false, the documents spurious, forged by anti-Catholics, or else misunderstood, misinterpreted, etc. A general denial or evasion was the plan of defense set up by Bishop Purcell.

Some ideas of the responses Bishop Purcell gave to Mr. Campbell's charges may be gained from the following. Mr. Campbell had accused the Catholic church of permitting its clergy to keep concubines, and quoted from a standard author in the Catholic church as proof of the truth of his charge. This standard author was Alphonsus de Ligori, whom Pope Pius VII Canonized as a saint on the 15th of September, A. D. 1815, under the title of the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord Alphonsus de Ligori. I will now give upon this point in the debate the exact words of the disputants so the reader can judge of their merits:

Alexander Campbell:—Once more, from Ligori, and I shall have given almost a specimen of the immorality and impiety of the Roman Catholic rule of faith, on general points of religion and morality. There is no one subject on which we could be more copious than this one; but from respect to our audience we shall give but the remotest hint:

"A bishop, however poor he may be, cannot appropriate to himself pecuniary fines without the license of the apostolical see. But he ought to apply them to pious uses, which the council of Trent has laid upon non-resident clergymen, or upon those clergymen who keep nieces." Ligor. Ep. Doc. Mor. p. 444. Synopsis, p. 294.

Now, if a priest should keep a niece, it is a very expiable and trifling offense; but should he marry a wife, he must be excommunicated forever Thus the Roman Catholic rule of faith treats the Bible, and annuls, at pleasure, every law and institution of heaven.

Bishop Purcell:—The volume from which the gentleman has been all day reading, is one of those books of abomination and falsehood; put forth, in the city of New York, by Smith, Slocum & Co., and it is a fair specimen of their fashion of circulating truth. Does it not furnish strong presumption to the reflecting mind, that there must be something divine in the religion which such men and women combine to abuse? It was the monster Nero, notorious for parricide and lust, who first drew the sword against the Christian religion. Forget not then, I pray you, my friends, the proposition that is before us. I am determined not to slumber or sleep on this matter, but to probe it thoroughly and expose its rottenness to the world. Mr. Campbell's allegation against the Catholic church, is that Ligori, a standard moralist in that church, teaches, that priests may keep concubines by paying a fine, but that if they marry, they must be excommunicated. Whereas I distinctly deny that Ligori has ever taught anything so abominable, and that all who say so, are guilty of a most flagrant violation of the commandment of our God, which says: Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

Here are the complete works of Ligori, in eight volumes, with an index consisting of one volume. I have performed a work of supererogation. I have examined these volumes, from cover to cover, and in none of them can so much as a shadow be found for the infamous charge. I exonerate my friend from the sin of wilful misrepresentation, I will say he has been deceived, misled by—anti-Christ, perhaps, who can deceive the elect, if possible, that is to say, if I'll let him, which I have, in this instance, no notion of doing. The original tells the truth. The translation lies. My friends, I hope that the same audience which is here now, will be here this evening, and I pledge myself, before the heavens and the earth, that this base slander is what I call it. There is no foundation for it whatever in the works of Ligori.

EVENING SESSION.

My friends, it is imperative upon me to make one exposition before I proceed. Many of you were here when my friend would have led you into a gross mistake, respecting the Catholic church, by quoting a pretended extract from Ligori. I asserted then, that nothing could be found in that writer's works to substantiate the odious charge, to give it so much as a semblance of truth. I have now before me the entire works of Ligori, and I have placed them in the presence of my friend, Mr. Campbell. The 9th volume has an index, containing every word of any importance, and I repeat, that after a search through the whole nine volumes, nothing like the quotation of last evening can be found. I have now placed the book in the hands of Professor Biggs, of Lane Seminary, one of the moderators, and a Protestant of the Presbyterian denomination, if I do not mistake, and I will leave it to him, or any other intelligent and candid man, to say to you whether the fact is as my friend has stated, or the very contrary of what he has stated.

Mr. Campbell:—Be so good as to explain the matter fully.

Bishop Purcell:—I will explain the exact state of the case. Mr. Smith, the author of the translation, from whom my friend read this, as well as many other things, has given a false quotation, and made Ligori say, what he never said. The facts are these: A canon of the Council of Trent, and Ligori, according to the canon, says, "that if a priest falls by criminal intercourse, as specified, from the holy state of purity, to which he is bound by a voluntary, deliberate, and solemn vow, he shall be deprived of a large portion of his salary for the first offense. If he does not refrain after admonition and such punishment, he is again admonished, and deprived of his whole salary, and suspended from all his functions as a priest in the Catholic church. But after the third admonition, if he is still incorrigible, he is excommunicated.

Rev. Campbell:—Knowing, my fellow-citizens, how much depends in such a discussion, as that now in progress, on having authentic documents, I determined from the beginning to rely on none which could, on proper evidence, or with justice be repudiated. I knew that in all debates so far back as the very era of the Reformation this party has been accustomed to deny authorities, to dispute versions, translations, etc., even of their own writers who were so candid as to give a tolerably fair representation of themselves. And as all their historians, good and bad, frequently tell the truth, they are all occasionally to be censured, when that truth is quoted by a Protestant and turned to its proper account. I have not then, to my knowledge or belief, introduced an unworthy author. And so long as my opponent can disprove nothing which I have quoted, either from Du Pin, or Ligori, his frequent allusions to them, with such unqualified censures, only shows how much he feels the truth of their testimony.

Bishop Purcell:—My friends, Mr. Kinmont will now tell you whether the pretended quotation of Mr. Smith from Ligori, is correct. You will recollect that Mr. Smith said, that, according to Ligori, the Catholic church allows priests to keep concubines upon a fine. Upon hearing this I at once said that the charge was an infamous falsehood; and I will now show that Ligori said no such thing.

Mr. Kinmont:—I am called on in my professional character simply, and have no part or lot in this debate. (Mr. K. is understood to be a Swedenborgian). I sincerely believe they are disputing about shadows, and that both parties are equally in the wrong; but I will do what I can to assist in clearing up the difficulty of fact. I find it stated in Samuel Smith's work and marked as a quotation from Ligori, under the article headed "Concubines of Clergy."

Concubines of the Clergy.—"A bishop however poor he may be, cannot appropriate to himself pecuniary fines without license of the Apostolical see. But he ought to apply them to pious uses. Much less can he apply those fines to anything else but pious uses, which the Council of Trent has laid upon non-resident clergymen, or upon those clergymen who keep concubines."—Ligo. Ep. Doc. Mor. p. 444.

And the following is Smith's commentary:

"How shameful a thing, that the Apostolical See, as they call it, that is, that the pope of Rome, should enrich his coffers by the fines which he receives from the profligacy of his clergy! If they keep concubines, they must pay a fine for it; but if they marry, they must be excommunicated! This accounts, at once, for the custom in Spain, and other countries, and especially on the island of Cuba and in South America; where almost every priest has concubines, who are known by the name of nieces. These abandoned men are willing to pay the fine rather than forego the gratification of their lustful appetites. The 'Narrative of Rosamond,' who was once herself one of these concubines, in the island of Cuba, portrays the general licentiousness of the popish clergy, in colors so shocking, that the picture cannot be looked at without a blush. This keeping of concubines is a thing so common in the popish West India islands, and in South America, that it is rarely noticed. The offspring of this priestly intercourse are numerous. They are known to be the children of the priests; but, because it is the general custom, it is lawful; and it passes off merely with a joke or sarcasm."

Mr. Kinmont continues: This is the text and commentary as I find it in Mr. Smith's book. This is marked as Ligori, p. 444. If taken from Ligori at all, it is taken from a different edition. The present purports to be a complete copy of the works of Ligori. It bears no mark of being an expurgated edition. It is said to be an edition of what was said and written before with additions. On turning to the place where he treats of fines and punishments inflicted for concubinage, he says that priests guilty of this offense, were, after two ineffectual reprimands, to be degraded from their functions. He refers to the Council of Trent, and states what that council decreed. Smith throws us on Ligori, and Ligori on the Council of Trent.

Rev. Campbell:—My friends, you will doubtless have observed, that of all the extracts read from Ligori, found on the pages of Mr. Smith, but one was challenged by the Bishop, on the ground that it is not found in the page of St. Ligori in the edition now before us. The case is simply this. According to the moral theology of the church of Rome, marriage is a greater sin than concubinage; for, if a priest marry, he is forthwith excommunicated; but if he keep a concubine he only pays a fine. This is the statement that Mr. Smith makes as a correct translation from the passage in Ligori. Now, Bishop Purcell denies that there is such a passage in Ligori, or that there is in the Council of Trent any such arrangement; and in proof of it, he has brought us an edition of St. Ligori, and the decrees of the Council of Trent. But the edition which he has produced, has not, upon the page referred to, the passage quoted. In the passage quoted, the reference to Ligori is to a decree of Trent. But there are always two ways of quoting a passage, the one verbatim, and the other, substantially. Whether Ligori quotes the decree of Trent literally, or only quotes the substance, we cannot affirm. The bishop referred this matter to Mr. Kinmont, without consulting me. It was an exparte reference; and therefore comes not fairly before us. Although I have no objection to Mr. Kinmont; but on the contrary, I think him very competent to decide a matter of this kind, if he had time to examine all these volumes; and perhaps, had I been consulted, I should have agreed in selecting him; yet as the reference is wholly one-sided, it can have no authority here. However, so far as the decrees of Trent have been read, they do speak of fines or forfeitures of those who have concubines, and these do substantially sustain all that I have alleged. In his preface to his synopsis, Mr. Smith observes: "If they deny that we have given a fair translation, we will then challenge them to come forward in a public assembly with the works of St. Ligori, when we promise to meet them, and submit our translation, and the original, to the inspection of a committee, one-half of whom to be chosen by ourselves, and the other half by the Roman clergy. Truth never shuns investigation. If we have not given a fair, genuine, and true translation, and if we have not exhibited the doctrines of Ligori and the church of Rome fairly and correctly, without garbling, or giving an erroneous construction, we will be willing to incur the consequences that we ought to expect, for having deceived the public."—Synop. Pref. p. 12. I will thank the Bishop to inform me the date of his edition of the works of Ligori.

Bishop Purcell:—What is the date of Mr. Smith's edition?

Mr. Campbell:—1828.

Bishop Purcell:—This edition (pointing to his own) was also published in 1828; so that it appears both are the same.

Mr. Campbell (here taking up a volume of the Bishop's copy of Ligori) read, "Editio Nova Emendata." It hence appears that the Bishop's is a new amended edition; so that, probably, this and the one used by Mr. Smith are not the same. Be this, however as it may, nothing is lost by the examination; nothing is proved against Mr. Smith as a translator, and I shall write forthwith to New York to Mr. Smith for the original Latin of this passage in his edition, and have it certified and publbished among this community.

But were it lawful to read in this assembly, I have before me the decrees of councils, and the words of bishops and cardinals, teaching the very doctrine which the Bishop would represent as a reproach or calumny on his clergy and church. Here is the decree of a council at Toledo, and here are references to varous councils, such as Bivil Concilia, Tom. 1, pp. 737, 739. Crabb. Concil. Tom. 1. p. 449. Edition of 1551, and Pithou Corp. Ju. Canon. p. 47, as quoted by Dr. Brownlee, which go to prohibit priests "from keeping more than one concubine," and declare marriage in a priest to be "a mortal sin." And here is Costerus and Cardinal Campygio who taught what I dare not read here; but I will reserve all this for a more convenient season.

Mr. Campbell received documentary substantiation in reply to his letter to Mr. Smith, which appears in the appendix or notes supplementary to the printed debate as follows:

The reader, who looks back to pages 219, 253, will there see with what solemn and strong asseverations the Bishop declared that no such passage as that quoted from page 294 was ever written by Saint Ligori. (See pages 269, 319, 320). Mr. Smith, in reply to my letter per Mr. Emmons, wrote as follows:

"The obnoxious passage, then, which the Romish Bishop of Cincinnati calls heaven and earth to witness is not to be found in the works of Ligori, is the following:

"A Bishop, however poor he may be, cannot appropriate to himself pecuniary fines, without the license of the Apostolical See. But he ought to apply them to pious uses. Much less can he apply those fines to anything else but pious uses, which the Council of Trent has laid upon non-resident clergymen, or upon those clergymen who keep concubines."—Ligor. Ep. Doc. Mor. p. 444. This passage I will now give in the Latin, as it stands on the 444th page of the 8th volume of the "Moral Theology of Alphonsus de Ligori," from whose work the extract was made. The words are as follows:

"Mulctas pecuniarias Episcopus sibi addicese non potest, quantum vis pauper sit sine licentia Sedis Apostolicae (ur expluribus argumentis S. Congregat. evincitur in Tract De Syn. Dioec. L. 10. C. 10. N. 2) Sed debent in usus pios expendi. Multo magis non possunt nisi in pios usus applicari illae mulctae, quas Tridentinum infiixit Clericis non residentibus, ant concubinariis."—Ligor. Epit. Doc. Mor. p. 44.

The words included in the brackets, were not translated, merely because I did not wish to encumber the "Synopsis," (as I have observed in the "Preface of the Synopsis") with too many authorities quoted by Ligori, I shall now, however, translate the above words in the brackets, much, I know, to the discomfiture of his Reverence the Romish Bishop of Cincinnati. The words in the brackets, therefore, translated are as follows: ["as is evident from many arguments of the Holy Congregation, in the Treatise respecting the Diocesan Synods, Book 10, chapter 10, Number 2."]

Here we have, not only the authority of St. Ligori, but also that of the "Holy Congregation of Rites."

Since the subject is now to be probed to the bottom, we will also translate the contracted words which I transferred into the "Synopsis," as I found them in the original. The words to which I allude are the terminating ones of the disputed passage, as follows: "Ligor. Ep. Doc. Mor. p. 444"—which, translated, stand thus: "From the work of Ligori, under the head of 'An Epitome of the Moral Doctrine,' page 444."

In order to render the testimony still more striking, it is important to observe that this "Epitome of the Moral Doctrine" to which Ligori alludes, is an epitome compiled by no less a personage than Pope Benedict XIV, as we are informed by Ligori himself, in the 301st page of the 8th volume of his "Moral Theology."

That the previous Latin words are truly and faithfully the words of St Ligori and fairly extracted from the 8th volume, p. 444, is duly certified by the following learned gentlemen.

We, the undersigned, have carefully examined the foregoing extracts from the Moral Theology of St. Ligori; and having compared them with the original Latin copy of that work, now before us, we do hereby certify that the

A VANDERBILT TELLS WHY SHE BELIEVES SPIRITS RETURN.

MRS. LA BAU, THE COMMODORE'S DAUGHTER, GIVES HER EXPERIENCES—HER CHID DIED IN ANOTHER CITY AND SHE WITNESSED HIS PASSAGE INTO THE CLOUDS.

Up in the third-story bay window of a big white brick and marble mansion that tops one of Riverside Drive's beautiful hills sat an old lady yesterday looking out of the window. Hers was a face that bespoke strong character. There were firm lines around the mouth, an authoritative poise of the head, a pair of blue eyes that could look one through and through. She was Mrs. Alicia Vanderbilt La Bau, daughter of old Commodore Vanderbilt and possessor of many of his millions after contesting the will.

The World yesterday told of the suit for $20,000 brought against her by Arthur P. Dodge and of Mrs. La Bau's remarkable defense. In a word, she declares in her sworn answer that she was influenced by a medium, Jeannette Danforth, to buy a quarter interest in Dodge's patents because the medium gave her messages from the spirit world to do so.

The house that the Vanderbilt money has bought Mrs. La Bau is a palace in miniature. It is forty feet wide and five stories high. It commands the full sweep of the Hudson from its great windows. It is furnished with all that taste can suggest or money buy. It has even a wonderful electric elevator which starts and stops at any desired floor by the simple pressure of a button. Her son, Walter La Bau, took the reporter upstairs in the elevator and showed him into his mother's room.

THE MEDIUM WAS HYPNOTIZED.

One glance was enough to tell that the elderly lady in the window was a Vanderbilt. There were those keen, strong eyes—that roundness of face and those little heavy purses of skin under the eyes which are a part of every Vanderbilt visage. There was that full habit, too, which all the elder generation of Vanderbilts possessed.

"Won't you sit down?" the old lady said, in a pleasant tone.

Mrs. La Bau was somewhat averse to going into details about the technical side of her defense, preferring to leave it to her counsel.

"I'll say, though," she said, decidedly, "that Dodge hypnotized Jeannette Danforth to tell me those messages from the spirit world. I'm sorry now I didn't do as the spirits themselves told me. They gave me a control which showed all Dodge's schemes to be worth nothing to me."

Mrs. La Bau lay down what she was reading, pushed her gold-rimmed spectacles back on the top of her iron-gray hair and slapped her hand on the little table in front of her to emphasize her statement.

"But do you believe in Spiritualism?" asked the reporter.

BELIEVES IN SPIRITUALISM.

For a moment the old lady hesitated. Then she said:

"I have never denied, and I will not deny now, that I thoroughly believe in Spiritualism. I don't believe in any of this clap-trap Spiritualism; I take mine direct from God. And why shouldn't I believe? I once received the greatest proof in the world.

"It was forty years ago. There was something that I wanted to come to pass most earnestly. I was a scoffer then, but I locked myself in my chamber and I prayed. I cried, 'Oh, Lord, if this can come to pass I will believe.' And it came to pass. Now, how can I disbelieve?"

There were tears in the old lady's eyes by this time, but she brushed them away with a laugh. What proof had been shown to her she would not say. It was plainly something close to her heart.

"And since then," she went on, "I have seen too many from the spirit world to disbelieve. I have seen God face to face; I have seen my little dead children. I receive 'controls' from the spirits all the time."

"But others would believe if they could see these too?"

BASES HER BELIEF ON BIBLE.

"Ah!" laughed the old lady, thoroughly, the woman of the world now; "that's what so many ministers have said to me. But, mind you, I don't believe in all this clap-trap Spiritualism. I take my Spiritualism from the Bible and from God. Read your Bible. In it you will find many gifts of Spiritualism.

"Everybody is spiritualistic. Some people are more so than others. Now, my son has healing power. He can cure aches and pains by the simple laying on of his hands. I have the healing power; nobody can pass away in the same house with me. I have never seen any one pass on and I never will. The spirits have told me so. Both my little children passed away when I was far away, but I knew it.

"I knew when my little boy went, many years ago. We were here in New York. The baby, who was only three months old, was in Saratoga. Suddenly I saw his spirit. It was just as if you looked out on those beautiful clouds there in the west."

The old lady pointed to the window, where the sun was sinking over the shimmering river. There was a big bank of clouds over the Palisades. She was the mother now, and her eyes were moist.

"It was just like that," she said softly. "High above the clouds was a great round flame, just as if it had been made of opal. And there through the clouds was little baby's spirit going straight toward the opal frame. I saw him reach it just as plainly as day.

SPIRIT CHILD WAVED FAREWELL.

"Then his little spirit stopped and waved its little fingers toward me. 'Good-by, good-by!' and he was gone.

"The baby's gone. He's passed on," I said.

"My husband laughed. 'Nonsense,' he said, 'you're always worrying.' But in a few hours came a telegram. The baby was gone. He had passed on just at the minute when I saw his little spirit. It was the same way with our little girl. We were here and she was away. I saw her spirit go. A friend was coming upstairs. I asked her what time it was and she said 'Eleven o'clock.' That was the hour that my little one passed on.

"I knew Elliott F. Shepard was going three weeks before. I suddenly felt it coming from the spirits. I told my family that some one in the Shepard family was going. They laughed, and next morning my uncle's passing was in the papers. They tried to tell me the spirits meant him. But I knew it wasn't so. Three weeks later Mr. Shepard passed on suddenly. I was right.

"It was the same way," went on Mrs. La Bau, "with Jeannette Danforth, who died a year ago."

Mrs. La Bau was in Boston then and at a seance she saw Jeannette Danforth's spirit.

"I didn't pay any attention to it," she said, "but when I came back my maid told me that Jeannette Danforth had passed suddenly while I was away. She was one of the best mediums that ever lived, and if Dodge had left her alone all would have been well."

THE WORLD A SCHOOL.

Mrs. La Bau's theory is that those who do not believe in the spirits here are eventually forced to do so after death.

"This is only a little kindergarten, this world of ours," she said, "and we pass on to better things. But those who won't believe in God's Spiritualism are forced to come back again. But they can't come in the flesh, but as in spirits, and they must come through the mediums. Then they tell us that they believe now.

"These spirits leave a very uncomfortable feeling in the mediums, and whenever any come back for me I always ask them not to leave this feeling in the mediums."

Mrs. La Bau never uses the word "die," because she doesn't believe it. She says "pass on," instead of "dying." Every person who doesn't believe in Spiritualism she calls a "doubting Thomas."

"How can you believe in the spirits when you go in prepared to disbelieve?" she asked. "You set yourself against them, and even if something is proved to you, you expect to have it proved all over again every time."

HER SON A HEALER.

Mrs. La Bau's son is a handsome man of perhaps thirty-five or thirty-eight. While he shares with his mother some of her beliefs in Spiritualism, he said yesterday that he did not believe all people were mediumistic. He has gone deep into the mysteries of the spirit world. His sister, Mrs. George Morgan Browne, who was Miss Bertha Vanderbilt La Bau, is not so interested. She lives with her husband at No. 75 East Fifty-fourth street. He is a member of the Union, University, Harvard and other smart clubs.

When pressed, Mrs. La Bau gave several examples of the healing power possessed by her son and herself. Their cook, Della, had pains in her back the other day, and is still not herself.

"My son," said Mrs. La Bau, "simply sat down beside her and put his arm against her waist. In five minutes the pains were gone.

"I have done more. Once when we were driving at Cape Cod near Onset the horse hurt himself in the sand and sprained his shoulder. I gave the coachman some $20 gold pieces that I had and told him to rub them on the horse's shoulder every twenty minutes. He laughed, but did so. But the horse was cured. It was simply due to my healing power. I call it the gold cure."

WILL FIGHT DODGE'S SUIT.

Mrs. La Bau is a woman of perhaps sixty-eight or seventy years, though she doesn't seem it. She is the daughter of old Commodore Vanderbilt and the aunt of all the present generation of the family. She speaks with the tone of one always accustomed to giving orders, and she dresses very plainly for a woman of great wealth. She proposes to fight Dodge's suit to the end.

Mrs. La Bau believes that the planchette table, a heart-shaped affair with two wheels and a pencil, will work for some people through spiritualistic agency, but she never heard of the weird Ouija board.—New York World.

A SCRAP OF HISTORY.

said extracts are verbatim, truly and correctly given by Mr. Smith.

In this certificate, we include, particularly, the passage disputed by Bishop Purcell, which is contained in Mr. Smith's "Synopsis," p. 294, par 7, headed "Concubines of the Clergy."

Duncan Dunbar, Pastor of the McDougal Street Baptist church. John Kennady, Pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church. Spencer H. Cone, Pastor of the Oliver Street Baptist church. Sam'l. F. B. Morse, Professor, Etc., in the University of City of New York. Wm. Green, Jr., Deacon in the Sixth Free Cong. church, New York. C. G. Finney, Pastor of the Church in the Broadway Tabernacle. New York, February 23, 1837.

On receiving the above communication from Mr. Smith I asked from Bishop Purcell the loan of the works of St. Ligori. He politely complied with my request. Turning to the page, 444, volume 8, I found every word in his own edition as above reported. I carried it and the Synopsis of Mr. Smith to our mutual friend, Mr. Kinmont, to whom it was now my time to appeal. Mr. Kinmont read both the original and the translation; and then certified as follows:

The above (version of Smith p. 294) I regard to be a faithful translation of the passage as it stands in the 8th volume of Ligori, page 444.

Having read all the proofs of this discussion, I certify, that the reader has substantially, as correctly, as under all the circumstances could have been expected, a fair representation of the whole discussion. A Campbell.

As proof establishing the fact that it was the custom of the Catholic clergy to keep concubines, and probably is at the present time, in some countries, the foregoing constitutes an important document which it would be worth while to cut out and paste in the scrapbook. It is well to keep such facts before the eyes of rising generations.

The book from which the forgoing has been taken has undoubtedly long ago gone out of print. It is doubtful if a single copy of it can now be found in the library of a Catholic, priest or layman, notwithstanding the fact that through it Bishop Purcell has displayed in an eminent degree the faculty of an "artful dodger." But upon the subject of the "Concubines of the Clergy," his art failed him, and he met his "Waterloo." It would be interesting to know if his share of the edition of the debate was ever really distributed among his people LORE DELVER.

HOW IT IS DONE!

The Sleight-of-hand Performer in California.

HOW HE PRODUCES PRETENDED SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA, AND DECEIVES THE GULLIBLE.

"SPIRIT" TYPE-WRITING.

This is such a bald, hoary-headed and transparent trick that it would not be worthy of notice were it not that so many presumably intelligent people have recently been taken in by it in this vicinity. The "messages" are nearly all prepared beforehand, and the machine is always worked by the "medium" or an assistant, the keys or space-bar being rattled to give the audience the impression that the spirits are writing in the dark. Sometimes, when the medium is in the cabinet with the machine, he will actually write two or three short messages or answers to suit the occasion. Type-writing can be done in the dark anyone familiar with the machine, but it is slow work, and explanation is made that a little girl "control" of the medium is "just learning." The medium has all the prepared messages in his pocket when the seance begins, and after they are handed out he pockets the blank paper provided for the use of the "dear spirits." If the audience will insist upon the machine being covered and locked, so the medium or his assistant cannot get their hands on it, there will be no writing done. Be sure of that.

A TRICK WITH BALLOTS.

One method of ballot-reading used by some prominent mediums in their circles is this: The cards or ballots written by the audience are collected by the medium or assistant and placed in an envelope or bag. This is supposed to remain in sight of the audience. In reality, it goes into the cabinet and a dummy just like it takes its place while the medium in the cabinet examines the ballots at his leisure by the light of a small bull's eye lantern. After he has answered most of the questions and copied the rest, another "switch" is made, and the real ballots are again under the eyes of the audience. Of course some of these present are positive there has been no change, but you must remember that the hand of an expert is quicker than your eye, and also that in every circle of that kind there are a number of confederates or assistants, and it is very easy to make these changes without detection. Some mediums have the bogus ballots in an envelope and burn them before the eyes of the audience. This is generally regarded as a clincher. Another method is to switch the ballots into another room, where an assistant reads them, and gives the contents to the medium in the cabinet through a speaking tube, cunningly concealed. This way has its advantage, as if the voice of the assistant is heard by any of the audience, it is regarded as an independent spirit voice and an evidence of the medium's power. These methods have been recently worked in Los Angeles, and are used elsewhere.

SLATE-WRITING.

The methods of producing so-called independent slate-writing—18 or 20 in number—are so numerous that we will mention now only those in most common use among mediums of the shady class.

The "Prof." who owns the premises he occupies always has a system of trap doors and sliding panels which are used to pass the slates to concealed assistants, who embellish them with pictures and messages in the name of your loved ones, and pass them back the same way. But your traveling medium must depend upon his manual dexterity to carry him through. Nearly all of these use the silicate flap, which fits into the frame and covers the prepared slate completely. The medium shows you both sides of the slate; you are willing to swear it is perfectly clean. In placing the slate upon the table in front of you he dexterously allows the flap to drop into his lap, and when, after sitting awhile with your hands on the slate, you turn it over you are amazed to find it filled with writing, perhaps in different colors. This method is the one commonly used in giving slate-writing seances in public halls and on the stage. It is easy for an expert to fool any committee not acquainted with the flap trick. The production of writing on slates brought by the audience and held in their hands, is very simple and easy when you know how. The slates are all prepared before being brought to the hall. In every city there are plenty of people who can be induced by a small fee, or perhaps a ticket to the show, to bring the prepared slates and carry out their part of the program. The "medium" does not see these people. This part of the work is done by the agent or helper who is always on hand to help mediums. This go-between generally prepares the slates and attends to paying the stool pigeons, who can truthfully say they are strangers to the medium and were not employed by him.

In giving private sittings the medium uses various methods, according to his estimate of the sitter. One who visits this city frequently has a private arrangement with a stationary store near his rooms. He leaves at the store several pairs of prepared slates of the same kind as those kept in stock. These are kept neatly wrapped in the usual style. When the medium gets a sitter who is shrewd and hard to work, and who brings his own slates, his "guides" find some objection to the sitters's slates, and if the sitter objects to those the medium has in stock the latter suggests that he buy a new pair of the required size, and kindly mentions where they may be procured, near by. The victim sees nothing wrong with this proposition. He goes for the slates, the clerk shows him a number, he selects a pair he knows are clean, the clerk goes back to wrap them up, switches in the prepared ones, and the victim takes them to the medium, gets his sitting with the slates in his own hands just as they came from the store, finds that one or two slates are filled with writing, and takes his leave fully convinced that spirits do write on slates. He knows it—no trick possible. And any person who says that medium fakes is a liar and a horse-thief. Henceforth he is an easy victim and can be fooled with any old trick. Of course he got no "test" from his departed friends the first time. He goes again for that, complies with the "conditions," and gets some "wonderful results."

Sleight-of-hand, or the changing of slates, is depended upon more than any other method by most mediums. And by the same means they seceure the names or questions you have written. One prominent medium I had a sitting with had all the time during the sitting, in his hands, a large-sized slate. He handed me two smaller slates with noiseless binding. I was directed to wash and wipe the two slates thoroughly. After this was done he took one in his hands for a moment to see if it was thoroughly washed and dried, he said. All this time he was holding the big slate. And right here is where the lightning change came in. Under the large slate he had a smaller slate, just like the ones I had. This was all prepared, written full of messages (that would fit anybody) in different colors. In the short interval before he handed back my slate he had turned the large slate—a quick movement that scarcely anyone would notice—bringing the prepared slate to the top. This we placed on top of the other slate I had washed, and the rubber band placed around them. In a few minutes I opened them and was astonished to find one filled with writing. Of course I did not detect the trick at the time. That came later.

The next sitting was worked entirely different. About a dozen still smaller slates were placed on the table and I washed and wiped all of them, to magnetize them, he said. Then I took one and wrote my name all over one side. While I was doing this he came up and for an instant laid the large slate on the pile, and to divert my attention from his movements, let me read a brief message he had written on the large one. Then, taking the slate I had been writing my name on, he took the top slate from the pile of small ones, put the two together and I held them awhile. Of course I found one full of writing—the one he had fixed for me and covered with the big slate. I mention this experience to show the modus operandi of one medium. Perhaps some who read this may recognize the "test." In our next issue this story will be continued, with some additional facts that we had not, in the beginning, intended to mention.

An intimation has been conveyed to us in an indirect but unmistakable way, that it will not be advisable for us to continue this department, and more especially would it be dangerous for us to mention certain names in connection therewith. We are not seeking a martyr's fate nor hankering after a martyr's crown, but the truth will be told regardless of consequences, and names given, too. Look out for music ahead. The band will play.

The above is from the Modern Mystic and Occult News, published by Ed. D. Lunt, at 629 South Olive street, Los Angeles, Cal. It is presented to our readers as a matter of news, at the request of an ardent Spiritualist, who has had a varied experience with the sleight-of-hand performers. Spiritualists as a class want to know what is going on in our ranks, and not be kept in the dark, like incompetent children. The above has no reference to genuine mediums in the various phases referred to. California has furnished the East with some of her sleight-of-hand performers, but they do not flourish, as the genuine spirit manifestations here in broad daylight can not be counterfeited. The genuine spirit manifestations in Chicago so eversbadow the fakes and tricksters, that the latter excite but little notice. In fact, Chicago mediums cannot be excelled; they are among the best in the world, and can convince any skeptic that the spirit survives the death of the body.

THE GALVESTON HURRICANE.

Little Bright Eyes, good and fair—
Mine are dimmed by age and care—
You may read for grandma, dear,
This long letter; I'll sit here;
Will it tell your father's ill?
Hush! my beating heart, be still!
Take it to the light, my dear,
Read it loud and read it clear.

I can see it's not from him,
Though my eyes are old and dim,
I can see enough, my child,
To convince me. Am I wild?
Hush! my waiting heart. Be strong!
Oh! I hope there's nothing wrong!
Am I here, or do I dream?
Read it carefully, Helene.

Then the childish voice rang clear,
And the grandma's heart with fear
Heard the story long and said,
Of that hurricane so mad.
How they ran and cower'd below;
Of the terror none could know,
But the people who had been
Through the havoc, wreck and din.

How they shook with fear and awe!
How they trembled when they saw
Frightful tempest, mad and wild!
"He is dead! He's dead! my child."
At the end, these words she read:
"He is numbered with the dead."
Fast the tears in torrents fell,
On the hands, she loved so well.

"Grandma, hear you not, he's dead?
Have you listened while I read?"
But no sob nor cry she heard—
Just a gurgle, like a bird
When he first begins his song,
And she waited, waited long.
"He is numbered with the dead!"
And she raised the drooping head.

"What doth all thee, grandma, dear?
Thou dost neither speak nor hear."
Stroking soft the snowy hair
With her little hand so fair,
Lifting oft the drooping head,
Sadly cried she, "Papa's dead!
Canst thou neither speak nor hear?
What doth all thee, grandma, dear?"

Then with terror and despair,
Wildly tangled in her hair
Are those gentle hands, so white,
And she screams in childish fright,
Offers up a silent prayer
For the still form, dying there!
Swooning! fast her spirit fled!
Two more numbered with the dead.

DESERVE WHAT YOU DESIRE.

Is the world a place of worry to your soul?
Have you missed the good, while ills about you roll?
Is there something that you need
You would listen to, and heed,
If the words of life were spoke that made you whole?

'Tis a miracle of God, this great life,
That looks always out of tune, full of strife,
Till you learn the magic word—
Grander truth was never heard:—
'Tis a song with Universal justice rife.

What you love and would possess—just observe:
What you know is good, hold fast and preserve.
God has angels he will send,
And they bear, each angel friend,
Just the things to every mortal they deserve.

It is easy, then, to rise day by day:
Never worry, never fear by the way,
Since the God whose son you are Holds each swiftly moving star
by his lofty law, his justice it will sway
Every factor of your being, every day.

Would you have the good of ages—just deserve it.
God will give it to the ones who will preserve it!

LARGER SPIRITUALISM.

Takes the World of Progress In Its Arms.

Spiritualism comes to people only as they are able to receive it, only as they are capable of understanding it.

Dr. Thomas, of the People's Church, this city, says: "I know my loved ones still live and are conscious; my own soul, my whole being tells me so."

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage says: "I know that our friends are alive and all about us as we walk and as we sleep; my consciousness tells me so."

Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, of All Soul's Church, this city, preaches good Spiritual truths and yet he never had evidence of spirit return.

While it comes to the souls in tune for its vibrations as does the knowledge of a supply of water come through the thirst of the flesh, as food to the appetite, there are those who are not in tune with anything but that which is material and tangible to the eye of earth. There are those who must see and feel and smell and taste their evidence of continued life after so-called death.

There are those who can find all the evidence necessary in the Bible that man a future existence, and again there are those to whom this is no evidence, those to whom naught but the shake of a tangible hand and the familiar voice of a friend whose form they had seen let down into the dark and gloomy grave would appeal.

In fact no two can see this great truth from exactly the same standpoint, for that point is self and no two are exactly alike. But that makes no difference to Spiritualism; phoenix-like it rises up from the sands of time, from the ashes of burned witches; from the ages of myth and superstition, and spreads its broad wings over the whole world like a great mother of the universe.

Evidence of continuity of life comes and comes; through the ignorant to the ignorant and the wise; through the poet to those who are attuned to poetry; through the philosopher to those who have capacity to measure and weigh, and analyze, and reason; through the musician to those who are filled with nature's harmonic vibrations; to the egotist with something like a hickory club; to the materialist in a material way, etc.

It comes and it comes, and there is nothing that can prevent it.

Ever since the little raps upon the other side of the door of life; ever since those little children invited it in, Spiritualism has plowed through stormy seas and braved the tornado sweep of bitterest opposition from church, and clergy and imitations, and still it moves on and on, always manned with a crew as true as life, always pushing forward and leaving its enemies by the wayside in deep wonderment at its rapid gait.

Differences belong to individuals and they prate and rant, in the heat of passion over the smallest matters of divergence; grow personal and call each other hard names, in other words, lose their balance; lose their respect and lose sight of the broadness and greatness of the spiritual movement.

Narrowness belongs to the human, not the spiritual. Selfishness, jealousy, envy and anger are not of the soul, but of the flesh in its struggle with the spiritual, the higher, the real man.

Spiritualism is not only not an organization, but as a whole it is not organizable; it is above and below and all around and in and through all organization; the foundation for many organizations.

It requires human beings to make or create organizations here, financial, benevolent or religious; social, political or reformatory, and all are but "parts of one stupendous whole," and that whole is life, nature, spirit.

Men organize for ball game contests, and in it and under it is the ever restless spirit of excellence; the spirit of man trying to gain, to win, to grow; to rise above others; the spirit of ambition; the spirit of pride; the eternal evoluting, aspiring, desiring, growing spirit of man, and how can that be organized into a small, one-idead institution with only five or six defined principles and presented to a world as representing Spiritualism?

Modern Spiritualism is not founded on the historical manifestations of dead and buried ages, any more than ancient Spiritualism was founded on the then unfulfilled prophecies the realization of which remained for the unborn generations to reach when grown up to it. Therefore Spiritualism always has been and always will be, and will continue to move on and on while humanity continues to struggle with the problems, small and large, pertaining to the infinitesimal and innumerable non-essentials.

It will grow with a creed and it will grow without a creed, for this is only a plan or means for adding the cause, with its religious tendencies, to other religions within the whole and giving it a name by which it may be distinguished from others by the coming generations.

We are told there is nothing binding in that declaration of principles adopted by the Spiritualists representing the National Association. In one sense this is true. One can be a Spiritualist in the true sense of the word when he has been convinced of the power of the disembodied spirit to return and manifest its presence, whether he does or does not "believe in Infinite Intelligence." Neither does it hinder one who does so "believe" from being a Spiritualist.

But this is now published to the world as the declaration of American Spiritualism, and unless we can subscribe to or sanction that little fiat from organized Spiritualism, we cannot be a full-fledged Spiritualist in the eyes of the world.

In other words, if we do not have to subscribe to it as a requisite of good standing in the organization what is it good for? A sunflower badge will give notice to the public that the wearer is a Spiritualist, and is of just as much importance for recognition by the N. S. A. if this little creed need not be subscribed to to become a member of Spiritualism.

The badge system has not been generally adopted as a means of recognition among Spiritualists, although when worn by anyone it designates him as a Spiritualist and surely is as far-reaching and as apropos as is the much discussed "declaration." Then why not adopt the sunflower and make it of cheap material as well as of gold, and place it within reach of all as well as those who are able to wear gold? A sunflower button for the coat lapel, as the G. A. R. boys wear, would answer the purpose just the same and not necessitate the sanctioning of an objectionable assertion.

In the first place a true Spiritualist is one who lives his doctrine every day, and except for recognition by our old puritanic laws neither Spiritualism nor Spiritualists would need to declare or hang out a sign to be known as a member of the great family, the great brotherhood of man, the only church and the only religion that is worthy of the name.

This creed, this declaration of principles, this thing of so little importance that has consumed so much valuable time and space in the Spiritualistic press; called forth such wisdom and such condemnation and commendation will neither kill nor cure the cause of Spiritualism and can be amended or repealed at some future convention.

Larger Spiritualism will some time in the future be taught from every pulpit in the land, be taught to the child at its mother's knee and be lived more closely than any other religion has ever been, because it teaches people to do right, because it is right, and because it is the duty of spirit, it is nature's own demand, and will recognize only the spirit of perfect brotherhood as its creed.

Joys Beyond the Threshold
A SEQUEL TO
THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.
BY LOUIS FIGUIER.
TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.
THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE THRESHOLD" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal Price $1.25 For sale at this office.

REMITTANCES.

Remit by Postoffice Money Order, Registered Letter, or draft on Chicago or New York. If coins from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so don't send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Direct all letters to J. R. CLUBS: IMPORTANT SUGGESTION!

As there are thousands who will at first venture only twenty-five cents for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER thirteen weeks, we would suggest to those who receive a sample copy, to solicit several others to unite with them, and thus be able to remit from $1 to $10, or even more than the latter sum. A large number of little amounts will make a large sum total, and thus extend the field of our labor and usefulness. The same suggestion will apply in all cases of renewal of subscriptions—solicit others to aid in the good work. You will experience no difficulty whatever in inducing Spiritualists to subscribe for THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, for not one of them can afford to be without the valuable information imparted therein each week, and at the price of only about two cents per week.

A Bountiful Harvest for 25 Cents.

Do you want a more bountiful harvest than we can give you for 25 cents? Just pause and think for a moment what an intellectual feast that small investment will furnish you. SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1900.

Christian Civilization.

The headlines of a daily of September 21, now before us, condensing therein the news from China of the morning, omitting the display to make it prominent, were in words following:

"Awful fate of Chinese. Russians butcher 5,000. Force entire population into river, and all perish. Massacre is ordered. Natives were led in batches to river bank and forced to cross. Strewn with dead. Those who sought to escape were clubbed or shot, else flung alive into the stream and not one escaped. Darkest page of war in the far East."

Then follows a column of sickening details which we gladly suppress.

And the American Republic is practically a partner in the guilt of such massacres, and the honest, conscientious tax payers, who abhor war, and all acts of violence, share in footing the bills of cost.

And at the bottom of all this destruction of life, of this waste of treasure, of ruptured families, of desolated and burned cities; and, worst of all, of pestilence, starvation and death, sure to follow, was the attempt to force an offensive religion on an unwilling people.

A bull from the Pope ordering the slaughter of the entire population of the Netherlands, containing at that time more than three millions of people, if carried into execution, would not have been more cruel or bloodthirsty than is this war on indigent Chinese who saw no other way of righting their wrongs than by the sword. Our Western civilization, if imbued by the spirit it professes, could afford to stop short of the final slaughter; but the act is in harmony with Kaiser William's direction, to "give no quarter, and make the war memorable for a thousand years." Instead of "Let us have peace," let our watchwords be, "Let us have mercy."

Praying to a Purpose.

A correspondent of the Truth Seeker recites the following well-known fact, in showing the evolution of prayer:

"When Halley's comet appeared in 1456 it was considered the harbinger of vengeance of the Deity, so the Pope ordered all the church bells in Eurpe to be rung, to scare it away. The faithful were ordered to add a special prayer to their daily supplications. As their prayers had so frequently before been answered in eclipses, and in times of drouth and rain, so on this occasion it was declared that a victory over a comet, when it disappeared, had been vouchsafed to the Pope, who got the credit for exorcising successfully, and expelling it from the skies. Halley, however, who discovered the [periodicity of the] comet in 1705, guided by the revelations of Kepler and Newton, also discovered its motions, so far from being controlled by prayer, were guided in an elliptical orbit by destiny, and he predicted its reappearance in 1757, which duly occurred."

The same comet, seen in 1835, with a tail which almost spanned the heavens, is again expected in 1910. Prayers continued long enough may seem to the ignorant to drive it away, but like the setting sun it appears again when it has circled its orbit.

Children to the Front.

"The Congregationalist" represents that there are Christians who formulate catechisms and have become expert in the business of asking questions to which they have not the ability to furnish satisfactory answers, so are turning over to children the responsible task of formulating their own answers.

Well that is very proper when we remember David was represented in one of our Sunday School catechism lessons as the most perfect man, though he leaped and danced with all his might, perfectly nude, before an idol and his maid servants, and killed Uriah to get his wife. Children would have sought elsewhere for a perfect man, had they been left to formulate an answer.

Fagots for Heretics.

In a history of St. Helen's, Bishopgate, by a late rector, it is stated Mrs. Abigail Vaughn left a legacy of four shillings per annum, to buy fagots to burn heretics. The church, St. Martin Outwich, to which the donation was made, was long ago demolished, but it remained while it was lawful to use the fuel for the purpose the kindly disposed legatee so generously provided.

The heart naturally glows with love for a system of religion which gained its dominancy by a generous use of the stake and fagot, with a threat of the prolongation of such cruelty throughout eternity.

Christianity Not the Civilizer.

"Europe owes its superiority over Asia to the greater energy of its peoples, and to the advance of science and art, bringing in their train useful inventions, improved methods of communication, the enormous growth of commerce, and the general uplifting of intellect and softening of manners which are the natural result of the increase of knowledge and the spread of art among the people."

So says the "Literary Guide," in reviewing a claim that faith in Christ is the distinguishing difference between Eastern and Western civilization, and that that faith is the cause of the difference. The Guide added:

"There can be no true comparison, from the standpoint of religion, between Eastern and Western civilizations and African barbarism. The differences between Europe and Asia have their root, not in differences of religion, but in climate and soil, surroundings, history and race."

There is another reason why the Western civilization leads the Eastern. In the West are collected and centralized the progress of the entire East. Commencing with the first dawn of civilization, we find the arts and sciences had taken root in the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates, and around the Persian Gulf. They were carried through Arabia into Egypt; became prominent in Phenecia; extended Westward into Greece and Rome, and overspread all Europe. Commerce, through the Mediterranean, enabled the exchange of ideas between the East and the then new West. Then came the Crusades, and the more thorough mixture of Europeans. Returning from their long marches, their victories, and their defeats, a new impetus was given to knowledge, which gave rise to the art of printing and to the Reformation. Till then the church held the world in thrall, and people could only think along old lines without risk of life.

The discovery of America; the peopling of the New World with advanced thinkers; the establishing of a great Republic in no way the slave of the Church; the mutual interchange of advanced thought between Europe and America, and giving free rein to genius, all have made the West what it is to-day.

China was isolated from the rest of the world. She was a hermit people, with outsiders shut out. She gained no new ideas from abroad. Her civilization was the product of her own soil and great minds. The West gained by a mixture of races; but China remained stationary; was even slow to accept improvements thrust upon her. Her great wall on the North; a supposed boundless ocean on the East; the towering Himalayas on the South; with impassable mountain chains and sandy deserts on the West, made her just what she is, a peaceful, contented and prosperous people, truly wonderful in their grand achievements without extraneous aid. Her religion is the product of her own philosophers, as are all her institutions, her language, and her literature. Could she have been improved by accepting and practicing Christian dogmas, without a knowledge of Western arts and learning? We think not.

More than a Quiver.

"The Advance," a Congregational organ, hit the mark squarely when it said in a late issue:

"Disturb a bone deep down in the earth and there will be a quiver along the whole theological line."

More than a "quiver," there is an alarming shake; for it betokens ruin to the whole church system. Demonstrate by that bone that countless millions of years have passed away since it was buried "deep down in the earth" and the whole story of creation, as told in Genesis is proved a myth. If that story is false then there was no fall of man. If there was no fall there was no need of a Redeemer to restore him to his primitive condition. If there is no Savior, and no hell from which man needs saving, then the whole foundation of Christianity rests on a false base, and, like the house built on sand, it will fall of its own weight.

So that "bone," or its fossilized representative, becomes a powerful weapon in the hands of science to demolish a system of religious faith

"From turret to foundation stone"

—built on fraud, and has been perpetuated by fear and force ever since.

Too Polite to Oppose Evil.

Rev. Dr. Gunsaulus, who proposes to build in Chicago during the ensuing year "The Twentieth Century Church," to replace the Central Church where he now ministers, is reported to have said during a late discourse relating to his proposed work:

"We have been so polite to evil that our church committees have courteously bowed themselves out of the communities where evil is rampant and crime is nurtured."

"An honest confession is good for the soul," says an old adage. Dr. G.'s confession is unquestionably truthful. Churches, and church committees are blind to the evil all about them, but over there in China, horror of horrors, they worship God under the name of Joss, so until the late unpleasantness Christians were flooding that country with missionaries to teach the people the true name of the Universal Father, and that that father in Galilee had a son by a Jewish peasant girl. That is a more important thing to establish than is the reformation of sinners so abundant in all our great cities.

Competition Ruined the Business.

"New York, Sept. 18.—The old Bible House at Fourth avenue and Ninetieth street, the home of the American Bible Society for nearly fifty years, is to be sold and the great printing establishment of the society will be given up and the Bibles printed by contract. This step has been made necessary by the competition of the Oxford and International Bible companies in England."—Press Dispatch.

Just think of it: The great Bible Society, that has been flooding the world for many generations, the last fifty years at one place in New York, has been compelled to surrender to the inevitable, and change its methods of business. Publishing the "Word of God," it was expected God would protect his own, but competition among rivals in the God's Word business has driven the American House to the wall.

Will the fire-cracker manufacturer suffer because of this act? and how will the gold-leaf business be affected? Probably the lack of demand for Bibles by the "heathen Chinee" has prejudiced the interests of the manufacturer.

A Great Revival Needed.

A convention of Christian Workers was late in session in this city. Rev. R. A. Torrey voiced the universal wish in a paper entitled, "The need of a general revival." If the subject was not a serious one it would be difficult to suppress a smile while reading this extract from that paper:

"Many of us who are professedly orthodox ministers are Infidels. Worldliness is rampant among church members. Many church ministers use the methods of the world to accumulate riches. Many do not believe in the whole Bible. Immorality is found everywhere. Men marry one wife after another and are still admitted to good society. What we need most is a general revival."

If by a "revival" is meant a "ceasing to do evil and learning to do well," then we echo the wish. If, on the contrary, it means, as we suspect, more worldliness in the church; greater zeal in accumulating wealth by begging from honest toil; an increase of vice; and more hypocrisy—professing to be what they are not, then we hope the revival will be a failure. That disbelief in church dogmas is rampant among its members all know, and the greater the knowledge the more pugnacious is that disbelief.

The Sleight-of-Hand Performer.

The Evening Times, of Warren, Pa., has the following in its September 10th issue:

"Lily Dale, that Mecca for all Spiritualists, draws a very large patronage from Warren, where there are a good many followers of that particular belief. A few days ago, a youth of persuasive manners arrived in town and called on some of the leaders in the work mentioned. His name, he said, was Tony Starr, and his home at Parkersburg, West Virginia. He further stated that he was a 'trumpet medium' and was desirous of pulling off a sitting. The young man did not convince those with whom he talked, and they suspected that he was not all that he claimed to be. In order, however, to satisfy their own doubts and the 'medium's' anxiety, a session was arranged to take place Sunday evening, at a certain private residence. Fifty cents a head was collected from about fifteen persons, and at the appointed hour the assemblage got together, the lights were lowered to the proper degree of spookiness, and the festivities commenced. Starr worked the trumpet in an amateurish manner for about fifteen minutes, making such statements as 'Mary is here.' Suddenly and without warning an electric light illuminated the room, and disclosed the fakir with the trumpet to his mouth industriously earning his fees. The light came from a pocket battery carried by one of the spectators and completely nonplussed the performer. When an explanation was demanded all he could say was that if the trumpet was at his mouth he did not know how it got there.

"Threats of arrest were made, but finally, after scaring away the remnant of self-possession which he still possessed, Starr was allowed to go, on the condition that he smash the trumpet, refund the money and promise never to offend in a like manner again, all of which he promptly done. It was a very entertaining evening for those who were present, and the chances are that Mr. Tony Starr, of Parkersburg, W. Va., will not soon again attempt to monkey with the up-to-date residents of this section of the country."

A good object lesson for Spiritualists and investigators. If a similar plan were followed generally, the tricky sleight-of-hand performers in materialization seances would soon find their occupation unprofitable, and leave the field to genuine mediums—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Corruption of Public Morals.

A Rev. Dr. Price, of Birmingham, Eng., complained that because of the reading of a novel by Mrs. Grand, his daughter masqueraded as a boy and ran away from home. To this the author replied:

"If the incidents of a book are likely to reproduce themselves in the conduct of those who read them, whatever moral is attached to the incident, it is to be sincerely hoped, for the sake of his wife and family, that Dr. Price will not be caught dipping into the Old Testament."

It is because the immoralities told of in a book do corrupt minds of its readers that we oppose the reading of the Bible by children. For the same reason it should be excluded from the hands of the clergy; for familiarity with wrong doing lends unconsciously to the commission of crime. Our daily papers, so full of details of crime, are largely responsible for the vices of the great cities.

A Charitable Outlook.

The editor of "Christian Work" takes a very charitable view of a divine life. He says:

"A divine life does not always manifest itself with the same degree of strength and vigor, but oftentimes displays weakness and a wavering disposition; and even the greatest saints find difficulty at times in resisting temptation, and in the right performance of their duties."

It is, probably, because of that "weakness and wavering disposition," so many "saints" are found inmates of reformatory institutions, particularly of State penitentiaries. The preachers read of it in their holy books then:

"Vice seen too oft, familiar with her face,
They first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Playing Cards Lead.

It is usually represented the Bible, or a part of it at least, was the first production of the printer's art. Hallam, in his "History of the Middle Ages," an authority no one calls in question, on page 548, 2d col., Harper Bros. edition, 1839, says:

"It is generally agreed, that playing cards, which have been traced far back in the fourteenth century, gave the first notion of taking off impressions from engraved figures upon wood."

A Desirable Disease.

The Kansas City Star says: "W. T. Stead, the well-known English journalist, is subject to a nervous disorder, on account of which his hand writes independently of his conscious brain. Mr. Stead attributes his peculiarity to spirits.

If there are "nervous diseases" that enable men to write with the vigor of W. T. Stead, without the aid of his brain, we are curious to know if the "disease" is contagious; for there are other editors who would be benefited if similarly afflicted.

Liberal Churches Are Attracting Spiritualists.

Striking Features of the "New Immortality."

Death is the true resurrection. No other resurrection is conceivable.

He who dies awakens into consciousness the same being as of old.

The threads of the old existence are not cut at the touch of death.

Death ushers us into no foreign world. All that is essential to human life here will be found there.

The activities of our being on earth will be the activities of our being in heaven.

The aspirations of earth must shadow and type the occupations of heaven.

Death makes no break in the continuity of character. A man is the same here and hereafter. He changes as his aspirations dictate.

A wise man before death will be wise after death.

There will be foolish persons over there as here.

The selfish man before death will remain the same selfish man after death, or until he reforms.

The fingers that have been busy handling the croupier of our American Monte Carlo, which faces Trinity Church, cannot turn at an hour's notice to playing harps in the New Jerusalem.

The above are the sentiments of Rev. Richard Heber Newton, of New York. Is it any wonder that, with such sentiments, his listeners from Sunday to Sunday are drawn largely from brainy Spiritualists.

The phenomena of Spiritualism are simply the result of a natural law, and that is why it is common in a measure to all the churches.

Having driven hell and brimstone fire out of Rev. Newton's Church, killed the Devil, and improved heaven, Spiritualists naturally gravitate to hear him preach.

Spiritualists have no patent right on spirit return.

Spiritualists have no monopoly of Nature's laws.

The Virgin Mary appeared at the various shrines of the Catholics, and promotes the heathenism of that church, demonstrating that this particular "Virgin Mary" is behind the times, and not marching on the true lines of progress.

It is easy to learn that spirits return. It is not an abstruse problem in mathematics or chemistry.

Some of the liberal churches are attracting many Spiritualists, because their respective ministers are cultured, and teach sublime spiritual truths, having appropriated the spiritualistic phenomena in all their varied manifestations.

Many mediums have seats in Dr. Thomas' church, because they hear there about ministering angels, and many practical things in reference to Spiritualism and earth life.

Now, you might as well understand what these liberal preachers are driving at.

They have opened business with spirits—real live spirits from the Angel World—and, are competing for business—audiences.

Competition in this business is not a killing affair, but a good thing.

We have on the Spiritualist rostrum talents that will compare favorably with those of the renowned liberal divines. Some of our lecturers have certain special gifts of improvization and inspiration that can not be excelled. In that respect they are superior to any of the various leading liberal ministers now drawing on our ranks for audiences.

The fittest will survive. If the liberal churches appropriate Spiritualism as they have done and are now doing, and demand rigid honesty, virtue and morality on the part of the members and ministers, and maintain a greater degree of general cleanliness before the world than the Spiritualist societies do, then they will attract the brainy, better class from the latter, and control capital to carry on reformatory work. If, however, the Spiritualist societies lead in the above respect, they will maintain the ascendancy, but not otherwise.

THE CONVENTION.

From the N. S. A. Home Office.

Fraternal greetings to all the friends and workers in the good cause. Here, at the home office, the work is going on, and convention matters are shaping quietly. We believe that the annual assembly of the N. S. A., to be held in Cleveland this year, will prove one of the most important that has ever been convened. Much interest from Maine to California is shown in the meeting, and the delegates chosen by the various societies are men and women of intelligence, refinement and good judgment, such as will show the best of interest in our cause, and the utmost of good sense in their deliberations—however much they may express their opinions. We hope for a large attendance at every session, and that many visitors as well as delegates will be at this eighth annual convention of the N. S. A.

Again we request those who intend to go to Cleveland to purchase the certificate tickets for the same on the railroads; full instructions for doing so have been given in the spiritual papers, and it seems by this time all must understand them. Be sure and call for the certificate tickets at your railway station, and do so in time to give the agent opportunity to secure them for you if he does not have them in his office. At small stations you will have to purchase a ticket to the nearest station where the certificates can be had—please ascertain about these points at your station some days in advance to avoid trouble.

The Forest City House, Cleveland, will be the headquarters of the delegates and visitors. Fine accommodations and service there at special rate of two dollars a day. Those who do not wish to stay at a hotel, have the privilege, of course, of stopping where they please; we have no restrictions in the matter.

Now comes the Mayer fund again; the money is coming in daily, but we still need a few hundred dollars. The fund ought to be filled and closed by October 1, but we will hold it open for the contributions that come a little late. Please friends, send what you can, and have a vital interest in the N. S. A. Home; if Mr. Mayer is generous enough to deed the property outright to this association, surely the country at large can collect the fund we ask for, that the treasury may be well equipped for the good work of the N. S. A. This is the last call from headquarters before the allotted time expires, and I trust that the donations, large and small will roll in upon me at once; I will acknowledge each one, and you will win the heartfelt gratitude of mortals and spirits alike.

We have been presented with a handsome silk quilt to be disposed of by this association, for the benefit of the Home fund. It is the work and the gift of Mrs. C. Nelson, of Los Angeles, Cal., and we are indeed grateful for it. Other contributions—like the books before mentioned—have been a source of help to this fund.

The good Spiritualists of Washington are getting ready for the work of the season. Mrs. Sarah A. Byrnes, the popular and eloquent speaker is to occupy the platform of the First Association during October; we anticipate a rich treat from her ministrations.

That earnest and sincere worker in the cause, Mrs. Carrie L. Hatch, of Boston, secretary of the Massachusetts State Association, and officer in a number of Spiritual societies, is visiting us at this time, and we are enjoying her witty and genial presence and personality.

Our good brother and valuable medium, J. H. Altemus, of this city, gave a benefit for the Galveston sufferers last week, and realized a very handsome sum for the same. His tests were well received and enjoyed, as was his vocal selections. Mr. Altemus always is forward in good works; and is also a staunch friend of the N. S. A.

Hell for the Babies.

The St. Louis Presbytery, by a vote of 2 to 1, decided adversely to a revision of its creed. It sustains infant damnation.

SUGGESTIONS

Concerning Chairmen of Societies.

The management of local Spiritualist societies is somewhat peculiar in many ways. In no item more so than having a presiding officer. This person announces each feature of the meeting, and is not content with a general introduction of the speaker. He starts by making some opening remarks—sometimes lengthy, and then the song, invocation, another song, the speaker, the collection, another song, the medium "who will give tests (not make an effort), and then announcements and a closing song, and still further some one for the benediction. Each of these "calls up" the chairman and he becomes a major domo of importance. It is often queried if all this is necessary.

The original cause was the fact that a trance speaker needed care and protection upon the platform. Yet, it would seem that the controlling spirit (if the medium cannot help) would be able to proceed without a perfunctory announcement made at each meeting. I have seen a medium "introduced" twice regularly at each meeting—once for a lecture and then for tests. To be announced would be sufficiently perfunctory, without the repeated introduction.

Tact is often wanting, but the same is a great need for a competent and pleasing chairman. They often become a "boss" instead of a "protector." They often sit at the speaker's desk (or near it) and thus bring unpleasant conditions to the speaker.

Ladies presiding at meetings usually take a prominent place in front of the platform and pose for effect. They may look well there, but it savors of an egotism that does not impress. Add modesty to tact and then supplement with a little common sense, and the chairman will be O. K. Otherwise he is often an incubus.

Haslett Park camp-meeting, the past season, omitted to provide a chairman, and they found it worked splendidly. There was not an item of friction in their exercises. The platform was given entirely to the speakers to manage according to their ideas of propriety and needs for personal effort. It gave them a free platform. They found an opportunity to work up public efforts of a pleasing character that otherwise would have been missed. Their greater zeal was called out and they infused spice and life to the meetings that a chairman would have made impossible.

It is true the chairman often does that but it is not always according to the talents of, and often not pleasing to the speaker. When possible, give a free platform to your speakers and call out their best endeavor. A speaker can better manage his meeting than can anyone else. I am

AN OBSERVER.

WONDERFUL TESTS.

Galveston Disaster Foretold.

To the Editor:—I write you and the friends again to tell you of the latest experience. I inclose a letter which Mr. Orvis loaned me after much persuasion on my part. You can see for yourself that Mr. Orvis told that poor girl the truth; but she, like Thomas of old, doubted. I consider this a wonderful test. Perhaps you have seen and heard more wonderful things than this. Of course it is all so new and strange to me. I have a dear grand niece in spirit life, Anna Miller by name. She passed away not quite a year ago, near Richmond, Va. She came to me through Mr. Orvis and told me the circumstances of her death, all perfectly correct. Mr. O. also said to me: "You are to receive a letter from a Mrs. Russel, from a city far to the north, and somewhat west of here." On my return to my rooms I found a letter for me at the postoffice from a Mrs. E. T. Russell, of West Bay City, Mich. Mr. O. is kept busy answering letters from different people all over the United States.

I feel that I can never be grateful enough to The Progressive Thinker, to Mr. Orvis, and last but not least, to the dear spirit friends who have all given me this comfort and peace of mind that only comes through a knowledge of the truth as it is found in Spiritualism. May The Progressive Thinker exist as long as man and semblance of man exists, May Mr. O. live long to spread the light of living truth broadcast, and may the angel world continue to come down and bring messages of life and love to us poor mortals longing for a look into the promised land.

THE TEST AND ITS FULFILMENT.

Dear Sir:—Your reading received, and all you told me is as true as gospel with one exception, but that does not matter. You say you see no future for me, and tell me I am about to be visited by flood, and that you see something like a tidal wave advancing from a large body of water, and you want me to warn folks. Why, Mr. Orvis, don't you know that folks would call me crazy? They make all manner of fun of me here at the house because I have written to you. Besides lightning never strikes twice in the same place, although I must confess your letter has made me nervous. You tell me to flee from Galveston. Well, I will if I see anything as you describe for me. Thanking you, I remain, yours truly,

Just from the Press

In July last mention was made in these columns that Mrs. Dr. Houghton-Chaapel had in press a small edition of her beautiful poems, which she was getting out for the special benefit of her personal friends. We begged her to enlarge the edition, and place the gems on the market; for it seemed to us they were too valuable to be limited in their reading to a few private individuals. She yielded to our request, and the Poems, beautifully printed and nicely bound, are fresh from the hands of the binder, every one—there are fifty-five of them of varied length—a brilliant of literary worth, with incidents of real life, so natural in their recital as to make the reader share with the author in their personal application. Some few of the poems have appeared in The Progressive Thinker, and given joy to all who read them. The price is 60c. Address the author at Palmetto, Fla.

O. J. Johnson.

This gentleman, who resides at 822 16th avenue S., Minneapolis, Minn., has lately returned from California, where he has large mining interests. Mr. Johnson is a prominent Spiritualist, and if his mines prove as lucrative as he thinks they will, he will certainly become one of the leading agents in a grand reformatory work.

SANCTIFIED SWEATING.

Cruelty to Young Girls in Convents---Shall It Be Tolerated Longer?

A TRACT JUST ISSUED IN LONDON—SIGNED "S. J. ABBOTT," SECRETARY TO THE CONVENT ENQUIRY SOCIETY, 8 GRAY'S PLACE, LONDON, W. C., ENG.

There are now upwards of thirteen hundred monasteries and convents in the United Kingdom, about nine hundred being convents, or religious houses for women, and every one more or less a prison.

According to the "Catholic Directory" for 1839, there were then but seventeen convents in the whole of England and Scotland, or about half the number now established in the county of Sussex alone.

With this enormous increase and the fearful evils involved therein, legislation is urgently required for the protection of all inmates of such institutions.

Including nuns and those under their control, the number of inmates can scarcely be less than fifty thousand. These have thus far been abandoned by the British government to the tender mercies of Mother Superiors, who neither know or respect any law but the canon law of the church of Rome, though the cruelty and tyranny practiced in convents have been demonstrated beyond question in our law courts, as in the trial Saurin v. Star, etc., also in France, America and elsewhere. But so little is known by the outside world of common-place things in convents, that in 1895, when it was proposed to bring all convent laundries carried on by way of trade under the Factories and Workshops Acts, not one member of Parliament was able to meet the misrepresentations of the Roman Catholic members; with the result that the bill was so altered that these iniquitous institutions were exempted from inspection and from all the provisions of the Act, though a petition, hurriedly got up and signed by one thousand proprietors of laundries, against their exemption, was sent to the House.

The laundries, work-rooms, dormitories, and general arrangements for the women and girls not under vows in these institutions, are as separate from the cloister and all that appertains to the nuns as are the arrangements of the factory from the private apartments of the proprietor of any secular establishment.

In France, convents have long been subject to some sort of government inspection. But in spite of this the most shocking abuses have come to light, as the readers of the "Contemporary Review" for April are aware. Some of these abuses were known to government officials in France, though the French public were ignorant of them. But the letter addressed to a cardinal at Rome, by Mgr. Turinaz, Bishop of Nancy, charging the nuns of the Good Shepherd with crimes which cry for vengeance, got into the French newspapers, and brought forth evidence from official sources and from the victims themselves, revealing the practice of atrocious cruelties upon helpless orphans and others in convents in all parts of France, of which I have received enough details to fill a volume. The writer in the Contemporary Review says, "There is no contradiction" to this evidence, "except from the Sisters themselves," and "an enormous number of persons in all walks in life must be liars, conspirators, and worse, if the denial of the nuns be well founded." P. 595.

The frightful picture, with all its harrowing details, cannot be given with a few strokes of the pen. Some of the poor victims were nearly starved, cruelly beaten, shut up for days and even weeks, fed on bread and water, and otherwise ill-treated, and all were sweated and treated as slaves. Failing to accomplish the allotted task, or offending the nun in authority, met with such punishment as female tyrants alone could inflict; some of which must almost have exhausted feminine ingenuity to devise.

A hairpin was driven into the head of one by a blow from a nun. The eye of another was torn out by a stroke from a cat-o'-seven tails. A young girl named Elisa died from meningitis, who had previously been struck on the head with a stick. Another, suffering from the same malady, was let down the stairs between two matresses, under the pretext that she was yielding to the exigencies of nature. She died two hours after. A young girl named G——, received a kick in the breasts, became consumptive, and spat blood. Mdlle. Anna B—— received a blow in the eye with the scissors, and now wears a glass eye. Mdlle. Agathe T——, at present residing in the place de la Republique, has her back permanently bent in consequence of blows received. A child five years of age was placed in a straight waistcoat, was constantly beaten and otherwise cruelly treated, because unable to get through her daily task. She had a pin in her mouth. A nun gave her a blow which cut her lips and made her swallow the pin. The child gradually wasted away and died, without medical treatment, at the age of seven.

These samples are taken almost indiscriminately from a voluminous mass of such details, much of which may be found in the "Contemporary Review" for April. The best workers were kept in the convents from twelve to twenty-five years. Then, when nearly blind, and completely ruined in health, they were turned into the world homeless and penniless.

The following, of which I know of no published translation, appeared in the "Aurora," October 25, 1899. It is taken from the report of Dr. Thulle to the Upper Board of Public Relief: "During the nights of December 7 and 8, 1890, ten little girls who slept in rooms unfit for human habitation, had their feet frozen; seven slightly, three very seriously. One of the latter was of necessity transferred to the hospital (Hotel Dieu), and had to undergo the amputation of both feet."

After the action that was taken by the French government, the English correspondent, quoted in Christianisme, might well exclaim on hearing that the Nuns of Nancy had gone to London, "God have pity on us in England!" But the nuns of the Good Shepherd and other similar orders have long had their convents in almost all parts of England; many of them governed by foreign nuns. In these convents thousands of poor girls are imprisoned and never allowed to go outside the convent walls. They slave at the laundry, shirt-making, and other labor, from early morning—rising in some at 4:45, others at 5:30, and continuing until 8 or 8:30 at night, with no respite from their labor, except to take their scanty meals and attend to religious exercises. Every letter is read by the Superior, who posts or withholds them according to her inclination, never allowing any complaint to pass out of the convent. A child ten years of age, who had been an inmate of a convent orphanage in England for about four years, informed me that she had to spend four days a week at laundry work and scrubbing floors, etc.; yet no government or school-board inspector ever visited the place. The child further stated that one form of punishment adopted was to put the children in a dark cellar and tell them the rats would eat their toes off. The child did not make these statements by way of complaint, but in answer to simple questions.

Quite recently the infamous methods of getting children into Roman Catholic industrial convents in Ireland have been exposed in the Court of Queen's Bench. The elder of two girls was told by a woman engaged in a conspiracy to get them away that, if she would ask for a penny she would give them one each to buy some sweets. They asked and received the penny, and were then charged with begging, a man representing himself as their father, appearing in court to aid in the conspiracy—the father himself being ill in bed at the time. An order of committal was made by the magistrate. On discovering the whereabouts of his children and the truth of the matter, the father made unsuccessful applications to the Chief Secretary, and eventually applied for a writ of habeaus corpus, and had his children restored to him. Mr. Justice Boyd in delivering judgment said, "It was admitted that the practice prevailed to a large extent of getting up bogus cases for the magistrate for the purpose of having a large number of children committed to industrial schools who ought not to be there, and thereby a fraud was committed upon the authorities and upon the rate-payers, on whom the burden of keeping these children there was imposed." He commented strongly on this case of pious fraud as "the worst kind of fraud there was."

A young girl who had been an inmate of a convent laundry told me that one of her fellow-inmates, who was very ill and a great sufferer, was made to continue at the laborious work of ironing until she was too weak to stand, and then, worse than Egyptian taskmasters, who deceive the world by their apparent gentleness, made this poor creature go into the labor-room to make men's colored cotton shirts, and continue at this work, without any respite from the hours of labor, until within two or three days of her death! Truly, as the bishop of Nancy says, "These nuns have no other end in view but that of gaining money."

Another poor girl who suffered from a painful abscess, had to continue at her toil without mitigation, though so weak that she used to faint while at work. She was in danger of being choked, so was taken to the doctor. On her way, unperceived by the nun who accompanied her, she posted to her mother a letter she had penciled on scraps of paper, which letter I have in my possession. In it she says, "I am posting this on the sly, so don't say you heard from me. Oh, I should be punished! I am going to the doctor, and that is how I am posting it....It is just like a prison ....We have to work and keep the nuns. We have food like they have in the workhouse. They read all your letters before they are posted and open all that come in....I have just the same [clothes] as I came in with, and my boots are hanging off my feet. I wish you would send me a petticoat and stays for my birthday. For God's sake don't say you heard from me, for it will be read. You had better not write any letter, for I shall not get it. Send me a petticoat and put me a shilling in the hem of it!"

This was written, not in heathen China, not even in South Africa, where we are spending blood and treasure for oppressed millionaires and the rights of white men, but in the metropolis of civilized England, where in the name of the "Good Shepherd" white girls are oppressed in convents and have no rights except that of submission to their "holy oppressors."

The perilous attempt of the two girls to escape from the convent of the Good Shepherd at Sheffield is referred to in Tract No. 1. I will therefore only mention that, according to the Sheffield Independent, July 3, 1897, "The girls tell stories of starvation, hard work and cruel treatment, and threaten to kill themselves if they are sent back."

No wonder that Rome hates the light and dreads inspection! No wonder that the censorship over correspondence in all convents is so rigorous! But surely this is all the greater reason why British electors should insist on a rigorous inspection of all conventual institutions.

The eloquent facts contained in this short paper should stir the heart of every Englishman who has a spark of humanity, to a sense of his duty! Protestants are making their voice heard all over the kingdom! The inspection of convents is one of the objects forming the basis of all the Protestant electoral rolls. Let every elector, therfore, who has liberty of conscience and a sense of justice, press this great question upon Parliamentary candidates and demand that legislation on the subject have a prominent place in the next Parliament.

About God and Religious Beliefs.

The above word, "God," calls to mind the article from Brother R. M. Stanton in The Progressive Thinker of September 1, on "Evolution of Gods." While it may wound some of your readers who yet have a God, about which they are very sensitive, fearing to lose him, yet those who have advanced in thought, and have reached the plane of a scientific Spiritualist, realizing that creation, and that which caused it to be, and that which rules it, is entirely beyond human conception, or any personal God, will regard this article as a very appropriate inscription to place upon the monument erected over the grave of their dead and buried Gods.

How extremely ridiculous is the idea, to us, who have buried all of our Gods, and resolved to create no more, having no use for them. My spirit grand-father, who was for many years a Baptist deacon, recently informed me that he, in company with several other spirits, had been studying into the causes which led to the establishment of religious beliefs, and their evolution up to the present spiritual conception; and that the revelation obtained was both amusing and disgusting. His object was to prepare himself to aid in the progress of other spirits, who, like himself entered spirit life loaded down with theological dogma, by teaching them the true origin of their faith, thus eradicating the error, and opening their minds to the true light. The revelation would be interesting to us, I think.

May our noble ship, The Progressive Thinker, continue to sail on the Divine Plan to the end of time.

THE KEY-NOTE

Of the World's Great Religions.

COMPILED FROM MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S WORKS.

Mrs. Besant's testimony on this and kindred subjects is especially valuable, for many reasons, among them these; her conclusions are the results of many years of study and patient research on these lines, assisted by some of the best scholars of Europe (as well as the sages of the East in whom Freethinkers do not believe).

Secondly. She was at one time one of the foremost Agnostics in the world; and lastly the fact that even her enemies do not doubt her ability to speak the truth to the best of her knowledge.

Mrs. Besant says in her introduction to her "Ancient Wisdom": "Right thought is necessary to right conduct, right understanding to right living, and the Divine Wisdom—whether called by its ancient Sanskrit name of Brahma Vidya, or its modern Greek name of Theosophia, comes to the world as at once an adequate philosophy and an all-embracing religion and ethic." Some of its teachings are so simple and practical that any person of average intelligence can understand and follow them, while others are so lofty, so profound, that the ablest strains his intellect to contain them and sinks exhausted in the effort.

"It is admitted on all hands that a survey of the Great Religions of the world shows that they hold in common many religious, philosophical and ethical ideas. But while the fact is universally granted, the explanation of the fact is a matter of dispute.

Some allege that religions have grown up on the soil of human ignorance tilled by imagination, and have been gradually elaborated from crude forms of animism and fetichism; their likenesses are referred to universal natural phenomena imperfectly observed and fancifully explained, solar and star worship being the universal key for one school, phallic worship the equally universal key for the other, fear, desire, ignorance and wonder led the savage to personify the powers of nature, and priests played upon his terrors and his hopes, his misty fancies and his bewildered questionings; myths became scriptures and symbols, facts, and [How could the symbol exist before the thing symbolized?] as their basis was universal, the likeness of the products was inevitable. Thus speak the doctors of comparative mythology, and plain people are silenced but not convinced, under the rain of proofs; they cannot deny the likeness, but they dimly feel; are all man's dearest hopes and loftiest imaginings really nothing more than the outcome of savage fancies, and of groping ignorance? Have the great leaders of the races, the martyrs and heroes of humanity, lived, wrought, suffered and died deluded, for the mere personification of astronomical facts facts and for the draped obscenities of barbarians?"

"The second explanation of the common property in the religions of the world asserts the existence of an original teaching in the custody of a Brothhood of great Spiritual Teachers, who—themselves the outcome of past cycles of evolution—acted as the instructors and guides of the child-humanity of our planet, imparting to its races and nations in turn, the fundamental truths of religion in the form most adapted to the idiosyncrasies of the recipients,

"According to their view the founders of the great religions are members of the one Brotherhood, and were aided in their mission by many other members, lower in degree than themselves, initiates and disciples of various grades, eminent in spiritual insight, in philosophic knowledge, or in purity of ethical wisdom. These guided the infant nations, gave them their polity, enacted their laws, ruled them as kings, taught them as philosophers, guided them as priests; all the nations of antiquity looked back to such mighty men, demi-gods, and they left their traces in literature, in architecture, in legislation.

"That such men lived it seems difficult to deny in the face of universal tradition, of still existing scriptures, and of prehistoric remains, for the most part now in ruins to say nothing of other testimony which the ignorant would reject. The sacred books of the East are the best evidence for the greatness of their authors, for who in later days or in modern times can even approach the spiritual sublimity of their religious thought, the intellectual splendor of their philosophy, the breadth and purity of their ethic?

And when we find these books contain teachings about God, man and the universe identical in substance, under much variety of outer appearance, it does not seem unreasonable to refer them to a central primary body of doctrine. To that body we give the name of the Divine Wisdom, in its Greek form—Theosophy.

"As the origin and basis of all religions, it cannot be the antagonist of any; it is indeed their purifier, revealing the valuable inner meaning of much that has become mischievous in its external presentation by the perverseness of ignorance and the accretions of superstition; but it recognizes and defends itself in each, and seeks in each to unveil its hidden wisdom."

Mrs. Besant goes on to classify the underlying harmonies running through all religions; and begins her proof quotations from the old Chinese Scripture, the Ching-Chang-Ching, or Classic of Purity; and the thread of these quotations together with Mrs. Besant's comments, arguments and explanations will be followed up in our next—if we are allowed a next.

BOOK REVIEW.

The Light of Egypt. Volume 2. In this volume Spiritual Astrology is especially elaborated, in a scholarly and masterly manner. It is a book of much interest to Hermetists and students of occult subjects. Astrologically The Light of Egypt aims to present in brief the wisdom of the ages concerning man and his destiny, here and hereafter. It may be stated that Theosophists of the Blavatsky type have felt impelled to criticize it sharply because it controverts their theory of Karma and Reincarnation. The book is beautifully bound in cloth, and is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price $2.

Esoteric Lessons. By Sarah Stanley Grimke, Ph. D. Including personified Unthinkables, First Lessons in Reality, A Tour Through the Zodiac, (A Sequel to) First Lessons in Reality.

A remarkable production of occult thought, very deep and abstruse, requiring close and severe thinking in order to follow understandingly the mind of the author.

WHAT IS LIFE'S OBJECT?

A Study In the Philosophy of Man.

The earth was once a revolving sea of fire, yet in the molten mass was the germ prophetic of man. In the course of infinitely long ages, through the patient hand of involution, evolution, revolution and time worked until its surface cooled and became solid, when this process had continued and the temperature of the crust had at last fallen below the boiling point of water, the steam condensed and gathered in the depressions of its surface, as the cooling continued and the crust became thicker the melted interior repeatedly broke through it and burst forth in streams, which in turn hardened and became rocks, and now through space there sweeps a solid sphere all gemmed with liquid mirrors. Such changes and revolutions follow one another, every region of the globe passed through several changes. Plants and animals perished by these revolutions and now lie embedded as fossils in the rocks, mute witnesses of the past. The past ages of the globe are based upon the occurrence of the various fossils. The life of the globe has changed with the progress of time, and each age has had its peculiar species of plants and animals. Its life is divided into seven long ages which have dawned and died into space of time.

The first age includes the time from the first forming of a solid crust to the appearance of animal life. In this age granite quartz spar makes a cradle for the unconscious sleeping man. Then follows the age of mollusks, the age of fishes, then in the age of carbon man's spirit sings in the forest of palm and pine. Then follows the age of reptile, then in the animal age man's spirit dreams all unconscious of its dream.

Onward through the slowly creeping ages of evolution, the animal stands erect and we have the present age or that of man; his dreams now become conscious thought. The earth now has become a fit dwelling-place for man. To be sure changes are taking place now, but they are less sweeping and less violent than those of the preceding ages. Man now stands on the earth and looks around at the rocks, trees, grass and the sky, and thinks: This is I. For him life's object begins and ends in self, for he is but little in advance of the mere animal, cares for nothing but his own savage desires and passions and his own bodily wants which are provided by nature; his home is a cave or a rock, and he subsists on food supplied by nature.

But onward rolls the world and through progression and thought and the refining hand of time, softly as the ocean's ebb and flow, tames and molds the savage man through pain and suffering, his tyrant wish becomes subject to the reign of reason, and now in the o'er bending sky a new century blooms in the garden of time, before its open gate stands a pilgrim not a savage, but a man clothed in reason,

As he stands he muses: What is life's object? Is it the gaining of wealth? Is it honor? Is it position or rank? Is it beauty? Is it intellectual greatness? Is it social influence? Is it the search of happiness—the city of eternal happiness in the land of bye-and-bye? As he muses he sees many are striving to reach this beautiful city. Some are taking the path of carnal joys, some the strong path of fame, the road that is crowded most is the one that bears the sign-board "Gold." As these pilgrims worn and weary are almost within its portals, like a mist it disappears, and as before there stretches about them the unfathomable mysterious ocean of life; and in the magic music of the rustling leaves and rippling brook our pilgrim hears these words: Happiness is not found by any external path, but within thyself lies the priceless pearl. Man makes happiness the object of life, but nature decrees it shall be the result of every duty well done; happiness was the ultimate object for which man was born, but it can only be gained through a life well spent in usefulness, all duties faithfully performed.

As Longfellow says:

"O what a glory does this world put on,
For him who with fervent heart goes forth,
Under the bright and glorious sky and looks
On duties well performed and days well spent."

We must do our best for the uplifting and bettering of humanity, and to the spreading of progressive and liberal thought. But by many and varied experiences the soul must grow receptive to the soul of nature or spirit before it can unfold the flower of happiness.

But onward travels our pilgrim through all the various experiences of life, of joy, of sorrow, of honesty and uprightness, working for the good of others, unselfish in all his efforts, all duties well performed, and weary with pain and suffering and the burden of life, our pilgrim stands at the open grave. He reflects: Is this the end of life? No; oh, no; this life is but a second in the throbbing pulse of time, compared with the vastness of eternity; this little sand of time sparkling on the shores of an infinite ocean was given us, in which to learn the first lessons of life, to grow, to endure, to unfold, to fall and rise again and by experience to learn to overcome our faults and learn the worth of freedom. That dark and open space does not receive the soul, only the worn and weary habitation of clay. From this the immortal elements spring and live; it soars from height to height, life's troublesome waves grow sweet and still, in the darkness of an earthly night the star of morning shines bright. On the wings of love and music the soul is upward born by loving spirit friends to life, life immortal. Upon our pilgrim's silent lips rests a smile of perfect peace. He has found life's object.

GOD AT GALVESTON.

What The Oregonian Thinks of Him.

The trusting believer, if he thinks as well as trusts, looks at the Galveston horror and wonders how it happens, if there is a just God, that he permits such undeserved losses and suffering to fall upon his children. We may suppose that evil men received in this catastrophe no more punishment than would requite their deeds; but the blow feel equally on the saintly and the depraved, the hardened sinner and the innocent babe, on the abandoned in their hour of carousal and on the self-sacrificing at their posts of duty. Loving families were broken up, faithful wives snatched from the husband's side, dutiful parents removed from the children to whom they were necessary, and God-fearing men and devout women were called to pass through torture of mind and body such that the humane are faln to turn from it in very weariness of sympathy and grief. How can God, if he loves his children, suffer these things to be? What purpose of justice or benevolence can be advanced through such strokes of misery and desolation upon those whose lives are exemplary and whose hearts are right?

Such inquiries bring forcibly before us the iniquity of old superstitions and the collapse which is near at hand of old inadequate conceptions of God. It was the misfortune of early Christian teachers and of many of later times, to go back to antiquity for heathen attributes of deity which higher thinking, notably that of the stoics, had grandly outgrown. The primitive mind, in its narrow veins, naturally imparted human passions to the Ruler of the universe, who was usually conceived in multiform personages. The growth to monotheism was slow and painful, and the impulse to identify different divinities or parts of divinity with different human qualities has long seemed impossible of correction. It still survives in the multiplications of saints in the Catholic system, and in the speculations of extremely mystical Protestant theologians on differentiations between the three persons of the Trinity.

Theology has long insisted upon cataloguing the human propensities of Deity. These are derived, not from study of creation, but from imperfect human nature. It is the survival of conceptions formed of the universe before any adequate knowledge of the universe had been obtained by actual examination. The nature of the force or forces behind creation was as imperfectly grasped in the morning twilight of knowledge as was the topography of the earth itself or the arrangement of the celestial worlds. And while the geography of Marco Polo and the astronomy of Ptolemy have long been superseded by more correct systems, the religious world, partly by reason of its isolation from the practical walks of life and partly through the tenacity of religious opinion, has been slow to yield to the educational effects of new discoveries.

The one great fact that theology has set its face sternly against is the reign of law. And if there is one department or expression of the reign of law more profound than any other in its significance, or more inimical to theology in theology's own view, that is the law of growth. The tenet to which religion has most fiercely clung is that things were created as they are. Again, to specify the particular fields in which this contention has been most fondly cherished, they are three—the original creation of the world, the being of man, and the Bible. Geology was long resisted as the contrivance of the Evil One, because it menaced the doctrine of special creation. Evolution is still resisted because it disproves the ecclesiastical view of man's nature, and historical study of the Bible is condemned because it shows that book to have been a growth instead of a verbal emanation of Deity. It is only necessary now to note the fact that theologians have long ceased to contend that the Genesis accounts of creation are to be taken literally, that Christian evolutionists are becoming more numerous and influential every day and that enlightened Christian scholars now differ only in the degree in which they accept the results of the higher criticism. An excellent source of information on this score is supplied in the noble series of articles now appearing in the Outlook from that grand old Congregational minister, Lyman Abbott.

With this increasing understanding of the law of growth as applied to creation, to man's nature and to the Bible, it will not be long when the old terror of a capricious God incessantly interfering in the affairs of men will have passed away; when explanation of calamities and blessings will be looked for in natural causes rather than in the mysterious desire of a hidden power to reward or punish. The old libel upon the Creator, that he could call into being millions of innocent children whom he had preordained to everlasting torment has been dismissed at last, in favor of the assurance that "it is not the will of your Father in heaven that one of these little ones should perish"; but similar misconceptions still linger. As independent inquiry grows strong through its reassuring discoveries in science and history, it will soon have courage, even in the most trusting and devout, to appeal from dogma to evidence, to lean in confidence upon reason and conscience, to strip away from the conception of Deity all unworthy and repellent attributes, as anthropomorphism gradually gives way to the refinements of perfect ideals. The saintly soul that is perplexed at the Galveston horror has need of emancipation from that worst form of slavery, the intellectual tyranny that binds the mind and forbids it on some subjects to think and reason. The old theology, the old church, the old ideals—these have served their purposes and served them well. They must give way by degrees, and they are pretty certain not to do so until the basis of new and better things has been laid in study and experience. The new boat must be seaworthy before we abandon the old.—The Oregonian, Portland, Oregon.

ENSHRINED.

Though worthy of all love thou art,
All tenderness that lips avow;
The first plucked blossoms of my heart
May never wreathe a mortal brow.
I cannot offer thee first place
Within my heart, because not mine
For aught on earth; an angel's face
Forever fills and lights that shrine,
While lilies wreathe these words above:
"In memory of an immortal love
And of a hope divine."

And yet, dear soul, I love thee much,
And value more thy tenderness
Than love of most. With reverent touch
Thy friendly hand in mine I press
And whisper low before too late,
Ere death may still my lips or thine:
Though none may pass the mystic gate
Thy soul has grown so dear to mine,
I offer thee with love sincere
A place outside the shrine, yet near,
If thou wilt make it thine.

SOME CORRECTIONS

Of One Who Does'nt Understand Spiritualism.

Mr. T. Darley Allen makes so many questionable statements in his recent communication relative to Spiritualism, that I am constrained to further note and correct some of his errors, which I doubt not the general reader as well as the contributor himself, will be glad to have corrected; for I take it that both readers and contributors are hospitable to the truth, to a welcome degree.

He says: "There are eminent investigators who believe that as in the past fifty years we have learned to explain a great many of the phenomena of Spiritualism by natural causes, there is reason to hope that the study of mental science will enable us to explain all, before many years have passed."

How long since, pray, has it been true that, because A or B believes so and so ergo, that settles it. This, however, is the substance of Mr. Allen's logic—surely a very convenient but a very false way to determine the exact nature of any subject, fact, thing or theory, especially the question of immortality.

Every intelligent observer knows that the attitude of the human mind has much to do with accepting certain theories as being true, particularly where the wish is father to the thought.

This was popularized by Shakespeare 300 years ago, in his famous saying "there is nothing good or bad but thinking makes it so"—a sophism which a certain class of mental scientists in their extreme teachings, double discount.

I dispute his assertion that "we" or anyone has "learned to explain the phenomena of Spiritualism by natural causes"—meaning thereby by purely material means.

Who are the eminent investigators that have thus satisfactorily or scientifically explained a single spiritual phenomenon?

I neither want nor accept assumption or supposition for explanation, but demand clear, unmistakable demonstration. I want something beside the testimony of professional tricksters, like Maskelyne, Hermann and Heller, for we have the written statement, deliberate confession of their superiors, professionals like Houdin and Bellachina, the latter formerly court magician to the Emperor of Germany, that the spiritualistic manifestations they had witnessed were beyond their explanation or knowledge.

Where are the bona fide scientists that have made plain the genuine phenomena of Spiritualism by material agencies?

Perhaps our critic refers to the famous Buffalo doctors who in the early days of the movement, finding themselves overwhelmed at the extraordinary character of the manifestations evolved from out the measureless depths of their wisdom the ipse dixit that that rapping communication etc., on and through the table were caused by the snapping of toe joints! This marvelously intellectual dictum of such an extraordinary feat—worthy only of Bedlam—was seriously given as an expert medico-scientific explanation of incomprehensible phenomena as to how matters of known as well as forgotten facts, were stated, and cases of personal identity revealed to hundreds of total strangers and skeptics, most of whom were convinced against their will, while some were open disbelievers in a future life.

Though absurd to the extreme degree, this "toe-joint" theory was really propounded by educated M. Ds. and readily accepted by willing minds as a scientific explanation of how in numberless instances positive information was furnished—information which so far as known no living person possessed, verification, in some cases, having to be made to certain specified documents unknown to be in existence, either by the medium or the investigator.

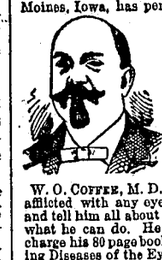
This is a specimen of the so-called "learned explanation" which still obtains with many, although under the more modern and euphonious terms of "hypnotism," "unconscious cerebration," "sub-liminal self," "sub-consciousness," "mind reading," "telepathy," etc.

Learning is popularly supposed to be the equivalent of knowledge, and knowledge the synonym of wisdom, but it is not—always! In fact they are often widely at variance. By way of accounting, however, for the successful results obtained under vastly different circumstances by the world's greatest and most independent investigators, the leading scientific minds of Christendom in their individual effort to determine the verity of spiritual phenomena—investigators like Askakof, Crookes, Varley, Zollner, Hellenbach, Wallace et id genus homo—our critic eagerly remarks that "learned men are often as easily deceived as ordinary people.

If he had said that certain professionally learned men often display great ignorance if not greater prejudice, especially when it happens to conflict with their preconceived notions and business interests, I could here readily agree with him. For instance, when such "learned men" as the late Dr. Geo. M. Beard, of Brooklyn, and Dr. Wm. A. Hammond, more recently of Washington, publicly announced that there never was a case of clairvoyance and that none could be produced, they but advertised their own ignorance.

But the great offer was made in good faith, without compensation, to submit proof of clairvoyance in Dr. Beard's own home, before any party of gentlemen he might choose to have present, the trial in question to be subjected to any test within reason, the only stipulation being that if the same were demonstrated to the Doctor's and the company's satisfaction, that he should acknowledge it as publicly as he had previously denied the possibility of its being done. This was openly granted. So, agreeably at the hour, a publicly known gentleman and his wife, old friends of mine for many years, both still living, made a trial on the occasion agreed upon, with the following result: They visited the Doctor's residence and before his assembled guests, the visiting lady was seated in a chair that was placed in the middle of the room, and her eyes carefully bandaged, which the company critically examined to full satisfaction. The Doctor then walked across his library and taking down a book from one of its shelves asked the lady the name of its author. To his great amazement she answered correctly, reading the full title-page. Good for trial number one. But this was claimed might be mind reading or telepathy. Then came trial number two. The Doctor walked backward to his library shelves, reached behind him and taking one of the books from its place, opened it at hazard, turned down a leaf and asked the lady what book it was, as he nor any one present did not know. She slowly gave the name of the book, the name of the author, the page turned down, and finally read it without an error. All this was verified when the Doctor brought the book to the front, looked it over, tested the prescribed page and the reading of the turned leaf—the correctness of all of which was testified to by every one present.

Alas! for the mutubility of human hopes and certain men's promises; the good Doctor never had the graciousness to acknowledge that fact. It was too great a vindication of what he had conceived to be an impossibility. The evidence was overwhelming, and likewise was his discomfiture. He died without making his word good or the truth known.



When one seeks publicly to assail genuine spiritual phenomena, it is essential that he be prepared to submit argument other than that which is based solely on misinformation. It is respectfully suggested that the first prerequisite is at least a little knowledge.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

"The Mystery of Edwin Drood," a continuation of Charles Dickens' remarkable story. Who has a copy for sale? Send price of it on a postal to this office.

F. E. Irvine, secretary, writes: "The St. Paul (Minn.) Spiritual Alliance will begin the fall meetings Sunday, October 7, 1900, at 8 p. m., at Odd Fellows' Hall, Wabasha and Fifth streets. Mr. Will J. Erwood will lecture and give psychometric readings.

John Hutchinson, president, and May F. Ayres, secretary, have issued the following to a most excellent and faithful worker: "Missionary Commission, Michigan State Spiritual Association. Know ye that reposing special confidence in the integrity and ability of Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit, Mich., said association has commissioned her as missionary of the gospel of Spiritualism, to execute and fulfill the duties of said office, to organize societies, reorganize some that for various reasons have not been holding meetings for some time, and also arrange for spiritual meetings in any part of the state, upon the most reasonable terms. Anyone desirous of securing her services can do so by addressing her at 411 13th street, Detroit. As Mrs. Baade is an ordained minister, she has the right to solemnize marriages, bury the dead and do everything that pertains to the gospel of Spiritualism, and we hope Spiritualists from all parts of the state will endeavor to avail themselves of the opportunity to organize and rebuild and work for time and eternity."

The Spiritual Research will hold meetings every Wednesday at Van Buren Opera House, Hall B, corner of Madison street and California avenue. Beginning at 2 o'clock. Also will give a musical and literary social the afternoon of Thursday, October 11. All are invited to come and bring their lunch. Coffee will be served from 6 to 7 o'clock. The evening will be spent in a social time and card playing.

The Gazette of Chillicothe, O., says: "A very peculiar story has developed since the inquest of Miss Brown was held in the Probate Court. It appears Miss Brown attended the teachers' institute held in this city some time ago, and there met a Prof. Spade who claimed to be soliciting pupils for his school in Lebanon, Ohio. Prof. Spade called on her while she was staying at the home of her sister, and talked Spiritualism to her and went through various Spiritualistic performances. Before Prof Spade left the city she promised to go to Lebanon as soon as her school term had ended. Since that time it seems her mind has become affected on the subject of religion. Wednesday she kept up a continual call for Professor Spade, saying that he was the only one able to save her. If any one chanced to get near her while she was in the cell at the city prison that night, she called to them to release her, telling them they would be struck dead if they refused."

The St. Louis Star-Sayings says: "Her obstinacy in adhering to Christian Science doctrines in the face of severe illness is said to have caused the death at 5 o'clock this morning of Mrs. Emma Kennel, of 2733 Chouteau avenue. Although she had been ill from a malignant cancer for six months, Mrs. Kennel, who was 48 years old, persistently refused to allow a regular physician to attend her. Instead, despite the pleadings of her relatives, she prayed daily with a Christian Science practitioner, said by the family to be a Mrs. Hinton, of the Christian Science church at Twenty-eighth and Pine streets. At daylight this morning her condition was so low that her nephew, George Guibor, who lives in the house, took it upon himself to summon the family physician, Dr. J. T. Pirtle, 2714½ Chouteau avenue. When Dr. Pirtle arrived, however, Mrs. Kennel was dead."

Edward Alford Merritt speaks as follows of Christian Science: "Christian Science is founded upon the Word of God, and its works are demonstrated through the teachings of Christ. The power of healing is divine, wholly spiritual. Nowhere in the Bible nor in the Christian Science text books, can it be found that suggestion is a method of healing taught by Jesus Christ. God is eternal, an ever-present truth, being All in All. The teachings of Jesus may suggest to Christians that God is love, that God is life, that we should have no other gods but the one Infinite God, but only in this way, can the teachings of Christian Science be classed with suggestion."

All mail matter for Frank T. Ripley should be addressed hereafter in care of H. W. Boozer, 409 Lyon street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Polly Burrows writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Occult Temple was filled to the doors, many being unable to gain admission on Sunday and Wednesday evenings, to hear Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago. A more appreciative audience could not be found. A spiritual atmosphere filled the beautiful little temple. Mrs. Cooley spoke under full trance conditions; each lecture was followed by spirit communion. Many descriptions, some startling, were given. The people of this city will long and favorably remember the coming of Mrs. Cooley."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. C. H. Figuers writes: "Ill health has kept me very quiet the major part of this year; once by the advice of my physician my Buffalo engagement was cancelled, and I have been at home resting until a few days ago I went to Perrysburg, Ohio, stopping at the home of Mr. Geo. Scott and his estimable wife. Last night as per arrangement, Mr. W. V. Nicum, vice-president O. S. A.; Mrs. Amanda Coffman, of Michigan, and myself held a joint meeting which was a complete success in every respect. The Independent Association of Spiritualists of Toledo is increasing in numbers and usefulness, and bids fair to become the leading society of Toledo. Mrs. Challen and Mrs. Chouse, local speakers, most kindly assisted in the exercises. After Christmas I shall be glad to make engagements anywhere, but prefer working in Ohio. Any society desiring my services for a short engagement can address me for terms at 9 Fulton street, Cleveland, Ohio."

Mrs. Alice Baker, trance speaker and test medium, of Cleveland, O., writes: "October 3, I commence holding meetings at 261 Pearl street, Cleveland. I will hold meetings there until January, 1901, at which time I am planning to start on a Southern tour of work for January, February and March. A part of my time is now engaged. Any society or places wishing to organize a society in Southern Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee, and desiring my services during these months, please correspond with me at once so I can arrange my dates as nearly satisfactory with all as possiblbe. Address all communications to me at 261 Pearl street, Cleveland, Ohio."

Oscar A. Edgerly writes from Elyria, Ohio: "The Progressive Spiritualist Society of Elyria, Ohio, held its annual business meeting on Friday, September 21, when the following named persons were elected as officers for the ensuing year: President, F. M. Martin; vice-president, W. H. Shattuck; secretary, Mrs. R. Baird; treasurer, Geo. H. Arnold; directors, F. M. Martin, W. H. Shattuck, Mrs. Baird, Geo. Methe, Mrs. Geo. Methe, R. B. Belden and Mrs. Sarah J. Kimball. Having served this society during the month of September, and thus having become well acquainted with the officers and members, I feel well assured that the society is destined to do a good work for our cause in this community. I find very good workers for our cause in this city, but if there are any who deserve special mention I feel they should be Mr. F. M. Martin, the incoming president, and Mr. W. H. Tucker, the ex-president. Mr. Martin is to my mind one man in a thousand. He is ever ready to support our cause with tongue, pen, or pocket-book. I only wish we had a million such men in the United States; then Spiritualism would be properly appreciated, and what I have said of Mr. Martin could as well be said of Mr. Tucker; he is justly proud in having been a Spiritualist for forty years, and I can believe he has ever been true to that high standard that at present is so apparent in his life."

E. A. Doty writes from Albany, N. Y.: "We have just organized a Spiritualist Society in this city, and elected the following officers: Colonel John S. Robbins, president; James Burge, vice-president; E. A. Doty, secretary and treasurer. Mediums passing through this city are earnestly requested to correspond with us, as we are anxious to engage first-class talent. Address me in care of Comptroller's office."

Mrs. A. M. Pennefeather writes from New Canton, Ill.: "Mr. Ward is going to follow the directions of his guides for development for the next few months, which will render him able to present this great truth to the whole world. There is great improvement in the music, and the guides say when perfected, they can play any and all kinds of music in the light. Won't this be wonderful? Voices have already been heard in the light, and there seems to be no end to the manifestations, and it is as astonishing to the medium as to the sitters. It is truly wonderful to hear a spirit voice talk for an hour or more. They are developing a form or phase of seeing, that will show the real spirit, they say; not materializing, but the genuine body. Faces and hands have already been seen."

H. N. Maguire writes: "Please allow me space to express my high appreciation of the article by Brother Underhill in the issue of September 22, headed 'Studies in Spiritual Thought.' I commend it for thoughtful perusal to all who have not read it, and also as worthy by those who have read it once of a second reading—which I have given it. The appended poem, 'The Mount of Vision,' would have reflected credit on Cowper, and is evidently a continuation in harmonic numbers of the same inspirational impulse that gave birth to the preceding prose matter. The 'Petersilea' article, No. 34, in the same issue, especially the last paragraph, is also rich in soul food. Other articles of great merit I will not specify, as they run on other lines of thought. Advanced Spiritualists are now awakening to the fact that there are different qualities or elevations of inspiration. Imperial or primary inspiration comes unvoiced; it is a silent inflow into the soul of the divine life essences, which the soul may be cultured to give expression to in truths aglow with its own heavenly fire, an outpouring in word-forms of what was received as the unformed life essences of the living God. This is the Spiritualism which alone can spiritualize. I agree with those who predict that the time is at hand for a general lapsing of the powers of those mediums whose aspirations and cast of character are not truly spiritual. Even now their powers are waning, as is the demand for all the mere external manifestations. But the world will not be left in darkness. As the lower lights flicker low and go out the brighter stars will rise. The true glory of Spiritualism is just dawning."

The First Spiritual Church of the South Side, Oakland Club House, corner of Oakwood and Ellis avenues. Service every Sunday at 7:30 p. m. Lecture, followed with spirit messages. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, pastor.

Herman Hess, clairvoyant lecturer, wants a lady or gentleman to join with him in giving platform tests for Spiritualistic societies, one with gifts, but not fully developed, preferred. Address 30 West Vermont street, Indianapolis, Ind.

H. F. Coates writes: "The Ladies' Auxiliary of the Church of the Spirit Communion will give an entertainment and dance Saturday evening, October 6, at Mackinaw Hall, corner Evans avenue and 43d street. This is the first of the season, and no pains will be spared to make it a very enjoyable affair. Entertainment will be provided for both old and young. Come one, come all. Admission 25 cents."

Mrs. I. Wagner writes from Eskridge, Kan.: "I attended the Ottawa and Delphos camps. Good audiences at both and harmony among the people in general. I had the pleasure of listening to Will C. Hodge, at the Delphos camp. His lectures are always instructive. I am open for camp engagements for 1901."

The Terre Haute Tribune says: "Secretary Jamison, of the J. M. C. A., and A. Chaney, the bicycle dealer who has the corner room in the association building, have become thorough Spiritualists. Some few evenings ago while Mr. Chaney was sitting in front of his store, he noticed the shadows of the letters in the sign in his window swinging back and forth and, turning to see the cause, found the gas lamp in the window swinging from north to south. He went in and stopped it and then went out again. The shadows were still moving and the lamp could not be induced to stand still. On investigating he found the chandelier in the back room describing the same motion. The next morning Mr. Jamison came running down into his shop and told Chaney that the mirrors in the bathroom, the door to the closet in the physical director's room and the mirrors on the walls had all gone crazy and were swinging from north to south. Chaney told his side of the story, and an investigation was made, but no cause for the movements could be found. The articles are still swinging and all attempts to stop them are baffled. There is no machinery in the building, not even an electric fan, and even at night when there is hardly any one moving, the lamps and mirrors insist upon swinging. The phenomenon so far goes unexplained."

E. Woodard writes from Tucson, Arizona: "In a late paper, in the editorial, 'Banish the Alcohol,' you still seem to have a misconception of the word 'canteen,' as used in connection with the military in Manila. The word is evidently taken from the Spanish word 'cantena' (a saloon), and indeed is a saloon authorized by the military and restricted to the sale of beer and lighter beverages. It seems that before the military took hold of the matter there were innumerable native gin shops which dispensed a native drink that was much worse than poor whiskey, and was demoralizing the American soldiers to such an extent that the authorities closed all these shops and the 'regimental canteen' was established with permits issued by said authorities. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the work you are doing and don't like to see any vulnerable points exposed for the opposition."

The Columbus (Ohio) Journal says: "Judge Williams on Thursday ordered that the property of the Liberal Spiritualist Camp-meeting be appraised and sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debts. The action of the court was taken upon the suggestion of the receiver, G. A. Livensperger. In his report to the court, Mr. Livensperger says that when he took charge of the camp at Worthington there was a quarrel among the members of the association, and that as a result there was such a small attendance that the receipts were not sufficient to pay the running expenses. Mr. Livensperger says that the association owes debts amounting to $1,602.25, and that he has in his possession as assets a number of chattels, in the way of tents, etc., that have not as yet been appraised."

The swindler, the cheat, the mediumistic fraud and the sleight-of-hand performer are abroad in the land, in every city. Gullible Spiritualists are deceived by them—not those with horse sense. The Galesburg (Ill.) Register says: "Prof. Joseph J. Carpenter gave an interesting entertainment at the Auditorium, Sunday night, which he announced in his advertisement to be a demonstration of Spiritualism or theosophy, but which many in the large audience present are saying to-day was simply an exhibition of clever prestidigitation. The professor completely mystified his spectators with various wonderful feats, among which inexplicable slate-writing was done, locked handcuffs instantly unlocked, and the professor himself freed by the 'mysterious influence' from numerous rope bonds."

The Logansport (Ind.) Journal says: "The latest sensation in Frankfort is the death of a highly esteemed German citizen, who, it is claimed, was forewarned of the end and was told by an angel at what time he would expire, and death came as he said it would. A few days prior to his death his family noticed that he appeared considerably worried about something of which he was reluctant to speak. After much persuasion, however, he related to them a dream which he had a night or two previous. While he was asleep, a form resembling that of an angel, beautiful and in white raiment, appeared to him and announced that he had but a short time to live. This vision said that it was not permitted that the exact date should be made known to him, but that he would be called at the expiration of either one year, one month, one week or three days. After making this declaration the vision vanished. and Mr. Classmeyer awoke. He noted the hour, a few minutes after midnight, and he attempted to dismiss the dream from his memory, but it had so impressed itself upon him that he found it impossible to escape its haunting influences. Then he told his family and a few immediate friends, and they tried without avail to cheer him up. The remarkable fact is, his sudden death occurred exactly one week, almost to the minute, from the time he awakened from his strange dream. He had been in good health prior to the fatal attack of neuralgia. The strange coincidence of his dream and death is the subject of much comment in this vicinity."

The Chicago Tribune says: "Mrs. Annie Simon and her married daughter, Mrs. Fannie Birnbaum, who have been kept out of an insane asylum for upwards of two years by means of hypnotic suggestion, are still undergoing treatment at the Metropolitan Hospital, in East Eighty-second street, but heroic efforts on the part of attending physicians have failed to prevent them from moving their habitation. They moved their home to-day for the sixty-first time in one year, and then went to the hospital to be treated hypnotically. First they endeavored to get Dr. Samuel F. Brothers, who has been attending them for two years, to come to their abode and clear the place of the witches, which the women declare are eternally pursuing them, electrifying the floors and walls, sharpening knives with which to jab their bodies, and descending from the chimney at night to beat them black and blue. It was to escape a blonde-haired witch who came down the chimney for the purpose of beating them, and a blind witch with white hair who had a propensity for sharpening knives on the window sill of their room at three in the morning that Mrs. Simon and her daughter say they abandoned their last apartments."

Jennie O'Neill Potter, the gifted elocutionist, died lately at St. Luke's Hospital in New York City. Miss Potter has been patiently waiting for death since last December, when the doctors told her that she could not possibly live longer than spring. She was only twenty-eight years old and has been a very popular reader for the last ten years. A pathetic incident connected with Miss Potter's death is that of the mocking bird which was given her some time ago by a friend. The little bird never sang and the doctors and nurses came to the conclusion that it was not a songster. Tuesday morning the bird, to the wonder of all, suddenly began to whistle and trill. It continued to sing in shrill and beautiful tones for several hours. All at once the bird ceased its music and dropped in its cage, and at the same moment Miss Potter breathed her last.

H. F. Coates writes: "The Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, is filled each Sunday night and we feel that a good work is being done. Tests are also given after the lecture and are the means of converting many. The conference meetings at 3 p. m. are very interesting and instructive. All are invited to come and take a part."

Col. Bingham, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, who has charge of the Washington Monument, says one of the greatest troubles the watchmen at the monument have to contend with is the chipping of these memorial stones by relic hunters. "One of the strangest things in regard to these relic hunters," said Col. Bingham, to a New York Mail and Express reporter, "is the fact that more than one-half of the men arrested for chipping off relics are clergymen. When the police arrest these despoilers and start with them to the station house the man will begin to ask what is the penalty and try to beg off. He is told that the fine is a heavy one, but that $15 security can be put up for appearance in the police court. Then the prisoner explains that he is a minister of the gospel and meant no harm, and that he could not stand the disgrace of appearing in a police court. He ends up by giving up the collateral, after generally trying to cut it down to $10, saying he has only that amount with him."

L. W. Beard writes from Lapine, La.: "I have had the pleasure of perusing a few copies of your paper, which has had the effect to shake my faith as a Christian, and to arouse my suspicions as to the truthfulness of the Old and New Testament scriptures. I must confess that these antiquated writings, together with all the comments I have heard and read upon them, have not been sufficient to satisfy my mind in its search for the truth. I have been taught to believe, and have tried hard to believe, that everything in them is absolutely true, and have tried to practice the precepts laid down by Jesus Christ, especially with regard to secret prayer, and now at the age of fifty-one years I cannot cite to a single instance in which my prayer has been granted. I know of nothing upon which I can rely with any degree of certainty. I would subscribe for and read your paper and all the publications you offer for sale bearing upon the newly discovered way to peace and happiness on earth and in the spirit land, if I could feel assured that they too were not a delusion and a snare." Verily, how do you expect to change your views without careful investigation. If you are afraid you will find a "delusion and a snare," and in consequence will not read and investigate, then good-by to progress on your part, we can do nothing for you. If you will, however, carefully investigate Spiritualism, you will in due course of time become a believer in its phenomena and philosophy.

The Scranton (Pa.) Tribune says: "A young man in Richmond, Va., has been seized with a desire to shine as a hypnotist. He has been quite the most popular man in his set by reason of the entertainment he has been able to afford with his amateur efforts at making his friends do weird things. But young Mr. Cook's popularity has suddenly waned and the people in whose parlor he was giving the amateur performance now are not at home when he sends up his card. It was all on account of a little seance the other evening when a young man of frail physique was the subject. Mr. Cook had hypnotized him, after which he was assured that he was an athlete of fabulous strength. The subject immediately arose and 'went for' things. He tipped over the piano and then pitched a china cabinet across the room; then he uprooted the radiator and smashed a sideboard. All this time Operator Cook was vainly endeavoring to wake up the subject, but seemed to have lost the combination. Physicians were called in but with the united strength of the assemblage they found it difficult to subdue the astonishing energy of the hypnotized man. It was only after several hours of hard work that he was aroused from his trance. The indiscriminate use of the hypnotic influence should be restrained by law. People are bad enough and weak enough when managed by their own impulse, but to have their bad tendencies strengthened and their wills weakened by someone else probably worse than themselves is to be deplored. The college professor in Harvard who cures boys of cigarette smoking and the drink habit is using his powers to some good effect, but as a rule the amateur hypnotist simply makes fools of his subjects and with no other purpose than to show them up in a ridiculous light before the public gaze."

We have received a copy of Laura B. Payne's song, entitled "The Millennium." The music is very fine. The price of it is 50 cents. For copies address Laura B. Payne, 723 Van Buren street, Topeka, Kan.

Dr. John C. Wyman writes from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "A new series of Spiritual meetings was started Sunday evening, September 23, in Single Tax Hall, 1101 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., by a number of the Spiritualistic friends of Miss May Sicardi, who is a medium of rare psychometric ability, as well as a fine test psychic, and also an inspirational writer of beautiful spiritual poems and essays, which are highly entertaining in their lucid and logical presentation of the foundation principles of our beloved Spiritualistic philosophy. Bro. Geo. A. Deleree, president of the Brooklyn Advance Conference, acted as chairman and made the opening address. Miss Sicardi read one of her poems, and then spent an hour in psychometrizing articles, and giving excellent tests and messages to the fifty persons present, which were abundantly convincing and satisfactory to the recipients. It is intended by the members of this new Spiritual organization to make it a truly educational society in the higher teachings of the spirit world, while at the same time fully demonstrating the phenomena of Spiritualism. Among the audience were many of our old-time Spiritualists, as well as new enquirers. Bros. Samuel Stodder and Wm. Palmer, of the board of directors of the Fraternity of Divine Communion, are in full sympathy with and are generous supporters of this new movement in the interests of a pure, rational and religious presentation of the true gospel of modern Spiritualism. Bro. Elbert Latham is treasurer of the society. We shall keep The Progressive Thinker on sale at our future meetings, and seek to increase its circulation, for it is a valuable educator."

P. A. Cleveland writes: "Trinity Spiritual Society will hold its regular meeting at its hall in Van Buren Opera House, California avenue and Madison street, Wednesday October 3 at 2 p. m. Mrs. Nixon, president. Admission free."

T. S. Russell writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union will hold a special anniversary service at its hall 420 West 63d street, October 7, at 7:30 p. m. There will be a conference meeting also at 2:30. Will C. Hodge will deliver the address. Excellent test mediums will assist. There will be inspirational music, poems, etc., and altogether a day of spiritual rejoicing over the splendid work accomplished for truth in the past year. Come and rejoice with us. It will do you good."

Mrs. H. E. Gaulden, of Titusville, Pa., wants the postoffice address of A. A. Wilkins, formerly of Greenfield, Mass.

Henrietta Straub writes: "After reading Mr. Dawbarn's good words about Mr. Tuttle's 'Arcana of Spiritualism,' I give up, as unnecessary, the intention to express my modest opinion about that remarkable book. Mr. Dawbarn's mature judgment does not brook any supplementary attempt. Let me venture only a few words impressing themselves upon my mind while reading Mr. Dawbarn's article: It must be a feast for the heart of every true Spiritualist, to see two prominent workers in our grand cause, however different in shades of opinion, do justice to each other, one publicly endorsing the other's worth and merits. This is the right kind of spirit for brothers and co-workers. 'In unity lies strength.' Unity and harmony will be the safest foundation for our glorious temple of spiritual philosophy."

N. H. Briggs writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "In keeping with the growth and general prosperity of our beautiful 'Queen City' of Michigan, the society of Spiritualists here has outgrown its old home, and been compelled to seek a larger, more spacious auditorium. Such a one has been secured, and on Sunday evening, September 23, the same as a 'Temple of Truth' was duly and appropriately dedicated to the holy cause. The dedicatorial lecture was delivered by Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit. It was indeed a masterful effort, replete with truth, love and harmony. She held her audience as if spellbound for nearly two hours. As I listened upon that occasion to the earnest, eloquent utterances of the speaker, the truth of the saying that 'like attracts like' was forcibly impressed upon me. Mrs. Carpenter who is the personification of goodness, purity and truth, certainly attracts to her aid from the bright wisdom sphere of the higher life in the Over-World, intelligences of an exceedingly high and holy order. She is so well known and universally beloved in this city, that it requires but the simple announcement that she is to lecture, to insure a large attendance of earnest, honest, thoughtful and inquiring listeners. May her sojourn in the 'land of shadows' be many, many years, that she may be permitted to complete the grand work of dissipating ignorance, error and superstition, and disseminating good and truth in which she is so zealously, conscientiously and enthusiastically engaged, and to which she has so unselfishly dedicated and devoted her life. When her life's cares in the mortal are o'er, when her good work is done and she is called to her reward, she will be greeted and welcomed by the angels of heaven with joy and song, even as they sang 1900 years ago around the cradle of the 'Meek and Lowly,' 'Peace on earth, good will to men.'"

Nellie S. Baade writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Having been called to Port Huron to officiate at a funeral, I availed myself of the opportunity of attending one of Mr. Rennick's materializing seances. The spirit of Mrs. Gilchrist, whose body had been interred in the afternoon appeared to the husband and daughters in the evening at the seance. It was a happy reunion upon the part of spirit and mortal. Other spirits were recognized by their friends, and all returned home satisfied that Mr. Rennick was an honest and conscientious medium."

Lyman C. Howe has been lecturing at Williamsport, Pa. His home address for engagements is Fredonia, N. Y.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has returned to Chicago and located at her former number, 98 Thirtieth street, where she will be pleased to see her friends after October 1.

Dr. J. M. Peebles has been engaged to write a series of six articles, on Spiritualism, for the Free Thought Magazine. The first article will appear in the October number. The Free Thought Magazine is most excellent, and is published by H. L. Green, 213 East Indiana street, Chicago, Ill.

NO FEAR OF DEATH.

Whoever leaves the world the better for His having lived, need have no fear of death;
So when the day of my departure comes
I'll pass away in peace, content to die,
Because of having uttered my protest Against that ghostly, monstrous, nightmare of
A dying world, a devilish Deity,
The author of a never-ending hell—
A hopeless hell for souls who stumble o'er
The stony path their feet are forced to tread,
And who, alas! are called all causelessly
From silent, sinless chaos, save, forsooth,
To satisfy the soulless, savage lust
Of wanton cruelty that's said to seethe
Forever in the baleful bosom of An angry God, whom Mary's Son declared
To be the very soul of sympathy,
Of tenderness and love, such as a model
Earthly mother has for helpless infancy,
Unsullied by a sin—or for a son
Sin-soiled from head to foot, who lan-
guishes
His hapless life away in dungeon dark
And foul in some far land beyond the sea,
But whose death agonies e'er haunt her heart
By day, and horrify her dreams by night.
And is a woman of the common kind
So much above her maker in the sweet
Amenities of love, and all that goes
To make a gracious woman grand, that
He,
Her heavenly father, in comparison
Appears a hideous fiend? It cannot be!
The God I worship is the one who left
The sheltered sheep and wandered through the storm
In quest of one poor, little missing lamb
And ceased not in His search till it was found.

KANSAS.

Organizing a State Spiritualist Association.

To the Editor:—The organization of the State Spiritualist Association of this state is about perfected. T. W. Woodrow, of Kansas City, was elected president; H. W. Henderson, of Lawrence, vice-president; A. Markley, Topeka, second vice-president; F. E. Miller, Topeka, secretary, and Oscar G. Richards treasurer. Directors, C. B. Hoffman, Enterprise; Jno D. Haskell, Abilene; Judge Tucker, Wichita; Mrs. Bessie Bellman, Horton; Mrs. M. E. Rupright, Topeka; H. W. Gates, Rosedale, and Theodore P. Walton, Harveyville.

The object of this organization is to get the state of Kansas more thoroughly organized for Spiritual work.

With Rev. T. W. Woodrow at the head and a number of able and efficient workers as officers, scattered throughout the state, we hope to move on victoriously in the battle for truth.

It is the intention of this association to send out missionaries to organize local societies, each of which will send one delegate or more to the annual meeting of the State Association which will be held at Topeka during the month of February.

During the coming winter there will be held what is called a mid-winter meeting at Topeka, during February, at which meeting it is hoped there will be a large gathering from all over the state and elsewhere. Especially is it desired that the officers and trustees of this association meet here then.

There will be many good speakers and mediums here. A good program for each day will be had. An excellent time is anticipated. This is but the beginning of our annual mid-winter meetings, which we hope to see grow into something grand and good for Spiritualism.

The Church of Spiritualism of this place is making arrangements to obtain Unity church in which to hold meetings until a Spiritualist Temple is erected here, which we hope will not be long.

Topeka is the home of hundreds of Spiritualists, and they badly need a place which they can call their own and where they can meet to be educated in the beautiful truths and grand philosophy of Spiritualism. A move is being made in that direction and we long to see the day of its fruition.

When we look about us and see the many things necessary and waiting to be done for the spreading of Spiritualism, and knowing well that its teachings are for the betterment of the human race, we realize that indeed and in truth the harvest is great and the laborers are few."

Oh, that Spiritualists everywhere would rise in their might, and do with a will whatsoever their hands find to do! Oh, that men and women everywhere who know of the truths of Spiritualism would boldly stand up for the same without fear of derision or the sneers of the orthodox world. Then would the wheel of progress roll rapidly on, and where ignorance now drops its sable curtain down, and disease, hunger, war and bloodshed stalk like grim phantoms throughout the land,

The light of truth and knowledge
Would shine with undimmed ray,
And drive from out our earthly land
All miseries away.

Real Cause of the Chinese Trouble

It is said that the Americans spend annually $200,000,000 in propitiating their gods and devils. I do not hesitate to say that the Chinese are able to do the same thing just as effectively for a much larger population for less than half this sum. If any doubt we Chinamen ask a competitive trial.

If your missionaries can show us any devices which would be more efficacious in keeping off devils, or cheaper or more expedient in propitiating the deities by prayers than those that exist among our important people to-day, then and not till then will it be time for you to send missionaries to China. All our superstitious practices are among the Taoists and Buddhists. The learned literary and official classes are all Confucians, and Confucius taught us to respect our ancestors and leave the gods alone. Confucius teaches us to have nothing to do with any one who pretends to have intercourse with the supernatural. We do not believe in any angels and demons, which is so common in all other systems, and it has often been said of us that because we do not believe in these supernatural beings our system is not religion at all. When first Jesuit missionaries went to China they did not attempt to meddle with the institutions of the country. They taught mathematics, astronomy and philosophical subjects. They were well received and made themselves popular with the Emperor, but as soon as they commenced to attack the institutions of the country they were ordered to quit.

What we require in China is scientific men—men educated in some of the concrete sciences that we do not understand to the same extent you understand them. We do not object to your doctors and we admire their skill; we do not object to your engines and neither do we object to any of your scientific men. The whole cause of the present trouble in China is because we have an ignorant and superstitious class of people, and the Buddhists, who have a religion almost identical with the Christian religion, and who are jealous of others who are bringing what they consider a competing faith. They feel exactly the same as the people would in this country if the Buddhists were to come here and attempt to supplant Catholics and Protestants. But what exasperates us more than anything is the immunity which the so-called converts have from the action of law in their own country. Suppose a Chinese priest should come here and it was shown that every burglar and pickpocket by becoming a Buddhist would become exempt from arrest; suppose the introduction of the new faith here should give the criminal classes a license to ply their trade with complete immunity from the action of the laws, would you submit to such a state of affairs? Why, then, should we Chinese be an exception to the rule?

It will be quite impossible to have peace in China so long as foreign missionaries are allowed to interfere with the institutions of the country, and no government in Pekin can be strong enough to protect unpopular missionaries throughout so vast an empire.

Recall the missionaries and all will go well.—Toan Chen in the New York Journal.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

T. Williams: Q. Will the promise of my guides be fulfilled, that they will be able to materialize independent of the circle, and be recognized by their friends?

A. This correspondent will succeed far better to cultivate his intuitional faculties—spiritual perception. The circle is not essential to the appearance of spirits, although employed as an assistant. Hence it may be possible for the guides to fulfill their promises, but as long as the seances are conducted for this especial purpose, and expectation exacting this phase of manifestation, it will not be received. The reasons for such failure have been so many times given that they need not here be repeated.

E. Johnson: Your description of the manifestations attending you indicate mediumistic power, which may be improved by proper methods. You should first inform yourself on the subject of Spiritualism by reading its literature. You will thus learn to distinguish the valuable from the inconsequential. By so doing you will be able to begin your investigations with the advantages of the experiences of those who have gone before you.

"Seeker," Kalamazoo, Mich. Q. By what right do governments own the land and deed it to individuals?

A. This is a question, the true answer to which will call out severe criticism, for it will touch vested interests and oppose the traditions of generations. We may be better able to answer by inquiring the relation of the people to the land in the earliest ages. We find that it was not as now parcelled out and occupied to the exclusion of those not favored with the boughten privilege, but owned in common by the tribe, and as it was in great abundance, for the population was sparse, each individual used as much as he pleased, and when not occupied it reverted to the tribe. Use was the deed of ownership, and the title was valid only during use.

As the tribe advanced toward nationality the rulers were quick to seize the lands and by taxation thereon make the people slaves. Of the three imperative necessities—air, water, land—the rulers could not control the two first, but the last could not escape them.

Nothing can be more clear than the great truth that the gifts of nature, air, water and land, do not belong to individuals, but the whole human family; for if the air be monopolized we may perish from suffocation; if the water, we die of thirst; if the land, of hunger; yet on the subversion of this truth all the despotisms have been founded.

The king owned the land by divine right and gave his subjects the privilege to live on it by paying taxes and services when commanded. The first and best of everything belonged to the king and his officers. Such was the primary condition, which was made more complicated by conquest. The conquerors held the land and its people by the right of conquest, vested in the king, who parceled it out among his chieftains, who supported their tills by the enslavement or taxation of the original occupants, who became serfs.

Their right was that of conquest—the robber's right, yet such is the original patent for all private ownership of land. Is the United States an exception? Did it not take the land by force from the Indians, treaties and purchases being farces?

The rights of government? What right has the governments to that which is by nature the inalienable possession of the individual who uses it? Has government a right to survey the air and prohibit its use by those not able to acquire a title deed? Has it a right to debar the light from those who cannot or will not purchase? Has it a right to impose a tax on the water we drink?

Then has it the right to take possession of the land and forbid its use except on the conditions it imposes?

When the colonial governments were established, they met at once with the difficulty of land grants made by profligate kings to more profligate courtiers. The kings claimed the land by divine right. When these were disposed of the government assumed the kingly right, and sold the land to those desiring it. The value fixed was small, that none might be debarred, but this very precaution allowed the land to be purchased in large tracts, to be held by greedy speculators until the actual settlers were forced to pay exorbitantly, although not the least improvement or change had been made. No legislation has worked greater wrong, caused more suffering or as effectually retarded the country's growth. It has poured the heart's blood of labor into the plethoric veins of grasping monopoly, insensate and merciless.

The great army at last was rebuked by the homestead bill, but too late, for already had most of the public land passed into the hands of speculators. The priceless heritage of the children had been squandered, or given to those who would use it to enslave them. Not only townships, and counties were given to railroads, but territory large enough for states; great belts stretching across the continent, and the poor and struggling pioneer, braving every danger and deprivation to secure a home, was compelled to pay tenfold for every acre over government prices. This is legal right, but not justice. The government cannot justly grant lands to railroads because it has no right to the lands thus granted. It gives away its children's patrimony. The land belongs to the people of the state and should be unalienable.

It follows that the improvements made on the land belong to the laborer who makes them and hence such improvements give the right of that continuous occupation which is called ownership. This principle is recognized, although by no means the incentive of the law, in the stipulations of homestead pre-emption which bestows the land after a certain amount of labor has been expended thereon.

Mechanic, Savannah, Ga.: Q. If a beam of any material—say steel—were absolutely fastened rigidly at both ends, could any force less than breaking, make it sag in the middle?

A. The "sag" does not depend on the giving of the supporting ends of the beam, as this correspondent evidently believes, but on the pressing together of the material on the upper side, and drawing apart of the lower. Hence, however rigid the ends are held the beam will sag, even by its own weight; in other words the elastic energy or cohesive force of the atoms, and when this is exceeded, the beam breaks.

But "Mechanic" may support his belief by a mathematical subtlety. A beam may be supposed to be like a line so thin that there will be no difference between the top and bottom, and hence there can be neither drawing apart of the one, or condensation of the other. Mathematically it may be demonstrated that such an imaginary beam, whether held at the ends rigidly or not, would not "sag," nor break were the world itself placed on it.

P. L. S., Pontiac, Mich.: Q. Did all the MSS of the Bible come down to us through Catholic hands?

A. The Greek and Catholic churches were one before the political separation of the Roman Empire into the East and West. Hence the claim of the Catholics of having been sole custodian of the Bible, is not supported by history. Yet it was the united church, which cherished the "sacred writings," and in all the world only her priests had sufficient learning to write, read and interpret them, for more than a thousand years—from A. D. 400 to 1500. She could add to, or subtract from, change and modify at her supreme pleasure.

A DREAM.

I stood at the dawn of a new-born day,
By the side of a beautiful stream,
And I marvelled much at the scenes which lay,
Like the threads of a wonderful dream.

I laughed as the birds flew over my head,
I danced in the sands at my feet;
I will follow these flower-starred paths, I said,
Where the earth and sky doth meet.

I wandered on with no thought of time,
The path was too lovely then,
The golden hours of life were mine,
With all things for my friends.

I walked entranced by the beautiful stream,
Its music was sweet to hear;
I sang my songs, and dreamed my dreams,
And joy was always near.

At last I came where the flowers died,
And the hot sands scorched my feet;
No beauty lay by the river side.
Where the storms and tides doth meet.

The new-born day was passed and gone,
No golden hours were mine;
But the shadows of night were settling down
O'er the banks of the river of time.

I backward gaze o'er that flower-starred path,
As I wait for another day,
And I fancy—sometimes—I can hear the songs,
Of the birds that flew away.

And I feel my happy dreams were sent,
To me as a token given;
That the flowers of earth but fade and melt,
In the richer bloom of Heaven.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

whether contained in the sacred books of India and China, or found in the Bibles of Jews and Christians, have been inspired. The mediums of our day, the visionaries of Egypt, Greece, and Rome, the prophets known to Jewish history, the apostles and evangelists, and lastly the Christian martyrs, have all been inspired people. Plato received his first inspiration on the summit of Mount Hymettus, Moses on Mount Sinai, Mahomet on the mountains of Arabia, Confucius on the Asiatic elevations, and Jesus, the Christ, in tears and prayers, on the Mount of Olives.

According to Pythagoras, inspiration is a suggestion

who reveal to us the future and hidden things ("Diog. Laert," viii. 32). Also, according to the same philosopher, language itself is inspiration. Plato says ("Phaedo," 244-264): "Inspiration is the work and source of all that is sublime and beautiful in man." The poet could not create his verse, nor the prophet predict events, if they were not inspired; they must enter into a superior state or condition where their intellectual horizon is widened and illuminated by a higher light (Plato, "Dialogues Io and Meno"). Anaxagoras, 500-428 B. C., maintains that inspiration is the work of spirits. According to Homer, inspiration comes from heaven. Cicero calls it the divine breath, which permeates all spiritual life. We have St. Matthew (x. 20) quoting Jesus, who says to his apostles: "For it is not ye who speak but the spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." In St. Mark, "Be not anxious beforehand what ye shall speak but whatsoever shall be given you in that hour that speak ye, for it is not ye that speak but the Holy Ghost," and according to St. Luke, Jesus again observes: "Be not anxious what ye shall answer or say, for the Holy Spirit shall teach you in that very hour what ye ought to say." In Psalm cxviii. is found: "Teach me to do thy will, for thou art my God whose good spirit will lead me in the right way."

Homer says (Iliad., xii. 228): "Prophets and seers are they are the passive instruments for the Divine Will." In the dialogue of Io and Meno by Plato we have, "it is not the seers, prophets, or poets who speak, but God speaking through them." This is the reason they are considered as saints or the instruments of a higher power, because they do not know or realize what they say; in other words, all noble inspiration, all exalted and original thought evidently emanate from a superior world composed of invisible intelligences, viz., the world of spirits. The heavens vivify the earth, and we find that fact exemplified in the lives of all the great poets, musicians, and other geniuses whose noblest and grandest artistic productions, ideas, or most marvellous discoveries, were all born in the moments of inspiration.

Shakespeare, Milton, William Blake, Schiller, Dante, Mickiswicz, Puchkine, Heine, and many others

WROTE UNDER INSPIRATION.

Blake even affirmed that he had written some poetry through the spirit of Milton and frankly avowed that all he obtained had been inspired. Haydn, Mozart, Rossini, Beethoven, Chopin and Richard Wagner composed under the same influence.

Frederic Chopin had startling visions and wrote his finest compositions, such as his Funeral March and Nocturnes, in complete darkness. In his biography, written in the Polish language, is found an admiral description of the way he composed in this obscurity. The visions he frequently saw sometimes terrified him to such an extent that he would fly from the place. With Richard Wagner the principal element found is mysticism and spirituality. This is not only expressed in the words of "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser," the "Flying Dutchman," and "Parsifal," but one also feels it strongly in the music.

In the twelfth century there lived the celebrated monk, Roger Bacon, otherwise called "The Admirable Doctor," on account of his prodigious scientific knowledge.

We owe some ingenious observations to him on optics and the refraction of light. The discovery of the telescope and the air-pump are also attributed to him. Under he had revealed to him many great mysteries in life that up to then had remained hidden. In his work, "Opus Magus," are found many prophecies, and among these predictions, made 600 years ago, are many remarkable ones which have been proved true by modern science and invention. Here are his own words: "Bridges without arches will be thrown across tempestuous torrents. Man will descend into the profundities of the ocean able to breathe the necessary air. His feet will touch sands of gold which the light of day has never penetrated. He will put into action the secret forces of the sun and moon, and one man will be seen seated at the helm guiding the bark which cuts through the waves with a greater rapidity than if it was propelled by a host of sailors rowing with the arms. The heavily loaded vehicle will no longer be dragged by panting animals; it will spring forward on the road with an irresistible force and great rapidity." These things, foretold so long ago, clearly announced the great inventions of our times, such as the suspension bridge, the diving bell, the steamboat, and the train.

Christopher Columbus waited seventeen years for the moment when he could embark for the discovery of the New World. During all this time he retained an unfailing enthusiasm and confidence in what was to him an inspiration who would guide him in his mission and hazardous enterprise. He was treated as a visionary, and in the midst of almost insurmountable difficulties he always heard an unknown voice murmuring in his ears: "God wishes that your name should gloriously resound throughout the world—you shall be given the keys of all these unknown ports of the ocean which are at present closed by powerful chains." The discovery of America was also predicted by Cicero in the following terms: "At the other side of the ocean, after many centuries, a country vast and rich shall be discovered. There shall a hero be found who by reason and the might of arms will deliver his country from the bondage of the oppressor" (Washington).

Treitheim (1462-1516), writer and theologian, was an extremely learned man, and left several works of value, such as "Polygraphica Cabbalistica" and "Stenographica." He had the and one day saw the spirit of his wife, who was dead, and whom he immediately recognized. His biographer declares that having long meditated on the hidden mysteries of Nature, he came to the despairing conclusion that it was foolish on his part to try and fathom such seeming impossibilities; but one evening he saw a spirit who assured him that all his most profound thoughts had been specially inspired. The result was that he arrived at a complete understanding of many problems and mysteries, and through inspiration he succeeded in making an instrument whereby he was enabled to greatly facilitate communication with the spirit world by means of a species of mental telegraphy.

Raphael Sanzio (1483-1520), the celebrated sculptor and architect of the Roman school, in speaking of his works, which he attributed to inspiration, said that all his work was carried out in a sort of dream condition. Dannecker, a German sculptor, who died in 1841, said that he had obtained his idea of Jesus Christ, a chef d'aeuvre in art, by after having sought for it vainly during his hours of study. Frederic Schiller, the great writer and poet, declared that his best thoughts were not of his own creation; they came so rapidly and with such force that he had difficulty in seizing them quickly enough for writing down.

The Rev. Stainton Moses, who utilized his intellectual knowledge for the benefit of his fellow-beings, was brave and courageous enough to render homage to what appealed to him as a rational truth, and wrote without any doubt about the source of inspiration—as do also the thinkers—Guldenstubbe, Gabriel Delanne, Bosc, Aksakoff, and many others.

The majority of people do not care to acknowledge that they may be inspired, preferring to attribute all they do to their own individual efforts or merit, but the great world geniuses have always been directed by superior and invisible forces, or in other words spirits, and show indisputable proofs of the existence and power of God.

MOSES IN DEBATE.

He Will Annihilate the Rev. Baer.

EXCITEMENT RUNS HIGH IN THE DEBATE BEING HELD IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The Nanaimo Opera House, B. C., was filled to its fullest capacity on the evening of September 18, when the initial debate of the series to be held between Rev. Moses Hull, of Buffalo, and Rev. W. W. Baer, Nanaimo, was formally opened by the chairman and umpire, Mr. W. W. B. McInnes, M. P. P. There were with Mr. McInnes, Mr. Yarwood, Stipendiary Magistrate, for Mr. Baer, and Dr. G. Brown for Mr. Hull. The basis of the debate was the affirmation of Rev. Mr. Hull, who affirmed that Modern Spiritualism as taught by the N. S. A. for the United States and Canada, is in harmony with the Bible, history and reason. Each debater was allowed a thirty minutes turn, and each made the most of it. Mr. Hull gave a review of the evidence for Spiritualism and quoted copiously from authors and well known thinkers to prove his case. Amongst these were Joseph Addison, Sir William Crookes, Dr. Johnson, Lord Dunraven, Lord Airlie and others. He contended that the history of the world, sacred and profane, ancient and modern, contained many proofs to show that the dead do return. He then related a number of instances of strange occurrences vouched for by reputable witnesses, such as a man taking live coals from the fire and laying them on top of his head, a woman washing her hands in burning alcohol, a person floating in the air out of a room window and back again, and many others which he contended proved the dead did return. In his opinion the persons who denied those things were not worthy of a hearing before the world. The only question was to show whether those things were tricks. The speaker told of some instances which had come under his own observation, which could not be explained upon the trick hypothesis. He pointed to the case of Joan of Arc and Emmanuel Swedenborg. He contended that Joan of Arc had direct communication with the spirit world and that unless she had she could not have accomplished the wonders she did.

Rev. Mr. Baer then took the platform and proceeded to deliver an extremely amusing criticism upon the statements of his opponent.

"At last we are here," began Mr. Baer with a smile at the audience, who laughed. "It took us a long time to get here, but we are here." Mr. Baer then went on to explain that he proposed to discuss the pros and cons, the rights and wrongs—especially the wrongs of Spiritualism. He was glad of the opportunity of meeting so renowned a champion of Spiritualism as Rev. Moses Hull, for if anything happened to Spiritualism that night or on any of the subsequent nights, there would be no one else in America who could repair the damage. Rev. Moses Hull was the Goliath of Spiritualism in the North American continent. He then paid his compliments to Mr. Campbell, who had said Mr. Baer had almost been whipped into line, and challenged him to produce his evidence. The speaker then entered upon a consideration of Spiritualism, and retorted sharply upon Mr. Hull for ridiculing Mr. Baer's use of the word "cavort" in one of his letters to the press. Mr. Baer contended the word was a good English word, and quoted James Whitcomb Riley and the Century Dictionary in support. "Why doesn't my respected friend say 'sic' now?" cried Mr. Baer.

Mr. Hull—I do. (Laughter.)

Mr. Baer then critically examined the claims of Spiritualism to be considered a philosophical science and study, and contended that it was not entitled to any such claim. It was, on the contrary, unphilosophic. Spiritualism attacks the Bible. It busies itself, and his opponent busies himself to discredit the history and authority of that book. Spiritualism not only attacks the Bible, but attacks it most villainously. "I am not talking through my hat, or wildly, said Mr. Baer, "these are facts." The speaker then took Mr. Hull severely to task for the latter gentleman's use of the Ingersoll anecdote about the Almighty carving a bloody rib out of Adam's body to make a woman. He declared that Mr. Hull had tried to palm off the story as his own, when it had been much better told by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. He promised the audience that they would hear a good deal about that rib before the close of these debates. Mr. Baer then attacked the phraseology of Mr. Hull, taking the word "expression" and the phrase "infinite intelligence," and contended that they were both improperly used by Mr. Hull. He said he could get through the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism and its teachings like a dose of salts. (Laughter.) He promised the audience some interesting things regarding Sir William Crookes, who is quoted with so much gusto by Mr. Hull.

Rev. Mr. Hull, on resuming, traversed the statements of his opponent and made some excellent points. He deprecated the style of argument adopted by Mr. Baer. He strongly denied that the word "cavort" was proper English, and said it was a low word and therefore it cannot be used in a religious controversy. (Laughter.)

He then went on to explain that spiritual philosophy and the philosophy of Spiritualism were very different things. He had made it quite clear to his audience in the Queen's Hall that he was quoting from Ingersoll in telling the anecdote mentioned; he did not try to take the credit of it. He defied anybody to point to one occasion on which he had ridiculed the Bible. He had said the Bible was a mass of tracts, and so it was. The Roman Catholic Bible contains more of these tracts than the Protestant Bible. There was some good in all these so-called sacred writings. God had not left himself without a witness in every land. There were other Bibles besides the Bible of the Christians. The Bible was not inspired. God could not inspire a book, but the people that wrote it may have been inspired. No creed in the world is the truth to the exclusion of all others. He defied anyone to stand up in the audience and declare that there were no errors in the Bible.

Alluding to his opponent's criticism of the word "express," Mr. Hull said that when Mr. Baer "expressed" the nonsense he had uttered it had been "pressed" out of him. (Laughter.) Mr. Baer had published in his hand-bills that he (Mr. Baer) was a student of his. "I expect he was," said Mr. Hull. Then, after a considerable pause: "I had some mighty dull students." (Laughter.) Mr. Hull then criticised Mr. Baer for assuming a different name, and said that he had never had occasion to change his name.

Mr. Baer then took the floor and cleverly replied to Mr. Hull's comments. The most serious portion of his concluding speech was when Mr. Baer produced a volume issued by the Spiritualists, and entitled "The Occult Life of Jesus Christ." He denounced this book as one of the filthiest pieces of smut that had ever issued from the press, and declared that but for the fact that it was issued under the auspices of a religious body it could not go through the United States or Canadian mails. This book, which he proposed to expose in the most merciless manner before the conclusion of the series of debates, was one of the chief books of Spiritualism. He then briefly outlined the contents of the book. The last half of the book contained a report of the Hull-Covert debate. Mr. Baer concluded by saying: "You men and women of Nanaimo ask why I do not let that quiet body of men and women known as Spiritualists alone. Before the close of this series of debates I'll tell you. I think I have given you enough to-night to prove that there are some things to be explained. I'll explain them to you." This ended the meeting. The debate will be resumed to-night at 8 o'clock.—Nanaimo (B. C.) Free Press.

Mr. Baer, in stating that the Occult Life of Jesus "is one of the filthiest pieces of smut that had ever issued from the press," gave expression to the rankest lie. The book is thoroughly clean throughout, and is a masterly production, but its views of course are not in harmony with accepted Christianity, and therein the "smut" comes in.

THE CLOUDS.

The fleecy clouds go floating by—
With silv'ry sheen they fleck the sky;
Like birds with wings of gossamer,
They fly, yet scarcely seem to stir.

Soft veiling the ethereal sky,
Light summer clouds are resting high—
Filmy festoons, of changing hue,
Betwixt Earth's green and Heaven's blue.

Great mountain clouds go rolling by—
Like stately ships they sail the sky;
With silv'ry fringe that gilds the sails,
They speed before the sweeping gales.

Dark, sullen clouds go thundering by,
While lightning flashes pierce the sky;
Like armies on the field of war,
They clash in battle's din and roar.

The radiant cloudlets tint the sky—
Low in the sunset's west they lie;
They flush our souls with sweet surprise,
Like golden gleams of Paradise.

O, soul with aspirations high,
No clouds can long o'ercast thy sky,
For loving thoughts thy heart refine,
And rest and light and peace are thine.

The clouds may float, go looming by,
Or dark, portentous, gloom the sky,
And veil with mist the outward scene,
But peace within makes all serene.

OCTOBER.

("The melancholy days have come—the saddest of the year.")

Old memories come o'er us—
Old scenes again before us
As we rake up the withered leaves in October,
And our hopes float down the river
Like the years now gone forever
As we rake up the withered leaves in October.

There's a bliss the young heart craves,
But hearts wither like the leaves
And our youthful loves fall off in October,"
And at length the broken heart
Asks permission to depart,
And it falls like the leaf in October.

Seasons come and seasons go
In life's everlasting flow,
And each one has his May and October;
But the smiles of hopeful May
And the warm summer day
Are succeeded by a withering October.

Raking up the falling leaves,
Filling up the open graves
Raking up! raking up 'till all is over.
We are dropping one by one,
And we end as we begun
Hoping on! hoping on 'till "October."

Reply from across the river:

No, all is not over yet,
You'll have nothing to regret
When beloved "leaves fall off in October"
For another sun will shine
In a heaven more divine,
And a spring-time succeed to "October."

MOST WONDERFUL BOOKS.

The Warfare of Science With Theology.

A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom. By ANDREW D. WHITE, LL. D., late President and Professor of History at Cornell University. In Two Volumes. 8vo. Cloth, Five Dollars. For Sale at This Office.

In these two large volumes are combined information that the reader could not find in the libraries of the world in fifty years. It shows the constant and determined opposition of Theology to the advancement that has been made in every branch of Science. To the Student it is indispensible. Every Free Thought Speaker should have it. It should circulate in every community. It goes into minute details, citing in all cases the authority, showing the persistency of Theology in fighting new and advanced ideas in Science.

"The magnum opus of the eminent ex-President of Cornell plants a new and notable milestone along the highway of ever-advancing human thought. The work is the masterpiece of a mind as devoid of wanton iconoclasm as of moral cowardice. It is a definite statement of where the best thinkers of the world now stand in the religio-scientific conflict. It is clear, honest, brave, and must be given a place among the great books of the year."—Chicago Tribune.

"The most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the history of the conflict between the theologians and the scientists; struggles that have alarmed timid Christians, but, as Mr. White shows, there was no occasion for alarm. The several chapters are extremely interesting, and while President White never flinches in telling the whole truth, as he thinks science has ascertained it, he is nowhere irreverent. He confronts truth, takes its hand, and follows boldly wherever truth bids him come."—Buffalo Commercial.

"The book is written almost colloquially, and so interestingly as to enchain the attention at once, and keep it enchained. Concise as a history of the universe could be made, tabulated so that instant reference to a particular bit of history, theory, or biography may be had, it will be valuable as a lexicon relating to religious controversy. It is crammed with information, sorted, sifted, winnowed, and prepared for the consumer, as reading it is of an absorbing interest, and it will probably provoke answering arguments."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"Undoubtedly the most exhaustive treatise which has been written on this subject. It is able, scholarly, critical, and impartial in tone."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A literary event of prime importance is the appearance of 'A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.'"—Philadelphia Press.

These two large volumes, containing about 900 pages, will be sent to any address on the receipt of the price, Five Dollars.

ROBERT OWEN.

"As soon as the human mind shall be delivered from the ignorance of the infancy of humanity, during which it is filled with the monstrosities of a wild, crude, inexperienced imagination, uncorrected and undirected by any accurately known facts or laws of that nature of which humanity forms a part, or one link of an eternal chain, the beginning and termination of which exist not—it will be obvious by the examination of facts, that the organizations of all that have life upon the earth are formed for them by a Power unknown to the individual organizations thus formed. That this process is yet a secret of nature hidden from the human race, and that all the knowledge yet acquired on the subject is some acquaintance with the process by which these, to man, extraordinary effects are produced. These processes appear to the human faculties to commence, proceed, and terminate, in the full-formed organizations, by uniform changes, which men have called laws of nature. These laws have now been discovered to some extent, and men can so far act upon them as to interfere with their original or first known processes, and thus produce a material change in the combinations of the several qualities composing some of these, to man, wonderful compounds of nature; yet not such a change as to alter the general character, but only the individual character of the organization. Thus men, by studying the general laws of animal life among those animals domesticated and submitted to their continual observation and inspection, have acquired a knowledge of the modes by which a material change can be made in the qualities of the dog, sheep, cattle, horses, asses, etc., etc.; and there can be no doubt that an attention to human nature, like that which has been given to other animal nature in this respect, would open a wide field for the improvement of the infant and matured organization of the human race; for such a change in this respect, with regard to the internal and external man, that all the inferior or misery-producing qualities of the human race may be gradually made to cease to exist in humanity, and all the superior ones combined and carried to a much higher elevation, so as to form man into a rational and greatly superior being, compared to his past and present existence; to become far superior, physically, mentally, morally, and practically, and most likely to attain such powers of improved combination as should extend the life of each individual organization greatly beyond its present general duration.

"But whatever the organizations of men may have been hitherto, or whatever they may be made to become, still each organization has been formed at its birth for each one, without its knowledge, consent, or control; and to talk of its being bad or good by nature, or to make human laws to punish or reward artificially individuals so formed, are acts of pure insanity, and could never have been thought of and introduced into practice, except by beings who were in a state of infant process, slowly passing from an irrational mental condition toward another state, in which the seeds of rationality might be received and allowed by degrees to germinate and grow into full rationality.

"The rudiments of the most valuable knowledge that man can acquire are those respecting the laws of his own formation, as far as they can be traced with accuracy and certainty. And to know that the internal organization and external character of each individual are formed for him, and that adult man, and especially men formed into a society, united to produce all practical excellence and happiness to the human race, can most materially influence the qualities of the internal organization and external character of every one, is an attainment of inestimable value to the human race; and which knowledge when it shall be farther increased by the acquirement of the sciences, to enable the adults accurately to understand all the best means by which to improve each internal organization and external character, will place the human race in the most enviable of sublunary conditions; for then man will be advanced to that state in which the adults of the race will be enabled to ensure the happiness of the rising or succeeding generations, to the termination of human existence upon the earth.

"This knowledge will new-form the human race, regenerate man, give him a new mind, dissolve all his old false associations of ideas, extract them from the existing old erroneously-formed and filled minds, and open a new world to the human faculties; a new world, which shall change their thoughts, feelings, and conduct, withdraw all notions of force or fraud, and make truth alone the universal language of man, and justice, charity, and love, the sole conduct of the human race."

N. B.—It may be remarked that these reflections are the thoughts of a profound student of human nature, whose advent upon this planet occurred in 1771; and the "scribe," having met the gentleman, is a sort of connecting link between the past and the present.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life, August 20, 1900, Warren C. Gillett, aged 56 years. The greater portion of his life was passed as station agent for the Erie railroad. He was an accredited member of the Masonic and Odd Fellows fraternities, an ardent Spiritualist, an esteemed citizen, and a cherished friend, but his greatest merit manifested in his solicitude for the temporal comfort for his aged father and mother, who survive him. The funeral services were conducted by Clara Watson.

Reno, Pa. ZELLA C. SHERROD.

Passed to spirit Life, at Springfield, Mo., September 16, John T. Shank, aged 70 years. Brother Shank was a model man and had the confidence and esteem of all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He was a true Spiritualist and when the angel of change called him home he did not fear to go. The funeral services were conducted by Josie K. Folsom. He leaves a wife who is comforted and sustained by the unmistakable evidences the spirit world has given her. C. M. F.

Passed to spirit life, from her late residence, Port Huron, Mich., September 18, 1900, Mrs. Jennie Gillchrist, aged 50 years. She leaves a husband and two daughters who have the assurance that it is well with her soul. She beheld the spirit forms of the dear ones, and knew that because they lived she should live also. Services conducted by Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit, Mich. COR.

Passed to the higher life, on his 77th birthday, Samuel Calhoun, from his home in Edinburg, Ohio. He had been a life-long Spiritualist. A widow, one son and four daughters are left to feel the loss of a kind husband and an indulgent father. Services conducted by D. M. King. XX.

In the passing to spirit life of B. B. Hart, of Clinton, Iowa, we deeply regret the loss from this plane, of a good friend, and an earnest worker for the cause of Spiritualism. On the 23d of September, at his home in Clinton, after a brief illness, our friend laid aside his worn-out body, and passed into the larger life of the spirit world. Mr. Hart was one of the oldest and most respected citizens of Clinton. He was long and prominently identified with the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' Association, and labored faithfully for the cause he loved, and the best interests of the association. That he will continue to work with us, and for us, with the enlarged powers, and clearer sight of the spirit we have no doubt. EMMA J. KNOWLES.

Sterling, Ill.

William Holmes Dorris, aged 50 years, passed to spirit life, September 14, 1900, at his home in Lewiston, Idaho. Mr. Dorris had been a firm believer in the Spiritual philosophy for almost thirty years, and he leaves a wife and three grown children who realize he is not dead, only passed on to a higher and better life.

MRS. W. H. DORRIS.

Passed to Spirit life, from his late residence in Auburn Park, Benj. F. Troxell, aged 67 years and 6 months. The funeral services and address were by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor of the Church of the Soul. The burial service was by the Masonic Brothers, Mr. Troxell being a member of that order. He and his family (wife and son) were devoted Spiritualists, members of the First Society of Spiritualists (now the Church of the Soul). He had been the Church of the Soul. He had years. Recent ill health, however, had taken him from that field of labor. The address of Mrs. Richmond's guides, delivered at the funeral, will be published in the next issue of this paper.

J. M. PEEBLES, A. M., M. D., PH.D.

ABSOLUTELY FREE! Knowledge Which Should be Possessed by Every Man and Woman Who Prizes Health and Happiness.

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the great scientist, who has given to the world his psychic science, which places in mankind a tremendous vital and MAGNETIC FORCE, and which not only DISPELS DISEASE of every nature from man and woman, but at the same time so STRENGTHENS and FORTIFIES the constitution that DISEASE CANNOT EXIST. This grand benefactor to the sick and weak has been honored as has no other scientist known to man; for his life-long service in behalf of suffering humanity he has been made a Fellow of the Anthropological Society of London, Eng., and Honorary Member of the Academy of Art and Science, Naples, Italy, and a Fellow of the Academy of Science, New Orleans, La., and also in recognition of his superior accomplishments, was appointed by the National Arbitration League to the International Peace Commission in Europe. But what he prizes above all is to live with the knowledge that after fifty years of scientific researches he is at last able to place a science before the world where diseases can be cured, no matter how hopeless the case may seem, for there is no doubt but that treatment through his science, which does away with DRASTIC and POISONOUS DRUGS, will bring you within the SUNSHINE of HOPE and HEALTH. In addition to treatment of psychic force the patients receive a mild medicine, which is prepared in Dr. Peebles' laboratory, and which is made of roots and herbs, prepared by the most scientific processes. It is this combination of PHYSICAL and PSYCHIC treatment which has brought about cures that have ASTOUNDED the medical profession on TWO CONTINENTS. You may take his treatment in the PRIVACY OF YOUR OWN HOME, as it is absolutely a home treatment and DISTANCE IS NO BAR. Mrs. J. W. Henderson, of St. Johns, Washington, who suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness, was entirely cured by the Peebles treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, Martinsville, Pa., says the cannot express too much gratitude for the results received through Dr. Peebles' treatment. She suffered for years from falling of the womb. Francis Wavering, Seattle, Washington, suffered for twenty years with a severe case of Catarrh; was completely cured through the psychic treatment. L. A. Lord, Elsworth, Wis., was permanently cured of dyspepsia and nervousness. Geo. H. Weeks, of 53 Minerva Street, Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration of health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia; says he now enjoys restfulness and sleeps sound every night. Mrs. Mary A. Clair, Lexington, Ky., after thirty years continual suffering from epilepsy and trying to be cured by eminent physicians, writes. "Two months of your treatment has made earth almost a heaven to me." Hundreds upon hundreds of testimonials like the above have been received. Dr. Peebles' psychic phenomena is the GRANDEST DISCOVERY OF THIS AGE. If you will send your name and address, also leading symptoms, to Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich., you will receive ABSOLUTELY FREE a complete DIAGNOSIS of your case, also advice and the Doctors' different booklets, which should be in the hands of all who prize HEALTH and HAPPINESS.

Important. At the earnest request of hundreds of my friends and former patients, I have prepared a Course of Lessons on the Psychic Science. This Course of Lessons include Psychic Healing, Vital and Personal Magnetism, Intuition, and like occult subjects. In its wide scope it not only teaches its pupils how to cure themselves, but at the same time teaches them how to heal others of disease and how to be successful in their every venture, be it for political, commercial or social ascendancy.

The course is so plain that anyone who will take it up as a professiou and give his time and attention to it can make a grand success in its practice. These lessons not only teach you how to heal disease but they also teach Personal Magnetism, through which you can silently influence those about you, so as to acquire influence, friends, prosperity, success in business, in fact, anything that you want. The course will be worth many times the price you pay for it, simply to cure yourself and increase your ability and eliminate any bad habits, such as the drink habit, tobacco habit, sexual excesses, etc. The entire course of instructions is taught by mail and you can matter every point in this science in the secrecy of your own home without loss of time in attending to your business. Medical men especially, and scientists, general readers and students of occult forces will find instruction of great value and interest. CLUBS! CLUBS!

We want ten thousand clubs formed in every part of the United States, for which we present inducements never before offered by any Spiritualist paper. These clubs must consist of ten subscribers, and each one will get Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death; or if they would prefer it, they can have the Next World Interviewed. They can have their choice of the two. Each subscriber in order to avail himself of this offer must pay $1.15. The fifteen cents is to pay expense of postage and mailing, and the books sent out are practically a gift. They are not cheap affairs; they are nicely and substantially bound in cloth, neatly printed in clear type and are ornaments to any center table. The contents are indeed valuable, such as every Spiritualist family should have. The aggregate price of these two books to the trade is $2.75. To each of our club subscribers one of these books is a gift, and when they receive the one of their choice they will be delighted with it, and will wonder how we can afford to do so much for them. The one who gets up the club will be entitled to The Progressive Thinker for one year, and Vol 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death and Life in the Spirit World, and also the Next World Interviewed. He will not only get The Progressive Thinker for one year, but both books. He gets what is equivalent to $3.75 for this trouble. There should be no difficulty whatever in getting up hundreds of clubs.

Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World will not only interest Spiritualists, but church members will be attracted to it. The Rev. M. J. Savage, a leading liberal divine of New York, leads off with several of his masterly productions, treating Death from an advanced standpoint. He is followed by leading Spiritualists who treat of Death in a philosophical and fascinating manner.

The Next World Interviewed is also a very excellent work. The plates of this book were donated to the office of The Progressive Thinker by Henry J. Horn. It consists of communications from the spirit side of life from leading minds there. Fifty-five communications are given by prominent personages, among them Prince Albert, Harriet Martineau, Judge Edmonds, Horace Greeley, Lord Lytton, Fanny Fern, Dr. Livingstone and the Czar of Russia.

Now is the time to get up

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. TWO IN ONE

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IT IS A MOST EXCELLENT WORK.

This work is by DR. M. L. SHERMAN, assisted by PROF. W. F. LYON. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substance; Animal Instincts; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

SCIENCE OF THE SOUL

BY

LOREN ALBERT SHERMAN.

Sets forth the Philosophy of Existence, with details of evidence. It appeals to Christians and Spiritualists alike, as it demonstrates the truth of the spirit manifestations of Jesus Christ, upon which the Christian religion is based, as well as the actuality of modern spirit manifestations. Its title page claims that the book is

A SCIENTIFIC DEMONSTRATION of the Existence of the soul of man as his conscious individuality independently of the physical organism; of the CONTINUITY OF LIFE and the ACTUALITY OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The first eleven chapters are devoted entirely to manifestations of the soul incarnate, with a clear exposition of the psychic philosophy.

The succeeding four chapters set forth the philosophy of the Infinite.

The last twenty chapters are devoted to an exposition of spiritual philosophy, with evidence in detail, much of it being personal experiences of the author.

The price of the book is $1. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker.

HULL-BAER DEBATE.

Very Large Audience Hears the Discussion.

Half an hour before the doors were opened a big crowd blocked the sidewalks in front of the opera house and overflowed into the roadway, says the Nanaimo Free Press. They were waiting to get in to listen to the second of the debates on Spiritualism between Messrs. Hull and Baer, and their presence testified eloquently to the interest which is felt in this contest by the general public.

Inside the opera house even standing room was at a premium and later in the evening many failed to gain admittance. Both of the debaters were in excellent spirits and each upheld his argument with vigor throughout the evening. Mr. Hull opened the discussion after expressing pleasure at the fine turnout, he launched into his subject in earnest.

Rev. Mr. Hull took up his discussion of Saul's visit to the Witch of Endor, and quoted copiously from Scripture to illustrate his point that Samuel had come up to speak with Saul. Samuel, on the evidence presented, either spoke to Saul or he did not. If he did then Spiritualism is true; if he did not then the Bible is false and he would ask his friend to-night to choose on which horn of the dilemma he would prefer to hang. The speaker then exhaustively discussed the phrases "Spirit is God," "God is Spirit." He contended that all spirit is God. The exact translation of the Greek original "Pneuma ho Theos," is "Spirit is God." "I see God," said Mr. Hull, "in every pair of eyes I see before me! in the little child, the old gentleman and the old lady. That being does not live who is not of God." He then denied he had ridiculed the rib story. He had declared the book of Genesis had two authors, and Mr. Baer had not denied it. Eve would never have heard of the tree of life if it had not been for the snake that had walked up to her on its tail and told her. Mr. Hull then took up Mr. Baer's remarks about telling the truth to children, and accused him of having said parents had to lie to their children. If parents found it necessary to lie to their children, their children would find it necessary to lie to somebody else. He had reared four daughters and one son, and he had told them the truth. He thought it better for their father and mother to teach them how they came into the world than that they should get such information from street urchins and others. He then told of the Dean of New York University who declared before a number of professors and scientific men, he believed Eve was made as described in Genesis, and that every man had a rib less on one side than the other, and that when challenged to go into the adjoining room and count the ribs on a body, cried, "No, I won't! I don't want your facts to destroy my faith!"

Mr. Hull said the allegation that the Spiritualists stole the Golden Rule was false. He himself procured its introduction into the creed of Spiritualism. The Golden Rule was not original with Christ. He himself said so. He was an honest man, and the speaker only wished some more of the ministers who preached in His name were just as honest. (Laughter.) That rule had been uttered ages before Christ was born. Mr. Hull then ridiculed Rev. Baer for taking Saul as an example as one who had assumed a different name or character from his own. "Well, Saul was forsaken by God." (Laughter.) "Every worthless fellow in the country had adopted Saul's example ever since." (Laughter.) He (Mr. Hull) did not have to go with a lie in his mouth and tell people something that was not so.

Regarding the book "The Occult Life of Jesus Christ," attacked by Mr. Baer, he did not believe ten men in the Spiritualist Association knew of that book before it reached the public. Its author was Alexander Smyth, of Baltimore, a mechanic, who was disappointed in love and took to drink. Then he sobered up and became one of the most temperate men imaginable. He wrote the book, not knowing whether it was true or not. He said spirits came to him and bade him do it. Mr. Hull denied he had ever published any discussion. He had nothing whatever to do with the publication of the discussion with Mr. Covert. Covert came to that meeting in Indiana with two reporters, asked permission to take a verbatim note of the speeches and to publish them after. Mr. Hull did not object, but knew nothing of its publication.

He then went on to tell how scientific men who had started to investigate Spiritualism had ended by becoming Spiritualists. It was only necessary to investigate to become a Spiritualist. He cited the case of the Anglican Church conference in 1880, presided over by the famous Bishop of Durham, and at which the celebrated Canon Wilberforce spoke. That conference declared emphatically for Spiritualism. Here the bell rang "Time."

Mr. Baer declared Mr. Hull spoke at the rate of 175 or 180 words a minute.

Mr. Hull—"That's about it. (Laughter.)

Mr. Baer continuing, accused Mr. Hull of not keeping to facts. He did not propose to make any choice of the dilemma horns. Mr. Hull could not name a single authority who said Spirit is God. Hull had said God did not speak from the burning bush. Who was it who said "I am that I am." (Applause.) He contended no angel or spirit could say that for God, but God himself only. He denied that the Book of Genesis had two authors. Prof Sayce and other high authorities emphatically denied the same thing and said it had a single authorship. Mr. Baer then explained he had only been asking a question when he made the remarks about telling children the truth about certain things and protested against Mr. Hull putting words in his mouth he never uttered. If Mr. Hull wanted to waste time that way he (Mr. Baer) was ready to stay right with him—16 weeks if necessary. (Laughter and applause.) Next he took up the rib story and Moses Hull's unbelief therein, and denied sundry allegations of his opponent. He severely criticised Mr. Hull for not naming the Dean of New York University, and said Mr. Hull would not dare utter such a story on a New York City platform.

Mr. Baer—I deny that I said the Spiritualists stole the Golden Rule.

Voice from the audience—You did.

Mr. Baer—I did not. What I did say was that it was stolen from Christ.

Mr. Baer then went on to quote from Professor Harnach, whom he described as the finest scholar in the world. He declared for the originality of Jesus Christ.

About that false name, he (Mr. Baer) never had a false name. Any other name he ever bore besides his own was given him by Spiritualistic mediums. (Laughter and applause). He then told how, when with Dr. Hull in New York, the Doctor told him if he had objection to his own name being used to go in to the medium and say he did not wish his own name used. "And, so," said Mr. Baer, "the false name I got was given me by the mediums. (Laughter and applause.)

Regarding the book in dispute, Mr. Hull said it was a novel. Mr. Baer then read extracts from the preface to prove it was no novel. Marie Corelli, he declared, would never put such a preface to the beautiful fictions she produced. She was a decent woman and didn't fly up to the blasphemous heights attempted by the author of this book. He said it was an infamously blasphemous volume. Spiritualism assailed the divinity of Jesus Christ. The book was published by a man when he was crazy. Why did he not stop its publication when he got back his senses? (Laughter and applause.) After reading some further extracts Mr. Baer threw the book on the table with an expression of disgust, saying he would not read further. He could forgive the man who wrote it, but not The Progressive Thinker Co., who published it. Where was the decent home that would care to have that book on the center table for the children to read?

On the question of mediums he asked if Mr. Hull endorsed D. D. Home, the well-known medium, and told how Charles Slade had been exposed and how the Spiritualists immediately repudiated him—but only after he'd been found out. Don't they always do it? asked Mr. Baer amid laughter and applause.

He then humorously told the story of how Home was fooled by not knowing three men were present, thinking there were only two. The third man gave the whole trick away. He asked why Mr. Hull did not tell the audience about the reputable scientists and other learned men who examined Spiritualism and came away more thoroughly materialistic than before. The bell here rang.

Mr. Hull said Mr. Baer was a very promising young man. If he kept all the promises he made he would have to live to the age of Methuselah. (Laughter.) He then took up seriatim the statements of Mr. Baer and traversed them more or less effectively, submitting a general denial to all. Incidentally he declared Buddhism the best Gospel in the world, and said the Chinese knew the Golden Rule 600 years before Christ was born. He had hoped Mr. Baer would keep on reading from that book. It was the only sensible part of his discourse. (Laughter.) He would rather place that book upon his table than the Song of Solomon. Some men who had selected texts from the Bible and sent them through the United States mail had been arrested and imprisoned. Geo Francis Train was one of them. He did not know anything in that book nearly so blasphemous as the speech of Mr. Baer. Mr. Baer said he had fooled the mediums; but the mediums had fooled Jesus. He emphatically denied ever having assailed the divinity of Christ, and asked when and where he did it. "I preach the divinity of every child," said Mr. Hull, "every child that comes into the world. I don't believe Jesus was his own father. (Laughter.) I don't believe he was miraculously born into the world. The only testimony you have to that is Spiritualistic testimony. An angel came and told Joseph, that old widower (laughter) that a son would be born unto him, and that's the only testimony you've got. Wasn't Jesus crazy, too? It says so in the Bible. His own mother thought so, his friends also. They wanted to take him home and he wouldn't go. He would have no hesitation in putting that book on the center table.

Mr. Baer followed in a masterly piece of argument, and offered authorities he claimed to be equally as good as those cited by his opponent. He gave a general refutation to Mr. Hull's statements, some amusing incidents happening by the way. A voice in the audience shouted, "Read the 4th chapter of Ezekiel," and Mr. Baer retorted instantly, "I'm not talking to you," throwing the audience into roars of laughter. He then said: "I must call your attention to the fact that those interruptions came entirely from the 'intellectual aristocracy.'" The audience again going into hearty laughter at the hit. The bell rung with Mr. Baer going strong and making points.

Umpire McInnes announced the next meeting would take place on Friday evening, when Mr. Baer would take the affirmative.

WE call special attention to The Next World Interviewed, one of our special premiums. We are enabled to furnish it to our readers at the price announced in our premium list, from the simple fact that Mr. Horn donated the plates of the book to us. We have sent out thousands of copies of this book, and it has been well received everywhere. It should be circulated by the millions among all classes of Spiritualists. The seven books that we are offering to Spiritualists as premiums contain a large storehouse of useful knowledge on Spiritual and Occult subjects. You should have them on the shelves of your library where you can have access to them at any time. Read carefully our premium announcement.

MAN A CREATURE OF INFINITE POSSIBILITIES.

A Lecture by D. W. Hull, of Norton, Kan.

Everything in the universe leads to the conclusion that man is a creature of development. From man down to the monera there is a tolerable gradation, and that he has climbed all the way up to his present status there can be no doubt. I have shown in the preceding lecture that even every inanimate object is living—that life is a property of matter, and that the tendency is to continually manifest higher conditions. The material of the earth itself is of a finer texture than it was of olden time. "Sorrow is better than laughter, for thereby the heart is made better." So the grinding of the rocks by the great upheavals and volcanic eruptions is a purifying process by which the clashings of the segregated rocks are made to unite with their material and improve the conditions for the development of our earth. From monad to man is a long stride, but not longer than from rock to monad. Yet man has come all this long journey. It has taken him millions of years to accomplish it, but here he stands at the top of the Jacob's ladder reaching from earth to heaven, but we should not even know the road he has come, but for the footprints he has left on the sands of time. He now sees that every man and woman makes the same journey into human life that he has made, except the millions of years required in the transition, now only requires a few months. The gelatinous speck observable at the beginning of foetal development has no more the appearance of ever becoming a human being capable of planning great battles, building leviathan ships, tunneling mountains and rivers, spanning immense bodies of water with bridges, harnessing the lightnings, and controlling the elements, measuring and weighing the stars, than does a speck of globeringia of the northern seas, yet if we watch that speck we should see it begin to assume definite shape. One cell is added to another, and we have a spongeole; yet it resembles neither human nor any other organic creature; but the process of development continues, and in a short time we have a fish, then a reptile, then a bird, afterwards a mammal, and thus this little speck of flesh continues to climb up through the animal kingdom till it reaches the zenith of human form. We find not only the gradual growth of the foetus but we also find the grades between man and other animals so indistinct as to leave us almost in doubt where the animal leaves off and the man begins, but there is a great difference as we shall find.

What wonders, what potency is bound up in this speck of sarcoid with which man starts on the journey of life! And yet it is but a speck discernible only with a microscope, and between it and the germ of the most humble of the vertebrata there is no perceptible difference. But the potencies are there, and given conditions, they will manifest. Here is something that escapes the detection of every mechanical appliance which has ever been invented to assist the observation. A minute speck that cannot be seen with the unassisted eye; and yet it may contain all the possibilities of a Herschell, a LaPlace, a Socrates or a Plato. All these things are hidden in the germ and yet we are totally unable between it and the germ of a fish. What a wonder! Beyond our comprehension! Who can explain it? Before reaching manhood we find very few manifestations of reasoning powers. No animal manifests the constructive genius that man does. Birds may build nests, bees make hexagonal cells, for the storing of their honey, but man does more; he reconstructs everything that fails to suit his fancy, altering it to suit his notions, and even now proposes to place a sun in the heavens to give light and warmth during the night to thousands of square miles of territory, and the possibilities seem to be that he will so far duplicate nature as to introduce into the northern latitudes a condition of warmth and comfort. This idea may be utopian, but it is being considered, and the man who would ridicule it in these days of enterprise and invention may live to be laughed at. The majesty of Mind, as now in process of development, is illimitable, its power is immeasurable and its purview boundless. Man a creature of the universe, is a creator in it. Animals are prisoners to the conditions of their surroundings; man changes his environments. Animals move by walking or flying; man harnesses the natural forces and compels them to carry him whither he will. He smoothes the seas, tames the elements, seizes the loud roaring thunder, imprisons the lightnings and is planning now to make it convey messages to and from the stars.

Does the usefulness of men cease with a few brief years of life here on the earth? or, will he having changed from speck to spongeole, from spongeole to reptile, from reptile to bird, from bird to mammal, from mammal to man, still make another change, from man to angel? and throughout the long years of unending etrnity continue the work of reconstruction and modification now in process? Must man, thus all-powerful, like the gods of the Greeks, yield to the majesty of fate? or, is it in his power to change even fate and prolong his existence at will?

But it will not be necessary that man thus all-powerful should so change the conditions about him as to create his own immortality. His usefulness is unlimited. When he drops the grosser flesh filled with calcareous substances which obstruct his usefulness here, he will buoyantly rise to a higher life in which all the earthy particles that weighed him down, causing him to hug the earth more closely, will be removed. While man is in all respects an animal, he is more—he is MAN.

1. Man is a two-handed animal. No other animal has hands as man has. There are four-handed animals—quadrumana, but these four hands also after a manner perform the office of feet. But each of these organs having a double purpose, performs neither office well. They cannot walk on the earth so well, neither can they construct. These four hands are adapted to arborial life, for gathering fruits and nuts, but for no other purpose. Their hands are too clumsy for delicate and fine work, and they are too feeble and unfitted to carry forward great enterprises such as building bridges, constructing stone castles, etc., even though they had the brain to conceive of intricate enterprises. But the capabilities of man are unlimited. His head can plan and his hand can create. The hands do much toward the development and education of the individual. Each new invention has grown out of some construction of Man's hands and forms the basis of something yet more complex. Had the hands of Man never been able to put the creations of his mind into shape, we should yet be where the orignal man was. When the mind conceived the telescope, one was produced; and lo! myriads of worlds by the side of which ours appears as only a speck, are brought into our immediate neighborhood. Man's hands have opened to us the depths of infinity, and revealed to us a universe before which we are inspired with that awe and veneration that strikes us dumb, and lifts our souls high out of our bodies. Not only that, but the use of the hands has ennobled and fraternized us. We cross hands and are friends. We lift and assist each other in our mutual upward journey with our hands. We lay our hands on the fever-fired brow and lo, the fever takes its flight. Our nimble fingers touch the stone dug from the depths of the earth and lo, the history of the earth is revealed to us. Our fingers are the willing servants of our brain and the fond caresses of our bodies. It is the hand of man that gives him superiority over the brute, and enables him to capture him, educate him, and make him his servant. And Man's hands will ever lead him onward and upward. They will ever put into execution the creations of his brain, and while he has a brain to think and hands to execute there can be no limits to his mental development and progress.

2. Man has the gift of speech, by which he can transmit his ideas to his fellow men and hand them down to posterity. Blot out human speech and men could do no more than copy each other. We could not explain how a thing happens, or the processes by which a thing is done. We should look at a piece of superstructure like the Niagara bridge with awe, not being able to explain all its complications, and even though now and then a man should be found who could comprehend its wonderful architecture he could not reproduce its like without the co-operation of his fellow-man, and without human speech this would be impossible. Anarchy would prevail, civilization would be impossible, and the strongest man would be master. Men could build fires, but they could not run steam engines, nor build railroads, nor cross the seas. Human speech brings us within touch of each other, makes us neighbors, friends and philanthropists. Human speech is the connecting link between men and gods. By speech, more than all things else, we are distinguished from the brute creation, and without speech we should fall back, and again become brutes. In human speech there are infinite possibilities. It is the verdure through which the intellect breathes and inhales its life and growth; it unlocks the universe and brings us into relations with the Divine. Words are our coined thoughts and may be exchanged at will for other thoughts. The nimble use of them while relieving our pent-up feelings always make the recipients richer. Human speech is the faculty by which we treasure up our thoughts and transmit them to succeeding generations. As there never will be a time when we cannot be edified by human speech, so there never will come a time when there will not be opportunity to learn something unknown before. Thus, human speech opens an infinite possibility to every soul, and, as man is destined by his very organization to always grow mentally and learn something new at every turn of eternity's long road, so he must have an eternity before him to accomplish the purpose of his organization.

It is thus impossible that lower animals can ever outgrow their present state of development. All that they can learn must be acquired by intercourse with man, and this can be learned only as they learn the meanings of a few simple words. All abstract intelligence is out of their mental grasp. I will not here say that animals are to have no future existence, as I have not yet scientifically satisfied myself on that point; but I do claim that the animal rounds out its life and fills the purpose of its existence here in earth-life. There is no purpose of life in them for the future other than mere existence, and I confess that I am unable to see any desirableness in life except it presents us something on which we may exercise the intellect. All existences have been here that we might live—they have prepared the way for man upon the earth. When Man came upon the earth he at once commenced the work of reconstruction, and making the earth over again, and presenting it in better shape to his posterity than when it came to his hands. There have been no special creations for carrying out any preconceived purpose, but all existences have been landmarks leading to the upward road. If however, animals do go out of existence having no more that they can learn, or do in the great upward road, what shall we say of those wearing the semblance of men and women, who remain all their lives just where their school days left them, never having gained a single idea, nor even strived to learn a single thing? Many persons also throw themselves between their fellow men and women and all efforts at progress, persecuting them in every possible manner. What is there for such as them to live for? They have long ago completed their mental development; while it is possible for them to achieve further growth, they refuse to do so, and do what they can to prohibit their friends and neighbors from growing mentally. They are enemies to all improvement in this world, and in consequence will be in the next. If such lives continue in the hereafter, it will be sufficient refutation of the claim of Design and Designer. These are men only in shape, but probably somewhere in the eons in the future they will commence to climb the ladder of progress.

3. The brain and structure of man specially endows him for progression and proves him a creature of infinite possibilities. In the case of animals we find that they round out and complete their existence in earth life. They are given life sufficient to carry out the ends to which their organisms are by nature endowed. But man being a creature of infinite possibilities, cannot carry out the design of his organism in any time short of infinite duration. If he passes out of existence at any time in the future, the purposes of his organism have never been satisfied. A curtailment of his life would be contrary to the economy of nature. Everything is adapted to its sphere of action and nothing is given activities beyond the possibilities of execution. The wings of the eagle do not come before the atmosphere to fly in, but because of the atmophere. So man is not given eternity in which to develop his intellect, but is given his intellect because of eternity in which to develop it.

Man is structurally developed for eternal progression. If you will notice, the lower the animal in the grade of being the nearer is its face on a line with the spinal column. Take for instance, the face of a reptile, which is on an exact line with the spinal column. This creature can never be other than a reptile, because its brain has no room for growth until its face is moved over to the opposite side of the body. The brains of animals are but the thickened end of the spinal chord. In reptiles this thickening is very small, about three times the diameter of the chord, but it increases in thickness till we reach the human brain. Hugh Miller, in his "Footprints of the Creator," says: "The brain which bears an average proportion to the spinal chord of not more than two to one, comes first—it is the brain of the fish; that which bears an average proportion of two and a half to one succeeded it—it is the brain of the reptile; then came the brain averaging as three to one—it is that of the bird. Next in succession came the brain that averages as four to one—it is that of the animal; and last of all there appeared a brain that averages twenty-three to one—it is that of reasoning; calculating Man had come upon the scene." Now there is no room for an increase of the reptilian brain, because its face is in the way.

Neither is there any room for the development and growth of a cerebrum, and therefore the reptile has no cerebrum to speak of, except two little threadlike projections extending from the base of the brain to a point above the eyes, a mere prophecy of a cerebrum which should manifest in higher organisms. As we rise higher in the scale of animal development we notice the face is more and more removed to give place for a larger and better brain, but each animal perfects its existence in its present organism. If it should reach a higher organism it must change the shape of its head to do so, move its face further over and in fact move from out the species in which it was born, reared and lives, and this is impossible. The bird can build nests, the beaver construct dams and other animals perform other things peculiar to their several modes of existences, but they can go no farther, though their lives might be lengthened out to myriads of years, because their brains are not constructed for any higher development. When a bird has grown up, propagated its species, it has fulfilled its mission. Whatever of life it may enjoy will be but a repetition of what it has already enjoyed. There is nothing new for it; there is no purpose which it can accomplish by living longer.

The dog, the horse, the elephant have each some advantage over other animals in that one has a mouth answering in an indifferent way to the hands of man.

But we come to Man; his face is entirely reversed from the reptillian face so that instead of being on a line with the spine it is on a line with the abdomen, and it is greatly changed from all other animals. Here is room for infinite growth, the brain has pushed the face as far over as it can be pushed. No higher organism is possible. The mouth, nose and eyes have been crowded down from the top part of the head to the lower part of the head so as to give room for the brain. While the other animals may complete their education in this life, man can never complete his education, no matter how much he may learn. He is a creature of infinite possibilities; there is always something to learn, something to achieve and he is endowed with a capacity for learning or achieving it. Archbishop Sumner in his Records of Creation, Vol. II., chapter 2, says: "Animals are born what they are intended to remain. Nature has bestowed on them a certain rank, and limited the extent of their capacity by an impassable decree. Man she has empowered to become the artificer of his own rank in the scale of beings by the peculiar gift of improvable reason."

To fulfill the purposes of such an organism requires eternity, because in no shorter time can its mission be filled.

It cannot be that an organism has come into existence adapted to certain purposes and yet be prevented from carrying out the object of its existence. No such wastefulness is observable in nature. If man ceases to exist anywhere this side of eternity his organism has been a failure. If man is developed with an organism adapted to a certain purpose, time will be given for the development of that purpose.

If time is not given, then the development is so much waste and is certainly useless. This organism cannot be for this earth life alone, for there are hinrances to its usefulness. We are environed by difficulties and cannot learn what there is before us to learn. For the opportunity and the time must be consumed in procuring the necessities of life.

At most this life seems to be a school in which we are preparing for future usefulness. We have just only acquired our education when we are removed hence. Thus unless we can avail ourselves after this life, of all our requirements, we have lived in vain.

The Work of Spirit Artists.

To the Editor:—When at your office on one occasion I informed you I had made arrangements with the Bangs Sisters, the portrait mediums, for portraits of some of my spirit friends.

On Wednesday noon we sat for the first portrait. We did not have long to wait before the work was commenced, and there soon appeared the portrait of my noble Indian guide, Mountain Oak, on the canvas. I must say it is the finest portrait of an Indian that I have ever seen. The next was a double portrait, one being my son Charles, the other, his soul companion, Jennie. The next was my son Leo, who was taken alone. The next was a double portrait of my daughter Ruth and her soul companion Bertram. The next was also a double portrait of my daughter Nettie and her soul companion, Bertie, making three double and two single portraits, the double ones being on stretchers 22x27 inches in size; the single ones being 20x24. I wish to say right here they are the finest work of art I have ever placed my eyes upon, and so says everyone who has seen them. I have them framed and hanging in my parlor where everyone who comes in can view them.

We know these portraits are perfect representations of our spirit children, as Mrs. Dole sees clairvoyantly these children every day, and had long before the portraits were taken, so she knows wherof she speaks when she says the portraits are perfect ones of our children. I would not take $1,000 for them; in fact, money could not buy them.

METHOD OF DOING THE WORK.

We went into a small room at the back end of the hall, with one window. A table was placed in front of this window, after being first examined by me. On this table was placed two frames or stretchers with the canvas sides or face sides together, whichever you choose to call it. After being thoroughly examined by me the window shade was drawn to the top of these frames which were held upright by the two mediums, one sitting each side of the table, one having hold of the frames with her right and the other with her left hand, holding them tightly together. I sat in front of the table where I could look right through the canvas and see the work as it progressed, as the frames were not two feet from me, or within easy reach. First I could see the canvas begin to grow dark around the outside for the background. Then came the outlines of the form, followed very soon by the features. This, understand, was in the day-time, and the room not dark. The inside canvas or the one next to me was the one the portrait was on when they were taken apart each time. The canvas on the other frame was not soiled in any way with the colors used, although they were face to face. It did not take over thirty minutes to produce the double portraits, and about half that time on the single ones. There has been many here to my home to see them. All pronounce them wonderful works of art, which they truly are, such as no mortal can produce.

THEN AND NOW.

"Come and let us sweetly sing
Praises to our heavenly king;
For His name do we adore,
Humble, trusting evermore.
Loud the anthems have been sung,
Through every land, by every tongue.
Round the altar oft we've joined,
Swayed by one eternal mind:
'Simply to the cross we cling'—
Save us, O, our Savior King."

Round the hearthstone now we meet;
Loving one's now come to greet,
Not to sing these praises o'er
As they ever were before!
Now again our songs we sing,
But not to a heavenly king;
We sing to loved ones far and near,
Both in the spirit life and here!
Now the world is on the wing,
So we would the anthem sing.

Sing of loved ones gone before,
See! They open wide the door,
Asking all to look within
For the knowledge they can win,
If they work with faithful trust
Striving ever to be just;
Then the answer quick will come:
To this beauteous spirit home.
All may enter at the last
When the storms of life are past!

"Then, O, friends of earth take heed,
'Tis for you we humbly plead,
That you search for gems of truth—
Mothers, maidens in their youth,
All may learn the way to come
To this beauteous spirit hame.
'Tis by love and simple deed.
We're not bound by any creed!
Many hunger for a word
Who by sorrows have been stirred,
Give them of your store, and then,
You'll be blessed! so now, Amen."

Men-Made Gods.

Men have made gods among themselves and fashioned them after their own beings. Moses made his god in his own image and gave him instructions from the standpoint of knowledge that he possessed. All the messages and commands that Moses received originated in the mind of Moses. The god of Moses had two legs and walked about in heaven, and on the earth, at the command of Moses. All other gods that have been gotten up by people of other nations, have feet and legs and use them in obedience to the will of their earthly commanders. The Christian God is not the Chinese God, hence the Chinese array themselves against his manner of teaching. The Chinese God is supposed to rule the Chinese people, as well as all other people that walk the earth, and when other people from other lands come among them with their gods to rule them, they kick vigorously against it, and who can blame them? A god of their own making is much preferable to all the gods that the Christians have ever invented. And now the line is drawn and a holy war is inaugurated.

The gods of all the nations are extremely bloodthirsty in all their habits, and all the human gore that is burned on their god altars is a sweet-scented savor in the nostrils of all the gods that live in heaven and walk the earth.

This sending missionaries into the Oriental kingdom to crush out the gods of that people, and destroy their plans of salvation, is a little more than Chinese human nature is able to endure, and their gods will not submit without having a fight for it.

All the wars of the past ages have been religious wars, and all the blood that has been shed in those wars has been in the interest of the different gods.

Is there no way of bringing the blush of shame to the cheeks of those orthodox Christians? Are they not a drawback to civilization, and is it not the duty of every Spiritualist in the world to raise his voice against nations fighting against nations, for the sole purpose of revenging their gods? Is there no way of subordinating these people and bring them to an understanding of their duty to humanity, and prepare the way of living? Let the gods be forgotten and human love be established in their place. Then there will be union among the people not unlike that in the spirit world which extends everywhere. A united effort on the part of the spirits and the Spiritualists of the earth will soon bring about peace and good will such as has never been known to exist before.

The Christians have failed to do their duty as Jesus taught them. Now let the Spiritualists come to the front and by their example explain the teachings of Jesus in a practical way—love ye one another.

IT WILL ALL RETURN AGAIN.

I stood at the brink of the ocean
And watched the ebb and the flow,
The waves kept the sand all in motion,
The sun kept the waters aglow.

A wonderful river came rushing
Close by with its driftwood and clay,
Far out in the ocean's mad gushing,
And splashing, and high leaping spray.

Out, out until lost to my vision
Its clay-colored waters did roll,
Till ceasing to mark in collision
Its path through the deep ocean bowl.

Far up in this great stream are others
That pour in their torrents of mud—
Like children—like sisters and brothers—
Returning to mother her blood.

Far up toward the head of each river
Are found the wee brooklet and rill,
Each striving its load to deliver—
Just gathered from valley and hill.

From valley and hill that are wearing
By rainfall and wind sweeping o'er,
Till soon the great ocean is sharing
The substance she had once before.

Some day all the hills will be sliding
Back into the ocean once more,
And land at the bottom now hiding
Rise up and be tilled as before.

In snow and in rain the great ocean,
The seas, the rivers and rills
Spread out and keep matter in motion,
Evolving in nature's great mills.

Each wave in the ocean it reaches
Seems anxious to welcome it home;
Which, likened to life, ever teaches
That nothing is lost in the foam,

That Nature is grinding, evolving,
Re-forming and shaping anew,
And that which seems lost in dissolving
Will some time return into view.

"Words That Burn."

A Twentieth Century Romance, by Lida Briggs Browne, of Utica, N. Y.

The undersigned having been in close and enjoyable touch as a reader, with the best literary thought on humanitary lines presented in romance style in our strong English language, on the part of Europe's brilliant and great-souled writers, and also those of America, I unhesitatingly place "Words That Burn" by the side of all that I have read, as their peer for practical illumination and expression on the Golden Rule plan. "Words That Burn," a book of 366 pages, will evidently prove a souvenir of great value to all lovers of a high and elevating order or class of literature, and as soon as its true merit comes to be knewn and proclaimed through the generous press, must meet with phenomenal success in its sale, for it is worthy.

"HE GIVETH HIS BELOVED SLEEP."

Funeral Services of Benjamin F. Troxell, in Chicago, September 24, 1900.

By the Guides of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

"He giveth his beloved sleep."

"In my Father's house there are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you."

"And there shall be no more death."

In Arabia it hath been said: "We depart from Allah when we enter into mortal birth, but mortal death arrives, we are with Allah forevermore."

One in India has said: "This that we call mortal birth is indeed death, for we are wrapped in time and sense and in the shadow of earthliness; but when the release comes we are with the eternal."

Beloved friends, it is our privilege—our sacred privilege—to stand with you at this hour by the side of the casket that holds all that was mortal of the remains of our dearly loved brother, Benjamin F. Troxell.

He was still comparatively young, not having reached the three score years and ten allotted to human life, being only sixty-eight. He was born in Northumberland county, Pennsylvania. He came to Chicago in 1862, and has been a citizen of this city since that time. He was connected with railroads for thirty years. He has been a member of the Masonic fraternity since he was twenty-two years old, and he has been a member of the Church of the Soul (formerly the First Society of Spiritualists) for twenty-four years, ever since your present speaker has been its minister.

Honored, loved and respected by all, he has entered into his higher inheritance. We follow reverently and sacredly his life-line. We must obey that high and divine mandate that has set him free, knowing that the heavenly Father's will is loving and supreme. The mortal life of this goodly man counts at this hour for its great worth. It is at such an hour as this, when we stand by the open gateway of immortality, that we measure the real value of human life, which is not in the vast possessions which cannot be carried with one; not in houses and lands or great treasures of earth, for these are vanishing; but in those treasures that are abiding and eternal; those that come of a goodly life and sincere purpose, and earnest and loving fellowship felt when in life. In the circle of our acquaintance, and the number who bend with us at this hour, of whom can it be more truly said, he was loved, honored and respected by all who knew him? Considering that he had no flattery for those who were in power, and that he was always fearless and outspoken in his convictions, in his daily life that he never catered to human authority for the purpose of gaining position or wealth, it becomes more and more beautiful to note the large circle of friends that these two people have drawn around them from their very worth, for the companion of his life, one with him, has realized, as he did, that the sanctity of home, the sacredness of social life and the daily performance of every duty must constitute the holiest life.

His religion was his own, but he did not enforce it upon others. He believed that the greatest testimony unto the Infinite is that of loving kindness to your fellow-man. He understood and knew that this earthly life is but the stepping stone, the preparation to that which is to follow. He knew that he had human faults, but he also knew that the integrity of purpose counts for more than loftier professions. So the love of God and the fellowship of man may be said to constitute his creed. His thought of immortality was that death was the next step in existence, the next step in which one throws off that which is feeble and fleeting in mortal existence and takes on the raiment of the spirit, woven of goodly deeds and loving thoughts, of gracious ways. It was his privilege to know that the immortal world is not far away; that those who bend near from the realm of light, even as John Wesley once said, "are the guardian angels, the ministering spirits of the household." He believed with Bishop Whitefield, that the immortal realm impinges more closely upon human life than people are aware of; and he knew with the poet that:

"When the hours of day are numbered
And the voices of the night
Wake the better soul that slumbered
To a holy, calm delight,

"Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door;
The beloved, the true-hearted
Come to visit us once more."

What poet, sage and seer have sung in every age; what the highest philosophy has taught and the great religions of the world have espoused he knew to be true; and he knew, also, that human life, the human pilgrimage, with all its trials, its discipline, its seeming disappointments is the great preparation for the next step.

We can assure you, dear friends, from the closest acquaintance with this household, this goodly man, that he did not fear to take that next step; that his life was always ready, that he kept the altar fires within the spirit burning.

Though perhaps very few knew him as intimately as we did and some of you did, those who did know him intimately knew that the sweetest, kindest thoughts were often veiled from the outward world; that he did not allow many to enter into the inner sanctuary of his being; that he met the world sometimes with that exterior that would say: "I am impervious to your assaults."

When in the midst of great external struggle and discipline, of many trials and misfortune, and later enfeebled in body, not the result of disease, but of so-called accident, he still never murmured at his fate; he did not complain because of this discipline, but felt that perhaps his life would grow stronger in spirit because of this.

You, dear friends, who have known him all these years understand more than words can express, how he gathered his friends close to his heart in the nobility of his spirit and sought to make them know how he valued and appreciated every word and act of friendship.

Now that the immortal gateway has swung open, that he has entered into that next step of life, that he has been promoted to that higher position, that he has taken an added degree in the great, grand Order of Immortality, it would seem fitting that all who are laying the tributes of their best thoughts upon this casket, in the form of these lovely flowers, which are the symbols of their remembrance, should also remember that it is well with him. That it is to those who are in human life that the moment is a moment of admonition; that here is the preparation; he has entered into the fruition; here is the shadow, there is the light. But a few hours ago it was feebleness, yet how bravely did he battle with that approaching feebleness; his armor was ever on for the daily struggle, even almost to the last he held his post and performed his daily duty. Will every one here be as ready, will all be prepared when the time comes for that next great step? And how beautiful is that next step.

In the wise, divine, benignant providence of Infinite love, who can say that death is a shadow? Of course the outward life is lonely; of course it rests as a shadow upon the human heart, but consider the great revealment that it is, and the inevitable step that it must be to all. If it were not for this great change how desolate and drear would be the grinding treadmill of daily life. It is because of this hope, this uplifting certainty that mankind can bear the daily crosses and the narrow limitations of human existence.

But to weave the raiment of the spirit of kindly deeds and loving thoughts, to make honor and integrity foremost instead of time-serving and external prosperity; to know that we have an immortal destiny instead of human life alone, and to be able to bequeath to one's son the heritage of a name unsullied by any act of dishonor; this we claim is the greatest and highest privilege of any mortal life.

Lowly as was his human estate, he was a prince among men. Little as the great and proud would note him as he passed by, the honest gleaming of his flashing eye, the true grasp of his honest hand would be a thrill of pleasure to any who were intuitive enough to perceive real honor in human existence; and to know that this life has entered into its own, has taken possession of that inheritance which was his, to feel certain that the morning has dawned with the full step of added light and glory, this is the consolation of the hour.

So, dear friends, it is well enough to remember that the things of earth cannot abide forever; that but for those who have passed on you would have nothing to remind you that the future heritage must be cared for. It is needful at such time as this that all who bend here in praise and tribute to his worthiness should remember, also, that he will help to lead and guide them on up to the eternal, supernal height.

When death's kindly messenger came and took from them a dearly beloved daughter, it was under the consolation of this knowledge of immortal life that they bore that trial bravely. When year after year other friends were added to the great concourse of spiritual beings that bent above them they also knew that those in immortal life were strengthening and helping each human endeavor.

When Dr. Barrows said in Chicago, that a host of witnesses were bending above at the great rejoicing of the Columbian exposition, he but echoed the religious hope and thought of the world. When at this hour the greater and higher Messenger summons you all unto the council chambers of the wise and just, it is blessed to remember that these endearing presences, these lofty and divine ministrants are not far away; that every day and hour, when the Messenger arrives to bear some loved one from from the earthly estate, these invisible ones bend near.

How great a triumph is life after all; how wonderful is that beneficence that opens and unfolds the great pathway of immortality! Even the agnostic and materialist of today are compelled to admit, that if there is no immortality for man then the great purposes of nature seem to have been unfulfilled. But if they could only grasp this subject from the standpoint of inspiration, from the light of true revealment and know that every age has had its testimony, and that the Infinite hath left no one without witnesses of this immortality and divine heritage.

Dear friends, what other words can we say? How can we add to that which in itself is the glory and the fulfillment? Did you know that in the shadow of this humble dwelling, in the small room from whence this spirit took its flight, it was as though from out the shadow and darkness of a narrow prison cell the spirit burst into freedom? Then it was faltering and weakness, now it is strength and the glory of the morning. Have you ever seen the morning rise from this beautiful lake, or out upon the prairie, or beyond the mountains seen the glorious Armor of the Day (name given by Ouina to Mr. Troxell) appear as the herald for the light that was to come? Have you seen the streaks of gray and gold mount up the sky, and the crimson curtains of the dawn roll aside, and the great unfolding light of the Infinite reveal itself in the clear splendor of the sun? So from the shadow of earthliness the great curtain rolled aside, and from the gray of the human state the gold and crimson tides of immortal life floated into the narrow chamber, and the senses, wrapped in the earthly feebleness, no longer impaired or impeded the vision of the spirit, which more and more expanded to receive the new light and the ministrants from that heavenly land.

Oh, neighbors, friends, beloved members of the Church of the Soul, comrades, brothers and sisters, all this heritage and light is yours! Lo! the dawn of immortal life bends near and touches this household with its radiance.

Nothing can be said to these nearest and dearest, for theirs is a sanctified love; theirs is the illumination of the highest hope and prophecy; theirs the thought that the companionship is still continued. The son, the wife, all those who were of his care, will well remember that there is no loneliness for them save that which is born of the senses. The ties of nature are strong. Forty years and more of wedded life make a bond that is complete, and the physical severance, though hard to bear, still cannot divide that which is eternal in the larger habitation; these ties are renewed in the heavenly state free from the earthliness that belongs to the human form, and lo! in the heavenly convocations, in the home, the house not made with hands, in that divine and beautiful circle all will be united to their own.

Entered Apprentice on the earth,
All children must pass the level here;
The first degree, the human birth
In this the outward, human sphere.

Fellow Craftsmen all must be
As side by side they stand to fill
The Master's law and potency
In the fulfillment of God's will.

When at last the Master calls,
Through the Royal Arch all must pass,
And the mystic curtain, that ever falls,
Is uplifted and, like a magic glass,
Behold! they enter the Third Degree
In the great Master Masonry.

Lo! the Past Grand Master hath called him above;
The great Commandery is there;
The password to that realm is Love,
The initiation through earnest prayer;

Until, through such bewildering light
As glorious fellowship can bring,
He enters there the highest height,
And lo! Comrades around him sing:

Brother, this is the high Commandery,
It is the final and the last degree,
This is God's heavenly Masonry.
Enter into Eternity.

Our Heavenly Father, Thou who givest life, and that higher life, that is miscalled death, unto Thy presence Thy children turn in praise at this hour of mortal chastisement, beneath this rod which seems for a time hard for mortal life to bear; still may these Thy children be uplifted and strengthened; may they follow all the worthiness of the life of this, Thy child, who has arisen; may they understand the deep and hallowed benediction of this hour. Strengthen these neighbors and friends who have been so faithful through all these years; strengthen his Comrades and Brothers in the work of loyalty and love; strengthen the Sisters who rally around Thy stricken daughter; strengthen the associations to which he belonged; may they feel the higher and diviner fellowship; strengthen all, who beneath the yoke of care must struggle through mortal life. May they know that each child is the child of Thy love and care. Strengthen the son, his companion and these little children, and may they learn the great light of that unfolding realm that shall bless them once more by grandpapa's side. May all who are here bend in sweet supplication beneath Thy mandate of love that upliftteth and feeds the heart. May they unite then in praising "Our Father who art in heaven; hallowed by Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, and leave us not in temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, the power, and glory forever and ever. Amen."

You are to go the road which you see to be the straight one, carrying whatever you find is given you to carry, as well and stoutly as you can, without making faces or calling people to come and look at you.—Ruskin.

LIFE'S GIFTS.

Can the Inequalities of Life be Equalized?

The answer to the foregoing question must depend largely upon the fact whether that consummation would be deleterious or beneficial to human progress. And how is it to be accomplished? By the progress of human life not on any one special line of thought, but progress in its entirety, which will eliminate from life those inequalities that are impediments to its onward march. The record of former achievements has proven that the human soul is capable of breaking its way through the barriers that have formerly impeded its upward journey.

The question also may properly be asked, are there any inequalities in life that are not injurious in their effects, and if so where is the line of discrimination drawn? Some of those unequal conditions are so apparent that their beneficent or deleterious influence is visible to the most casual observer. To show that there are unequal distributions of life's forces which are beneficent in their design and arrangement, we would illustrate. Here are my friends. One is an artist, one a musician, one an architect. O, what beautiful pictures are evolved from the mind of the artist and externalized upon canvas. What heavenly music is given expression from the soul of the musician, and what beautiful forms are evolved through the architect's skillful hand; but neither is capable of giving expression to those faculties that are so highly developed in the others, but they can have their soul enraptured and find pure enjoyment in the results that come from the use of those gifts. And we who may not have the gifts of either the artist, musician or architect, but can with them find pleasure in their manifestation, may have faculties developed on lines in which they are deficient. They may be skilled in the arts of producing the luscious fruits and vegetables which we, by having in possession that gift, can by sharing with them enable all to enjoy the benefits of those varied faculties.

Here is represented inequalities in the distribution of life's gifts, and they are all used for the mutual benefit. Ah, but you are too idealistic, is the answer given by the materialistic pessimist who "sees a nigger in every corner of the fence;" and who asserts that the rule is to use those faculties for selfish ends; the beneficent motive the exception. Admitting that in the illustration used the idealistic is paramount, it is nevertheless, by slow but sure steps through the progress of life, being brought into practical application. It is not so much the inequalities represented by the various degrees of intellectual and spiritual power, that causes the clash of those varied phases of development as they stand in apparent antagonism to each other, as it is the abuse of those forces.

What a monotonous world this would be if all were artists, musicians, architects, horticulturists, or any one of the many varied faculties that are represented in life, and from the very fact of such a variety existing proving that they are needed in the great problem of life, to help it work out a correct solution.

Life here assumes in a very large percentage of cases the characteristics of its surroundings. This fact, whether acceptable to us or not, is proved by the development of the different races that inhabit the different portions of our globe; they assuming the mental and spiritual traits of character that most perfectly correspond with their external surroundings. Mountainous regions develop a rugged type of character, that, like its external manifestation, presents a bold front to the antagonistic forces of life. Who would wish to see our beautiful earth reduced to one vast plain, without the inequalities of hills and valleys and rugged mountains? In its diversity there is harmony; so out of the discordant tones and clashing of interests, that arise from the inequalities of life, there can and there will be evolved harmonious tones and unity of purpose in the working out of the problem of human progress. In the journey of life some from the start have a tremendous advantage over others in their harmonious material surroundings, and in their intellectual and spiritual development. It is the duty of those of the more advanced type not to try to equalize the conditions of life by coming down to the level of the inferior, but by awakening in them a desire for advancement, and reaching a friendly hand down to the lower levels, and help uplift to the higher planes of life.

The forces that at present are organizing and preparing to battle for the supremacy of the selfish instincts, and against the truth of the unity of the race, must realize that whatever is injurious and mitigates against the progress of one section of human society, injures the whole; but we should realize the fact that the antagonism against the progressive instincts of the race appears formidable only as we view it from the standpoint of our own selfish desires. The remedy is not in destroying that energy which is demonstrating its force in the accumulation of vast stores of material wealth and using it for malignant purposes, but to turn that energy into higher channels and cause what is now antagonistic to the harmonious progress of life to be a medium for the manifestation of the truth that all are entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

The world has had and now possesses its brilliant galaxy of statesmen, philosophers, poets, religious teachers and other types of special development who are, by the possession of those gifts, illuminating the road over which life is traveling and which would without those specialized gifts be groping in the darkness. They stand above their fellow beings, that great and glorious galaxy of the common people, only in the sense of having more highly developed those faculties that in the mass are dormant, and with the multitude explorations have not even been made to locate and ascertain the amount and quality of those treasures which are apparently and for all practical purposes lost in the accumulations overshadowing their undeveloped life.

The law that one extreme must be balanced by an opposing condition of life of equal extent and power is an established and accepted truth, and the artificial distinctions which are being used to make it appear that the divine law is a mistake when it announced that it had formed of one blood all of the nations of the earth are being corrected, and that law by the coming of the new civilization will be confirmed and practically illustrated by the recognition of the truth that while there may be natural inequalities in the development of individual life, whatever the gifts may be that are possessed are the equal property of the universal humanity, and as such must be utilized for the universal good.

We use the term new civilization in its fullest and most perfect comprehension, because in its inauguration there will be relegated to the museum of barbaric relics those conditions of life that give at the present time, with its best development, only unequal opportunities for the advancement of life on lines of harmonious unfoldment; and while all of the higher natural faculties which make the distinctions in individual life will be retained and intensified; none will be used to oppose or to bring the lower into slavery to the higher. Then will be realized that advance thought which gave expression in the words: "My country is the world, my countrymen all mankind."

AN OPEN LETTER

To the President of the London Spiritualist Alliance.

Sir:—If the method adopted in thus addressing you should be looked upon as somewhat unusual, I trust to be able to fully justify my present procedure. As a Spiritualist, and one desirous of discovering and proclaiming the truth, being moreover supported by the feeling that in what I have to say herein, I am not only giving forth my own notions of things, but at the same time expressing the views of numerous Spiritualists with whom I am in perfect accord. I venture to come forward with a public declaration of opinion, upon a subject with regard to which all non-Christian Spiritualists must feel strongly. Is our cause to be misrepresented, lowered indeed in the eyes of the world, by a leading Spiritualistic paper, which week after week, continues to favor, flatter, and compliment clerical sectarians? Is there no possibility of protesting against the continuance of such a condition of affairs? For some time past "Light" has persistently pursued this line of action, as all readers of that periodical are aware. In the ordinary course of events, an editor is at liberty to manage his paper as he thinks fit. But this is an exceptional case, inasmuch as you, Sir, are the president of the London Spiritualistic Alliance, and also editor of Light, therefore anything appearing in your periodical uncontradicted, necessarily bears the stamp of presidential approval. The outside public must naturally suppose the opinions of English Spiritualists are put forward by what would seem to be an official organ. The president of the London Spiritualistic Alliance may almost be said to represent our cause in his own person, therefore it behooves one so high placed to recognize his responsibilities, and act up to the obligations incurred by the acceptance of such a post—to adjudicate justly on all matters that come up for debate. It cannot be denied that "Light," although under the leadership of the president of English Spiritualism, is yet willing to lend its columns to Christian theologians, and is striving in every way to obtain clerical support, by constantly retailing pulpit utterances, reporting sermons, and discussing church doctrines, even going so far as to advocate spending money (£50) on the hopeless task of enlightening the clergy, by the distribution amongst them, in pamphlet form, of Mr. Hawels' address to the L. S. A.

Some time back, too, a dissertation was published in "Light" on the resurrection of Jesus, from the pen of a correspondent, in the course of which he proceeded to argue his point on the ground of this mythical legend, as though it were a well-proved fact of yesterday. As you are aware, I took the trouble to write a reply to this article, showing the numerous discrepancies in the four differing accounts of the supposed occurrence, and pointing out what must be evident to all unprejudiced readers of the narratives, that no serious argument could be raised on such an uncertain basis. This communication found no place in the pages of "Light." Quite recently a proposition was brought forward in "Light" to inaugurate a Spiritualist church in London.

No discussion was allowed on this topic. All the letters and articles which were published were on the same side, viz, in favor of the project. It is true one very short letter was published, signed H. W. T., which did point out some practical difficulties in the way of the carrying out of the plan proposed, but raised no fundamental objections to the principle of converting Spiritualism into a church organization.

My own letters against the scheme have been suppressed and possibly also many others. Even ignorant ranting revivalists, presumably because draped in the sombre habiliments of the churches, are treated as privileged personalities by "Light," for quite recently its readers were instructed and enlightened in a lengthy and laudatory article by a contributor, expatiating upon the Christian virtues and spiritual intuitions of that self-deluded misleader of others, the traveling gospeller, Moody, claiming him, forsooth, as a Spiritualist

Well, if a ranting preacher can be a Spiritualist, and not know it, perchance a Spiritualist may be a ranter without being aware of the circumstance—a terrible reflection, this, truly! "Light," as a journal of psychical, occult, and mystical research, should act up to its character, and not condescend to truckle to any of the powers that be, take a higher stand, with regard to the church parties, above all theological quibblings, all party pettiness, all sectarian folly. Let Christian schoolmen spend their time in inventing or reciting impossible creeds, undesirable dogmas, mumbling vain repetitions, uttering formal supplications, chanting psalms, preaching platitudes, or, at moments when more metaphysically inclined, in disputing about the number of angels that can dance upon the point of a needle, or on some other question of equal importance to humanity.

We can find better employment for our faculties, by experimenting, observing, proving, recording the facts disclosed by psychological investigation. With regard to the Spiritualistic church question it may be remarked, there are already sufficient places of public worship, and more than sufficient parsons for those who require them.

Let the orthodox sheep and goats remain in their own folds, under the charge of their own shepherds, instead of seeking pastures new in our domain. The regular attendants at the different churches cannot be any gain to our cause until they are able to think their way out of the ancient creeds and dogmas by which they are tied and bound. We need not be anxious to attract to our ranks the mental tricksters and spiritual shufflers of the sects. Chapels and churches may perchance serve much the same purpose psychically as hospitals and asylums do physically. Those who are physically robust and healthy require no physician. Those who are psychically sound and sane need no priest. The strong soul can walk upright alone in the sight of all the powers of heaven and earth, without the aid of church or parsons.

Yours, etc. W. H. SIMPSON.

HOVERING BETWEEN LIFE AND DEATH.

A Line That Sometimes Is Not Specially Well Marked.

STRANGE STORIES OF HUMAN ACTIVITY AFTER BEING DECAPITATED — A CONFEDERATE SOLDIER WHO WAVED HIS ARMS, THOUGH BEHEADED—GHASTLY EXPERIMENT OF FRENCH DOCTORS ON A GUILLOTINED MURDERER.

The first point to which our attention may be directed, says the Edinburgh Scotsman, is the collecting of evidence regarding the immediate effect of severe and mortal injury on the subject thereof. One of the best illustrations of the fact that such injury does not produce immediate death, or at least that absolute cessation of all movements which we popularly recognize as the main feature of life's ending, is that afforded by the case of Captain Nolan. The captain headed the famous charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava. In the course of his duties he was struck in the chest by part of a shell, the missile tearing the chest open and wounding the heart. Kinglake gives a graphic account of the incident.

"The sword," he says, "dropped from his hand, but the arm with which he was waving it the moment before still remained high uplifted in the air, and the grip of the practiced horseman, remaining as yet unrelaxed, still held him firm in the saddle. Missing the perfect hand of his master and finding the accustomed governance now succeeded by the dangling reins, the horse all at once wheeled about and began to gallop back upon the front of the advancing brigade. Then from what had been Nolan—and his form was still high and erect in the saddle, his sword arm still high in the air—there burst forth a cry so strange and appalling that the hearer who rode nearest him called it unearthly. And in truth, I imagine, the sound resulted from no human will, but rather from those spasmodic forces which may act upon the bodily frame when life as a power has ceased. The firm-seated rider, with arm uplifted and stiff, could hardly be ranked with the living. The shriek men heard rending the air was scarce other than the shriek of a corpse. The dead horseman rode on till he passed through the interval of the Twelfth Light Dragoons. Then at last he dropped from the saddle."

THE DECAPITATED CONFEDERATE.

D. L. Kilmer, who passed through the civil war in America, in his turn gives an interesting parallel case to that of Nolan. He tells us that a sergeant in charge of the Ninth Corps of the Confederate works east of Pittsburg leaped on the parapet and with his cap in his left hand and his gun in his right cheered his comrades onward. A shell decapitated him at this moment "as completely as a knife could have done," says Mr. Kilmer, "but the tall form continued erect for some seconds, the arms still waving frantically, but with everlessening sweep and power, until the forces of the body collapsed, when the headless trunk toppled over to the ground."

We may regard as facts the circumstances above noted—that men killed instantly, in the popular acceptation of the short term, may continue to execute apparently definite and purposive movements. A somewhat ghastly recital referring to a guillotined man has been generally credited to the renown of the Paris School of Medicine, and relates to the same curious features that mark the battlefield. The Parisian case was that of Dr. De La Pommerais, who was guillotined for the crime of murder by poisoning. The story goes that some of his confreres waited on De La Pommerais before his execution and, informing him that it was their desire in the interests of science to test whether any degree of consciousness remained in the decapitated head just after execution, asked him, if possible, to give some sign or token by way of solving the problem. De La Pommerais acquiesced in the suggestion and it is said that, securing possession of his head as it fell and preventing further hemorrhage, the doctors shouted in the ear of their former confrere, demanding of him to give some response. One of the eyes was said to slowly open and shut and then all symptoms of life ceased.

A writer remarks that a freshly guillotined head has been known to make gestures of the mouth and to move the eyes when a bystander taunted it. I have been unable to trace either the truth of the De La Pommerais story or the source of the last named incident, but there is no reason why both should not have been correctly reported. Much would depend on the rapid flow of blood in the case of the head of the guillotined criminal in respect of the existence of movement or consciousness.

DUALITY OF THE VITAL STATE.

We see a very distinct reflection of the duality of our vital state in the very arrangement of our nervous system. The chief masses of that system, as everyone knows, consist of the brain and the spinal cord, and a second system of nerve masses called the sympathetic system also exists, and is found lying in a double chain of nerve knots or ganglia down the front of the spine. Now, it is evident that as the brain is the most important part of the nervous apparatus the spinal cord and the sympathetic system must together occupy a secondary position. This is unquestionably the case and the plan on which our nervous affairs have been ordered represents the well-known principle of the "division of labor." With a complex body to look after, our nervous system exhibits a clear specialization of its duties. If there are parts in the brain whose duty it is to "think" there are other parts whose function it is to guide our movements. If there are groups of nerve cells destined for the purpose of receiving messages from eyes and ears, the "intelligence department" of the brain, there are other groups that supervise the work of the heart, and that control our digestive proceedings, and that see to it that the duties of the lungs are duly discharged.

On such a principle of division of labor we are bound to find the varied ways and works of the nervous system carried out on different levels, as regards the importance of the duties performed. Now, it happens that the spinal cord which runs through the middle of the backbone, within which it is protected as within a bony tube, is really a kind of brain deputy in many respects. It acts on the whole as the confidential servant of the brain, but it also possesses an independence of its own. Its duties are of a lower nature than those discharged by the brain, but they are none the less essential for the perfect ordering of the body's welfare. Even if the head office be singularly well organized it cannot exercise its functions properly in the absence or inefficiency of the suboffices, and the special cord is really a series of suboffices carrying out many actions which otherwise we might be tempted to credit to the share of the brain.

If we divide the spinal cord of a frog and irritate the foot the leg will be moved, after the fashion in which the uninjured animal would resent being tickled. Here we have separated the brain from the feet and yet control of the muscles of the leg is not lost. That which the brain does in the frog apparently is not so much to carry out movements, but to initiate and control them. If a frog's legs be allowed to come in contact with some weakly irritating fluid the legs naturally will be withdrawn after an interval. Time after time the action will go on, till we can gauge fairly the period which will elapse between the withdrawals of the legs and their descents. If, now, the spinal cord be divided below the brain, we find these movements much accelerated. They proceed at a quicker rate, because the brain control is removed and the mechanism of the animal is left, as it were, to run wild, like an engine from which the influence of the flywheel has been removed.

But we may find evidence that the spinal cord of the frog may control actions in a fashion that would almost lend belief to the idea that it is much more than a mere brain deputy. Cut off a frog's head carefully, so that there may be as little disturbance of parts as is consistent with the performance of this operation. We have removed the brain, of course, and all that is left in the body of the chief nervous system is the spinal cord. Now place a drop of acetic acid on the inner side of one thigh of your headless frog and you will see the animal raise the foot of that leg in the endeavor to wipe the acid off. If, now, you remove the foot of the same leg and apply acid as before the leg will be again raised, but as the shortened limb falls short of the irritated spot the headless amphibian will after an interval raise the other foot and endeavor to rub away the acid. This is a well-known experiment and its teachings are singularly instructive. They prove to us that the spinal cord is capable of carrying out movements of a very complicated character, movements with a purpose, such as we should be inclined to believe were controlled by the brain alone.

Pass now to the case of the man. Here injury and accident, unfortunately, supply us with a parallel instance to that of the frog. If the spinal cord of a man be divided, say, in its middle part, the lower half of his body is paralyzed. He is unable to move it and he has lost all sensation in that half. But if the feet be tickled the legs will be drawn up, although the man is not conscious of making the movements and is unaware he is putting his muscles into action unless he sees the motions of his limbs. Here we again come in contact with the idea of the independence of the spinal cord. We see that consciousness has nothing whatever to do with the work of the cord, any more than when we tickle the foot of a sleeping person and the leg is moved we can assert that he is conscious of his action.

Verily, the midway station between life and death is a locality that has been but a little investigated. Spiritualists, give it more attention.

OCCULT STUDENT.

I KNOW.

The Universal Life Force.

Universal Life Force is pulsating with a vibrating, intelligent I Know, that meets the demand of all life, from the smallest atom to the highest of soul aspiration. This I Know holds within all that is, ever was or ever will be. It is the All Perfect, undisturbed by man's suppositious theories of why and wherefore. Its geometric, mathematical, chemical and planetary laws ever stand, unchanged by the hand of time, or the mind of man.

This I Know force cannot be fully comprehended by the materialistic mind. The psychic soul coming in touch or rapport with I Know, feels the pulsating thrill of vibrating, instantaneous knowledge, that has hitherto been a blank to man. This knowledge vibrates with a precision and decision, that admits no hesitation of calculation; admits no thinking, scheming or proof; for it carries convincing proof in its ever pulsating truth. Man did well when he agreed with his brother man, that the addition of two and two was equal to the multiplying of two by two.

The mathematics of man are ever puzzling the brain of man with its rules of calculation. Why burden and worry the brain, when all is correctly assisted by the I Know, and is indelibly stamped in the psychic force, waiting the demand of man?

The so-called lightning calculators, who give instantaneous correct answers to written figures, without time for calculation, are in rapport with the I Know mathematical vibration of the universe. This is the true source of all knowledge. The psychometrists do not read by man-made letters or signs, nor can they at all times tell all they feel and know. They cannot express the soul inspiration that thrills their entire being with gladness, in thus being blended with natural law. Man has not accepted and lived enough in the now of I Know. By observation of the past, applied to the present education, man fully appreciates the possibility of the future man. 'Tis well for man to memorize the past and to familiarize the present, but 'tis better still to foresee the future possibility of all life.

To know the I Know of the universe, is to live in receptive submission to universal life vibration, being in the material yet not of the material; dwelling among the earthly, yet partaking not of their vanities; eating and talking with mortals, yet breathing the knowledge of Divinity; feeling a oneness with Universal Life, feeling the Omnipresence of all knowledge, feeling no limit to soul possibility, rejoicing in the ecstasy of love's realization, noting the harmonious waves of nature's vibration. The poetical echo of her rhythmical numbers are the incentive of soul mind. 'Tis a sad fact that psychics feel and know many things they cannot express; they are like the man of Pan, caught up into the third heaven, see things not unlawful but impossible to utter. Our psychics say the language of mortal tongue has not learned to express them.

ANNUAL REPORT

Of the Secretary of the National Spiritualists Association.

To the Spiritualists of America:

Dear Friends and Co-Workers:—Again the season has returned when it becomes necessary to submit to your consideration the annual report of the proceedings and work of the N. S. A., as connected with the office of the secretary, and it is a source of pleasure to me to present the gratifying results of our labors as well as the good prospects that are before the N. S. A.

The year has been a busy one, and filled with effort on the part of the officers of this organization to increase the influence for good of our societies and of the cause of Spiritualism in general. Evidences of the esteem and appreciation in which the N. S. A. is held all over the land have come to this office, by correspondence and from visitors from far and near, and we are assured that never before has the need of a National Association of Spiritualists been more firmly intrenched in the minds of our people. While I do not see the possibility of a National society being composed of individual membership, I can clearly perceive that if it could be so, the membership of the N. S. A. would consist of thousands of individual Spiritualists who do not, or perhaps can not, belong to any local society. I mention this to show that this organization is indorsed and blessed by a great number of friends who are not members of any of its chartered societies—an evidence of which is that hundreds of donors to the Mayer Fund are not connected with any society. This fact clearly proves that the N. S. A. is considered a necessity to the cause in all quarters of America.

The spiritual societies with which we are in touch have shown their loyalty and good will to the N. S. A. during the year, not only in their helpfulness to the Mayer fund, but in various ways, sending out to this office kindly words and sympathies that have been felt and appreciated as a power for good, and due appreciation of all this expressed by your secretary, whose labors have been lightened by this good will. Our spiritual papers have also brought an atmosphere of kindliness from their managers and many of their contributors, to this office, and the courtesy of the editors of these papers has been unfailing and helpful in the extreme. To each one we send our sincere thanks for the service of the year.

Our reports from State Associations have, on the whole, been encouraging and gratifying. These Associations have done much good work. Some of them have made a strong feature of missionary work as a part of their labors, with most satisfactory results. We learn that more of harmony and good-will exists between them and their constituents by this method, and that the cause is growing in various localities in proportion to the efforts made to spread the truth in the missionary field. Local societies have passed through trials and cares during the year. Some of them report depressing conditions, others are full of hope and zeal for the future, and all have certain unfailing workers who press on with their labors in the face of discouragements and disappointments, determined to do their best for the cause they love. Finances have not been plenty with any society—too much apathy on the part of the local Spiritualists being the principal cause; and the great need of Spiritualism all over the country, irrespective of societies as well as in connection with them, is the awakening of Spiritualists to a sense of duty in the line of supporting the cause with finances, encouragement and sympathy in every direction where good to humanity can be wrought. During the year, quarterly letters to our chartered societies evincing the interest and affiliation of the N. S. A. have been sent by the secretary, and kindly and loyal responses to many of the same have been received and filed. Since the last annual convention, your secretary has written about fourteen hundred letters in the interests of the N. S. A., many of which have been in behalf of, or in acknowledgment of, donations and other work connected with the Mayer Fund. She has also written frequent articles for publication in the various Spiritual papers, all of which have been honored by the editors with prominent space in their publications.

The office of secretary of this organization necessarily calls for diversified labors on the part of its incumbent, no portion of which can be neglected, from writing for the press, corresponding with societies, attending to the free library and reading-room, to entertaining the many callers who come to headquarters for information on Spiritualism and its workers, or as one goes to the Mecca of his hopes and dreams. But, with all this diversity of work, your secretary is happy to report that she has had to employ very little assistance in the year. At the last convention, the matter of employing clerical assistance for the secretary was acted upon to the extent of leaving the amount to be fixed for such aid to the Board of Trustees, and at the first board meeting thereafter the secretary announced that she could cover all expense of outside aid with the sum of fifty dollars, and at this time she is happy to state that all clerk hire falls several dollars short of the allotted sum. In this connection, however, I wish to give credit to the invaluable aid of Miss A. O. Wink, who has many times extended her aid in this office in such manner as to save the secretary much perplexity and overwork, and which would have cost many dollars if clerical labor had been employed. I also desire to extend sincere thanks to our worthy treasurer, Mr. Mayer, for his valuable suggestions and advice, and for his unfailing sympathy and goodwill in all the duties of this important office.

In accordance with the vote of the convention your secretary wrote a courteous letter—which we sent out as a circular request—to the various mediums who held independent platform test meetings on Sundays in the localities where spiritual societies for lecture work are established, asking them to refrain from holding their meetings at such hours as might conflict with the work of the society in their vicinity. How much good was wrought by these letters has not appeared. In seeking to secure complete files of the Spiritual papers and magazines for the N. S. A., letters were written to many of our prominent workers, also for the press, soliciting such publications, and many papers and other forms of printed matter have been received in response, while we have many promises of more that will in time be donated to this organization.

During the year, the secretary and other members of the N. S. A., have published articles in the secular press in favor of Spiritualism, and in protest to the attacks upon it in public by Rev. Talmage and others. In February last, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia were expected to act in favor of a bill prohibiting the exercise of clairvoyants and other psychics in their respective callings—a bill that if passed would prevent our mediums from exercising their gifts to any extent in this District, but by the prompt action of the Executive Committee of the N. S. A., in Washington, the bill was eliminated from the proposed measure, before they were submitted to the Committee of the District.

It is not my purpose to make this report a lengthy one, and while there is much of interest that might be cited, yet, I must condense as much as possible. During the year, nine local charters have been granted, one charter for State Association, Wis., one for camp association, and one for the Young People's Union.

Our free library contains nearly five hundred and fifty books, any of which can be borrowed by persons of reliability who wish to read them. We charge nothing for the privilege, and we have many calls for the books on our shelves. Many of our bright authors in Spiritualism and liberal fields of thought have generously responded to the solicitations of the secretary, and presented copies of their publications to our library; among these may be mentioned Charles and Katherine Newcomb, Elinor Kirk, J. Howard Moore, Dr. H. Kelley, Carrie Twing, Lida Browne and others, all of whom are well known to the literary world, and to all of whom we extend most heartfelt thanks. Our library has been newly arranged and catalogued by Miss Wink, and is in the best of conditions, and is by no means the least attractive feature of the Home office. I must not neglect to mention that Mrs. S. L. Porter presented the library with a number of the foremost and brighest books of the day, selecting our president as her almoner in this transaction.

The headquarters have been open for visitors and for business during the year except for ten days in the season when the city was well nigh deserted and business at a low ebb—when the secretary was absent for a few days seeking a needed change; but during that time no work was neglected, as all correspondence was attended to by that officer from her distant post.

And now the secretary wishes to acknowledge with gratitude the unfailing kindness and courtesy of President Barrett, and of each member of the board, toward her at all times, and their valuable influence, which has ever been felt by her as a source of strength and encouragement. To each and all she accords recognition of their help, as also to the editors of the spiritual papers and of societies with whom she has come in contact during the year.

The financial statement of the N. S. A. cannot be made till the end of the fiscal year; it will be submitted at the convention.

With loving greetings and good-will to all friends and co-workers,

Respectfully submitted,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
Secretary N. S. A.

THE ANARCHISTS.

What True Spiritualism Demands.

To the Editor:—It appears from the New York Herald that European statesmen, who are somewhat puzzled as to the steps which should be taken to suppress anarchy, are just now much interested in the views on this subject which have been set forth by Doctor Emmanuel Regis, an authority on mental diseases and a professor at the Medical College of Bordeaux. Doctor Regis has made a special study of regicides, and a book by him on that subject has just been published.

In it he dwells at length on the necessity of preventing anarchy from spreading any further, and he insists that the surest way to effect this object is to treat regicides and other criminal anarchists as if they were lunatics. Nothing is gained by killing them, he says, whereas much will be gained by shutting them up in lunatic asylums. Regicides, he explains, may be divided into two classes, the true and the false. The former try to kill sovereigns because their temperament and training impel them to commit such crimes; the latter follow their example because chance or a momentary impulse has driven them half crazy and has filled them with a desire to shed blood. The sole aim of the true anarchist is to destroy a potentate; the sole aim of the pseudo-anarchist is to punish some one who he thinks is his enemy.

True anarchists, continues Doctor Regis, are neither wholly sane nor wholly insane. Most of them, however, have hereditary blemishes and are so unbalanced that no matter how intellectual and brilliant they may be, they are in reality abnormal beings, a striking characteristic of whom is their inability to resist the temptation to commit crime which constantly besets them. They are, in fact, degenerates, and statistics show that in most cases several of their immediate relatives have been the victims of suicide or epilepsy. They are also as a rule sickly in childhood—witness the cases of Jacques Clement, Chatel, Ravaillac, Damiens and others—and furthermore they commit their atrocious crimes at an early age, the large mapority being under thirty-five at the time of their arrest. Mystics they also are, the result being that they believe themselves destined to do some great deed which will win for them the crown of martyrdom.

According to Dr. Regis the criminal acts of regicides are always premeditated. The anarchist, he says, is proud of his mission and takes care to strike the blow in open daylight, before the public, and in a manner which is almost theatrical. Therefore he rarely, if ever, uses poison, his favorite weapon being a steel blade. Death he does not dread, and the most cruel tortures he brears bravely. Most of the regicides have suffered death for their crimes and have surprised everyone by their calmness. Those who escaped death, like Parasanante, who tried to kill King Humbert, ended by becoming lunatics.

In answer to the question, "What should be done with anarchists?" Dr. Regis says: "The prevailing idea is that the only way to suppress anarchy is by killing the regicides; but, though this is certainly a radical method, I am satisfied that it will not prove as efficacious as is expected. The fact is there is no proof that this is the best possible method of protecting society from the attacks of fanatics of this type. Indeed, I have shown that anarchists consider death a glorious martyrdom, and that the greatest boon that can be conferred upon them is death. The reason is because they are convinced that, once dead, they will take rank among the immortal voluntary victims of a holy cause. On the other hand, the punishment of one regicide has never prevented another regicide from committing crime. On the contrary, the death of a regicide causes his colleagues to envy him and spurs them on to meet a similar fate. There is, so to speak, a contagion of martyrdom.

"It is important now to note the fact that nothing annoys or humiliates these fanatics so much as to be considered insane, and hence irresponsible for their crimes. Against such an imputation they have always protested, and still protest most loudly. In view of this fact, the suppression of anarchy can only be effected by treating the regicide as a lunatic. Complete suppression we need not expect, since there have been regicides, just as there have been lunatics, since the world began, but partial suppression we may confidently hope for. Nothing hurts an anarchist more than to hint that he is not in his right mind, and nothing is more likely to make him abstain from crime.

"A most valuable object lesson could also be taught in this way. Let those unbalanced persons who seek to become illustrious and to win the praise of posterity by burning the temple of Ephesus, as Erostratus did, or by killing the best of kings, as Ravaillac did—let them, I say, learn, once for all, that they have been treated as lunatics and that they will be locked up for life in lunatic asylums, far from the scenes of their former deeds of prowess(?) Such an announcement and such a policy would have a marvelous effect upon their colleagues, and would help greatly toward the suppression of anarchy."

There is no doubt in regard to the proper treatment of anarchists when view from the higher Spiritualistic standpoint. They should be kindly treated as misguided human beings, and confined in an asylum until thoroughly reformed. Killing them is barbarous—accomplishes nothing but evil.

SOURCE OF WISDOM.

Is there a Conscious Thinking Center?

We are told the sages, or wise men in all times, drew their information or wisdom, from a conscious thinking center. We are told to look to God for wisdom. We no sooner attempt to search for his abode, than we find he "is past finding out."

Again we are told that "Spirit is God," or that "God is a spirit," but we cannot comprehend spirit. If we drift into materialism, and say, "matter produces mind, thought, and will," we soon meet problems which we cannot solve from that standpoint. Tow, then, did wisdom come, from such infinite source?

Careful readers and great scholars, from the material side of theories, are now asking the question, "why so many theories, creeds, dogmas and isms?" A law library, in a few years after publication, becomes rubbish. A medical work is only good for ten or fifteen years. Among all the creeds, theories, and opinions, is wisdom wanting? Anything based on wisdom is never changed. Wisdom comes to man from a conscious thinking center, and is eternal, changeless and fixed. We are told we "think the same thoughts that Socrates and Plato thought in their day." If we blindly sit down and allow our preacher to do our thinking for us, and do not attempt to go to the fountain head for truth, we must not complain if the water is bitter to the taste. It is our privilege to learn the facts concerning our existence, and God's purpose in creating us, and what he wants us to do. It is plain that if wisdom is procured from the proper source, it will stand for all ages and time. Jesus drew his wisdom from the Father.

There is a space as black as night, running for nearly twelve centuries, it being in fact the Dark Ages, in which wisdom was met by death or a dungeon. Only the "opinion of the Fathers," was of any weight. Occasionally there was a ray of light detected, even in this dense darkness; some one would get wisdom from the central fountain and impart it to others, and suffer death for so doing. A monk was severely punished for telling his associates that "wisdom came from the center of creation, by asking, longing, and praying for it, while the mind was in a passive state, having the mind centered upon God."

Some years ago Joseph Adams taught that "right actions produced right living and right thinking." Mrs. Eddy changed this by teaching that "right thinking produced right actions." Helen Wilmans changed these to some extent by teaching that, "a perfect ideal must be established in the mind, before perfect results could be produced." These may all be near the truth. Why follow the "calf path?" The magnetic needle has not lost its cunning.

Wisdom does not consist in taking a bit of theory from this or that doctrine and making a perfect basis of only sound theories. A galley slave could not have been kept from the true wisdom, if he had been determined to go to the fountain head or "conscious thinking center after it. No person can be kept from wisdom to-day, however persecuted. A medical clairvoyant says he has "sat twice a week for ten years to acquire his knowledge." It only takes three years in medical college to graduate in medicine; why, then, go ten years to the conscious center?

The criminal records of Iowa disclose the fact that a man for restoring a sick man to health, after all his physicians had said, "he must go; no medicine can reach him," was sentenced to the penitentiary for, doctoring without medicine. His friends came to his rescue. The Supreme Court saw the hand of the "Inquisition," and said, "Let the man go free."

We anxiously inquire where, or how, to find this conscious thinking center? We go to the church idea of God, and find him in the minds of the masses of worshipers, to be a person, having form as we have, in the material. We turn away from that, and look for a fixed conscious thinking center in the planetary world. In that we find our earth, as well as many other planets pass around the sun as a center, making the trip, some in a few months, the ones far from the sun in about eighty-four years; we mean at a greater speed, as individuals, than the speed of a rifle ball, when shot from a Winchester rifle Our sun, with all its planets, passes around another sun, and this second sun, with our sun and its planets, all pass around a third sun, and thus on, and on, until the mind is lost in the never-ceasing motion. We again ask "where is this conscious thinking center?

A naturalist found a little blooming plant, growing in a dark mountain valley, and asked the little plant, "why are you here in this lonely world?" The little plant replied, "the spot where I grow is in the center of the world." Must the hands of time move forward or backward? The decision is for us in our efforts either in finding, or failing to find, the center from which flows wisdom.

He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton

...OF...
BIBLICAL SPIRITUALISM
...OR...
A CONCORDANCE
To the principal passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism;
Together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible.
BY MOSES HULL.

Much that is in this book appeared in an abridged form in a series of nine full pages of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. These articles were prepared at the call of hundreds of Spiritualists who felt the need of some kind of document for ready reference. They only seemed to whet the appetite for more; hence the publication of this work.

The author, Moses Hull, has written many volumes on Spiritualistic and other themes and each one is full of careful study on the subject chosen. Mr. Hull, in his introduction of this work says:

"Hoping that this book will serve to lead the people out of the wilderness of doubt and despair; and that when Spiritualism shall have wrested the Bible from its 'sanctified' enemies, it will not 'spike' it, but will use it to batter down the walls of Christian superstition and ignorance, I send it out on its errand of enlightenment with the humble prayer that it will prove a divine benediction to every reader."

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY.
BY W. J. COLVILLE.

Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume.

The chief aim throughout the volume has been to arouse increased interest in the workable possibilities of a theory of human nature, thoroughly optimistic and at the same time, profoundly ethical. As several chapters are devoted to improved methods of education, the writer confidently expects that many parents, teachers and others who have charge of the young, or who are called upon to exercise supervision over the morally weak and mentally afflicted, will derive some help from the doctrines herewith promulgated.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1900.

The Boxers! The Boxers!

Is it a fact that a branch of the Chinese Boxers have located in America, and are trying to run the religious institutions of this country with a high hand, just as it is alleged they have been doing over there in China? A few weeks ago gross outrages in which religion played a part, were perpetrated in Dayton, Ohio, which suggested the Boxers were at work in that city, even if their Celestial origin was concealed. Only last week, at Mansfield, Ohio, apparently the same faction attacked two elders of Dr. Dowie's church. These elders were tarred and feathered, and paraded through the streets, to the great delight of the hoodlum crowd. This is the third time members of the Dowie sect, who base their distinctive faith on the words of Jesus, have suffered violence in Mansfield.

Every little while the Latter Day Saints, otherwise known as Mormons, whose religious views are built on the Bible and Jesus Christ, experience violence somewhere in this great country, where all creeds and no creeds are supposed to be freely tolerated. Of course our native population sharing in the blessings of freedom are not guilty of these gross wrongs. And Christians who have suffered so much in the way of persecution in the past, would not repeat those outrages on other parties. It is the work of the Boxers, the vilest of the "heathen Chinee," who have no toleration about them! They have come among us in disguise, and are doing on the sly just what their associates are doing in the Orient. Instead of trying to dragoon the Boxers abroad into submission to established law, it would be well to employ our armies at home in keeping order, and in teaching intruders from abroad respect for our institutions.

Scourging Texas.

"Mother," said a sick girl, "'Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth,' is that so?"

"That is what Paul wrote," replied the mother.

"Well, the Lord must love me, then, for he is just giving me fits."

Wonder if that is the reason the floods are let loose on Texas, a second and third calamity following close on the heels of the one that desolated Galveston?

But for our early orthodox teaching we would have supposed the great air currents that rolled inland from the convulsed ocean and laid waste a city, destroying thousands of its inhabitants, carried along with them waters held in solution; that these currents were obstructed in their course by mountain barriers and counter currents; the moisture was condensed, formed into clouds, and these clouds being overweighted, fell to the earth as rain. Streamlets were quickly formed which constantly increasing in size became a mighty river which overflowed its banks. The great mass of water seeking its level flowed onward, and destroyed every obstacle in its path; just as the wind and waves in the ruined city of Galveston had done only a few days before, God having nothing to do in either case, save as a disinterested spectator, expressing neither love, hate, justice, revenge nor mercy.

Quite Time for a Change.

A movement among the clergy of Pittsburg contemplates the abolition of extravagant and expensive funeral customs. In a late meeting they recommended the omission of eulogistic remarks concerning the dead at the time of burial, and made a strong declaration against floral and other useless displays. Services at the grave, they say, should be brief, and friends present in inclement weather should not be expected to uncover their heads for a moment. They advise a discontinuance of mourning costume.

The Progressive Thinker gladly lends its influence in favor of this reform; for such it is in fact. Many a family has been wholly impoverished in aping the customs of the rich in the burial of their dead. Let all, the rich and the poor alike, remember the objects of their love do not rest in the grave. It is only their worn-out and cast-off garments to which they pay honors. The immortal spirit, which lately animated the earthly tenement, has fled, and is reveling in joys all its own. Quietly lay the vacated tenement away, and treasure the virtues of the departed as all that is left among us of a well-spent life. If it knew evil the sooner it is forgotten the better for the survivors and for the departed, whose power for wrong ended with the mortal body.

Progress in the Air.

Every lover of humanity must hail with joy the constantly improving tone of the orthodox pulpit. It is the prelude to a universal change fast nearing, when, instead of preaching dogmas dishonoring to God and outraging reason, every pulpit will proclaim the supremacy of natural law, and the rejection of errors founded on the ignorance of a remote age when the whole world was sunk in barbarism. Then, instead of opposing Christianity for its fallacies, all will applaud it for its practical common sense. The silly guessings of an ignorant priesthood as to the origin of evil and the remedy therefor, will give place to the great truths which true science unfolds. Instead of ascribing evil to the eating of forbidden fruit, or the uncovering of a box from which countless ills and diseases escaped, leaving only hope behind, it will be found an outgrowth of savagism, the natural condition of man before reason, and observation, and experience had taught him what he now knows. It does seem that progress is in the air as never before. And why not? Why should the arts and the sciences take such forward leaps, and the pulpit lag superfluously so far in the rear? It should not, and the more thoughtful of the clergy are rushing to the front, while others are but slightly in the rear.

Rev. Frank M. Carson, pastor of the Lake View Presbyterian Church, almost bounded to the front two Sundays ago, when he is reported by the daily press to have said:

"Listen to the opinion of a labor journal touching the condition of the churches to-day, and we shall see ourselves as others see us. The church may be numerically stronger, but there has ceased to be any test of morals for membership in most of the churches. The gambler, the liar, the swindler, and the extortioner can be a prominent member in a church in these days of religious and moral decadence.

"These are stern charges; but my observation compels me to admit their truth in some instances. What are the words used to describe the successful business man to-day? "Sharp," "shrewd," "keen."

"I say we must purify the atmosphere. Under the present system of competition the weak are going down before the strong. Commercial justice and righteousness in any fullness are almost impossible of practice. Has the church concerned herself about this whole question of how men are to love one another six days in the week?"

A church without morals, made up of gamblers, liars, swindlers, extortioners—and hypocrites should have been added—is not the kind of a church to perpetuate; and Rev. Carson does well in calling attention to them, and should have advised honest men to shun them.

Churchmen, amend your creeds, revise your Bible, correct your morals, advance natural truths, discard your fables and your follies, and we will all join you in the grand march for a higher, a nobler, and a better civilization than your prophets have ever predicted, or your poets have sung. The age is ripe for reform, and we demand it at your hands.

Hard Pressed.

A news dispatch from New York says the editor of the Homiletic Review, of that city, has just received a letter from Rev. Dr. Geo. F. Wright, of Oberlin College, Ohio, in which he discloses the purpose of a trip he has started to make through Siberia. He is unwilling to accept the theory that the deluge merely submerged the region round Palestine. He claims when the author of the Pentateuch said, "The waters covered the whole face of the earth" he meant it.

"Prof. Wright will go through the mountains of Siberia, far from where men ordinarily go. There he will make excavations. He will dig up the earth until, with the geologist's eye, he discovers just that stratum which should have been deposited during the period in which the deluge took place. Next he will explore the Caucasus range, pass down to ancient Ararat, where tradition says the ark landed, and emerge from his travels somewhere near Smyrna, Asia Minor."

On the eve of the Franco-German war a party in Paris organized a company to explore the Red Sea in search of some remains of Pharaoh's army overwhelmed in its pursuit of Moses when the sea let go its hold of water walled up on either side, to let the Israelites pass on dry land. The expedition was abandoned on account of the war, though its projector was sure he would find at least the chariot wheels. Possibly the sea was "salted" at that time, and the chariot wheels may be discovered a little later.

Rev. Dr. Wright should know before he has gone far in his explorations, that every mountain on the globe, however elevated, was once below the level of the sea. The mountains were uplifted by the terrible convulsions old earth has passed through, and they bear witness of this fact. He should also know that every grain of sand, all the gravel, and all the boulders, however deeply buried in the earth, are water-worn, and were made what they are by being rolled along and upon each other in rivers, estuaries or seas, and that no discoveries on mountain tops or deep excavations in the earth will discredit this statement. This movement, however, shows that men may be deeply versed in Bible lore, and know very little of true science.

Hugh Miller worked that "Testimony of the Rocks" theory for all it was worth and filled a suicide's grave in consequence.

That Is Right.

The "Evangelist," a Presbyterian organ, writing of the Galveston disaster, accounts for it in the good old orthodox basis:

"It was a visitation of God." * * "Great as is the mystery of the question it was an affliction of heaven. The raging wind and the leaping waves were but fulfilling His Word, and they never advanced beyond the errand on which they were sent."

The God who holds the winds in his fists, and who lets them loose to overwhelm a city and crush its inhabitants, is not the God of modern science. He is the barbarian God of the Jews, jealous, repentant and vengeful, a fit person for a believer in infant damnation to worship; but he is not the loving, kind and merciful Parent of even advanced Christians, and falls very short of possessing the glorious attributes Spiritualism has enthroned as Infinite Intelligence.

Those who try to break the fall of orthodoxy will only make the fall heavier at last.—Goldwin Smith.

A Mediumistic Prodigy.

As set forth by the Paris correspondent of the Chicago Chronicle, musical prodigies ad infinitum have bobbed up all over the continent during the past decade. Many of these, after scrutinous tests, proved to be no prodigies at all, and others, again, could display their phenomenal gifts only under hypnotic influence.

Paris, however, is just now harboring a genuine two-and-a-half-year-old "musical prodigy" or rather medium. In this case there is no deception, for that august body, the Psychological Congress, which met here a few days ago in connection with the Paris exposition, took cognizance of the smart youngster and actually declared that a miraculous genius, which cannot be explained by science, had presented itself.

This prodigy is a Spanish boy named Pepito Rodriguez Arlola. He was introduced to the large assembly of scientists in the big Palace of Congresses by Messrs. Richter and Carvalho. Pepito, arrayed in a dress which looked more fit for a girl than a boy, seemed overwhelmed with fear at sight of the big crowd of people and he burst out in a fit of weeping. It was some time before his mamma could quiet him. The boy showed pale, intelligent features, of pleasing, refined lineaments, framed in beautiful golden locks.

The Congress ascertained regarding the abnormal talents of the child that he was like all other children of his age in every respect, except his insuppressible predilection for music and his wonderful musical gifts. One day last year when Pepito was exactly two and a half years old, his mother discovered the boy's gift. After having played a sonata she retired to the adjoining library to spend an hour reading a novel. To her surprise she heard the sonata she had just played repeated on her piano. It was musically correct, but the touch of the player seemed light and hesitating. The reproduction was most accurate in the high notes and phantasy appeared to co-operate in the lower passages, but harmony was maintained throughout the piece.

Peeping through the curtains, she beheld little Pepito at the piano. The little one had climbed with difficulty on the piano stool and, of course, could not make use of the pedals. When his mother entered the first thing he asked her was to push the pedals so "he could make more noise."

From that day the piano became Pepito's most favorite toy. He astounded all his relatives and friends by repeating, without being able to read a note, the most difficult operas and classical compositions after hearing them only once. The infant musician, however, did not long remain satisfied with simple imitations; he soon began to improvise himself and develop his own musical ideas on the instrument. After six months' practice the boy was able to play waltzes of Straus and the most difficult operatic music.

The delegates to the Psychological Congress had the satisfaction of hearing Pepito on the piano and to judge for themselves. The boy complied only after much coaxing by Mme. Arlola. Pepito's repertoire consists of two parts. The one is fixed—that is, he plays either pieces he has heard before or some of his own compositions. The second part consists of rapid reproductions.

Sharpers and Semi-Idiots.

They go together. The former fatten off the latter. The latter take no Spiritualist paper; they must save their money for the use of the "Sharpers." The semi-idiots are not informed of what is going on in our ranks, hence are easy subjects. The last unsavory report comes from the Daily Northwestern, of Oshkosh, Wis., of September 29. It is as follows:

"Two clairvoyants have been arrested at West Superior, who tally with the descriptions furnished of Prof. Ball and Prof. Rovano, who did business in Oshkosh some weeks ago.

"Warrants were issued at that time and given to Sheriff White to serve. Sheriff White, when he learned of the arrest of these two men in Superior, telegraphed to hold them, and he prepared to go to that city at once and arrest the men if there was a chance of their escape from prosecution there. The men gave their names as H. V. May and Robert Jamison. The story of how the men were detected is published in the Superior Telegram, as follows:

"'Mrs. Palmer, a victim, tells the police a story, alleging that she was duped. She claims that she went to Dr. May in Duluth, who is a hypnotist, and to whom she looked for advice upon a matter of investment to the extent of $2,500. She says she took her money to the doctor's office, and that it was (or she supposed it was) sewed in a buckskin sack and tied around her neck. This was yesterday at 3:30 p. m., and she was to keep it there twenty-four hours. She decided, however, to open the sack sooner, and claims that she found only paper and a $2 bill there. Thereupon she went to the police and they had the two men arrested here at 7:30 last night.'

"A Marinette paper tells of their methods as follows:

"'They would allure people into their offices by the medium of attractive advertising. They would at first find out about how much money each caller had on his person, and if the amount was enough to warrant the time and trouble, they would proceed to rob him. The patients were told to place all their money into a small sack and hang it around their neck, and let it hang next to the heart. They would then administer a dope, telling the victim that when he awoke the amount of money in the sack would be doubled.'

"Notwithstanding different names are given, the method of securing the money is strongly similar to the methods of Prof. Ball.

"The Marinette paper says: 'These same two gentlemen were driven out of Oshkosh recently and passed through Marinette.'

"Sheriff Charles White has searched for Prof. Ball for some time and was on his track when he learned to-day that two men had been arrested in Superior."

Spiritualists will be safe when they read the Spiritualist papers, and avoid all these traveling tricksters who are not endorsed by some reputable chartered society.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood.

This able, thoughtful and scientific speaker delivered two lectures in Brooklyn, N. Y., last Sunday. The subject of his afternoon lecture was, "The Advance of Spiritualism During the Last Year." The evening lecture was on the "Conflict of Spiritual Thought in the Churches." That he handled these subjects with signal ability and thoroughness will readily be believed by all who are acquainted with his methods and qualities of thought.

The Hour When You Are to Die.

It has occurred to Dr. Charles W. Pilgrim, who writes an article on the subject to the Chicago American, that the study of a year's statistics of the Hudson River State Hospital, N. Y., ought to be of much interest and value.

An examination of "the hour of death" showed that 26 per cent died between midnight and 6 a. m., 19 per cent between 6 a. m. and noon, 31 per cent between noon and 6 p. m., and 24 per cent between 6 p. m. and midnight. By adding these percentages together we find the curious fact that the deaths were very evenly distributed between the hours of darkness and light, 115 patients having died between 6 p. m. and 6 a. m. and 116 between 6 a. m. and 6 p. m.

Desiring to pursue this question still further, Dr. Pilgrim examined the deaths for ten preceding years, nearly 1,500 in all, and found this statement strikingly confirmed, as a change of one-half of 1 per cent would have made the deaths exactly even during the hours of day and night.

A chart which the Doctor made of the deaths for the year showed, when divided into sections of three hours each, that the highest point of the curve was reached, both for men and women, between the hours of 3 and 6 p. m., nearly 20 per cent of all the deaths having occurred between those hours. The next highest point was between the hours of 3 and 6 a. m., although there was a decided fall for both sexes for the single hour from 4 to 5, when the line went down to the lowest point reached in any hour of the twenty-four.

There was also a decided fall, especially for women, between 11 and 12 in the morning, which is in direct contrast to the statement made by Dr. Beadles, of Colney Hatch, that the most fatal hour for women is shortly before noon. For the other hours the recording line remained remarkably steady for both men and women.

These figures, therefore, show that there is some reason for the popular belief that many deaths occur during the early morning hours, but they show still more plainly that the majority of those who suffer from long continued mental disease give up their lives toward the close of the day.

As a general rule "death softly follows life," and suffering at the end, either mental or physical, is of rare occurrence. In fact, it is not an uncommon thing to notice a clearing up of the clouded brain a few hours before the final change. This fact was noticed by Rush a hundred years ago, and in my opinion, too little has been written of it since.

From my own observance, and from the reports of reliable nurses, many patients, especially those dying of phthisis, or after surgical operations, or from acute intercurrent diseases, or injuries which produce a profound shock upon the general system, become calm and coherent shortly before death.

This may be accounted for either upon the theory of counter irritation or on the principle enunciated by Claude Bernard that when a histological element dies or tends to die its irritability augments before it is diminished.

Of course this temporary brightening does not occur often in cases of terminal dementia or in general paresis where there are profound changes in the structure of the brain. It is not rare for the melancholy or maniacal insane, as good old Dr. Rush observed, "to discover a greater or less degree of reason in their last hours, just as the sun, after a cloudy day, sometimes darts a few splendid rays across the earth before he descends below the horizon."

There can be no reasonable doubt that the seasons exert a marked influence upon the recovery rate, for 65 per cent of those who have recovered were sent home during the months of spring and summer, while only 35 per cent were so discharged during the autumn and winter months.

Regis makes the statement that melancholia is aggravated in the winter, and that but few cases of mania recover during that season. It is easy to believe that the fresh air, the sunlight and the outdoor life of summer must act as powerful agents in helping to restore the diseased organs to normal condition.

Demand for Bibles Declining.

One of the Chicago dailies, in its usual Saturday's religious news, makes the following interesting statement, more valued because the paper is in no sense sectarian, but is newsy:

"An attempt is being made to account for the collapse of the American Bible Society by saying it is not able to compete with foreign Bibles, which are imported free of duty; but the real truth is well known to be that, while Bibles are cheaper now than they ever were before, the sale of them of late years has been rapidly falling off. This neglect of the Bible, however, need occasion no surprise, as it is doubtless due to the discredit thrown on the Scriptures by the new school of theologians, who no longer refer to the Bible as the 'Word of God,' but class it and deal with it as being on a level with the sacred books of heathen religions."

If the Bible is ever restored to popular favor again it will be received as a compilation of old-time writings, written by unknown persons in the remote past, under circumstances of which we have now no knowledge, and no means, save by the contexts, to know of their value, or trustworthiness. The age is too intelligent to receive it any longer as the "Word of God," a claim set up by Luther and his coadjutors to compel its acceptance by the people to the prejudice of the Catholics who rejected it, because they knew how it was made.

Forgetful of Injuries.

Notwithstanding the terrible calamity inflicted on Galveston by act of God, the people seem disposed to accept it as merited punishment, and are now soliciting money to build new churches in place of those he destroyed.

The story of the Dutchman who was asked for money to buy a lightning-rod for a church, always comes up: "If God Almighty wants to thunder down his own house let him do so, I won't give a cent to prevent him." Having wantonly demolished his churches down there in Texas does he deserve others in their place? If insisted on why not let him take the advice of that other Dutchman, and sell some of the fat cattle on a thousand hills, which the psalmist says is his, and reimburse his wasted exchequer from that source?

Learn from Every Friend and Every Foe.

An English journal discoursing on "The Heathen Chinee," sets out with the sage proposition that it is unjust to suppose a man is an idiot because he has a yellow skin. It reports an interview between a representative of the Daily Chronicle and the Chinese Minister to England, Sir Lo Feng Luh, wherein the Earl, is reported among other things to have said:

"The Boxer movement is really a fusion of many secret societies incited to common action by the excesses of missionary zeal. The Chinese are not savages. They are possessed of a philosophy which inspired Comte, and which is Positivism. Men of culture are not sent to China as missionaries, but pastors whose zeal outstrips their judgment.

"The converts are recruited from the lowest strata of the Chinese millions. They are subsidized to the extent of three dollars per month, and their avarice is fostered by the missionaries interfering in the contemptible squabbles between the convert and the non-convert, and encouraging law-suits, which generally do not result unfavorably for the convert, thanks to the influence of the missionary."

The Earl said the national pride was outraged by the sending girls of nineteen to teach religious dogmas to men and women of advanced years. "And you offer premiums to crime by sending them to places far from the coast where foreigners are unknown."

But this did not conclude all of Minister Lo Feng Luh's grievances:

"Take the Chinese translation of the Bible: Every nation prides itself upon its sacred literature. Please note, literature, whatever lesson it teaches, it is a work of art. The educated Chinese are of an enquiring turn of mind. They turn to your Bible to realize Western manners and modes of thought. They are shocked at its graceless composition and inelegant phraseology."

This shows that the objections made to the Bible by independent thinkers have a foundation in fact. If the book was for the first time placed in the hands of cultured Americans it would be pronounced obscene, and be hid away from youth, or burned to prevent their corruption. But it was thrust on the world in a corrupt age, as an inspired production. It is rarely read, save familiar chapters, and is unknown save by youth who become familiar with its wickedness, and call the attention of their associates to it.

The Chinese Minister has made a point which Western peoples should think about. Time and again The Progressive Thinker has insisted that public morals are lowered by familiarity with that book. The Chinese Minister confirms that view. Separated from the corruption there are many good things in the Bible; but woe to the youth who seeks them obscured by and mingled with so much that is really vile.

We hope, too, missionary societies will give careful consideration to all the points made by the Chinese Minister. It has been repeated very often that it was the lowest class of the people of the countries visited by missionaries, who were converted to Christianity, and that the converts became such because of the pecuniary reward they receive, and that their fidelity to the new faith is contingent on prompt payments; that in the absence of rewards there are no converts. If this statement is true it is hypocrites the missionaries are making, persons who adopt a new religion merely because it pays to be a Christian. There are enough of that class among us without going abroad to multiply the species, and their production should be discouraged.

Belated Journalism.

The Youth's Companion recently published Napoleon's opinion on the Nazarene. It would seem an opinion from a higher authority than a military expert, who has a very limited acquaintance with theology, would be far more valuable. Like many other inadequately informed persons (he) Napoleon ignored the fact that Christ simply re-affirmed the Jewish law. He said he came to call sinners, not the righteous, to repentance. If the Youth's Companion desired to do the cause of religion service it should cite more authority. The fact that the Nazarene failed to re-affirm the teachings of Buddha, and instead of prohibiting the use of intoxicants turned water into wine, was a very grave mistake. Even this republic, foremost of all the nations, wastes annually $100,000,000 on intoxicating beverages, and the ruin and wreckage is terrible caused by intoxicants. 450,000,000 Buddhists and 180,000,000 Mohammedans obey the injunctions of their religion and are abstainers. The grandest prophet of all the ages, Buddha, some five hundred years before the Nazarene turned water into wine, prohibited the use of intoxicants. Thus if the youth of this Republic ask whose example shall they follow, shall we not direct them to the teachings of Buddha, which include the commandments? Buddha, so the divine story states, was entitled to enter heaven but put his merited reward aside and resolved to remain without to labor and teach so that every child of earth should enter Heaven before himself. Life of that great sage reminds us "We can make our lives sublime."

Conflict of Authority.

Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.—Lord God—Exodus 22:18.

Human courts, disregarding the command of Omnipotence, sometimes punish men for executing his will. The United States District Court of New Mexico has done this, and only last week convicted Mendo Rodriguez of murder, for killing Maria Duran, at Cimarron, N. M., he alleging the old woman had bewitched him. Rodrigues quietly slipped into Anna's house one night in April last, with Lord God's direction, as revealed in his Holy Word, for authority, and simply executed her by splitting her head open with an ax. And now earthly courts outrage the decrees of high heaven by calling that execution a murder, and propose to punish the culprit for its perpetration. How times change! The killing would have been a meritorious act 200 years ago.

Turned Stoker.

Rev. John D. Vinton, of Cleveland, changed from the Methodist to the Presbyterian church and cried when he did it.—News item.

There was reason for grief. The dominie doubtless saw in imagination hell filled with non-elect infants, and grieved because of their fate. Instead of copying Rev. Hillis' example, and shaking his fist in the face of Omnipotence, he became a stoker in his service, and aids in intensifying the heated torture those innocent babies' experience.

Defends Chinese Religions.

The London Daily News has published a letter from Ivan Chen, secretary of Sir Chih Chen Lo Feng Luh, the Chinese Minister to England, in reply to a former article by Julian Ralph, in which Ivan Chen defends the Chinese faith against Mr. Ralph's attack.

In defense of the little forts, "only three feet long and three or four inches high," lined with "beer bottles," to ward off bad spirits, Ivan Chen compares them to the expensive churches and edifices of the Christians, and asserts that they are entirely as effective and far less costly than those of the Christians.

After declaring that so long as the missionaries taught sciences and arts the Chinese did not object, but when they proposed to tear down established institutions they did wrong. He says:

"Suppose a Chinese priest should come to England, and it should be known that every burglar, pickpocket, and thief, by becoming a Buddhist, would become exempt from arrest by the police. Suppose that the introduction of a new faith into England should give the criminal classes license to ply their trade in London with complete immunity from the action of the laws. Would the English people submit to such a state of affairs? And what is true of the English is true of all other nations. Why, then, should we Chinese be an exception to the rule?

"Our civilization is the oldest in the world; it enables more men to live on a square mile of ground in comfort than any other civilization ever evolved. Before the missionaries visited our country there was much less crime in proportion to the population than even in Protestant Prussia, which is regarded as the most moral of European countries.

"Our kind of civilization may differ from that of Europe, but it suits us better. We do not care to throw it over unless something better can be produced—something really better when viewed from our own standpoint. Certainly our religious beliefs are quite as reasonable and respectable as those of other nations, and if age should be considered as one of the factors of respectability, our systems must be infinitely more respectable than the new faiths, some of which are only about 300 or 400 years old.

"Confucius taught that we should do to others as we would have them do unto us, and I believe this has been introduced into the Christian religion, and is generally known as 'The Golden Rule.' Certainly, the English would not like to have us interfere with any of their many religions or institutions. If we should force our priests upon England we would be doing to the English what we would not like them to do unto us. Conversely, the English, in forcing their priests upon us, are doing unto us what they would not like to have others do unto them. Consequently, they are not only breaking one of the fundamental principles of their own faith, but of our faith also.

"It will be quite impossible to have peace in China so long as foreign missionaries are allowed to interfere with the institutions of the country, and no government at Pekin can be strong enough to protect unpopular missionaries throughout so vast an empire. We may not be able to keep these missionaries out of China, because we are not a fighting nation. Anything will be better than the missionaries.

"Peace, prosperity, and healthy commerce will be impossible until the missionary shall have been eliminated from our local problem. Recall the missionaries and all will go well."

A CARD

From the N. S. A. Secretary.

My present duty to the public, Mr. Editor, is to announce through the medium of your valuable paper, that as the time allotted for the completion of the Mayer fund has expired, and as the required sum still lacks several hundred dollars, Mr. Mayer has authorized me to say that he will give till the convention at Cleveland, and trusts that before then the Spiritualists of America will see that the fund is filled, that we can go into convention, with the assurance that the N. S. A. is well sustained and fortified in its good work—not only by the sympathy of the public, but with a home and a substantial fund as well. Mr. Mayer states that he thinks he has now given ample time for the collection of a fund from the thousands of Spiritualists all over the land, as it is thirteen months since he made his first call, and offered to give the home to the association, and therefore, he feels it will be useless to extend the time again, if the friends do not respond to this call, and fill the fund in a few days. I trust that the good people who are in sympathy with our cause, and its work, who have not as yet donated to the Mayer fund, will now send their contributions to this office, and have the satisfaction of feeling they have done their best to show the world that Spiritualism can have its homes and institutions for good work as well as any other religion or movement can. Will be pleased to acknowledge any sum that may reach this office.

A Philosopher's View.

Prof. Goldwin Smith, of Toronto, recently wrote:

"These are troublous times. The trouble is everywhere; in politics, in the social system, in religion. The fundamental beliefs on which our social system has partly rested are giving way. To replace them before the edifice falls, and at the same time to gain such knowledge as may be attainable of man's estate and destiny, thought must be entirely free."

MAKING ATHEISTS.

"The Destruction of Galveston Was a Just Punishment Upon That Wicked City."

The above quotation is the statement of a large number of ministers and church adherents all over the land, and it is supplemented by a detailed account of the "surf bathings on Sundays," the "ball-playings," and other amusements that were wont to be carried on within the city's limits, and the advertising by the Galveston papers of all those places of pleasure, calling crowds to the enjoyment of those wicked resorts. The Beach called hundreds from the house of God. Even church members wended their way to this Mecca of sin and Sabbath breakers. Not only were the morals of the city wrecked and ruined by her citizens, but the railways centering there lent every endeavor toward bringing men and women from the North, the South, the East, and the West, where a straight road to their downfall was the first thing they were shown. Everything that could be devised was to be found in the list for attractive Sabbath-breaking. All this disobeying of God's laws gave him just displeasure, and hence his vengeance was wreaked upon the inhabitants of that sin-cursed city, and God's justice is thus vindicated."

A page of this fanatical, bigoted, sacrilegious profaning of the sacredness of the attributes of the Supreme Being could be given our readers.

Is it possible that God is wreaking his vengeance by punishing the innocent and allowing such numbers of the guilty to escape? Why were not the brothels, the saloons, and other wicked places swept into the sea with "The Beach?" Why were the houses dedicated to his worship not left intact? Why were pure, noble, true Christian men and women mangled, torn and bleeding, swept into eternity to "vindicate his justice," while that "vengeance" left unharmed such inhuman monsters as those who cut from the dead bodies of those same Christian men and women their ears and fingers to obtain the jewels? Our readers may ask any number of reasons. They might ask, if because God has removed a part of Galveston on account of that city's wickedness, why did he not remove the wicked portion and let the good remain? Why did he, in the St. Louis storm, as in all others, allow the lowest, vilest and wickedest places in the city to remain unharmed, and their inmates allowed to continue their hellishness, while spending his wrath on churches, asylums and business houses, and dealing death to loving, innocent, harmless children?

If this be God thus wreaking his "vengeance," he must be "hand in glove" with Satan, keeping all these sinks of hell intact and ready for the unbroken use of the latter's minions.

Out upon such terrible profanity. It is the strangest thing in the world that many "believing Christians" so far forget the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer, and every one of the teachings of Christ, as to charge the Great Creator with descending to such petty acts of meanness in order to "wreak vengeance" on a portion of the people, when at the same time he is filling the land with mourning by his wholesale slaughter of thousands of innocent people, and placing untold hardships on thousands and thousands of others.

Such twaddle about the actions of God in the case of disaster, this nonsense concerning such a devilish attribute as "vindictiveness" in connection with the action of any of his laws, is what makes atheists of thousands of men and women whose reason leads them to conclude that it is better to have no God at all than such an unsatiably vindictive monster.

No. God's laws are just and perfect—every one. And it is true that Galveston's terrible calamity was brought upon her people because of a violation of law. While not a moral nor a spiritual law, it is one of physics as applied to the forces and causes that produce these destroying storms.

This terrific storm for Galveston has long been foretold; and by many of her residents, even, a storm of terrible destructive power has been expected, because of the known laws that govern the courses of the wind. The site of the city is in the direct pathway of the heavy gales that originate in the equatorial belt and leaving the Carribean Sea dash with relentless fury on everything in their course. The action of these storms can be prevented by changing its course. But here we are met by some poor fellow who possibly ate green apples during a big meeting and honestly mistook the bellyache for religion, with a denunciation of "God's wrath" if such a change of the storm's course be attempted.

Well, when winter's storms and freezing blasts close around us we mitigate their severity by using our knowledge of the laws that govern the action of heat (for it is all heat, the different degrees of temperature simply showing a greater or less positive or negative condition). Lulled to quietude by the deflection of the storms of the past few years to a more westerly direction, caused by the varying atmospheric conditions, the citizens have neglected to avail themselves of their knowledge, and have simply reaped the punishment for this neglect.

Texas' City of Beauty by the Sea will not be given up, nor will any portion of her commercial greatness be diminished, but the laws that have been left so long to blind control of the wind and the wave will be investigated and immediate steps taken to provide for the future protection of the city.

Chicago has advanced with prodigious strides since her great conflagration. Just so shall Galveston, with gigantic steps, move to the front as the Great City of the Southwest.

In conclusion: Let us strive to better understand the laws that govern every department of life—not alone the physical, but the mental, moral and spiritual, feebly endeavoring to attain to the latter, for in that realm we shall better learn more of the laws that govern in the others. Let us do right because it is right to do so—without regard to the reward; "let us rejoice and be exceeding glad" that we live, and let us try to make of life that happy School of Preparation for the Future that Supreme Wisdom intended we should. Let us not make our neighbors and friends miserable and unhappy, but let us look at the beautiful brightness that has come to each of us all through life. Above all else let us have such a grand conception of that Intelligence who in wisdom guides the universe, that we can have no thought of him but that his goodness is too great, his love too boundless, his justice and mercy too thoroughly blended, for him to needlessly afflict his children.

THE NEW PLAN OF CHILD CULTURE

Whereby They Can Be Spiritualized and Mentally Improved.

The Exorbitant Charges Made to Teach One the Mysteries of Hypnotism.

The Progressive Thinker Comes to the Front and Mentions the Literature on the Subject.

PROF. LETSCHE SAYS HE HAS SUCCEEDED WITH HYPNOTISM—CALLS IT MOST HUMANE—SAYS AS A HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN THAT HYPNOSIS IS WITHOUT A RIVAL.

The remarkable demonstration made by Prof. Letsche, of Jersey City, recently before some of the leading officials of that municipality has attracted such world-wide attention that we present to our readers this week a signed article by the latest conspicuous demonstrator of the mysterious science which has recently come so remarkably to the front. Prof. Letsche assumes no mystery in the matter and does not surround himself with any of the theatrical glare of the Delphic cave, but says that all parents should familiarize themselves with the science as it would be of the greatest service to humanity to have it generally understood.

Jersey City, September 20.—Having come to prominence recently, on account of having my children vaccinated under the influence of hypnosis for the mere purpose of saving them pain, and being certain that the lymph would do its work successfully in both instances, you asked me to write a short treatise on hypnotism. For the sake of science and to convert thousands of skeptics who are afraid of touching this treatment I freely respond to your request.

Instead of being afraid of hypnotism everybody should study the science. Fathers and mothers should be practical operators and teach hypnotism to their children; teachers should know it; it is indispensable for doctors, dentists and nurses, if they would proctice hypnotism, they would not ruin thousands of persons every year with morphine, cocaine, chloroform and other poisons. The lawyer, clergyman, and other business men ought to be familiar with its mysteries in order to be successful.

However, I will confine myself to the use of hypnotism in the family circle. As hypnotism takes the place of opiates it should be applied and practiced in every household, as hypnosis will not and does not leave any bad effects on the human system like the above mentioned poisons, while the coveted rest, and the relief from pain are so thorough that one wonders how it is there are people afraid of its subtle influence.

As an educator hypnosis is bearing fruit and the desired result is gained without any apparent effort on the part of the child. Its memory is getting strengthened, the nerves are getting strong and steady, disease, bashfulness, nerovusness, etc., are banished from the system of the child, and it ripens to manhood and womanhood far more easily than its playmate who has not the advantage of being treated physically and mentally by the powerful influence of hypnotic suggestions.

Parents can scold their children, yell at them, whip them, cuff them, despise them, etc.; yet with all these kinds of punishments the child does not improve. It is getting dull, it learns to hate its father and mother on account of their cruelty, but, please, parents, stop your punishments, learn the science of hypnotism, you will save time and anger, for if you are acquainted with hypnotism it takes you less than half a minute to have your child in the deepest trance. You speak to its subconscious mind or to its subliminal self, show it how vulgar it is to be naughty, point out the way it should be, and as the clock strikes twelve your child, unconsciously, will do what you suggested, and will form a different habit. "Well," says some critic, "you can't put your child to sleep so often or it will ruin its nervous system," but, allow me to say you need to treat your children more than once a day. Again, there is no such thing as a nervous disorder in children or adults resulting from being put under hypnosis. Moreover a six months babe could not suffer from oversleeping as it normally sleeps about 16 hours out of the 24. Every time you put your children under hypnosis and give them the proper suggestions they will feel better after it and thoroughly rested.

As a household physician hypnosis stands without a rival. How many ills is a child heir to! Every little while it is indisposed. Summer complaint, scarlet fever, functional derangement and a host of other ills. The little one hurts itself by a fall or in play. Often mother suggests that the child have a doctor and he has to come. Mamma says my child is sick, yet the doctor knows that it is really mamma who needs a nerve tonic, but he was not called in to give mamma a tonic, only to give the child some poisonous drug to make it sleep or to kill the pain, never thinking that by killing the pain by poisonous drugs the child will also be killed; and before that child reaches maturity it is a dyspeptic or has some other chronic ailment. Now why not leave the doctor in the shade of his office, enjoying himself at his case full of poisons, and you yourself be your child's own doctor, using hypnosis and suggestion, which are more effective than all the drugs on the market, while the child is getting cured instead of ruined.

Of course I am a professional hypnotist, having adopted this science as a means of earning a livelihood, and perhaps there are some who will say that I uphold hypnotism from a financial standpoint, yet allow me to say that I urge every father and mother to learn it, and I do not expect to teach everybody who might happen to read this, but all the same I say: "For humanity's sake, fathers and mothers, become practical hypnotists. It will be money saved for you; your children will thank you in later years. Get instructions from some practical operator and you never will feel sorry for it. By using hypnosis while your offspring is in childhood you can define its destiny, mold its character and be its guiding angel. It is far easier to prevent a child from falling into vice and bad habits than to reform it and cure it.

JOHN M. LETSCHE.

The above gives a bird's eye view, as it were, of the wonderful results that will flow from a proper use of hypnotism in "child culture." The articles we have heretofore published on the same subject contain a great deal of valuable information, which should have been carefully treasured by every reader. Hypnotism should never be practiced for "the fun it may impart," but to promote health, to alleviate pain, to change the current of evil thoughts and intentions, and to create high and noble aspirations. Such a prominent factor has hypnotism become in the world to-day, that "schools" here, there, and everywhere almost have arisen which teach its mysteries, its methods, etc., for an exorbitant price. Dr. W. X. Sudduth, a reputable physician of this city, charged Lutellus Smith $100 for imparting instruction in Hypnotism. According to the Chicago Chronicle, Dr. Sudduth had promised Mr. Smith that by receiving instruction from him, he, Smith, could cure his epileptic son. He failed, however, to do it, and Dr. Sudduth sued him for $100. The jury, however, before whom the case was tried, refused to order payment to Dr. Sudduth. Such an exorbitant charge for teaching hypnotism is not in harmony with humanitarian work. As well pay a hundred dollars for teaching the alphabet or multiplication table to one who wishes to learn the rudiments of knowledge. In order to protect our own subscribers from those who are making exorbitant charges for teaching hypnotism indifferently, we have grouped together all the really valuable books on the subject. These books will teach you all about hypnotism, and if you study them carefully, you can be instrumental in doing a great deal of good in the world.

1. Hypnotism in Mental and Moral Culture. By John Duncan Quackenbos, Fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, Member of the New York Academy of Sciences, Fellow of the New Hampshire Medical Society, Member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Bear in mind, please, that this book treats of Hypnotism in Mental and Moral Culture. It should be in every family. Price. $1.25.

2. Hypnotism, a Complete System of Method, Application and Use, including all that is known in the art and practice of mesmerism and mental healing, prepared for the self-instruction of beginners, as well as for the use of advanced students and practitioners. By L. W. D. Laurence. A good work for anyone to read. Price $1. Paper, 50 cents.

3. Hypnotism, by Albert Moll. The author says: "Various recent researches in the field of hypnotism have rendered it necessary to remodel in part the earlier edition of the work. I have brought the history of hypnotism down to the present, and have throughout, I trust, presented the subject in its present state. In accordance with a wish which has been expressed by many, I have especially developed a chapter on the medical aspects of Hypnotism." This is a work of over 400 pages, and is certainly very valuable. Price $1.50.

4. Hypnotism, by Dr. Foveau De Courmelles. Translated by Laura Ensor. Illustrated with 42 vignettes. This is a translation from the French, and is full of valuable suggestions that will enrich the mind of the student. Price $1.50.

5. Hypnotism, How It Is Done; Its Uses and Dangers. By James R. Cocke, M. D. Dr. Cocke has hypnotized altogether about one thousand, three hundred and fifty people. The greater part of these were Americans, some negroes, quite a number of French, a few Germans, and a few of the Northern races, such as Danes, Russians, etc. It has been his purpose to illustrate the differences in the hypnotic state as they occur in the various nationalities, and in that respect the work is very valuable. Price $1.50.

Hypnotism—Its History and Present Development. By Fredrik Bjornstrom, M. D., Head Physician of the Stockholm Hospital. This being a Swedish production, it will fit into your library very nicely, though you have all the other works on Hypnotism. Price 75 cents.

7. The Theory and Practice of Human Magnetism. Translated from the French of H. Durville. The preface by the publishers is as follows: "In these days when Magnetic Healers of positive and negative ability are inflicting their courses of instructions upon the public at prices ranging from $5 to $100, courses of instructions which are neither more nor less than 'rot' from cover to cover, there is a real need for a popular work bearing upon the subject of Magnetic Healing in all its branches, from the hand of one who is at least a scholar and a master of his profession." Price $1.00.

8. Hypnotism, Its Facts, Theories and Related Phenomena. Illustrated with numerous original engravings. By Carl Sextus. This work is replete with valuable suggestions, and will be found of great utility by every student of the hypnotic phenomena. A single chapter will be found worth the price of the book, which is $2.00.

9. Mind and Body, Hypnotism and Suggestion Applied in Therapeutics and Education. By Alvan C. Halphide, M. D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Hahnemann Medical College. Illustrated. This work treats of the Antecedents of Hypnotism; the Development of Hypnotism; the Methods of Hypnotizing; the Phenomena of Hypnosis; the Theory of Suggestion; Suggestion in the Waking State; Treatment in Natural Sleep; Clinical Hypnotism; Suggestion and Education; Danger in the use of Suggestion; Criminal Suggestion. Really, the work is very valuable. Price $1.00.

10. The Rationale of Mesmerism, by A. P. Sinnett. This work, too, is worthy of great praise as it contains the results of the labors of a master mind. It treats of Old and New Theories; the Mesmeric Force; the Real Literature of Mesmerism; Side Lights on Mesmeric Phenomena; Curative Mesmerism; Anesthetic Effects and Rigidity; the Nature of Sensitiveness; Clairvoyance and Mesmeric Practice. Price $1.25.

11. Now we present a work of marvelous utility, one that should be carefully studied. It contains a mine of valuable information. Its title is as follows: Treatment by Hypnotism and Suggestion; or Psycho Therapeutics. By C. Lloyd Tuckey, M. D. In this work, the new method, "Treatment by Suggestion," is exhaustively considered. Every branch of the subject is discussed in a masterly manner. Every healer should have it. Every physician will find it invaluable. Every one who wishes to become proficient in hypnotism will find it a valuable auxiliary in the work. Price $3.00.

12. Mental Suggestion, by Dr. J. Ochorowicz, Professor of Psychology and Nature Philosophy in the University of Lemberg. Translated from the French. The ablest work, probably, ever published in France on the above subject. It is certainly very valuable, and no one can read it without having his knowledge vastly increased. The author says: "Hypnotism is henceforth part and parcel of Science, and Suggestion, which produces most of its wonders, no longer surprises us." Price $2.

13. An Experimental Study in the Domain of Hypnotism. By Dr. R. von Kraft-Ebing, Professor of Psychiatry and Nervous Diseases in the Royal University of Graz, Austria. Translated from the German. This book gives the best German thought on Hypnotism. It will prove valuable in every library. Price $1.25.

If you wish to have a complete library on Hypnotism and kindred subjects, purchase the thirteen books above mentioned. Indeed a single one of the volumes above named will prove of great value to every reflective mind. For sale at this office.

BELIEVING--DOING.

As Portrayed by the Editor of the New York Herald.

"If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God."—St.-John, vii., 17.

A practical mechanic once submitted the plans of a new invention to an expert for criticism. After a very careful survey of the matter my friend the expert asked, "Have you made a model?" and the answer was, unhappily, "No." "Then," said my wise friend, "I can give no decided opinion. So far as your theory goes it seems clear and logical, but it is only a theory. Neither you nor any one else can estimate the value of your new idea until you embody it in wood and metal. That is the crucial test. If your machine can do good work then your fortune is made. The promise of your plan is well enough, but what I want to know is whether your machine can make good the prophecy of your theory."

That is the rule in religion as well as in mechanics. Your theory of life may sound well to the ear, but I cannot tell what it is worth until you show how it will work in your daily experience. If it fails there it fails everywhere. If it produces a noble and well developed character, if it stands by you like an invisible giant, lending you a helping hand in times of emergency, then I will not only consider it, but will adopt it for myself. I want to know how it will work, what it can do, before I make it my own. In other words, I don't care much for your theology or for your professions of faith, but if you are living happily and generously, and when troubles and sorrows come you can meet them serenely and courageously, then you furnish me with an argument which is irresistible. You have put your ore in the melting pot, and when you draw it off I see at once whether it is lead or iron or gold.

The Christian religion must stand this test, and we must judge it by the results which are produced. Your arguments are nothing more than perfumed air, your eloquence is only a refreshing breeze in August, but I am not convinced until I see a life which is ordered by this religion, and then I have nothing further to say. You may talk to me about the law of gravitation and I may have my doubts, but when you throw a stone into the air and I see with my own eyes that it always comes back to the earth I have a demonstration of the law and can predict that if I do the same thing the same result will follow.

Religion is positively good for nothing as long as it remains a theory. You must take it into your heart, just as you put a seed into the ground. When the seed throws up its shoots and you can judge whether it is a thistle or a rose you know what you can always depend on when you plant that kind of a seed. Your belief concerning Christ has very little influence on your life; it is simply your creed. For that matter, you may believe everything that is good about him and yet live millions of miles away—so far, indeed, that not a ray of his light penetrates your darkness. But if you follow his example, make his precepts the basis of your action, then you know with perfect certainty whether he has told you the truth. No one can ever appreciate Christianity until he lives it. The world has not yet lived it, and therefore knows very little about it.

Let me illustrate. The earth is full of pain, struggle with circumstance, bereavement and misunderstanding of the purpose for which we are here. It is the misunderstanding which is the cause of nine-tenths of the misery and discouragement which exist. If I could make you believe as firmly as you believe in the compass which guides the steamer from shore to shore that God wants you to be healthy in body and whole in soul, and that you can be both when you and he walk together, I should produce a change in your whole outlook that would seem like magic.

If I could come to you when your dear one is closing her eyes for the last time and convince you beyond the possibility of a doubt, as you have been convinced that a stone thrown into the air will fall to earth, that the loved one is simply going into another room, and that the love which binds you to her will be untouched by death, your eyes might be filled with tears, but behind them would be the strong consciousness that death imposes a loss on you while it confers a benefit on her.

That kind of faith this great world does not yet possess, and therefore a tinge of despair mingles with every hope, just a tinge, but enough to blur the hope. What we need, therefore, is less theology, less theory, and more practice. To say that we are Christians is not always equivalent to being Christians. When Christ really rules your passions, ambitions and energies you will be surprised at yourself and at your possibilities. You will have the strength of the ocean and its peaceful omnipotence when it is calm. Life will be a discipline to which you will gladly submit, and heaven will be such a reality that you will die with a smile, as though you appreciated the welcome which awaits you.

GEORGE H. HEPWORTH.

GROWING OLD.

A little more gray in the lessening hair
Each day as the years go by;
A little more stooping of the form,
A little more dim the eye;
A little more faltering of the step
As we tread life's pathway o'er,
But a little nearer every day
To the ones who have gone before.

A little more halting of the gait,
And a dullness of the ear;
A growing weariness of the frame
With each swift passing year.
A fading of hopes and ambitions, too,
A faltering in life's quest;
But a little nearer every day
To a sweet and peaceful rest.

A little more loneliness in life
As the dear ones pass away;
A bigger claim on the heavenly land
With every passing day.
A little further from toil and care,
A little less way to roam;
A drawing near to a peaceful voyage
And a happy welcome home.

POINTED FACTS

Touching Upon the Ever Aggressive Catholic Church.

THE INVITATION HEEDED.

The Catholic church is to be congratulated on having such an able philosopher as James Kent Stone. He has defended Christian theology as ably as any priest well could, and in all probability is sincere.

To go over this work thoroughly would require the writing of a volume three times the size of "The Invitation Heeded." This is from the fact that analysis, when legitimately conducted, must take up each point, though it may be stated in only a few words, and go over it extensively till each phase of the problem is exhausted; such a process might cover pages, whereas the original proposition might have been stated in a dozen words; thus every book from "Mother Goose's Melodies" to Herbert Spencer's "First Principles," if thoroughly analyzed, would each require far larger volumes than the original; this statement will therefore scarcely bear the dignity of an "analysis," time forbidding me the opportunity of replying extensively, but may more correctly be termed a statement of main points.

Point One: Great stress is laid on the antiquity of the church. There are other institutions which are standing today and are thousands of years older than Catholicism. The Rig-Vedas (the Brahman bible) was written when the Israelites were a wandering tribe of untamed savages on the rugged hills of Palestine, without knowledge of the phonetic methods of writing which was used in the most ancient biblical manuscript we have any proof of.

Says Dr. Samuel Johnson: "They (the Rig-Vedas) were old at the earliest epoch to which we can trace them." All students of eastern literature acknowledge that India has the most ancient of all religions and all religious writings. When speaking of "students" here, we don't mean amateurs, but those who have made a life study of metaphysical philosophies. It is for this reason that such conflicts as witnessed in the Mivart case disturb the tranquility of theological institutions. Facts will upset theology till it is honey-combed. The following religions can all be proven from historical reference to be older than Catholicism: Zoroastrianism, the Confucian religion, Brahmanism, Buddhism and Judaism. All of these were old when Christianity was in its infancy. The claim is raised that Christianity had its origin centuries before the era Jesus of Nazareth was preaching in Galilee; this is correct. Let us see how.

John W. Draper, speaking of the fourth century before Jesus of Nazareth, says: "Immaculate conceptions and celestial descents were so currently received in those days that whosoever had greatly distinguished himself in the affairs of men was thought to be of supernatural lineage." He goes on to cite that Romulus, the founder of Rome, was faithfully believed to be the child of the God Mars and the virgin Rhea Sylvia, who had come in contact when the virgin was going, pitcher in hand, to a spring for water. Again I quote from that eminent scientist and historian Draper: "The Egyptian disciples of Plato would have looked with anger on those who rejected the legend that Perictione, the mother of the great philosopher, a pure virgin, had suffered an immaculate conception through the influence of Apollo, and that the God had declared to Ariston, to whom she was betrothed, the parentage of the child."

Alexander was another. He claimed the sonship of the God Jupiter Ammon. Many another could be named, but they are useless as the fact stands historically proven that the belief in immaculate conceptions was very common hundreds of years before and many years after Jesus of Nazareth, hence the ease with which Christians can point to seeming symptoms of Christianity in pre-Christian times. So the argument of antiquity as a reason for embracing Catholicism and as a salvation from all sinfulness will not stand.

Point Two: "Rome has never erred." With this we cannot agree. Authorizing the Inquisition was one of the errors of Rome. James Kent Stone, in the "Invitation Heeded," while answering the charge of persecution against the Catholic church, says of the Inquisition: "It was authorized, it is true, by the Pope." Marie Corelli, a Catholic author of remarkable ability, speaks to Cardinal Vaughan with courage worthy of great praise. The occasion was a letter in defense of St. George Mivart, the Catholic scientist of England. Let this lady author speak: "My Lord Cardinal, in days gone by there was an institution approved by the Church of Rome, called the Inquisition. The Holy Fathers, Popes Honorius, Gregory, and Innocent, representatives of the love and mercy of Christ to sinful mankind, instituted the Holy Office—a society which had as much holiness about it as they, the self-styled Fathers, had the spirit of fatherhood. The adventurous could be secretly accused of heresy by any person or persons—the names of such denouncers never being divulged. The heretic was bound on the rack, and sinew torn from sinew, nerve from nerve, limb from limb, in the name of the gentle Redeemer and the Church of Rome. Eight thousand,, eight hundred persons were burned alive by Torquemada to prove his faithful obedience to the command, "Love one another." We do not forget that this hellish society was only put an end to in Spain as lately as 1835."

We will not quote the remainder here, but let it suffice to remark that Marie Corelli is more severe than we have ever been in our most profound moments of iconoclasm. The above quotations are enough to prove that "Rome" has erred, coming as they do from avowed Catholics, one of them an acknowledged authority on Catholic history, the other an author of no mean ability, and a devout lover of her religion. Rome may have clung to its original creed but such mistakes as the Inquisition have thrown her into one error after another until the principles laid down by the simple founder of Christianity have been riddled into an unrecognizable mass. Corelli finely expresses it when she says: "We are told not to pray in public that we may be seen of men." We are told not to "use vain repetitions as the heathen do, for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking. How can we fit these plain words in with the endless litanies of the church?"

So much for Corelli. "Rome" in tolerating the iniquities of the past has done the same, possibly, that most of the Christian Protestant churches would have done if they (any one of them) could have come into existence at the same time and under the same circumstances.

Point Three: The Confessional. The virtue of this part of the church system depends on the purity of the priest and honesty of the communicant; a deviation on the part of either one makes the Confessional an instrument for evil instead of good. One of the strongest arguments against it is that it renders the confessor too dependent, the human race needs a greater independent virtue so that it may face sensual persuasion without yielding and keep on its course of purity, industry and progress, this will be dependent on the equal unfoldment of man spiritually, intellectually and physically.

Point Four: As to miracles, it is charged that the Protestant church does not have them. Granted it does not. Webster's Dictionary defines the word thus: "Miracle—A supernatural event." There can be no supernatural event. I make bold to say that every kind of phenomena that has been brought under the searching scrutiny of scientific methods has been proven to be governed by clearly defined laws. The so-called miracles of the Bible are all referable to the class "Psychic phenomena;" these are discovered to be regulated by certain laws; at present we comprehend part of the laws only; the undiscovered ones are gradually being brought to light. With each discovery the former miracle melts away, and it comes to be a demonstrated fact, a natural fact, if you please, governed by involuntary law, which is all that is necessary to demonstrate anything natural.

The Protestant church has been woefully slow in recognizing spiritual visitations in these modern times. Most of them have become incrusted in the manifestations of other ages. In that respect they look backward, worshiping the past as truly as the Celestials are said to do. It is such doctrine as this that makes Materialists; they look to a past darkened with ignorance, clouded by the most bigoted cruelty for their inspiration, infallible word and guide to the future. There are some notable exceptions in individuals and certain Protestant churches, as follows: Swedenborgians, Latter-Day Saints (Joseph Smith faction), Latter-Day Saints (Brigham Young faction). The Spiritualist is ruled out as not Christian, though he may believe as he chooses on the Bible if he does not reject the possibility of communication with those who have departed from their physical bodies and live in the world of souls, that boundless realm which offers infinitely more opportunity for spiritual and intellectual unfoldment than the physical plane does. The great danger lies in making a fetich of Spiritualism, as the Hebrews did in the days of Moses, if that individual ever lived.

Point Five: The one central thing against "Christian" theology is that the immaculate conception is an impossibility. If the all-wise Spirit was capable of deviating from the set laws of his being he would not do so foolish a thing as to produce a phenomenon which he does not intend to repeat, especially when reason rejects it at every turn. Reason is God-given as surely as anything else, and is our only guide in life. We must use this faculty or be smitten to earth; even in following the advice of others it comes into play. Are we not aware that in studying the Bible we must reason? Yes, indeed. If it were not for reason we could not understand the message of any gospel, foreign or domestic; thus both comprehension and settlement of all religious problems depend upon the greatest of all blessings, the possession of a rational mind. When one comes to settle a question so assumedly vital it should rest upon something more tangible than the traditions of a people in a barbarous or semi-barbarous condition. The Old Testament times found the supposed authors of the so-called prophetic books under environments, both physical and intellectual, that precluded production of such thoughtful passages as we find in Proverbs, or poetic expression as the Psalms contain. The sensuality of David and the many beautiful thoughts of the Psalms do not walk hand in hand. In this manner the entire Bible and "Christian" theology is analyzed by reason, and condemned, because found wanting. After this entire analysis there is much trash thrown out; some few kernels are found that have fed the multitudes of the ages and have been the redeeming features of all religions.

The one thing that has saved the human race from a ceaseless tyranny of ecclesiastical despotism has been its tenacious grasp upon those first principles of moral conduct and human right which are intuitively felt by all civilized races. We may not feel all of these principles, but each one will feel at least a part of them. Dogmatic religious thought and action may cramp and restrict, but so strong is the sense of right in the human soul that no rational mind can be entirely devoid of a sense of right. In the face of schism, creed, dogma, discipline and pious wrangling between sects and individuals the human soul has clung to these principles, in profession if not practice: Love, charity, justice, pure-mindedness, courage, steadfastness, industry; all of these have been taught or professed in all religious institutions, though they have been but little, very little, practiced. Nevertheless, it is a fact that they have not been entirely crowded out. They have been the guardian angels inspiring the reformer on to his next step of liberty. Every time he has given way to these great spirits he has gained a little more of truth, that great elixir of life which is gradually curing the blindness of the million.

Did you ever stop to think what the spirit of truth is? Let me tell you: It is that condition of mind in which one is ready and willing to give up all former convictions if they are proven erroneous, and accept any other if it is demonstrated true. How many realize what this means? It means that all you may have taken in your choice of philosophies, be they religious or otherwise, must be foregone, if untrue; that you will endure persecution and hardship, misfortune and ridicule, and still pursue the object of your adoration—Truth. Many times the feet may slip, the path may be rugged, and the way strewn with obstructions. We may commit errors too numerous to tell; declare conclusions which after a time prove untrue, but with the torch of reason to illumine our way and the spirit of Truth to inspire our faltering minds, we ultimately arrive at a tranquillity of soul and body that gives assurance in the hour of danger, peace in the moment of trial. Under the tuition of this great teacher our spirit glows with the radiance of renewed life. We need no wafers or litanies, no formal confessions or prayers, no indulgences or post mortem masses to insure our safety in the future. They will be of no avail; the spirit of truth alone can save man—from what? The stygian darkness of ignorance, which is all that anyone has to be saved from.

Point Six: "The church is infallible; therefore the head of the church is infallible."

We have already gone over the infallibility of the church and demonstrated it fallible. Mr. Stone has already confessed that if the church is acknowledged to be fallible it would be worse than illogical to claim that the head of the church could be infallible. We may just as logically reverse it and say: "If the head of the church is fallible the church must also be fallible." The head of the church is considered its most important part, therefore if any failing appear in the head the body has a flaw, and where a flaw is found fallibility is found also. Naturally it follows that the fallible is not infallible, hence the church is not infallible. It has been repeatedly proven that popes have committed worse than errors.

This sufficiently sets out the arguments of "Invitation Heeded." It may be seen therefore that it is only the general argument used by Catholic theologians in vainly striving to prove their religion. The enlightenment of our present age is daily making it more difficult for an intelligent man to accept the superannuated vagaries of "Christian" teachings, and the Catholic is not excepted from this rule.

One hundred years ago, fifty years ago, twenty-five years ago, the literal translation was universally accepted by Christians as the proper light in which to read the Bible. To-day the prow of the theological ship is pointed in the same direction as modern science, but is still far in the rear. We need not be fearful of mistake in declaring that there is only one thing that can possibly save the creed of Catholicism from complete destruction; that thing is to shut out the knowledge that is taught in unsectarian colleges and is circulating through the public press and current literature. They must reject the best opinion and positive facts that have come forth as the rich fruitage of diligent study, sparkling in all the rainbow hue with which Mother Nature has painted the canopy of her great laboratory. Many an unruly student has set himself in defiance of the lessons that are being continually demonstrated therein, but with beaming smile she continues her sessions with no recesses, well knowing that though the truants may for a time hide away and avoid their lessons that it is only a question of a little experience till they will return, their heads hanging in shame, willing to confide themselves to the greatest of all teachers in both spiritual and material things, Nature. This will take generations, but ultimately it must be true that Catholics and all races alike will unswervingly turn to nature for the solution of their problems.

Let us say in conclusion that there are those in the Catholic priesthood and among the laity whose minds are bright, and capable of grasping the truth of the situation; of the integrity of the mass of them there can be no question; of the generosity and noble impulses of some of them we have absolute proof. A people such as this must as a result of their own natural ability evolve out of the stygian darkness of credulism. The force of the intelligence surrounding them has cut off the source of supply, and slowly but sure exact science and criticism are changing the entire religious aspect to a rational and truthful Spiritualism.

STOLEN BEAUTY.

"Yes, dears, your new hats are quite pretty,"
I answered my three sweetest girls,
Who questioned while pinning their treasures
Above their fair faces and curls.
"But which is the loveliest, auntie—
Be honest and tell us, please do—
Belle's hat with the bright bird upon it,
May's blossoms, my egrets so blue?"

"Were I a young man—spare those blushes—
A-seeking a sweetheart or bride,
Just judging your fair happy faces
I'm sure I could never decide;
But judging alone by your bonnets,
With never a glance underneath,
I'd choose for a wife, kind and gentle,
The one with the sweet blossom wreath.

"Because my dear children, the blossoms
Speak only of fields and blue skies,
Of spring and its innocent pleasures,
With which all true hearts sympathize;
While birds that should gladden the woodland,
Or egrets, that stir at a breath,
With all of their sad stolen beauty,
Speak only of suffering and death.

"The soft baby blanket of egrets
Is torn from a dead mother's breast,
'Tis then that the feathers are fairest,
Though little ones starve in the nest.
The hunter cares not for the crying
Of those he has orphaned for gold—
The pitiful cries of the nestlings
That perish of hunger and cold.

"The jewel-winged bird on your bonnet
Last summer was happy and free;
Was flashing across the blue heavens,
Or filling the tree-tops with glee.
He died in the midst of a love-song—
O, woman's soft heart, think of that!
He died never dreaming you wanted
His beautiful corpse for your hat.

"Each bird that is worn for adornment,
Each heaven-taught singer that dies
For vanity's sake, has two slayers—
The hunter, the woman who buys.
One kills and one pays for the murder;
Both equally guilty I hold;
Because the sad slaughter would slacken
If woman paid not with her gold.

"If earth should at last become birdless,
And spring lose its glory and song,
The worm and the locust bring famine,
On woman would fall the dark wrong."
"Enough," cried the dear, dainty maidens,
While pity their kind voices stirred;
"We'll nevermore wear for adornment
What cost the sweet life of some bird."

Keep the Gift Pure.

A portion of Franz Petersilea's letter No. Thirty-five should be carefully read, pondered over and thoroughly digested by every Spiritualist and conscientious medium. "When mediumship is not bartered for money it will be better for all." "Why should the divine gift of mediumship be sold for filthy lucre? Why not earn money in other ways, through regular business channels, and keep the divine gift pure, and unspotted from the world?" "Spirits never materialize that a so-called medium may receive a dollar for each visitor—never, never, dear friends! Spiritual beings very rarely materialize and when they do it is usually in private." The entire tenor of his letter is substantial food for deep thought.

Recently an acquaintance of mine was sitting on the front verandah alone—not a person in the whole house. Suddenly a rap was heard at the back door. When she opened it no one was in sight. It was repeated three times with the same result, after returning to her seat. Presently a large dog bounded across the yard in front of her, suddenly disappearing. She called it by name, thinking it was hers. Hastily entering the house, she there found her dog as she had left him, lying on the dining-room floor. Shortly afterwards some one called to inform her that a young lady friend had been accidentally killed. Surely the spirit of that girl was not identified with the dog's bounding over the yard. Who can explain?

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.

Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged. 12mo., Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. ..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt is engaged for October as speaker for the Unity Spiritual Society of Milwaukee. He may be addressed for other engagements at 498 West Madison street, Chicago.

W. W. Aber does not expect to remain in Spring Hill, Kansas, any later than December of this year, and he may leave earlier. The spirit friends are drawing their work to a close. Persons desirous of visiting these seances will please write him without delay. Address him Lock Box 20, Spring Hill, Kansas.

Albert Unsworth writes: "I am well pleased with the premium books. They are all interesting, and worth more than they cost me."

Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Brooks left their home October 5, for Pittsburg, Pa., where he has a two months' engagement, October and November, with the First Spiritualist Church. He will respond while there to calls for funerals. Send all letters and telegrams to No. 3 Sixth street, care of C. L. Stevens.

Professor Laborde, of the Academy of Medicine, Paris, and M. Auguste Mouchel have devised a little machine for restoring persons in a state of suspended animation to life by the method of "lingual traction," a method now used with great success in cases of drowning, lightning stroke, electric shock and suffocation. The tongue is drawn out rhythmically, so as to stimulate the breathing organs, and this method has been effective in cases given up as hopeless, but only after a very long application. The friction sometimes needs to be kept up for three hours before reanimation, and as the new machine is worked by an electric motor and quite automatic, it saves much laborious exertion, and can save life where the usual methods would fail.

Officials of the War department would not be surprised if they had trouble with the friars in the Philippines. Advices from the Philippines received at the department, say the secret service branch under General MacArthur is engaged in an investigation of certain rumors to the effect that the friars in the islands have been circulating proclamations, signed by the socalled revolutionary government, advising Filipinos not to accept the amnesty extended by the government.

Rev. L. A. Mabee, for many years an ordained minister of the Gospel, and Laura B. Payne, the sweet singer and fine lecturer, will hold a series of meetings at River Side Park, Neosho Falls, Kansas, beginning the first Sunday in October. At 2:30 in the afternoon of October 7, Mrs. Laura B. Payne will deliver the opening address. At the meeting on that eveing Rev. Mabee will deliver a lecture on "Spiritualism from a Bible Standpoint." At all the services there will be soul-stirring songs by Mrs. Payne. Also tests will be given in the way of spirit messages to the friends in the audience, by Mrs. Payne. Rev. Mabee is a veteran in the lecture field and all will be benefited who hear her.

The Spiritualists of Minnesota have adopted the following plan to raise money: By special resolution at the annual convention of the State Spiritualists Association of Minnesota, held in Minneapolis, September 7, 8, and 9, 1900, the undersigned was appointed as manager of a corps of earnest workers in Spiritualism, to raise funds to carry on the missionary work in Minnesota, and to create a nucleus for the erection of a Spiritualist Temple, to be owned by the State Association. The plan is to secure a remittance every day from some person who has selected one day of the year to remit whatever moneys they can collect on that day, or at any time previous thereto. There are to be appointed 365 persons to represent the days of the year. Upon the date you select, you will remit the amount collected. There will be no rivalry, but an honest effort to help the cause, by sending either a large or small amount. These sums collected by 365 persons, in various localities in the state, will create a company of earnest helpers of our public cause whose record will be a roll of honor, and the results will be for the growth of our cause in the entire state of Minnesota. Will you join the ranks? We solicit you most earnestly to select your date—any date you may desire—and report by postal card the date you may select. Please report your date now! On that date remit your collections. Ask our friends, ask your friends, ask your citizens, ask anybody, to help the cause of Spiritualism. The State Association guarantees that the amounts will be accounted for and used only for the cause of Spiritualism in Minnesota. Let us fill the year at once. Send us your name and date—then get others to take one of the days. Give one day in the year to the cause. For further information for a date, and for reports of results, address the undersigned. Address all remittances to G. W. Kates, care D. E. Griffith, secretary, 58 Royalston avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, the veteran Spiritualistic and scientific lecturer, has opened his Sunday and Wednesday services at 8 p. m. for the winter season at 306 Opera House Block, Sixteenth and Curtis streets, Denver, Col. The Progressive Thinker and other Spiritualist papers for sale.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

G. Figley writes: "Hereafter my address is Bryan, Ohio, Route No. 1, instead of Ney, Ohio, as a daily free rural mail delivery has just been established from Bryan postoffice, and which goes past my house."

D. C. Moore writes: "I have made some examination of the premium books, and find them entirely satisfactory, and I am pleased to have them in my library."

Rev. Emil G. Hirsch, the eloquent rabbi, says: "Though we cannot escape the accident of birth, moral equipment or ancestral traits, we can all act in harmony like the members of an orchestra who on their different instruments take up the strains and with different intonations carry on the common theme. Religion, the twin daughter of philosophy and poetry, is the torch that leads men along the path of rectitude, purity and love."

The Daily Northwestern, of Oshkosh, Wis., of October 1, says: "Sheriff Charles White has returned from Superior, but without prisoners. He found the clairvoyants who were arrested there, but they were not Prof. Ball and Prof. Rovano, as supposed. Both of the prisoners were considerably older than the clairvoyants who worked in Oshkosh and neither tallied with the descriptions given."

Edward Fitch Bullard writes from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "Your paper with the third volume of the Encyclopedia of Death, came by mail all right. I am greatly pleased with the book. I had been reading Vol. I., which induced me to send for Vol. III. The series make valuable history, and it is all important these 'Acts of the Apostles' should be recorded, as they may be important eighteen hundred years hence if the dark ages should again cover the earth."

The Toronto (Canada) Spiritualist Association held its first social of the season in Wolsely Hall, corner Gerard and Yonge streets, on Wednesday evening, September 26, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The membership committee, who has those Wednesday evenings in charge, decided to have their first social before the departure of Mrs. Loe Prior, for Cleveland, and it is the intention to have those social gatherings quite often during the winter, not only for the purpose of bringing the members together, but to try and get the younger people to take more interest in the work of the association.

Subscriber writes: "Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates held very successful meetings here in Aitkin, Minn., September 28, 29 and 30 and October 2. We are given the free use of the Episcopal church each occasion these earnest and able workers are with us. The church is always well-filled and often over-crowded. The interest in Spiritualism here is growing; and it only needs that the truths be presented upon their merits without malice or prejudice in order that the people may similarly accept them. As a lady said: 'I went to the meeting prejudiced against the Spiritualists, but I will attend now whenever they have public services, for such preaching will reform and make better the world.' Mr. Kates is a logical and forcible speaker, but Mrs. Kates speaks right into hearts and souls. Her words burn right into the soul. As a test or descriptive medium she is the peer of any. These workers are doing wonders in Minnesota."

For centuries Friday has been regarded as the most unlucky day in the week, but the tendency now is to regard Sunday as the most unfortunate day. According to a modern statistician, who has just published an interesting pamphlet on the subject, Sunday is certainly more unlucky than Friday, as far as rulers and other prominent personages are concerned. The king of Italy, he points out, was killed on Sunday, and it was on Sunday that two previous attempts against his life were made—namely, on Sunday, March 17, 1878, and on Sunday, March 25, 1893. Other cases cited by him are those of the duc de Berry, who was stabbed to death on Sunday, Feb. 13, 1820; of Czar Alexander II., who was killed by a bomb on Sunday, March 13, 1881; of President Carnot, who was assassinated by Cesario, on Sunday, June 24, 1894, and of M. Canovas, who was killed on Sunday in 1897.

Emma M. Nutt-Moore writes from Muncie, Ind.: "The Muncie Spiritual Society re-opens its Temple, Sunday, October 7, corner of Howard and High streets. Meetings, 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. Mrs. Emma M. Nutt-Moore is the speaker for the month of October. It is the aim of the society to have its platform filled by good workers the entire season. At a business meeting of the above society, Mr. John J. Shields and Mr. Harry Hogue were elected to fill the unexpired term of two of the trustees, who had resigned. The lease of the Temple about expiring, the society has rented the hall from its owner, Mr. Zach Mong, son of Mr. Robert Mong, deceased, who so generously donated the use of the hall free, for five years."

Ellen I. Parker writes from New Hampshire: "I received the seven premium books to-day, and thank you for the same. I can't see how you can afford it. I am looking forward to a great treat when I can find time to read them. I enjoy The Progressive Thinker more than any paper I ever read."

Mrs. J. S. Soper writes: "There will be an old-fashioned supper and dance at the V. S. U. Home, Waverly, Mass., Friday, November 2, 1900. All societies and individuals are cordially invited to help in any way that they can. Pumpkin, mince, apple and custard pies; old-fashioned ginger-bread, Indian pudding, cold meats, anything that goes to make up an old-fashioned supper will be gratefully received. The old-fashioned dances will be on the program, and Prof. Willis Milligan will preside at the piano, with able assistants. There will be an old-fashioned choir. Singers are cordially invited to take part. Come and have a good time. A fine supper will be provided. Young lady attendants in costumes of the olden time. Admission free. Only small price charged for supper and dance. Address all communications to Mrs. J. S. Soper, Clerk V. S. U., 67 Upland Road, N. Cambridge, Mass."

A. F. M. writes from Charleston, S. C.: "One person says there are animals in the spirit world; another says there are not. One believes in reincarnation because he says he feels it intuitively; another denies it because he does not feel what his opponent feels. Now, what shall the skeptic believe? Nothing, until he investigates for himself. Then he will be in the same predicament with the rest—all of which goes to prove that Spiritualism is an individual truth, each one forming his belief on his knowledge of things, combined with his intuitive experience. How, therefore, can such an ism be creedalized? Is it not an eternally opened book for all mankind and for all ages?"

G. W. Kates and wife solicit correspondence from the West for their services, and will be able to make future dates with societies, after their present term of service in Minnesota. Address them at 58 Royalston avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Mrs. W. B. Slater writes from Washington, D. C.: "I do not think it possible to say too much in favor of your paper. Each week it comes laden with the advanced thought of the age, and to the thinkers along the line, it is invaluable. Its sublime truths radiate from center to circumference. It seems better with each issue. May prosperity ever attend you in your glorious work."

The Pittsburg Post says: "Local Spiritualists are in a state of excitement over an incident which occurred Thursday night at a meeting in the Sixth Street Church. Margaret C. Gaule, the Baltimore medium, was giving an exhibition of her powers in psychometry to a crowded house and was in a trance when suddenly she threw up her hands and with a thrill of horror exclaimed: 'The Red Cross—it is here—blood—war.' In an instant she had placed her hand on the head of a woman, who arose and shrieked. There was great excitement and a panic seemed to be threatened. The medium, however, in tones of horror, depicted a prospective battle-field and the mission of the woman. A bystander roughly demanded of the woman who she was and she replied: 'A Red Cross aid on my way from Galveston.' With that there was more shrieking in the audience, many persons taking the matter as a proof of supernatural powers possessed by the medium. A man cried out 'I came to scoff, but remain to believe,' and others repeated the same sentiment. A woman fainted and in the excitement the Red Cross aid made her escape without her name being learned, after which matters quieted down. Miss Gaule claimed yesterday morning that she knew nothing of what occurred while she was in the trance. She will hold her last meeting to-morrow evening."

The Boston Daily Globe says: "Yesterday the Harvard football squad and 100 students, who had come out to see the practice, were amazed at the performance of a young man named William H. Mack, who defied any one on the field to lift him off his feet. The claim was hooted by all the strong men of the gridiron, and little attention would have been paid to such an absurd statement had it not been for Jack McMasters, the football trainer, who brought the fellow to Soldiers field. The boys had just got on their football togs, and were in the humor for any test of strength, when Jack asked for a volunteer to lift the young man. A dozen fellows jumped at the chance and were willing to be made out fools just to see what the joke was, for each man did not doubt but that he could raise the fellow, and, if necessary, toss him into the air. One by one the brawn and sinew of Harvard football representatives-to-be strained every lifting muscle without raising the man a hair's breadth from the ground. Capt. Daly looked disappointed at the showing of his proteges, and he resolved to retrieve the lost glory and raise Wm. H. Mack, and the dead if necessary, for Harvard's sake. Daly wound his arms around the waist of Mack and settled himself to raise the man, or go through the earth. Mack placed the middle finger of his hand lightly against Daly's neck just back of the left ear and with his other hand pressed Daly's pulse. Daly lifted and lifted, every vein was dilated, his face became crimson, and his whole body shook with quivering muscles. Mack took his hands off of Daly, and instantly shot up in the air like an arrow. Mack was lifted, but it was because he himself had willed it. His light hold of Daly had been removed, which touch was the key to Mack's storehouse of resistance. Coach Dibblee also took the strength test, but he could not succeed in doing what the strongest men in the world have tried to do and failed. Dibblee declared Mack was in league with the devil and so gave up the laurels to this defiant Mephisto. Mr. Mack does not confine himself to this one feat of upsetting known rules of force, but also exhibits other wonderful powers. A pole was placed vertically and five men were invited to push it against the floor. Mack passed his hands over the knuckles of the men and then, with open palms, pressed against the stick, held it so the strength of five men could not force it down. After going through the last ordeal the young man showed signs of exhaustion, as the power he exerts is a great strain on his nerve system. The athletes were full of talk last night about the man with such a wonderful gift of nerve resistance, and hoped McMasters' friend has left a clew by which to keep the football eleven firmly on its feet this fall and prevent the team from going up in the air."

E. S. writes: "A very successful meeting was held in Toledo, Ohio, in the Memorial Hall, September 25. W. V. Nicum, vice-president of the O. S. A., gave an interesting lecture on Truth, Where and How to find it, after which Mrs. Schauss, of Toledo, in a few words added her testimony of the truth of spirit return. Mrs. Nina D. Challan, also of Toledo, then favored the audience with an address, and was followed by Dr. Figuers, of Cleveland, who in his usual clear and explicit way gave the messages of spirit friends to those on earth, and converted many skeptics. Mrs. Coffman, of Grand Rapids, also gave many good tests and messages. The Toledo people showed their appreciation of the efforts of both messagebearers by promptly answering and recognizing the messages given. We hope in the future to have more such meetings. Mrs. Coffman closes her engagement in Toledo, September 30, and the Independent Association of Spiritualists whom she has been serving will look with pleasant anticipation to the month of February, when she is to be with them again. Dr. Figuers will serve this association the two last Sundays of November. All are looking forward to a treat at that time."

Astrologers, clairvoyants, mind-readers, etc., are taxed $2 per day, $5 per week, $15 per month, $50 per year at Ottawa, Kansas. In relation to the above B. F. Hayden writes from Gardner, Kansas: "Enclosed find copy of the city ordinance of the city of Ottawa, Kansas, by which you will see one paragraph is especially interesting to astrologers, etc. Brother Ezra A. Carpenter, of Wellsville, Kansas, in forwarding this copy to me says: 'They must be afraid we are going to convert the town.' He (Brother Carpenter) said he would go before the council and do all he could to have that clause repealed. As the result of his labors I am just in receipt of a postal from him in which he says, 'I have just interviewed the city mayor and am pleased to inform you that any and all clairvoyants with proper credentials, will be protected and encouraged by the Mayor and council of the city of Ottawa in the future as in the past.' From this we infer it is not so bad as one might be led to believe from first impressions, but is really only intended as a terror to fakes and evil-doers, and a protection to 'time-tried and fire-tested.' Still the question might arise, Is any city council duly qualified to determine what shall constitute proper credentials? We will attend the Walluh camp next week, after which we are ready to engage with societies needing our services for lectures, platform tests, etc., on reasonable terms."

Emma M. Nutt-Moore, speaker and medium; address for the month of October, 321 East Jackson street, Muncie, Indiana.

Mr. and Mrs. John Lindsay write: "We are now at home, 63 Fourth street, Grand Rapids, Mich. We returned sooner than we intended on account of unexpected changes in our surroundings. At a seance held in Chicago, a spirit talked to the members of the circle concerning the Galveston horror, calling one by name, said, 'We are going direct from here to Galveston, a large band of us, to assist those that have just passed out.' At the next seance the spirit voice said they had been to Galveston, and that we could not imagine the terrible condition they were in. A friend of Pullman and ex-Mayor Harrison held conversation with these spirits. An effort was made to ascertain the results of the coming election from ex-Mayor Harrison, but the spirit refused to converse on political questions. He said he was through with politics. My wife and myself desire to thank the many friends we have met during our western trip for their kindness."

The Chicago American has the following from Binghamton, N. Y.: "The romantic engagement of Elmer Merrill of Lowell, Mass., and Miss Edith Tallman Smith is announced. The engagement was the result of telepathy and is the first of its kind on record. Miss Smith lives in the West, but she makes yearly visits to this section. Among her admirers was a wealthy business man, whose suit her parents encouraged. She looked upon him favorably until at a social function she met Elmer Merrill. They met but once, as he left for his home in the East the following day, but there arose a strange attraction between them. They did not correspond, for he did not leave an address, but it has since transpired they were constantly thinking of each other and holding mental communications. The merchant had asked for the girl's hand and was to be given an answer the same evening. When he arrived he was astonished by the announcement that she was engaged to another. Her parents thought her insane when she said she had engaged herself to Merrill that afternoon. This was, however, corroborated by a letter written by Merrill to his friends, in which he said he suddenly realized that he was in great danger of losing Miss Smith and he made a mental proposal to her which was accepted. He has since written her his first love letter, and she has formally accepted him."

Mrs. Mary Severance writes from Whitewater, Wis.: "Professor Loveland's Number Four on 'What Spiritualism Includes and the Duties It Imposes,' is full of solid truth which must be recognized, loved and appropriated before that good time we so earnestly long for comes. Yes, Brother Francis, that is the work the spirit world is trying, and has tried for fifty years to inspire mankind to do. But, oh! how dull we human are. The light shineth in the darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. The great work to be done is to improve the conditions of humanity. To do it selfishness must be put aside, and Human Brotherhood must not only be taught, but practically applied to our systems of government."

Mr. Lloyd Jones, of 156 Washington street, Chicago, is issuing an illustrated monthly magazine, The Journal of Magnetism, 48 pages, price 10 cents a copy. Free sample copies will be sent to any reader who mentions The Progressive Thinker. This new journal will devote its pages to Physical Culture, Magnetism and Health, and our readers should make a point of being on the lists of those who are to receive a copy free.

L. Holyoak writes from Toronto, Canada: "I have received Volume 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life of the Spirit World, and feel thankful for such a lovely present. The book is simply beautiful. It takes away the horrors of dying to mortals."

Mrs. Gage, the blind medium, and a very excellent one, too, resides at 364 Warren avenue. She is worthy of all respect and confidence.

R. F. Little president, writes from Seattle, Wash.: "It is a pleasure to report to your paper some things regarding the Seattle Spiritual Association. The society is in a flourishing condition, has 54 members enrolled, among which are several inspirational speakers, and many deep thinkers and loyal workers. Conference meetings are held each Sunday at 2 p. m.; at these meetings topics are chosen for discussion, which will benefit those who are seeking for a more liberal and advanced expression of truth. The society has recently been highly favored by a series of lectures from Rev. Moses Hull, four in number. The lectures were well attended and one could but feel that the opportunity to hear such advanced teaching by so convincing a speaker, is rare. In Sunday afternoon lecture, from the text, 'If a man die, shall he live again (Job 14:14), he said: 'Outside of Spiritualism there is no proof of immortality. Spiritualism comes to demonstrate that which has been only a hope. The world is moving. The Bible is our book. The time is coming when Orthodox and Spiritualist will be together in the work. May that time soon come.' The society was able to meet the necessary expense, leaving a small balance in the treasury. At present Madame Dr. Olivia is in our city, also a member of this society. We had the privilege of listening to her at Sunday's conference. She will speak again Sunday, October 7 on 'Body, Soul and Spirit.'"

Mattie E. Hull, secretary of the N. S. L. A., writes: "Lyceum Workers, Attention! The third annual session of the National Spiritualist Lyceum Association will meet in Cleveland, Ohio, the 19th inst., immediately on the adjournment of the last business session of the N. S. A. Convention. I make an earnest appeal to the Spiritualists to take up this cause. It is one of the most important departments in the work of Spiritualism. I need not reiterate the reasons why every Spiritualist should interest himself in this work. If Spiritualism is the most rational system of philosophy from a moral, intellectual or spiritual standpoint that has ever been handed to the world, in the name of those who are to take our places on the stage of human action when we leave it, let us see to it that conditions are created and maintained for the teaching of the same."

Amanda A. Cate writes from Haverhill, Mass.: "At the annual meeting of the Haverhill Spiritual Union the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Amanda A. Cate; first vice-president, W. W. Sprague; second vice-president, Mrs. Eliza Page; treasurer, Mrs. Jennie Huntress; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Jones; Directors, Mrs. W. W. Sprague, Mrs. Julia Johnson and Mrs. Etta Huntington. The society is in a flourishing condition. Several names have been added to its membership roll and a fine list of talented inspirational speakers and test mediums for the ensuing year. Our meetings opened September 30, with the noted and favorite medium, Mrs. May S. Pepper, who was greeted with a warm welcome and crowded houses, both afternoon and evening. Will be followed next Sunday by Mrs. E. A. Cunningham, of Boston."

Mrs. McDonald, speaker and platform test medium, will engage with societies desiring her services. Highest reference for honesty and moral standing. Address for the present, 15 Nelson street, Dorchester, Boston, Mass.

Mrs. S. J. Cutter, the well-known medium, has returned to the city, and is permanently located for business, at 118 Flournoy street, near Leavitt, and one block south of Harrison street.

G. W. Kates and wife held meetings in LaCrosse, Wis., October 7, and are engaged for Detroit, Mich., October 14. They will return direct from the N. S. A. convention to Winona, Minn., for October 21 to 30.

E. W. Sprague and wife are serving the Indianapolis (Ind.) Spiritualist Society for the month of October. They go to Philadelphia, Pa., for December. Their services can be secured as speakers and platform test mediums for the month of November, and time after January 1. Address for October, 911 North New Jersey street, Indianapolis, Ind. Home address, 416 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

Thos. H. Hartley writes: "The First Spiritual Church began services at its new hall, corner Oakwood and Ellis avenues, Sunday evening, with promises of an excellent season's work. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, the pastor, has returned to the city with renewed strength and vigor. Sunday, October 28, dedication services will be held at the above address. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond will give the dedication address, and other able workers will take part, as well as 'Mayflower,' who will give spirit messages in her inimitable manner. Further particulars next issue."

BATTLE OF PROGRESS.

Letter from Mrs. Carrie Fuller Weatherford.

The People's Spiritual Church of Louisville, Ky., is one of the few organizations in the United States which has decided that it must own its own church, with the result that to-day this association occupies a respectable brick structure which is nearly half paid for.

The church is centrally located and the society with but one more effort will be able to feel secure. Much of this success is owing to the determination of their efficient president, Val Speed, a respected citizen and earnest Spiritualist.

Louisville, like Cincinnati, is overrun with chicanery; but it is a notable fact that since this society has bought property, both mediums and pretenders are left amiably alone by the police; which is quite a change from a few months back.

Since coming here the Ladies' Aid has made many important changes in furnishing rooms devoted to medial workers; and more are contemplated. The great question which is agitating the minds of our people here is whether the N. S. A. expects this year to do anything more than merely collect its officers' salaries, or not.

If this organization does not exist for the purpose of giving to the world a clear, concise statement of the knowledge (not belief) which Spiritualism brings and to give a legal name to devoted workers, which tricksters cannot claim, then what in the name of Truth does it exist for?

And if, as many of our N. S. A. officers and delegates claim, the whole question of mediumship presents such a picture of pitiable incapacity, of chicanery and of general nastiness that they are afraid to handle it lest they smash the N. S. A. into smithereens, then why, in the name of Truth does not the N. S. A. take the matter in hand and set a standard for mediumship for all phases, and at least give an opportunity to clean workers who are determined to uphold the standard of "Honor in mediumship before all else;" to have a name by themselves which "reeds shaken in the wind" dare not steal?

It is a very easy matter to pass these rules: "Lecturers and test and physical media who travel constantly in the effort to teach the truths of Spiritualism, whose lives are honorable, and whose lectures, tests and physical mediumship bear evidence of genuineness, shall be entitled to the title, Lecture, Test or Physical medium for the N. S. A."

No lecturer using this title shall use the published thoughts of others without giving due credit.

Test media who present as tests the names of those who have been well-known people; or present from the rostrum messages which they have previously given in private, or who may be proved to possess a "blue book" or any previous information, shall be disqualified from using said title.

Physical media shall present their phenomena each time under an adequate test which cannot injure them physically—such as the mosquito bar test. Said mediums are also earnestly advised to insist that they be well protected from violence, the throwing of paraphernalia, etc., and that they demand of their audiences perfect cleanliness, harmony, kindly care and freedom from noxious odors.

Lecturers and mediums taking such a stand shall also be entitled to defense from the N. S. A. in all cases of prosecution.

The question very quickly arises in the minds of enthusiastic workers: "If this mediumistic combination scattered over the world is too dirty, too vile to handle, as would appear by the careless indifference of the N. S. A., why should I stay in the work under a name with such supposedly dark associations? There certainly is a very large dictionary of the English tongue; and the word medium in its present irresponsible condition does not offer a shelter to any thoroughly devoted worker!

We as mediums must help the world to many things; we have to teach a truer understanding of the return of spirits and of the laws of the spiritual; to a better marriage system which will exclude prostitution; to higher ideals of generation; to kinder thoughts of labor; to humanity to the criminal. We run amuck daily with many prejudices of society; then why in the name of truth should we be loaded down with tricky and licentious lecturers and media, whom we either have to apologize to the public for as being mediumistic degenerates, or whose sins we feel impelled to cover up?

There never was anything so certain as that the world can get all the spirit communication it wants without the name Spiritualist; and there never can be anything more certain than that every day sees a good-bye to the name while they still continue the work under a cleaner title; and one which will be taken better care of.

That with the coming session of the N. S. A. a future of intelligent work will be opened, or with its hesitancy the whole fabric of organization will crumble, is a surety. For my own part I have loved it and helped fight its battles; but I feel now that it is time to change from a puny, petted babe to a hard-working spiritual organization. The word Spiritualism does not represent to any degree my sentiments in its earthly representation; excepting the return of spirits which I understood just so well in the Episcopal church before I had scarcely heard of Spiritualism as I ever have since.

This session of the N. S. A. our delegates will decide whether the word means anything more than "I believe" (which is well enough if we did not pretend to know) and Spiritism; so also it will decide whether I, for one, ever raise my voice under the name Spiritualist medium again.

Truth has always been dearer to me than any other name. I left my church and my true friendly friends of childhood and went out as a Spiritualist worker, feeling that the name meant Truth. I have found that there is more chicanery under the name medium per hundred than under any other unless it is Doctor, Lawyer, or Priest. I find Spiritualists generally much less kindly disposed toward honest effart than I had expected; much less loving and respectful to old Spiritualists and mediums than I could have dreamed; and much more easily charmed by sensation of any old kind than I would have imagined in the deepest moments of darkest hypochondria.

I find many Spiritualists worshiping the spirit world much more than the Universal Soul Force which made a spirit world possible, and I find many abusing churchianity while we are making more mistakes; and these things make me feel ashamed and disgraced. My ideal of a church is one where Truth is loved; progress attained; spirituality aimed for; and where, while no one expects perfection, yet where honor bright shows through every lecture, every test, every physical demonseration. A church in which our efforts to save the world with knowledge and without creed shall be stated; and the principles we are working for published, not kept covered up, in which spirit communication is expected to be something above a mere shiver down the spine, or the snort or grunt of an unprogressed spirit; where sensation is abjured and truth-seeking prominent; where old truth-seekers, teachers and demonstrators are respected because they are respectable; where the poor, sick and unfortunate are aided, the grief-stricken helped to knowledge that death is but transition, and where devoted workers instead of dollar-seeking tricksters shall be loved and cared for.

I for one shall have such a church home; and if but one member ever belongs to, and that one myself, I shall still continue in that work which the angel world has mapped out for me:

Essie and I shall remain here during October. The press of the city is giving us the kindliest treatment generally.

Yours for justice to the Truth under whatever name it can be best demonstrated and under whatever clean home roof it can best be sheltered.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75c.
CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life; Counsels and Maxims;; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.
"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is consistant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. J. E. Wilbur. Q. I am influenced by a spirit in business, and following its influence I have suffered continuous and great loss? How can I escape?

A. By simply exerting your own selfhood. You should not come to any conclusion or enter into any business, on the spur of the moment, but should take ample time to think and talk it over with friends. The spirit influence will thereby be escaped.

Delevan Bates. Q. (1) Do unuttered thoughts produce vibrations that can be recognized by sensitives?

(2) Can spirits understand such vibrations?

A. These questions have reference to the explanation of spirit communion by thought vibrations. It is the thought itself which produces these vibrations, and not the spoken words. In speaking a thought it gains in sharpness and precision, which is the only advantage.

It is entirely by the recognition of such vibrations that spirits communicate with each other. A thinking being is a pulsating center of thought waves.

It is objected that: "Thoughts come and go unbidden, like the wind which blows where it listeth and no one can tell whence it comes or where it goes. It would not be justice for all that passes through the mortal mind to be given away unless each individual was given the power to keep unbidden thoughts from entering."

A thought vibration, cannot be kept from "entering" a mind in harmony therewith, but unless that harmony exists it cannot be received. Thus the mind does not become an open book which all can read. Only those in harmony are able to read each other's thoughts.

Rosa Giles: Q. The meaning of this dream: Four spirits appeared, recognized as friends while in earth life, one a Methodist. They conversed, but the only thing they said that was distinct was: "Don't be afraid, we are nothing to be afraid of;" and "Are you a saved man?"

A. This is a fine instance of mediumship during sleep. Sometimes those not sensitive during wakefulness are highly impressible during sleep. As one of the spirits had been a Methodist in earth life, his inquiry was characteristic—"Are you a saved man?" Showing that he had not outgrown his religious beliefs. It is not correct to class such instances as dreams, for they belong to an entirely different order of phenomena. There is more than spiritual appearance in this manifestation. The sensitiveness which made it possible, indicates by its abruptness, a very great psychic and physical change of the character, which usually is the forerunner and prophecy of coming disease. This abruptness is a distinguishing feature from equal sensitiveness slowly induced by culture, which would by the harmony of psychic and physical functions indicate the highest state of health.

"Reason": Q. If a person reasons, must he not come to correct conclusions?

A. Not necessarily, for if the data from which we deduce our conclusions are erroneous, so will be the result. Yet our reasoning may be as correct, our inferences justifiable granting the premises. The same process of reasoning proves the existence of Allah to the Mohammedan, as God to the Christian.

Did you ever make a mistake in the beginning of an example in arithmetic, writing a 1 for a 2 or a 6 for a 7, and after a long process wherein you had multiplied, divided, added and subtracted, your result would be wide of the true answer? Your reasoning has been perfect, your data wrong. How astonishing this error has grown, from units to tens, and from tens to thousands, and the longer it remains the more it leads you astray. "Figures never lie," is a proverb, but you will not believe it, when so slight an error puts an extra million or two into the answer.

The same process of reasoning gives the true and false answers. The difference grows out of accepting one wrong figure in the beginning. This is precisely the source of all false conclusions at which mankind arrive. The major portion reason correctly from the data they receive as true, but this is often false, or assertion received by educational prejudice.

He who writes 2 for 1 may reason out his problem equally well as the one who writes correct numbers, but his conclusion will be erroneous. So he who accepts an error as fact may reason even more closely than the one whose data is true, yet his conclusions will be necessarily erroneous.

As illustration: You wish to take the cars and start by the clock, with ample time by the clock. You go and find the train gone, because the clock was slow by ten minutes. Had it been correct you would have been on time. Your being late is the result of accepting the accuracy of the clock or a false data,

It is thus it is as important that our data be correct as our reasoning, yet the major portion of the reasoning powers of mankind is absorbed in the endeavor to harmonize and explain what is taken as granted and demonstrated theories which really are idlest chimeras.

It would seem that the power of reasoning is more developed than the faculty of observation in most individuals. They are excessively credulous of facts, and at once invent beautiful theories explaining them. If they observed closer their facts would melt away and require no explanation. They remind one of the old story of Pat at the tannery. The owner had bored a hole over the door and inserted a calf's tail as a sign, which greatly astonished the Irishman, and he called out, "An' how did the calf get through the wee hole?" "I put him through when he was small," was the ready reply. Pat accepted the statement and was satisfied with its plausibility.

We laugh at his ready acceptance of assertions as facts, yet how many there are who take with equal alacrity far more ludicrous statements as facts, proceed with their explanations and become violently angry if it be hinted that such are unreasonable. If all the facts and reasoning corresponding with Pat's were taken from the world, how little would remain. The world's Theology could be written in a single sentence.

Mrs. S. S. Ogilvie: A. It is difficult to explain the various appearances of materialized spirits.

Inquirer, Montpeller: Q. (1) How near the North Pole has ever been reached?

(2) What advantage would follow reaching the Pole?

A. The Duke of Abruzzi, commander of an Italian expedition reached 86 degrees, 33 minutes, or 239 statute miles of the pole. This he accomplished on sledges. Nansen by similar means did not reach quite this limit, being obliged to turn back by insurmountable obstacles at 261 miles.

(2) No advantage except that of extending the field of knowledge. The desert ice-fields offer no opportunity for commerce, and nothing to satisfy greed. Even the Esquimaux once swarming on the borders of the Arctic sea, have perished with the seal which gave them support. The attempts which have been made to penetrate the arctic zone have brought small recompense for the sacrifice that has been made. The pages of history have been illuminated with examples of heroic daring, and of almost superhuman endurance. The pathetic story of Sir John Franklin will never be forgotten, and the adventures of Dr. Kane, Perry and scores of others, are interesting as romance. Geographical knowledge has been extended, it is true, yet there is no practical value in tracing these lines, along coasts constantly encrusted with ice, or navigating seas which for only a brief month are converted into moving masses of ice.

IN MEMORY OF B. B. HART.

A tired soldier fell beside the way,
Whereon his comrades march with noisy tread,
And closed his weary eyes to earthly day,
While down the line the word passed, "He is dead."

Dead in the harness, faithful to the last,
The dust and stain of battle on his brow
He lies, and hears no more the bugle blast
Calling to arms his comrades even now.

But is he dead, the fallen soldier here?
Shall he not wake to sounds unheard on earth,
To bugle call, and voices sweet and dear,
That reach him thro' the darkling mists of death?

Shall not the tired eyes again behold,
On higher planes life's mystic cavalcade,
And his freed soul leap gladly as of old,
To join the mighty hosts 'gainst wrong arrayed?

Aye, God is good, and from earth's battle-fields
The conquering hero rises in his might,
And over there, on heaven's plains, he wields
His radiant weapons still, for truth and right.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

THE HONORABLE OFFICE OF MEDIUMSHIP.

Mediumship is the portal through which, during the past half century, the world has been catching glimpses of the other world and the visitants from beyond the borderland of this stage of man's progressive existence. Through mediumship the people of the other-world-order have been able to make themselves known to their grief-stricken relatives and doubt-oppressed friends, who have mourned because of their solitude and have feared that the departed were gone from them forever. However imperfect and fragmentary the messages from the unseen have been—and many a sorrowing seeker has felt with regret the inability of the spirit to comply with his longing and pleading desire for further information and fuller revelation—still they have been messages from the beyond. If they have been but telegraphic dispatches, so to speak, instead of voluminous letters, or like the telephonic snatches of conversation with which we are familiar, rather than a face-to-face outpouring of thought and feeling in speech, still they have been greetings and comforting assurances of life and love from living souls in the land beyond the grave. Through mediumship the "grand secret" has been solved. The gates have been pushed ajar, at least. The silence of the tomb has been broken and its forbidding darkness illumined by the voice and shining presence of the spirit beloved. If only for a brief space, yet, in those short moments, mediumship has supplied evidence—so often repeated that it now amounts to demonstration—of the continued, conscious, rational, human and progressive existence of the people we call dead. To mediumship belongs the office and the honor of rolling back the tide of despair, comforting the sad and consoling the bereaved, and establishing faith upon the firm basis of scientifically ascertained fact. Mediumship supplements the affirmations of intuition, confirms the human heart in its claim for the continued existence of its dear ones, and gives to the traditions regarding by-gone revelations from the unseen a ground-work of probability—making credible, in the light of present-day experience, much which otherwise must have been regarded as superstitious folly or incredible miracle. Spiritualism, through mediumship, confirms ancient testimony to the so-called supernatural, and by explaining it, brings it within the realm of the natural. The ability to "hear the word of the Lord" is now known to be a normal faculty; natural to certain temperaments and capable of being induced in others, and of being developed and cultivated by attention to the conditions which govern its exercise. The famine—not of bread nor of water, but of "hearing words from the Lord"—which was threatened in olden times has been experienced in the dark days of the Christian era because of the ignorance and hardness of heart of the stiff-necked generations of men who in their blind zeal for the "letter" of the law crushed out the sensitives through whom the manifestations of the spirit were alone possible. The corner-stone of the Temple of the Spirit—viz., mediumship, or so-called "spiritual gifts"—rejected by the builders of the churches—must be placed in its rightful position before the open doors of intercommunion shall enable earth dwellers to rejoice in the knowledge of the Life Eternal, and Life and Immortality be fully brought to light.

PRAYER IN ENGLAND.

It has been suggested by our control on "the other side" that we should draw up a form of prayer to be used at the commencement of seances and meetings; and the one enclosed we have collected from "Spirit Teachings" and other standard works, and trust that it may be found useful by Spiritists in all parts of the world:

Form of prayer to be used at the commencement of a seance or meeting:

O God our Father * * Eternal, Infinite, All-wise * * we draw near to thee, and lay before thee our petitions, knowing that thou dost hear us and wilt answer our prayers.

Teach us, we beseech thee, thy law: teach us to know ourselves and thee.

Teach us that thy Law, based on Love, requires but the exercise of that Love for its fulfilment; and daily may we learn to love each other more, and to show kindness to every living thing around us, for all are from one Source, and Thee.

Remove from our path whatever may hinder and hamper us in our desire for progress; shed into our hearts a beam of thy light, to illumine our lives with thy continual presence, and to drive away all doubts and fears that may still remain within us.

Assist us by thy help and strength to daily grow in grace, and to live nearer to thee, so that whilst passing through the changes and trials of this mortal life, our hearts and desires may evermore be surely fixed on the real life in the world to come.

Send forth thy Light: scatter the shades of darkness, and open the eyes of this people that they may see thy Truth. Loose them from the bonds of creed and superstition by which they are now so tightly held, and ever grant to all of us thy blessed Freedom.

Send down on us the consolation that we need, and thy heavenly Strength which we so earnestly desire, to assist us in our labors. Great is the work before us, great must be the Love and Power to enable us to continue.

In mercy, grant more Light to all earth-bound spirits, who may still be wilfully clinging to the things of this world, and stir up within them an earnest desire for progress. Have pity on them, we beseech thee, O Lord, and may the desire for better and holier things lift them out of their present darkened and most miserable condition, and quickly bring them to higher spheres, and to that Peace which passeth all understanding.

Be with us, O God our Father, to-night; send forth the power of thy Spirit upon all assembled here, and bless our endeavors to spread the knowledge of the Light which thou hast vouchsafed to us. Send special help to-night to those loving Spirits who so earnestly strive to instruct us, and to lead us in the right path, for we know that without thy support their labors will be in vain.

Hear us, O Lord, we beseech thee, from heaven thy dwelling place, and when thou hearest forgive the past, and grant to us spiritual health and Strength for the future; and may all that we think or do or say, now and at all times, be to thy praise and glory alone.—Amen.

"The Light of Egypt." Volumes 1 and 2. An occult library in itself, a text-book of esoteric knowledge as taught by Adepts of Hermetic Philosophy. Price $2 per volume. For sale at this office.

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

A DEATH-SCENE WITNESSED 3,000 MILES OFF.

Whatever may be the cause, there are more stories of this kind told about sailors and soldiers than about all other classes of the community. Of the sailor stories one of the best, concerning the apparition at the moment of death, with the clairvoyant accompaniment, is sent me by a Master of Arts in the North of Scotland, who has made it the subject of a carefully written and very interesting story, for the accuracy of which my correspondent vouches as occurring many years ago to the person on whose authority the story is told. He is still living, and persists in the absolute accuracy of his most extraordinary narrative. It will be seen that there is not only in this case the phantasm of the unfortunate man who died, but also a vivid reproduction of the scene in which he perished, so that the person who saw it recognized many weeks after a total stranger as the person who was present at the hour of his death.

Thirteen years ago, said Captain S——, I was on board the C——, homeward bound with cotton from Calcutta to Liverpool. On Tuesday, the 25th of August, 1868, when in latitude 33 degrees 4 minutes south, longitude 31 degrees 27 minutes east, the sky darkened, and it was evident that a storm was about to burst upon us; the crew were sent aloft to furl the sails, and before we had completed the task a great gust of wind seized the half-slackened maintopsail, and sent it fluttering into fragments. At the same moment the ship reeled nearly on her beam ends, and, above the howling of the gale, we heard a sudden cry of despair. I was horrified to see an apprentice, J—— P——, sent whirling headlong from the masthead into the sea. Even yet I can see the look of agony stamped on his upturned face, and I can hear the very tones of his heartrending cry, "O! Lucy, Lucy," as he disappeared forever in the darkness below.

After the storm abated the captain made a careful note on the exact time of the occurrence, the position of the ship, and the other particulars. He seemed struck at my mention of the exclamation I had overheard falling from the poor fellow's lips as he clutched in vain at the yielding air.

"Ah," he said, "that must have been his sister, Lucy V——, to whom he was greatly attached."

I then produced his cap, which I had managed to seize as it fell, and which the captain locked up with the rest of his effects, remarking, as he did so, that no doubt his people would prize it as a last keepsake of their son.

The rest of the voyage passed without incident, and as soon as the ship arrived at Liverpool I made my way to the train which was to take me to Manchester.

I was walking idly along the platform when I saw the face of an old gentleman, who, with a young lady on his arm, was elbowing his way through the crowd. His resemblance to our lost mate was so striking that I stood and looked at him. The young lady's eyes happened suddenly to meet mine. Instantly she gave a violent start, uttered a low scream, and exclaiming, "Oh, look, there's the face of my dream!" stared at me as if fascinated. Her companion gently rallied her, and half led, half carried her, to the nearest waiting-room. As he passed he begged me to come with them, and handed me his card.

When we were alone the old gentleman explained that the sight of my face had reminded his daughter of a very peculiar and unpleasant dream, to which she still persisted in attaching importance. He said: "At the present moment, indeed, we are on our way to discover if the owners of my son's ship have received any news of its arrival."

I said: "I am an apprentice of the C——, and have but lately left her lying in the harbor."

"Then," the young lady cried, "I must be right. It must be true. 'Twas that man's face I saw gazing at him as he fell. I saw Joe's ship in the midst of a fearful storm, and him clinging to the slippery shrouds. A bright flash seemed to pass before my eyes, and I saw him falling backwards into the sea. I saw your face in the momentary gleam, and I woke perfectly terrified to hear the sound of my own name—'O Lucy! Lucy!'—whispered in my ears."

The expression of my face must have conveyed but too well the meaning of my silence.

"My God," cried Mr. ——, "is it true then? Is he dead?"

I stammered—"Too true, sir. Yes, every word of it! I was beside him at the moment, and even tried to save him."

From the statement subsequently given to the captain, it appeared that the sister had retired as usual before eleven o'clock. About midnight they were roused by a loud scream, and, on hurrying to her room, found her sitting up under the influence of extreme terror, declaring that she had actually seen her brother falling from the masthead into the sea, and heard him whisper her name.

On comparing notes we found that the dream took place the very day and, allowing for the difference in longitude, even the very hour when the accident occurred!

AN AUSTRALIAN TRAGEDY SEEN IN IRELAND.

Although there is no transmission of sound, nor any of the dramatic developments which took place in the previous story, there was the instantaneous transmission of the scene of an accident from Australia to Ireland. Mrs. Green writes:

"I saw two respectably dressed females driving along in a vehicle like a mineral water cart. Their horse stopped at a water to drink, but as there was no footing, he lost his balance, and in trying to recover it he fell right in. With the shock the women stood up and shouted for help, and their hats rose off their heads, and as all was going on I turned away crying and saying, 'Was there no one at all to help them?' Upon which I awoke, and my husband asked me what was the matter. I related the above dream to him, and he asked me if I knew them. I said I did not, and thought I had never seen them. The impression of the dream and the trouble it brought was over me all day. I remarked to my son that it was the anniversary of his birthday and my own also, the 16th of the first month, and this is why I remember the day.

"The following third month I got a letter and a newspaper from my brother in Australia, named Allen, letting me know the sad trouble which had befallen him in the loss by drowning of one of his daughters and her companion. You will see by the description given in the paper how the events corresponded with my dream. My niece was born in Australia and I never saw her. Please return the paper at your convenience. Considering that our night is their day, I must have been in sympathy with the sufferers at the time of the accident, on the 10th of the first month, 1878."

The following extract from the Inglewood Advertiser shows that she actually saw what happened:

"A dreadful accident occurred in the neighborhood of Wedderburn on Wednesday last, resulting in the death of two women, named Lehey and Allen. It appears that the deceased were driving into Wedderburn in a spring cart from the direction of Kinypanial, when they attempted to water their horse on the dam of the boundary of Torpichen Station. The dam was ten or twelve feet deep in one spot, and into this hole they must have inadvertently driven, for Mr. W. McKechnie, manager of Torpichen Station, upon going to the dam some hours afterwards, discovered the cart and the horse under the water, and two women's hats floating on the water. * * The dam was searched, and the bodies of the two women, clasped in each other's arms, recovered.

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

It is an objection made by some orthodox folks to Spiritualistic services that in connection with them. On the other hand, it is probable most Spiritualists would assert that in the generality of churches there is too much. Before we are able to determine the accuracy of either position from a rational standpoint, we must have some definite understanding as to what the objectors mean by the term. It is ordinarily understood to mean an oral address of supplication to a supreme or intermediate power, but often presents itself in the churches as an elaboration of fulsome terms of adulation in a vain attempt to magnify the power for good (and evil) of Jehovah. In reality, however, it is an appeal for help to a greater power when our limited powers fail to sustain us in the flood of human trouble, or manifested in another form, when the heart, filled with a realization of the goodness and loving kindness of the Universal Father, overflows in thanksgiving to, and adoration of, the Great Oversoul.

THERE IS TOO LITTLE PRAYER

God has given us certain faculties, spiritual and physical, wherewith to work for the development of ourselves and the world we live in. One of these faculties, Reason, aided by the power of Will, will enable us to overcome by far the greater number of difficulties we have to contend with in this world, and we have no right to pray to God for help until we have exhausted all the means he has given us to help ourselves.

What should we say of a beggar who appealed to us for pecuniary assistance, if we discovered he had money in his pocket to meet his requirements? We should characterize him as unworthy and dishonest; and yet numbers place themselves in the same position by asking God for help before (figuratively speaking) their pockets are empty. Is it likely their prayers will be answered? No. He who works in any upward direction, to develop, expand or upraise anything in God's creation, prays more practically and efficaciously than the thousands who week after week supplicate the Great Spirit to do for them that which he has already endowed them with power to do for themselves. The injunction to "Lead a life of prayer" is excellent if properly understood, but we object to the literal interpretation of it, which recognizes the form instead of the symbol. If we are to make prayer the staple of our existence, let us have the genuine article—something wholesome and elevating, that will strengthen our souls, brighten our spirits, and shed its radiance around us.

There are four forms of prayer—Supplication, Work, Aspiration, and Adoration. The form we have most to do with in the present is Work, and let us pray hard in this direction, Sundays and weekdays, early and late. There is always something to be done to help those around us and beautify the world about us, let us not weary in well-doing, but when we feel our powers inadequate to accomplish the work which presents itself to us, then it is time to ask the aid of our Father in heaven, whose many servants (our spirit brothers and sisters) are ever ready to help the really needy. Closely connected with the prayer expressed in our everyday life and actions is the higher form of aspiration.

Fulfilling honestly our daily tasks, doing to the full of our abilities the duties that present themselves to us, there are still times when the spirit reaches out, as it were, beyond its ordinary plane, yearning for more light, more strength and power, to accomplish greater things than it has before essayed; this is Aspiration, sometimes expressed in words, sometimes in silent thought; its effect is to place the individual in sympathy with the plane of his aspiration, enabling him to draw from it all the power he is capable of receiving, and thus his soul is expanded and drawn nearer to this higher plane. The more frequent and earnest our aspiration, the more palpably do our spirits unfold to a comprehension of the love of God as displayed in his works, till, filled with emotion at its realization, the highest form of prayer is developed, and expresses itself in adoration. Let it not be thought we deprecate or condemn all forms of prayer; it is not so. There are combinations of words expressing ideas—beautiful and elevating—which tend to harmonize the minds of those who listen to them, leading their thoughts incontinently upwards towards the plane of the ideas they express. There are prayers which, in their formal rendering, would fall dead upon the ears and minds of the listeners, yet, charged with the magnetic influence of an aspiring, prayerful nature, become aglow with life and light. The polished rhetoric of an educated preacher may please the intellect but fail to awaken the emotions, whilst a few simple, heartfelt words from the lips of a comparatively uneducated man go straight to the heart and uplift the soul. Man praises God best who lives best, and the harmonial thinker will realize that "The glory to God on earth best given, is works whose good reach up to heaven."

Let us then apply ourselves to practical prayer, by working assiduously the whole time for the elevation of each other, and when we attempt to teach, throw Soul into our utterances, and thereby making them vehicles of inspiration, raise ourselves one step nearer that Beneficent being from whom all blessings flow.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

NATURAL PHYSICIAN.

The Physician can only be the servant or handmaid of Nature in the cure of

In reality we can do nothing; we can only remove the offending cause while

Performs the cure, and therefore we lay it down as a fundamental maxim in medicine that all a Physician can do is to act as a Servant to Nature.

CRIME AND CRIMINALS

A Very Radical View of the Subject.

To the Editor:—Does it prevent crime to kill criminals? In other words, to make it more impressive, are too many killed, or not enough?

For the recent premeditated killing of a king the assassin was neither hanged nor decapitated. The penalty imposed was imprisonment for life.

Bresci's imprisonment is torture.

Why?

Because it sentences him to do nothing.

"Bresci is to be tortured beyond the power of imagination because he will be forbidden to follow nature's law."—Chicago American.

From Moses to Christ, from Christ to the present hour, humanity has been contending with principles embodied in what is technically called law, or codes of law. And all such have found their base on the principle of revenge, embraced in the barbarous and infamous code of Moses, when he said: "Avenge the children of Israel." For such authority always claimed instructions from the Lord, but in that was not truthful. For proof and climax, read from 31st chapter Numbers, 16th to 18th verses.

No figures can express the numbers sacrificed in that prolonged and still continued struggle. Or how many kings have been throned and dethroned; or how many dynasties have risen and fallen in the terrible conflict? Something less than 2,000 years ago a new law-maker and law-breaker appeared on the scene in Judea, the land of Moses. His entrance into Jerusalem was in the most humble and unpretentious way conceivable—astride a donkey; hatless, coatless, shoeless, but not shirtless, that being his only garment.

Followed by a motley crowd of fishermen, beggars and Marys, who were or had been Magdalenes, shouting Hosannas, Hail to the Master, etc. And he promulgated a new law, which was in direct conflict with the very basis of the whole of the Mosaical code, and claimed divine authority.

"Ye have heard it hath been said an eye for an eye, but I say unto you resist not evil." And again: "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor." And all his teachings and acts were in utter violation of existing law. He preached sedition and anarchy in most emphatic terms. And there can be no mistake in this. He did not believe in killing those accused with or proved guilty of crime. Remember the answer when one was accused, and guilty of an act, the pulshment and penalty being stoned to death. "He that is without sin, let him cast a stone."—John, VIIIth chapter.

It was not that himself and disciples stole corn on the Sabbath to keep from starving, or because of his disorderly and unlawful acts in the temple that he was crucified, but for saying how utterly impossible it was for a rich man to be happy without dividing his all with the poor. And for repeating some of his sayings in an abrupt, and as was thought, aggressive way, four men were hanged in Chicago, on the supposition that some one in sympathy with their teaching had thrown the bomb that caused such awful and terrible destruction of life. But subsequent events have caused many to think it was thrown (under cover of the excitement) by a member of a clan, whose very life was pending, for neglecting to kill one of an opposing clan.

Did the authority in Italy make a mistake?

Did the authority in Chicago make a mistake?

Did both make a mistake?

To have done as the Jews did with Christ, would that have been the better way?

Who will answer?

Those meditating crime seldom or never think of the penalty. When they do, expect to escape. Had it been torture on the rack, followed by crucifixion, Bresci would have killed the king. Neither would it have unnerved or stayed the arm that threw the bomb.

Would the abolishment of the death penalty in Illinois tend to an increase of crime?

Would a restoration of the same in Wisconsin tend to a diminution?

Do sanguinary and vindictive laws prevent crime?

Never. During the reign of Henry VIII. 72,000 criminals were executed for theft and robbery. He reigned 88 years—nearly 2,000 a year. But what are we to think of this? Thirty-eight thousand were put to death for mendicity (beggary)—1,000 a year. There was no escape. To beg or steal a morsel to escape starvation was death; and all those vast numbers from a population presumably not one-tenth what it now is. And as it is, popularly phrased, a pious and religious monarch. But had less scruple in signing a death warrant to behead an innocent queen than a terrier dog has in killing a cat.

It has not been said or advanced as an argument that in all the past, in the present, but is most significant, that the majority of those called reformers, humanitarians, poets and scientists, have ever been opposed, both in theory and practice, to the killing of criminals to prevent crime.

The arguments presented thus far have been limited to only one phase of the great subject, others equally important omitted.

How many guilty escape, how many innocent suffer?

Douglass Jerrold, in a story called "The Lesson of Life," gives a striking view of the subject.

It is a dialogue between a common hangman and a priest: "I want your counsel in an affair of conscience." "Thou shalt have it." "Thou hast called death a punishment; I live by it, my profession. I speak this in private, is little less than arrant folly." "The saints protect me," said the priest. "All must die?" asked the hangman. "They come into the world doomed to that penalty." "I ask them if no virtue, no goodness, no wisdom, can escape death; why should it be thought the only doom for the blackest guilt?" Said the priest: "'Tis a point beyond my comprehension. You would not kill the culprit's soul? What horror dost thou talk? I have heard thee talk such consolation to a culprit I have thought it a blessed thing to die."

Important. At the earnest request of hundreds of my friends and former patients, I have prepared a Course of Lessons on the Psychic Science. This Course of Lessons include Psychic Healing, Vital and Personal Magnetism, Intuition, and like occult subjects. In its wide scope it not only teaches its pupils how to create themselves, but at the same time teaches them how to heal others of disease and how to be successful in their every venture, be it for political, commercial or social ascendancy.

The course is so plain that anyone who will take it up as a profession and give his time and attention to it can make a grand success in its practice. These lessons not only teach you how to heal disease but they also teach Personal Magnetism, through which you can silently influence those about you, so as to acquire influence, friends, prosperity, success in business, in fact, anything that you want. The course will be worth many times the price you pay for it, simply to cure yourself and increase your ability and eliminate any bad habits, such as the drink habit, tobacco habit, sexual excesses, etc. The entire course of instructions is taught by mail and you can matter every point in this science in the secrecy of your own home without loss of time in attending to your business. There are many Spiritualists who know a good thing when they see it. There are others, however, who do not seem to realize what is going on around them, and therefore miss many chances to enrich their minds and enlarge their understanding. Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World is furnished to our subscribers at less than cost, and should be in every family in the United States, whether Spiritualists or not. Volumes 1, 2 and 3 constitute a wonderful magazine of thought on Death in its multifarious phases; in fact you can not find in all the libraries of the world as valuable information in regard to Death as you will have presented to you in these three volumes. They are nicely printed, neatly and substantially bound, and are an ornament to any library. Volume 3 is furnished at 25 cents, much less than the actual cost to us, and the three volumes, when ordered in connection with a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker, only cost $1.10. Paper one year $1.00. The three volumes of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World (or any three of the premium books you may select), $1.10. RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

BY S. WEIL.

Cloth, $1.25. Paper, 50 cents.

This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion; that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts. TWO IN ONE

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IT IS A MOST EXCELLENT WORK.

This work is by DR. M. L. SHERMAN, assisted by PROF. W. F. LYON. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 480 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres. It treats of the Soul of Things; Intelligence in Substances; Animal Intellects; Purity; Salvation; Discords; Good and Evil; Unnatural Ideas; Church History; Progression; Inherent in Substance; The Nebulous Theory; Particles are Entities; Justice; Impregnation of the Virgin; The Science of Death; Spiritual Death; Immortality; Mourning; The Confounding of Language; The Spirit Abodes; Matter and Spirit; Size and Distance; Spiritual Organisms; Born Again; The Key; Spirit Biography; Goes to Heaven; A Slave Master; etc., etc.

The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual aliment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

VOL. 22 CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, SATURDAY, OCT. 20, 1900. NO. 569

The N. S. A. Weighed in the Balance. Will It Be Found Wanting?

HOW SHALL THE N. S. A. BE SUSTAINED?

Responsibility of Delegates—Practical Suggestions.

To the Editor:—In response to your request for my views upon the present status of the N. S. A., I submit the following as a result of close observation since 1893:

You ask and very pertinently, "Has the N. S. A. failed during the seven years of its existence to meet the requirements of Spiritualism and Spiritualists? If so, wherein? What will promote its welfare, and what will remedy its apparent defects?"

Not even the most sanguine Spiritualist could say that the present N. S. A. meets the requirements of Spiritualists. The methods employed in organizing and conducting the same have not been adapted to achieve great success, and each year seems to increase the distance between the body politic of Spiritualists and the N. S. A. Notwithstanding a general call was made in 1893, the attendance at the first convention did not represent adequately the movement. However, those who were present did yeoman service, and took hold of the work with a vigor which meant success, hoping that their efforts would be appreciated, and that later on those who did not respond to the call then, would fall into line and help push forward the great and important work of organization. In this the pioneers were disappointed, lack of interest, and even marked opposition was manifested, to a great degree and still continues. So long as Spiritualists are at variance upon many important points, and allow themselves to be influenced by jealousy and antagonize all who differ from them, the work of organization will be retarded. The annual conventions are now in a great measure arenas, where the welfare of Spiritualists, and measures which should be discussed for the benefit of societies and the protection of our genuine mediums seem of secondary importance when contrasted with the all-absorbing interest taken in the question as to who shall secure the coveted places upon the Board of Trustees. Can we expect, then, such methods to meet the needs of Spiritualists, who claim to, and should be working along the lines of Spiritual Harmonial Philosophy? The various useless and objectionable measures which have been adopted from time to time, in the form of amending or revising the Constitution and By-Laws of the association, has had much to do with alienating the people from the N. S. A. It is not for the members of the Board of Trustees to create, even if they could, a National Association, but to execute the measures adopted by the delegates of the convention, which should be the supreme body. If the Trustees fail in this duty, as has been suggested by some, it certainly is not calculated to produce practical or harmonious results. Co-operation is absolutely necessary.

On the other hand, if the delegates shirk their duty, voting carelessly upon important measures, without reflecting how their acts will affect the Spiritualists as a whole—if they disregard the responsibility which has been placed upon them by the societies they represent, then the N. S. A. will not be a success. Or, if the Board of Trustees relegate to themselves the right to ignore the instructions of the convention, when carried by a majority vote, and act in accordance with their own inclinations, then their actions are indeed open to criticism, and so far are responsible for dissatisfaction.

Why is it that the N. S. A. is not more solidly organized after seven years' hard work. Between $25,000 and $30,000 have been spent in that time, yet where do we find ourselves at the present time? The amount of labor expended by President Barrett is well known and appreciated, as well as that of all other earnest workers. Much missionary work has been done and societies organized, and mass meetings held, but most of the societies so chartered are numerically and financially weak, and are unable to contribute more than a mere pittance towards the financial support of the parent body. Altogether the financial support so far, has been barely sufficient for running expenses, and no Board of Trustees can reach practical results when they are obliged constantly to appeal for financial aid. In view of all that has been done, the N. S. A. is not on a solid foundation, but is dependent on the fluctuating interest of the people.

What, then, is the matter? We answer, that the N. S. A. has been handicapped from the beginning, on account of the weak condition of the majority of the Spiritualist societies throughout the country, and which have been unable to respond to the needs of a National delegate body. In view of this fact, has the time not come to adopt the plan of lay membership? This would enhance individual interest and render financial aid by the payment of a yearly fee,

Under the peculiar conditions which have prevailed among Spiritualists, and the lack of interest everywhere manifested, and the difficulty experienced by the officers in carrying on the work of the local societies, a few years have sufficed to show that the N. S. A. could not be sustained by the societies composing its membership, and that the greater part of the financial burden must be borne by individual Spiritualists, who, no matter how generous they were in their support, were debarred by the provisions of the Constitution from having any vote in the annual conventions or voice in its deliberations. This shut out many earnest Spiritualists who lived in localities where there was no regular society, and so could not be represented in the convention, unless by chance they were appointed to serve as a delegate by proxy for some society of which they knew nothing.

At the last convention, one of the largest subscribers to the Mayer Fund was placed in this unenviable position. No one questioned his interest in the cause, his integrity, or his ability, yet the Constitution compelled him to sit idly by until he was given a proxy vote, while many so-called societies, which in many cases only held one or two meetings in a year, by virtue of a charter which cost five dollars, had the right to appoint a proxy who could vote the expenditure of thousands of dollars without contributing more than the merest pittance, which in many instances was paid by a member for the purpose of representation. We fail to see wherein this differs from individual membership.

Don't misunderstand me and assume that in my opinion the payment of a sum of money ought to entitle the donor to a delegate's seat. Far from that, but it ought to be self-evident to all, that those who supply the financial support ought to be entitled to some consideration in its expenditure. The Massachusetts State Association, which has always been most flourishing, by adopting the plan of individual membership, with the right to vote upon the payment of yearly dues, augments its membership each year, and continued interest is maintained by its movable mass meetings. An amendment to the Constitution, providing for individual membership, has been introduced for the consideration of the next convention. I trust that it will be adopted, as it will be an incentive to many to attend the conventions, who do not do so now.

Individual membership would not be necessary if the societies which constitute the N. S. A. were financially strong and able to support the National Association. Such is far from being the case.

The writer has traveled from Maine to California, visiting many societies in the trip across the continent, only to find that with a few notable exceptions, the officers of the societies claimed they had the utmost difficulty in meeting current expenses. Lack of interest and non-support, was the universal complaint. It is estimated that there are over 600 societies of Spiritualists, yet only about 30 of that number are able to employ the best talent obtainable and maintain meetings throughout the season, without anxious thought as to where the money is coming from to meet the bills. This is to be deplored, and every measure should be taken to strengthen the societies already organized. This being the state of affairs, how can such societies, being unable to meet local expenses, subscribe sufficient funds to carry on the National Association? If it were not for the individual subscriptions the expenses could not be met. Why then do so many strenuously object to individuals having a voice in the conduct of the N. S. A.?

There are many inclined to find fault with the financial expenditures, yet the laborer is worthy of his hire, and if a N. S. A. is really wanted, provisions must be made to pay the bills. Many do not have the opportunity of finding out how much money this requires yearly, and they will perhaps be interested in the following statement of the yearly receipts and expenditures, as compiled from the official reports. The fiscal year closes October 1 of each year.

Mediums Fund.		Babe Will Fund.
1894.....	$ 49.25	1896..	$359.00
1895–1896..	465.89	1897..	107.90
1897.....	5.00
	$520.14		$466.90

These special funds cannot be used for general expenses.

The receipts and expenditures of the General Fund are as follows:

Year ending	Receipts	Expenditures	Balance
Oct. 1, 1894.....	$2,653.06	$2,554.46	$ 98.60
" 1895.....	4,238.15	2,999.27	1,238.88
" 1896.....	6,207.96	5,114.29	1,093.67
" 1897.....	4,229.91	4,284.44	215.47
" 1898.....	2,934.91	2,678.76	256.15

We wish to note in connection with the above financial statements, that they have been compiled from the printed official reports of the treasurer at each convention, and yet are to some extent misleading. For instance the expenditures of 1896 include the payment of $440 due President Barrett from the year before, and that the convention voted to increase his salary from $1,000 to $1,200. These items alone added to the expenditures $640 extra. At the close of the fiscal year, October, 1897, there is a seeming surplus of $245.47, yet no mention is made of the outstanding liabilities, which in part consisted of $631 due for President Barrett's salary, besides which he had given his note for $259.50, which he was under no legal obligation to pay, it having been the legitimate outcome of his work for the N. S. A. in connection with the California State Association. Instead of a surplus there was a large deficit at the time.

The same state of affairs is apparent in the next report. At the close of the fiscal year, October 1, 1898, the treasurer reported a surplus of $256.15, though at the time there was left as a legacy to the incoming Board of Trustees, the sum of $2,100 in unpaid bills. This amount in liabilities confronted Mr. T. J. Mayer when he again took up the duties of treasurer after an absence of two years. How many of the delegates present at the convention knew the actual state of affairs? Why should such misleading reports be submitted to any body of delegates? Such reports are referred to a committee and that is the last heard of them, in most cases. Where in some instances dissatisfaction was expressed by members of the committees regarding the expenditure of certain sums of money, and recommendations offered looking to economy in the future, the committee was promptly called to order(?) by an officer of the N. S. A. and distinctly informed that it was not the province of a committee to proffer instructions to the Board of Trustees, as to the manner of conducting the affairs of the association. This happened in other instances, where the members of committees felt that, as delegates to the Supreme body, it was their right to offer recommendations looking to the betterment of the association. Such proceedings are not calculated to inspire confidence on the part of the delegates or their constituents. All the affairs of the N. S. A. should be open to comment by those interested. Too much of the work is done in the committee room, and for fear of creating inharmony never is brought to the notice of the house. Every delegate should have ample opportunity of knowing the inside workings of the Association. It is their just right. Star chamber methods will never enthuse the people.

I regret not being able to give the official figures for the year ending October 1, 1899 (as the yearly report has not yet been printed), for to the great surprise of the delegates assembled at the last convention, they found that after all the expenses of the year had been paid, and the liabilities of $2,100 left from the preceding year had been settled as well, there was left in the treasury as a balance about $2,600, which gave new courage to all, and it seems as if the N. S. A. was given a new lease of life. This year there will be a much larger balance, and in addition there is every reason to hope that the impetus given to the movement by the acquiring of the Home Fund will place the Association on a financial footing where it has never been before. The present administration has labored earnestly and deserves credit.

I would like to see the money subscribed for the Mayer Home Fund set aside as an endowment fund to support the headquarters, and the income used for no other purpose. This disposition of the funds would insure confidence, and many would subscribe to the Endowment Fund who would not subscribe to the general fund. If the entire sum subscribed is put into the general funds, it will not take long to use it up in the current expenses, and the N. S. A. will be in the same condition as before.

From the first I have stood for an association conducted upon business principles, and if it seems right in my opinion to criticise some of the methods employed in the conduct of the N. S. A., I will not hesitate to do so. In view of my earnest desire to see it established upon a firm foundation, no officer or trustee should consider such criticism actuated by any other desire than for its welfare. Honest criticism is always productive of good, if taken in the right spirit. For years the delegates have accepted without question almost anything that was proposed by the leaders. It is time now that every delegate and every Spiritualist should stop and ask themselves the question: "Upon what foundation does the N. S. A. rest? Whence comes its support, and how far are we responsible?"

If the N. S. A. has to depend wholly upon the dues and contributions from the chartered societies, it would soon go out of existence. Therefore why not call for a statement of the facts, and if it is found that the financial burden falls for the most part upon individual Spiritualists, then let the delegates to the convention of October, 1900, vote that they be accorded convention privileges as a recognition of their financial support which has alone made it possible for the N. S. A. to continue its existence for seven years.

There is no doubt that the greater part of the $10,000 subscribed to the Mayer Fund came from individuals, and is it just that the delegates or proxies should have the power to control the outlay of money they did not subscribe?

The coming convention will settle many mooted questions, and it is to be hoped that all personal feelings will be set aside, so that the outcome will be a stronger feeling of co-operation than ever before. It is to be hoped that no efficient officer and trustee will be supplanted for the mere sake of change. The efficient work of the present Board of Trustees in successfully wiping out all liabilities seems to premise a successful future for the N. S. A. But all their efforts will be a failure if they do not receive the hearty co-operation of all who are desirous to forward the cause of organization.

The financial question will be helped greatly by allowing every earnest Spiritualist to enroll as an individual member by complying with the requirements of the Constitution in regard to dues, etc., to be provided for in the proposed amendment.

The objection which has been raised, that individual membership would be undemocratic, is in my opinion not well sustained. The very fact that any worthy member of the cause can become a working member is decidedly democratic, and will be a government by the people and for the people, while on the other hand, the present system is decidedly autocratic and exclusive to such an extent as to prevent the attainment of practical results. The majority of the chartered societies of the N. S. A. cannot afford to spend the amount necessary to send a delegate to attend the conventions, hence are obliged to allow a proxy to serve for them, who in most instances is not in touch with their needs, or else go unrepresented.

It would be interesting to note in this connection, what proportion of the delegates at the convention have their expenses paid by the societies they represent. We venture to say that three-fourths who attend are obliged to meet their individual expenses.

Let us, then, face the situation boldly, and with a determination to profit by the experiences of the past seven years, try to remedy the mistakes, and band together to place the N. S. A. where it will be enabled to carry on the great work for which it was organized.

In presenting these facts to the readers of The Progressive Thinker, it is with the sincere hope that those who expect to attend the coming convention as delegates, and have not closely followed the workings of the N. S. A. and so are unfamiliar with its vital needs and necessities, will be better prepared to act as to ways and means for sustaining it in the future.

The N. S. A. is a vital necessity, and to strengthen it should be the proud duty of all Spiritualists. With their co-operation we hope the time will come when the N. S. A. will be a power in the land for good, and that through it the rights of all Spiritualists and the protection of genuine mediums will be assured. M. E. CADWALLADER.

EXPRESSIVE.

Besides Being Exceedingly Suggestive.

To the Editor:—I regret that want of time prevents my complying in full with your request to present my views upon the specific questions submitted to me by you in regard to the National Spiritualists Association. To the question asked: "Should the National Association assume to have the power and knowledge to cut out, formulate, evolve or fashion a new pattern for a Deity, and label it 'Infinite Intelligence?'" I submit as follows:

I suppose the National Association has as much right as anyone or body of persons has to formulate a conception of Deity and label it anything which to the mind of such a body best expresses what its conception has born into existence. You see, there is a great deal in a name. We are told that we are what we make ourselves to be, no matter by what name we are known. But for all that, there is ever so much in a name. Language is made up of words, which in many instances originated in the efforts of individuals to imitate sounds, forms, etc. Some words are exceedingly expressive, for instance, "Hell" as a place where the wicked are tormented, is a very expressive word. "Sheol," meaning the same thing, is altogether to mild. Some things have several names. Some persons have adopted numerous aliases designed to conceal their identity. The word "damn," in very common use, has great force and meaning, as when persons are angry, or in great earnestness, they want, sharp, emphatic words in which to express themselves. "Hell and damnation" is an expression in very common use by profane persons, and originated in the churches, and was used to describe the fate awaiting the wicked. Spiritualists never use it. They never swear.

When we come to that which most appropriately describes the attributes of Deity, or God, the selection of a suitable name becomes very difficult. This is not the first time that poor Humanity has been at its wits end over the matter. It naturally desires to be just on both sides. It does not desire to wrong "Infinite Intelligence," Deity, or itself. This is an exceedingly important matter, and no mistakes should be made.

Why not consult THAT which it is proposed to name, "Infinite Intelligence" before going so far as to actually proclaim to the world this new appellation? "Infinite Intelligence" must be everywhere. It must be fully aware of what the Association is proposing to do. The Association ought to be able in some manner to get an expression of its views upon this important subject. There are many people to be found who claim to hold close communion with Deity. I know of several who claim to be sons of Deity. Their relationship should be carefully examined, and if found genuine their views would be very important. Why act hastily in so momentous a matter? Let the Association take at least a year to consider it. Appoint committees; one on names; one on attributes; and one on history, and arrange so that in six months from now to have the committees come together and hold a conference. These committees should have power to send for persons and papers.

I hope I may be pardoned for suggesting that the Rev. Moses Hull should be Chairman. He is up in bibliology, and if anyone can do the subject justice, he can. He will take in the situation at a glance. He knows what a variety of Spiritualists there is, and he will suggest something that will be likely to please them all. You see, we are struggling for harmony. This must not be overlooked. He will not forget when he comes to the subject of "attributes," to consider the fidelity of the Jewish God to his chosen people; how he threw down the walls of Jericho through the blowing of rams' horns by the priests, and the shouting of the people, so that all of the inhabitants of the city, excepting one harlot and her family, could be butchered. How that, at Joshua's command, the sun and moon stood still in the heavens for the space of about a day, to enable the Jews to avenge themselves upon their enemies. That was a God worth having, when we are in for destroying a portion of the human race. Then he will also consider how this same God put lying spirits into the mouths of his prophets so as to induce King Ahab to go out to battle, that he might be destroyed. He will consider the attributes of God as manifested by Jesus. Of course, it will be difficult to harmonize these things, but probably the committee will be equal to the task. It will require almost "Infinite Intelligence" on the part of the committee, to come to an appropriate conclusion, and select a name that will be more appropriate than the various names which have heretofore been in use, by which the human race has come to know and recognize Deity. The probability is, that if the subject is considered in all its bearings, the time of the Association will be occupied in the matter for at least a whole year, and it is hardly worth while to discuss the other questions which have been submitted.

The "National" is an important body, and I say, in all seriousness, that its existence should be continued. It should, however, remember that the appellation "Infinite Intelligence," limits to "Intelligence" the attributes and powers which must be conceded to Deity.

A RESPECTFUL HINT.

Dedicated to the N. S. A. by Charles Dawbarn.

The trouble with Spiritualists is that, aside from the proved facts of spirit return and human immortality, there is not one point of belief on which they can unite. A Spiritualist may be a Brahman, a Mohammedan, a Mormon or even a Christian. In any case his avowed Spiritualism does not prevent his knocking his heretical neighbor on the head, if it can be done safely.

It is equally a matter of course that, in this era of the printing press, the Christian church as a whole, and its 700 sects in particular, have myriads of believers in spirit return, who would cut each other's theological throats with religious equanimity.

Such is the tree of human nature, which, in its combined beauty and ugliness, is supposed to be the glory of our little planet. Every tree is rooted in something, and, in the case of human nature, the root is supposed to start from an almighty Man-God, who has proclaimed the story of Creation in certain Divine Revelations, now called "Bible."

The world has been run on Divine Revelations, which for a myriad centuries covered the entire field of human beliefs. These Revelations first rested upon the facts of Creation in six days. The Bible further taught that the earth was the great center of the universe. That inspired untruth had to be drowned out in the blood of those who had discovered and asserted its falsity. The geologist was another heretic, who discovered that an ounce of scientific fact was better than a pound of Divine fiction. The unfortunate geologist was soon gagged in the name of the Bible. But his grandson has continued to dig holes and discover more truths. Fossils in rocks tell truth. It is fossils in pulpits who deceive. And when the historical fact of evolution was discovered and proclaimed the entire theory of creation shivered and shook. And even to-day, in the old age of the 19th century, college professors and pulpit ministers are theologically sand-bagged, and then turned out to theologically starve, for daring to inform the world that the present entire system of salvation rests upon biblical ignorance of natural law. They were accused of even daring to assert that the well-believed theory of biblical inspiration could not stand against the Higher Criticism and the scientific fact of to-day.

It is difficult for some of us, who have fought our slow way into freedom, to realize that numbers calling themselves Spiritualists are still hoppled to the Bible, and browsing upon the old theological thistles by the wayside. They dare not uphold Bible astronomy, Bible geology, Bible creation of man and Bible salvation. But still they revere the old; and believe man of the remote past was receptive to a higher truth than is man of to-day. Such believers help build churches, and support ministers who are sworn to teach only the old inspired ignorance. And when science speaks through modern lips, these modern devotees shout, as in days of old, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

I am well aware that the worthy delegates to the present convention of the N. S. A.—to whom this hint is respectfully addressed—dare not insinuate Bible astronomy or geology; Bible creation, damnation or salvation in any proposed statement of spiritual belief. But I also know that some among them want to insinuate the old Bible God, worshiped all through an ignorant past, into what ever credal statement may be adopted. It is insisted that he must be recognized or—something will happen. Such believers want to proclaim the fatherhood and love of this old Deity, and this in the face of all history, sacred or profane. They dare not proclaim the great fact that man is God Junior, with full power in the name of Cosmos, to create, uncreate, and re-create, just as in his judgment he may deem best for his own interest, here and hereafter.

This is the hour for short speeches, and to the point. I want, affectionately, to warn my brother subscribers to the N. S. A., that if the society hopes to command respect from intelligent believers in human immortality, it must rest upon man, and not upon God. Man mortal and man the spirit, shaking hands and working together, can compel destiny, and achieve universal happiness.

There is no other way. God to the contrary, notwithstanding. Amen.

Divine Intelligence.

To the Editor:—Now that our National Spiritualist Association will soon again convene, it is to be hoped that the delegates, who at the last convention gave us a Declaration of Principles, or creed, declaring our belief in an Infinite Intelligence, will, if they think they were mistaken, have the right to say so, and show wherein they were mistaken.

It is to the word "Infinite" I object. Did they substitute the word Divine instead of the word Infinite, so as to read Divine Intelligence, I would not object, for I do believe in a Divine Intelligence.

But in what does Infinite Intelligence consist? Who can answer? No one, yet we are called upon to accept it as such. Some may argue, but who can explain? Reason says no clear and conclusive answer can be given. Ask, too, any well-informed disembodied human spirit, did he ever see an Infinite Intelligence? If honest, the answer will be, No! We know of none, and so our human theory of Infinite Intelligence is largely imaginary, having no clear conception of His capacities, His limitations, or infinitudes, His nature, or existence. And, therefore, as the question now rests, the preponderance of opinion of the American spiritual public is against the innovation, in our constitution, of the words Infinite Intelligence. DR. R. GREER.

NOTE TO THE N. S. A.

On God-Making and Creed-Making.

Those who have had the opportunity and pleasure of visiting the Field Museum at Jackson Park, Chicago, will probably remember the array of gods there that have been collected from various parts of the earth and arranged to show how the unlearned man materializes his conception of the power that presides over the universe. The deity of the lowest barbarian is not a handsome character. His features are irregular and his head peaked in a way that gives him a disreputable and sinister aspect. But he fully suffices to satisfy the low imagination of his worshiper.

At Canton, China, there is a pretentious building, highly ornamented and colored, that is called the Temple of the Five Hundred Gods. There are rows of elevated seats along the sides of the temple where rest the embodied effigies of five hundred deities, who are variously attired, are of different shades of complexion, and whose features express every shade of fawning servility or repulsive ugliness. To this convenient collection one can repair and select the god that suits his fancy or disposition. It saves him the task of making a god for himself.

When we study the subject of god-making we note that the lower a people are in civilization the more crude and gross their deity is, and as men become better informed and comprehend more of the operations of nature their god-idea expands and deity becomes more and more remote until it ceases to be a personal entity and finally results in an "infinite intelligence." When they reach that stage definition had better be wholly omitted, for the attempt is a virtual acknowledgment of inability to express their thought in clear language. How can anything be defined until it is first comprehended? and a finite mind of short experience and very limited knowledge has no grasp on infinity. It is simply a waste of time for the N. S. A. to try to include in words a description of something that they nor any one else has ever seen or known in any way. Leave such speculation to those who are lower down in the scale of intelligence and give attention to the serious relations of life and the duties that long experience of the human race has found to be important and imperative. Wisdom is founded wholly on knowledge, and what we should believe can only reasonably rest upon what we know or what has been demonstrated by some one.

If a declaration of principles must be made it should not include speculation or personal fancies, as these are known to be transient and mutable. All the gods, either concrete or ideal, are the inventions of persons that have some interest in having them believed in, and as genuine Spiritualism aims at truth alone it cannot include a scheme of imposition. Any platform of Spiritualism, in order to be effective and generally acceptable, must aim at the present betterment of men, in securing justice to all; and advocate as a religious obligation such beneficent measures as will make the world a happier place to live in and the human race more worthy to occupy it.

Elkhart, Ind. O. H. MURRAY.

CONCRETE FACTS

Worth More Than Abstract Speculations.

The National Association can do little, if anything, for the individual Spiritualist, beyond enlarging the scope of his labors and influence in behalf of human progress. It need not formulate a statement of principles for him, for, if a believer in the utility of creeds, he already has one of his own.

It can not furnish work for the unemployed, bestow alms upon all dependents, or provide offices for those who aspire to place and power. Because it can do none of these things, however, is not an indication of its inability to accomplish a great work.

While it may assume to deal in an authoritative manner with such an abstruse theme as "Infinite Intelligence," its efforts in that line will never receive general approval. Many Spiritualists see no good reason for embalming their conceptions of deity in articles of faith or a statement of principles, for to them God is unknown and unknowable. The reverend ministers and representatives of deity have not yet presented satisfactory credentials to the court of reason, and, until they can do so and prove they possess a more intimate knowledge of "Infinite Intelligence" than the rest of mankind, their statements will not be generally accepted as endowed with any peculiar authority.

To students and investigators, a few concrete facts are of greater worth than millions of abstract speculations. The minds of men are always hungry for facts, because they point the way toward truth. Give the world facts showing their falsity, and the creeds of christendom will surely decay and disappear.

Soaring into the realm of abstract metaphysics may be a very pleasant pastime, but to the pilgrim on Life's dusty highway these excursions are of doubtful value. After the wings of your imagination become weary, a foundation of irrefragable facts is good to rest upon.

The churches have been proclaiming a pretended knowledge of God for centuries, and yet the world appears to be as ignorant of deity now as it was a thousand years ago. Why not leave this question to the churches?

Why not deal only with that which is within the realm of the knowable?

If Spiritualists know anything worth while, let it be stated.

The world needs no new fetters, but rather unfettered freedom, that its growing perception of truth may not be arrested.

A SUBSTITUTE.

The N. S. A. and Infinite Intelligence.

It was formerly and perhaps still is in some parts of the world considered essential for a youth to pass seven years' apprenticeship in order to acquire a competent knowledge of an ordinary trade. The N. S. A. has now served an apprenticeship of this duration to the gigantic business of organizing Spiritualists, among whom an idea largely prevailed that organization was some kind of poison utterly destructive of their usefulness and imperiling their very existence. The success of this undertaking has not perhaps, up to the present time, been so great as some of us hoped. It has, I believe, on the whole, and under the circumstances, been equal to anything we had a right to expect.

Mistakes have been made, no doubt, but the greatest mistake has been the half-hearted support of some in the Spiritualist ranks and the non-support of nearly all the rest.

In the space allowed me I feel that I must pass over matters very lightly and address myself to what seems to be the burning question of Infinite Intelligence. I cannot but think that those who are loudest in their condemnation are more frightened than hurt. There is a vast difference between Infinite Intelligence and an Infinitely Intelligent Personality. A person, at least in the human sense in which we understand the word, is necessarily limited by the conditions of personality, is one of many persons and cannot be called infinite without absurdity. But that intelligence in the abstract is infinite I can see no way of evading other than by accepting the most complete form of materialism. Spiritualists are ever foremost in proclaiming eternal progression. That means progression without end, of intelligence among other things. If the share of intelligence which each man and woman, angel and archangel, possesses is capable of development without end there can be no limit placed to the quantity of intelligence in the universe. Intelligent existences must always be finite, but abstract intelligence I can view in no other light than as infinite. It is the belief in Infinite Intelligence and not an Infinite Intelligence which was asserted in the Declaration of Principles adopted last year.

In writing this I am far from admitting that this is the best expression that might be used. In my opinion it is not nearly comprehensive enough, I would suggest as a substitute something about equivalent to this: Infinite Spirit from which all existences proceed and by which all are sustained.

One word more and I will close. Many among us object to believing anything. To them the word belief has a theological flavor. They are the people who know it all. But as we grow older in experience we sometimes discover that in many points our knowledge was only belief after all.

IS A NECESSITY.

The National Association of Spiritualists.

It seems to be a question for general discussion whether the N. S. A. should be continued. Many deem it a luxury—because expense is attached to it. If this rule were applied to all conditions of life, we would find everything we partake of or enjoy is a luxury.

The everlasting question: "What does it cost?" is applied to all movements and plans made or proposed by humanity. In the direction of humanizing and spiritualizing the world's people, there should be no question of cost. We should ask, rather, as to the merit and probability of the movement.

If Spiritualism stands for anything practical—if it develops human helps—if it conserves mental, moral and spiritual worth—if it proves continuity of life and spirit communion, then it is worth propagating and utilizing. It is debasing human intelligence and our inter-relationship to say: "Let the spirits do it all." Surely a portion of the effort, and probably the basis of possibility, rests with the denizens of earth. Physical sustenance and worldly organization belong to us—and not the spirits— to achieve. Hence we should combine our efforts upon mutual plans, rather than trust to desultory efforts. In combination there is strength—and of course, weakness in independent individualism. All nature organizes atoms and forces for grand effects. Every progress made by humanity has been the result of combined support and approval—perhaps not always by the majority; but always by combinations of energies and desires.

The majority can be either useful or harmful, and the minority may, by combined effort, achieve final good.

The first needful result to be achieved for an organization of Spiritualists, was a combination of persons to that end—no matter whether a majority or minority. That was accomplished, but certain others saw fit to oppose the movement, even after being started. It is probable that one person opposing, offsets the labor of several assisting. It is not necessary to oppose if we feel it best not to help.

Let all achieve who can. And it is better to make a forward movement in some manner than to stand still forever.

The N. S. A. has not served its best possible purposes, and no one claims it has. But because of some failures it is occasionally condemned wholesale. We should each and all feel disposed to criticise and suggest—but to condemn is showing only a destructive spirit.

It is almost universally desired that we organize as Spiritualists for co-operation and human helpfulness. We have the N. S. A., and our plain duty is to more fully perfect its plans and unfold its utilities. What it lacks, is because of our failure to help and advise.

Having been for several years trained to a business life, I constantly see the need of business methods in the public cause of Spiritualism. Money and numbers are the essentials of our organizations. True, also, that we need leaders and executives, much as we taboo being led. All are not able to execute, but each can sustain.

The cost of a convention is often computed, and thus people are prejudiced against its utility. The N. S. A. conventions do not tax its treasury, nor that of its auxiliaries; for the delegates and attendants (as a rule) pay their own expense. The outlay is a pleasure, because it brings personal results by a vacation from other pursuits, and profit in the commingling of congenial souls and the general benefit gained intellectually and spiritually from the combined talent that otherwise never would be brought together.

It is thus a personal profitable outlay. Beside that, the public effect is worth the cost, and without this convention the outlay of money would not be made and the effect would be lost.

This convention also calls aid to the public cause that otherwise would not be given. It has organized state and local societies which are in the same way holding meetings of good effect. But these do not have the widespread influence of the N. S. A. To hold only State conventions would be to limit results.

But all public work outside of the annual Convention of the N. S. A. and its own executive business, should be controlled and performed by the State and local associations. Mass meetings and missionary work belong to the States within their jurisdiction. And these in return should not trespass upon the local societies.

The N. S. A. should be executive and not legislative. It should have no other auxiliaries than State associations.

The proposed amendments for personal members should not pass. As a delegate I shall oppose them. A donor of money should not create a class privilege.

Only when we get the N. S. A. as a body delegated by the State associations, and the local societies be merged into the State bodies, will I think it best to meet biennially. As now constituted let us meet annually.

Whatever may be desired should be freely advocated. But if the critics do not attend the convention, nor officially communicate therewith, what right will they have to complain? Let us have consistency.

A very important item for the N. S. A. is to attend to its constructive duties with the best possible wisdom in control—letting all chronic fault-finders go unnoticed until they perish by their own poison.

The philosophy, science and religion of Spiritualism is worthy of development and promulgation. We need to learn how to expand our usefulness and to protect all true exponents. There is more need to protect the honest and true than to detect all the frauds, though the latter may be legion. They who debase every principle of honor will soon or late expose themselves. We should as individuals and organizations seek the true, beautiful and good. When local societies will support their efforts for intellectual and spiritual results, and thus attract persons upon these planes, there will be the falling away of sensationalism and thus the death-knell of fraud. So long as premiums are offered for the startling, and little heed paid to the instructive and comforting, we will invite unprincipled persons as exponents and workers. We need not concern ourselves about fraud, but so organize our associated bodies for spiritual labor that character and worth may be protected and find agreeable fields of effort.

We are suffering from a lack of knowledge of the competent and worthy. By strengthening our capacity, by enlarging our sphere of co-operation, we shall find the means to make the N. S. A. a conservator of the highest good.

The declaration of principles will then express our highest wisdom. The present declaration is defective, and it is well to discuss it. I have had my say and shall not be satisfied with any "We Believe" nor the indefinite "Infinite Intelligence." We surely can make a declaration that will affirm what most of the Spiritualists endorse and possibly have proven.

Spiritualism comprehends all that is true and can be proven. With such a field we should declare that which is positive, and in no manner utter an opinion or belief. No new definition or use of terms will settle the God question. "God" must ever be a term used to express the unfathomed source of life and order. Hence we cannot limit, but must ever give our adoration to an eternal source of incomprehensible power immanent in all form and force. Law is true and can be comprehended and discovered. That design is back of law seems to be unwarranted.

Finite intelligence cannot postulate infinite intelligence without accepting the theory of design—hence personality. Infinite intelligence is incomprehensible, hence the Spiritualists should not affirm it. Let us have a sensible declaration that we can with reason go before the world as a people convinced of truth and not endorsing a belief.

AN OHIO VIEW.

Improvements That May Be Made.

To the Editor:—Your circular letter of September 1, asking therein my opinion on certain points named in said letter was duly received, and I most thoroughly appreciate your motive as well as your interest in the N. S. A. in asking others their opinions on the subject named, and will as briefly as possible state my views.

First as to "Infinite Intelligence."

I shall not attempt to discuss the question at any length, especially so, as the matter has been so ably handled by the different writers in The Progressive Thinker during the last year.

I am not presumptive enough to suppose that I could throw any light on the subject, but can only state my belief.

We see Intelligence manifested everywhere and I believe that Intelligence is Infinite; I cannot prove it to one who denies it, neither can anyone prove the contrary, and I see no earthly reason why Spiritualists should quarrel over it.

The National Association in adopting the principles they did at their last annual convention at Chicago had no idea of formulating a creed or setting up a God as understood by the world at large.

I see no good reason why "Infinite Intelligence" should deter any Spiritualists from aiding the N. S. A.

The difference lies more in the language used in the discussions than in the principle itself, and I believe there is more substantial agreement on this question than appears on the surface.

I am in favor of the N. S. A. whether as a body they reaffirm their belief in "Infinite Intelligence" or not.

Brother Lockwood calls it "Principles of Nature," and I call it "Infinite Intelligence," and if understood, the language we both use means substantially the same thing, hence I have no disposition to quarrel with Brother Lockwood.

You ask if the National Association has met the requirements of Spiritualists and Spiritualism during the years of its existence.

That it has failed to meet the views of a large proportion of the great body of Spiritualists, judging from the attendance at its annual convention and the financial support it has received, there can be no doubt, and I should say it had at least partially failed.

The cause of this partial failure is not so easy to determine; however, it is a very easy thing to criticise another's actions, but a much harder thing to do better.

I should say that the financial matters connected with the Association have not always been conducted in a business-like manner, the results attained are not adequate to the means expended, too much has been paid in salaries and traveling expenses, which expenditure has necessitated so much begging at our annual conventions from the delegates who could ill afford to contribute, as in most cases they had all their own expenses to pay, which in many cases was all they could afford to contribute to the cause.

It has been of little or no benefit to the chartered societies so far; it has, however, been the means of enabling a few to travel on half-fare rates, which to my mind is of a very questionable benefit to the cause at large.

However, this can all be very easily remedied, it only needs the active co-operation of the great body of Spiritualists to make it a great power for good.

If as in the past, so many stand aloof and complain, instead of putting their shoulders to the wheel, it will necessarily be shorn of much of its usefulness.

Its real foes are within and not without its folds.

To promote its welfare I would abolish the per capita tax, trusting to the voluntary contributions of liberal-minded people. I would admit delegates to our annual conventions (with power to act on all questions) from all organized societies, whether chartered by the N. S. A. or not.

I know this would be a radical departure from the past, but I believe such a course would awaken an interest in the organization such as has not yet been seen. As it is, but few of the chartered societies pay their per capita tax, and if the by-laws were enforced there would be but a very few delegates to our annual conventions who were entitled to take part in the proceedings.

I would hold a series of mass-meetings in the various cities of the United States and Canada during the coming year in the interest of the Association. My experience in holding such meetings in Ohio is that they can be made self-supporting, and will awaken an interest in the cause wherever held.

I do not believe the Spiritualists of America can afford to let the N. S. A. pass into oblivion.

In conclusion let me urge the Spiritualists of America to send delegates to the coming Cleveland Convention, and lend their aid in making the National Association what it ought to be.

Come, brothers, let us get together.

DR. PEEBLES' POINTS.

Upon the N. S. A. and Cognate Subjects.

However odious comparisons may be, they are suggestive if not instructive. September 12, 13, 14, the Michigan Annual Methodist Conference met here in Battle Creek for church business. There were five hundred Methodist preachers present, who were entertained freely by the citizens of our little city of 21,000.

Connected with the general Methodist conference is the "Church Extension," organized in 1864, and during the last year has collected and disbursed, so says their report, over $6,559,000. The working value of the loan fund to-day is 2,356,000. Besides the new churches that have been built from this fund, 11,301 of the poorer churches scattered throughout the United States have received aid. During the period of a little over thirty years the Methodists have increased from 6,800 traveling preachers to 16,122, and the membership has increased 2,474,037. This is a sample of what conviction, energy, and organization can do—and does do.

Some of our Spiritualists boastingly claim from 20,000,000 devotees, all the way down to 9,000,000 and 7,000,000—a vast individualized, unorganized mass! This is the lowest estimate with one exception that we remember having seen in our journals. And what have these millions done? What does the last census show? And yet there are Spiritists who bitterly oppose all organization, "The spirits, the dear spirits," say they, "will do it all, saving the world." China has been a nation of Spiritists for 4,000 years and more. Spirit phenomena are almost as common (or were when I was traveling in China) in the streets and temples as were the Canton sampans in the river from which the girl-babies were often thrown and drowned; and what, I ask, is the mental, moral and spiritual status of China to-day?

This Methodist report further says that the 640 new churches on our Western frontier-lands gathered into the Sunday-schools the past year 41,417 children. How many progressive lyceums have we organized during the last year, and how many children have been gathered in?

The report continuing, says that the Methodists average "the building of from two and a half to three new churches a day" in our vast country. How many church edifices or temples have these millions of Spiritualists been "building a day" or in a year? Now, if earnest, intelligent Methodists with a narrow creed, false doctrines and repulsive fear-motives do this for religious truth as they see it, what might reasonably be expected of Spiritualists, chained to no sect, crushed by no ironclad creed; and, knowing as they do that death is but a gateway to the shore-lands of immortality, knowing that this life's conduct affects conditions in the future world—what, I say, knowing these things as do Spiritualists, should be expected of them? What devotion, what zeal, enthusiasm, self-sacrifice, fiery-fervor, and religious consecration to the spread of the truth of angel ministries, and so enlighten the world!

I again ask, what have we done the past year? How many golden sheaves have we garnered? How many colleges and training schools have we erected and sustained? How many homes have we built for worn-out mediums and infirm pioneer workers? What methods have we been employing to propagate the blessed truth committed to our hands by the angel-world?

Fighting all organization, sneering at prayer, opposing true heartfelt devotion, declaring all religion "superstition," calling the mediumistic martyr of Nazareth "a myth," or a "tramp" and a "thief," pronouncing the old mediumistic church fathers "hypocrites and liars," impugning the motives of the N. S. A. delegates and misrepresenting the principles enunciated by them, do not seem to me to have been the wisest and most efficient instrument for producing harmony, revealing the beauties of spirit communion and vesturing Spiritualism in its most attractive attire! The cause demands fraternal toilers, broad-minded elucidators; concessions and skilled constructors, embodying in themselves a strong personal magnetism.

The spiritistic iconoclast with hammer for pounding, torch for burning, and lips for spitting spite at the churches has had his day. He is a back chapter. The polemic period has largely past. If we have drunk from the fountain of eternal life—if we have joined hands with the Spiritual world, if we have knowledge for faith, confidence for fear; if we have something better than the orthodox sectarists, let us show it in our phenomena, our philosophy, our methods, our families, and in our daily practical lives, exhibiting all the manly virtues, and all the womanly graces, illumined and crowned with pure love, unselfish and altruistic.

Touching the status of the N. S. A. and what it has accomplished the past year and in former years, the president, secretary and other officers will inform us at Cleveland.

In The Progressive Thinker's Call—"For Your Consideration," it is said in substance that the Spiritualist delegates to the N. S. A. of 1899 formulated or evolved a new deity of an entirely new pattern—"Infinite Intelligence." If I read their proceedings correctly they did nothing of the kind; nor did they attempt it; but they did calmly express belief in "Infinite Intelligence," just as A. J. Davis years ago expressed belief in the Great Positive Mind; Lotze, in the Universal Mind; and Alfred R. Wallace in the Supreme Mind, all of which expressions would be naturally opposed by a few fault-finding, stay-at-home Spiritualists. Not a delegate of the 1899 convention expressed a particle of belief in the churchman's personal Judaistic God. To so affirm was and is mendacious misrepresentation!

Spiritualists generally make no attempt to prove that a circle is circular, that two parallel lines cannot enclose an Illinois farm, that space is, or that God exists. They consider these to be axiomatic. Some may not so regard them; and some, too, are color-blind. This is their misfortune.

The Brahm of the Hindu, the Allah of Islam, the Supreme Spirit of Krishna, the Causation of Proclus, the Spirit of Jesus, the Absolute Being of Spinoza, the Over-Soul of Emerson, the Divine Energizing consciousness of Schurz, the Positive Mind of Davis, the Supreme Mind of Wallace, the Our Father and Our Mother Too of Theodore Parker, the Infinite Intelligence of the N. S. A. all meaning about the same thing, are quite satisfactory to me and I presume to a vast majority of American Spiritualists. True, there are rumors that there's a new God being evolved to be known as "The-molecular-corelation-of-polarized-reciprocity." When duly vestured and set up as a 20th century invention, we shall kindly inquire of the makers how consciousness could have been, or can be evolved from non-consciousness; and energizing, reasoning, rational life from non-life. Man is not a self-made automatic machine; but a rational, moral and responsible being, with spirituality as the crowning keystone of the cranial arch. And if there's truth in intuition, biology, psychology, psychometry, phrenology, phreno-magnetism and psychic science, then man is not only a reasoning, but a morally responsible being, the subject of moral law, which law implies government and a moral Governor. This Governor, the Neo-Platonian Proclus denominated Causation; Wallace pronounced it the Supreme Mind, and the N. S. A. the "Infinite Intelligence." If there can be a better definition of that great Uncaused Cause I shall be among the first to accept it.

It is well known that both the secular and religious press have at times written down Spiritualists as an individualized heterogeneous mob, and Spiritualism as a Godless, Christless, religionless, prayerless, organizationless, and churchless fad—(I make use of the word churchless because the Rev. Dr. Austin writes me that they are about to organize a Spiritualist church in Toronto, Canada,)—I repeat, a prayerless, churchless fad, belligerent and purposeless, with no expressed declaration of principles.

If these millions of Spiritualists have truths, principles and purposes they should certainly declare them, letting an interested world know something concerning what Spiritualism stands for. This the N. S. A. has done, subject to revision, and I honor it for the manly effort. This work of the N. S. A. will go in trailing glory into history. Such Spiritists as will not work for harmony and cannot distinguish between an ecclesiastic creed with its limitations and paraphernalia for heresy trials, and a broad declaration of principles, would hardly have sufficient acumen to distinguish between a horse-chestnut and a chestnut horse. Cognizing, pitying, we pass on.

Spiritualism, the direct antithesis of materialism, is the rock from which have been hewn christian science, metaphysical science, psychic science, theosophy, the new theology—all, in fact, of the mighty redemptive forces that under different names have graced the last century. It is the great brooding-mother of all inspired truths, because originating in and from the spirit; and spirit, as I understand it, is the synonym of God.

While mediums—or what are more appropriate words—intermediaries and sensitives—are indispensable to our movement, and while spiritistic phenomena demonstrate a future conscious existence, the philosophy of Spiritualism is rooted and grounded in God, the essential, the absolute, and the unchangeable, and embodying as I see it, consciousness, energy, life, purpose, love, wisdom and will.

The thinking, the observing and the receptive, whether sectarist or spiritist, are aware that the world is in the throes of a great crisis, social, religious and political; and the higher phase of Spiritualism, having come to stay, is advancing more and more to the front. The churches must accept it or die; the political parties must be molded by its upright, uplifting teachings or rot into nonentity; and nations must adopt its ennobling and benign principles of justice, brotherhood and altruism, or go the way of ancient Greece and Rome. Only the good and the true can forever endure.

When the divine principles of Spiritualism—not merely spiritism (which is little more than Babylonian necromancy), but of pure scientific and religious Spiritualism are accepted and daily lived—when the Christ-spirit of love and wisdom thrills every soul—when the nations of the world abound in spiritual Spiritualists, peace and good-will will reign supreme everywhere beneath the sun; co-operation will take the place of competition, labor will be a pleasure rather than a drudgery, and the only rivalry will be as to who can educate and help the most souls along in the thorny journey of life. The soil then will be as free for all to cultivate as is the balmiest air to breathe. Groves will wave in shady luxuriance o'er every pilgrim's head, and gardens will bloom into wide oases of once dry arid wastes for the benefit of the unfortunate; the highways will be planted with fruit-trees and tearful orphans will find homes in a thousand palaces of benevolence, church edifices will be transformed into lyceums and rose-embowered school-houses, sensitives will be appreciated, consulted and sustained, and the divine will, the equivalent of a universal religion, will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

MOSES HULL.

What He Thinks of the National Association.

To the Editor:—The numerous questions in your letter of September 3, would require a Solon to answer; and if I were egoistic enough to attempt a thorough answer, I would want at least a page of your paper. I hope they will bring out a symposium which may do much good toward shaping the actions of the approaching convention. I hope that each delegate will go to that convention with one overwhelming desire; and that is, that the wisest thought may come to the front and prevail.

1. What I have to say with reference to the organization? I answer, an organization with definite ends in view, and with industrious, conscientious and wise men at its head is almost an indispensable necessity.

Every day brings new questions to the front; they should be met by wisdom. The Board of Trustees should call before it the most profound wisdom in the ranks of Spiritualism to assist in this work. Many of the questions which should come to the front are annually brought up by our president in his report, but the convention as a whole has neither the time nor the wisdom to dispose of them in the short space of three days, especially when their number is considered.

2. While the N. S. A. has not done all that could have been desired, it has, perhaps, done all it could under the circumstances. Some who have complained the most have done the least to assist it in its work. The Association has had to take everything from the stump, as it were; it had to make its own tools and to learn to use them. I hope it has at last reached the point where it can do a more effectual work than ever before.

3. "What will promote its welfare and remedy its defects?" The answer to that would require more wisdom than I have, or more space than you have to spare. Yet I can give a categorical answer in four short sentences: 1. More wisdom. 2. More harmony. 3. More zeal. 4. More money.

I would venture on this point to suggest that the coming convention should elect a new president. Perhaps there is no one in our ranks who can fill the office more acceptably than the present incumbent, but he has exhausted his methods. More than that, some of us are tired of hearing the question asked, Is there but one person in all the ranks of Spiritualism who is capable of filling the office of president of the National Association? or, is the office held by some kind of pre-emption right? While we have no more capable man, nor, perhaps, any better man than the one who has always been kept there, I for one, am perfectly willing to, for one year at least, try some other man or woman.

Spiritualists must get up something practical against systers, charlatans, frauds and fakes. In spite of all protestations and explanations to the outside world, many good men and women measure us by them.

Some system of propaganda should be brought forward by which more work can be done. Societies see the necessity of working for themselves, but think very little of doing anything for the world at large.

4. The Deity question is too large for me. No convention can handle it in three days. Every part of Deity must be surrounded, that is, corralled before it can be defined. It is hard for the finite to define the Infinite. No one who argues on the question, no matter on which side he argues, fails to develop the fact that he has a question larger than his ability is to handle. No matter who the man is who makes or defines God, he is larger than the God he makes. I doubt whether any better Deity than "Infinite Intelligence" was ever made. It seems that in a platform of principles it is possible to modestly state our inability to either define or comprehend the source of all life and being. Having done that, it will be an easy matter to go on and talk of what we know.

In any case it is good for wise men and women to meet in convention, and each try to gather nuggets of golden wisdom from the others. Each one can return from the convention with all the wisdom she or she possessed when they went there, and as much additional as they could gather from those assembled.

Hoping that I may see you, Mr. Editor, at the Cleveland convention, and that it may prove successful at least, in answering some of your questions, I am as ever, yours for the advancement of the highest and the wisest thought.

MOSES HULL.

PREFERS "GOD."

But Does Not Believe in a Personal God.

To the Editor:—As the time draws near for the eighth annual convention of the N. S. A., in which I feel a deep interest, I desire to express a few thoughts concerning its arduous task of bringing order out of the confusion of ideas expressed, and to increase the strength of Spiritualism as a movement in the world for humanity's weal.

As I reflect over the many and in some instances, unkind and senseless criticisms that were a result from last year's convention, especially of the clause "Infinite Intelligence," I cannot suppress a feeling of sadness. Spiritualists above all others should prove their claims by their words and actions. We have learned that the varieties of opinions are due to the degrees of awakened consciousness and self-active and associated vibrations—thus thought. Then why not discern and leave at present what is, as yet, wholly an expression on material plane, of minds devoid of spiritual unfoldment and understanding, and go on in accord with the best that is known.

I for one, desire that in the place of "Infinite Intelligence," the word "God" be used. God is, and all learned talk does not change the fact. That one word expresses all the divine principles, forces and laws; for God is the source and author of all that is. I have in mind no personal God; I know better.

It is the force, essence, the mind of this all-good which reflects itself through all things, all forms, on all planes of substance and force, its own inherent kind of essence to be manifested in forms when so acted upon, for object lessons, that humanity may learn the substance composing the cosmos in its stratic divisions, as also what is contained in themselves, is to be known by each one's conduct, as thus they are assigned in the order of degrees of natural and individual evolution.

The cry of some would-be wise ones, "We want no 'thus saith the Lord,' or 'thus saith the spirits,'" reminds me of a little quarrel I observed between two small boys in my neighbor's back yard, over a swing. The one in the seat was swinging happily, the other crying and scolding. When asked what was the matter, he said: "I want him to get out, I want that seat to swing a little myself." So with the fault-finders. They want the seat and to exercise a little authority themselves. I have heard a great many private criticisms of the N. S. A. officials and their management, etc., and have kindly asked the critics to attend the convention and state their grievances there, where they may be considered and adjusted.

These stay-at-homes never do have the right view of the thing they criticise, because they do not understand what it is, or means, to try to lead a selfish, self-willed people out of dense into brighter conditions and realizations.

The question before us is: Do we need a National Spiritualists Association? If we need it to bring together and harmonize the isolated forces representing this movement on earth so as to make its power for good felt in the world, then why not rally around the already established center, contribute of your means one and all, as well as of your minds, and pull together to that end?

Even if you disagree on some points, what does it matter? Spiritualists should agree to disagree, and work harmoniously under one banner, in sympathetic reciprocity, all being allowed to worship God or idols in accord with their unfolded consciousness and spiritual or purely selfish conceptions; for we know individual evolution brings all up some time where they see their mistakes and naturally turn from idols to the one true God to whom they are inseparably linked and from that Central Source spiritually nourished.

I am first, last, and all the time for organization, national, state and local and may success attend all earnest effort in that direction. MRS. M. KLEIN.

SPECULATIVE

Is the Question of Infinite Intelligence.

It has become a custom among us that we should present our views in matters of interest in The Progressive Thinker, before the time of the annual conventions, instead of waiting till the meeting of the Association, when there will be but little time for discussion. This is the better way. Let us do our debating before hand, so that when the Association comes together its members will be prepared to act promptly.

Last year the Association sprung a sensation on the Spiritualists of the world, by a declaration of one of its principles, of a belief in Infinite Intelligence. Many of us had wished for a statement of our views—not necessarily a creed, as creeds are only statements of unproved and unprovable tenets, but a statement of fact, and I might say philosophy, which we are constantly demonstrating by phenomena (so-called) and logic, and upon which there is little room for disagreement.

With me the question of the existence of Infinite Intelligence, call it by whatever name you choose, is entirely speculative. I can't say there is not such Being. (N. B.—I don't say A Being, but Being.) If there is, he is entirely beyond my comprehension. I do believe that there is infinite, or perhaps more properly, omnipresent force, an attribute we might say of every speck of matter, including even the tiny atoms which meet and embrace when they come within the attraction of their congeners and form of themselves molecules. It is the same force that moves systems and suns, and to me it is the life principle ever present and always and ever pulsating in the clod or even the granite, and that this force or life principle is ever reaching upward to higher conditions through man to angel, the highest point I can conceive of. I can conceive of no intelligence which was not developed through the processes of nature, through matter with its inherent forces. I will not say there is not such. I may be lame in my conclusions; but if there is, I am quite sure that I am in no way concerned with it, and that it cares nothing about the N. S. A. or what its members think on the subject; nor does it in any way interfere with the operation of natural law. In fact, the only thing it does is to sit and think—"sit and think?" I should have said "pervade and think"—for intelligence can't sit down, there being no broad part of its body on which to rest. But, you see this thing—this all—this infinite intelligence continually not only outruns my power of expression but my entire conceptions.

I wanted to say a word with reference to prayer, in this connection. I don't object to the formality of invocation as offered by, I might say, a majority of our speakers. Very few, if any of them, have any idea of changing the purposes of this "Infinite Intelligence" by their invocation. The most they hope for, as far as I can learn, is to place themselves in a receptive condition. I offer no invocations, but if the spirit of invocation should come on me, I would. I merely spend a few moments in silence, losing myself as far as possible from all thought. I have but one difficulty, that is to break away from this silent meditation. But I don't believe that any prayer ever changes the natural process of nature—it never would have turned the waters around Johnstown at the time of the flood. If God was infinite, omnipotent, and infinitely just, prayers for the salvation of those people would have been unnecessary; if prayers were necessary, it is unfortunate to the universe that it is ruled by a tyrant. On every important occasion in every village the proceedings are opened and closed by prayer by some clergyman on hand for the occasion. Everybody knows that the prayer is a mere formality, and that even if there is an Almighty personal being, he pays no attention whatever to the prayer. There is no fashionable formality more empty than a prayer on such occasions.

I believe in both patriotism and religion, but not in the articles that go by these names. In the popular acceptation of the term patriotism in England and America, and perhaps some other countries, it means plunder, and the man who objects to plundering some other country for the benefit of a few of his home nabobs, is considered a traitor. It is impossible for some men to connect patriotism and philanthropy in one person. With them the man who opposes national plunder is a traitor and deserves death. In the same way cant is substituted for religion, and the man who objects to cant is considered not only irreligious, but wicked and deserving of ostracism. The great difficulty with some of our Spiritualist brothers and sisters is that, associating cant with religion, they seem to think we who believe Spiritualism to be a religion are necessarily believers in the cant that passes for religion. And thus they also make Jesus responsible for all the follies of the church. Ingersoll's great lecture on the Devil was a grand lecture indeed, so far as evangelism was concerned, but when he left the inference that the evangelical church drew their authority for their teachings from Jesus or even from any part of the book called the Bible, he spoiled his lecture, with biblical scholars.

To me Spiritualism is indeed a religion. It blends into one heaven and earth. It associates those who have gone before with those who remain here. Enables us to live in the magnetism of the Spirit world, gives us strength and courage when we should otherwise be weak. Did I not think that men and women would be advanced in their spiritual and ethical natures by believing in it, it seems to me I should lose some of the zeal which actuates me in the promulgation of the cause.

I would open the gateway between this world and the higher world, that we may learn from their experiences that we sit in communion with those we loved on earth. Further, I would have all those who accept the faith of Spiritualism assemble at least once a week, and listen to the instructions coming from our teachers and from each other, for in this way we may grow. We can learn nothing at the churches, for the aim of popular preaching is to put in the time saying nothing. Some of the best teachers in the world are found in the ranks of Spiritualism, and by uniting we have the opportunity of assisting each other to learn.

ANALYZED.

The National Spiritualists Association.

As the time is near at hand when the N. S. A. will hold its annual meeting, it is well to inquire wherein it has failed, and how it can become an effective agent in building up genuine Spiritualism.

The grand failure of the N. S. A., and the one that includes all the minor ones, is its apparent incapacity to comprehend and give expression to the all-inclusive principles of Modern Spiritualism, and instead, has put forth what is in direct antagonism to those principles. If Spiritualism has anything differentiating it from the past, it is its perfect naturalness, and consequent repudiation of all forms of supernaturalism. It is a settled position that no gods or superhuman beings have anything whatever to do with the phenomena. No more than they have to do with the telegraph or telephone. But the N. S. A. affirms that "We (Spiritualists) believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expressions of infinite intelligence."

Let us note some of the "physical phenomena." The earthquakes, volcanoes, cyclones, the famine-creating drouths, the devastating storms, the insect pests, etc., are all "the expressions of infinite intelligence!" There are no inherent, automatic energies in this vast panorama of nature, it is all infinite intelligence.

But let us note some of the "spiritual phenomena of nature": The love that blesses and saves, the hate that tortures, maims and destroys; the wars that butcher, enslave, cripple and demoralize; the slaughter of men, women and children in South Africa, China and the Philippines; the cheatery, fraud, stealing and plundering; the inspired utterances of our speakers and writers; the howling profanity of the street and the vulgar mouthings of the brothel are, according to this creed, "the expressions of infinite intelligence."

But the creed says further: "We believe that a correct understanding of such expressions, and living in accordance therewith constitutes the true religion." Well, the thief, the prostitute, the murderer lives "in accordance" with those "expressions," hence, theft, murder and all forms of crime "constitute the true religion!" Most certainly, no one can live along all the lines of these expressions at the same time. It will need all the reincarnations of the Theosophist to cover the whole field of these "expressions of infinite intelligence."

But it is not true that "the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expressions of infinite intelligence." They are all finite, and it is false in fact and false in logic to assume a cause transcending the character of the effect. A finite expression or effect needs only a finite cause, and it can have no other. The expressions, utterances, manifestations of man are all of them finite, and therefore, cannot lay claim to infinite causation.

How logicians and teachers of logic could endorse such a creed passes my comprehension. It is an attempted embodiment of the old church notion of design, in language calculated to deceive the superficial and unthinking masses. If its getters-up had intended to put forth a two-faced document they could not have constructed one more perfectly adapted to that purpose. When they want to satisfy some Judge that Spiritualism is a religion, in order to hold a legacy, they very solemnly say: "We believe in infinite intelligence." When the Judge says, "You don't affirm 'an' infinite intelligence," they answer "We believe the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expressions of infinite intelligence." And as spiritual expression is impossible to anything but a personality, we most certainly profess the true religion, for our infinite intelligence is nothing less and nothing else but your personal God.

To the critical Spiritualists, they say, O, we did not put in that little article "an," because we did not mean to affirm a personal Deity but only a vague kind of pantheism, but in such a shape that we could pull the wool over the eyes of judges and railroad officials, and secure legacies, marriage fees and half-fares. Do you say, that is hypocrisy? I can't help that. It is precisely what the getters-up of that creed affirm in substance as an excuse and reason for its peculiar wording. They say that the problem before them was to construct a creed that would enable Spiritualism to pose in the courts as a legal religion, so that legacies could be held. Some kind of a God was needed to do that, and hence, the infinite intelligence dodge.

This infinite intelligence is the same old personal God of the church, or it is a new one made up for a special use, or it means Pantheism in its broadest sense. I think there can be no doubt that the N. S. A., in formulating its creed, meant the old god with a somewhat different dress. That is the method adopted by the Unitarians.

But to hold legacies it is entirely unnecessary to profess any kind of religion, or believe in any god whatever. Every benevolent or educational organization can hold and heir property whether it believes in one god, three gods, or no god at all. Spiritualism is not a religion in the sense in which that term is commonly used. And it is only hypocrisy to make any pretense that it is. And while we may justly claim that it is religion in a far higher and nobler sense than the church uses, that claim will not, cannot be allowed by either the church or the courts. Hence, we should organize as an educational and moral institution. We concede that the world's great need is true education. But the N. S. A., as far as it was able, has organized Spiritualists into a sect alongside of other sects, claiming the same special privileges of those sects, on the false plea of being religious in the same sense that they are. It may be that our good brothers and sisters, who made this creed, and who seek ordination so as to get half-fare on railroads, and fees for marrying, have not paused to think that these are special privileges and, therefore, wrong and corrupting in their influence. Half-fare is essentially the same as a free pass, which is illegal and unjust. No honorable person can accept half-fare without feeling under special obligation to the donor. He becomes a partner with, and a supporter of, the robber corporations, for he accepts a portion of what they rob from the people. Celebrating marriage as "a minister of the gospel," is not only a false pretense, but it is endorsing the false teaching of the church that it is "God's Holy Institution of Matrimony," instead of being a civil contract between the parties.

On behalf of thousands, I protest against this belittling and sectarianizing of Spiritualism; and I unite with them in demanding that the creed be expunged, and a simple declaration that all Spiritualists can endorse, be substituted in its stead. The affirmations in paragraphs 4 and 5, with one affirming Spiritualism to be the science and philosophy of life, with no allusion to any undemonstrable beliefs about God or an infinite intelligence, together with the proclamation of the Unity of Humanity, would furnish an ample basis for all possible efforts in educating ourselves and the people of the world. Lifted thus above the narrowness and shallowness of sectarianism, we shall begin to appreciate the all-inclusiveness of Spiritualism.

All intelligent Spiritualists know that mediumship is the great arcanum whence has issued every form of religion and superstition which has blessed or cursed the ages. It is the key which unlocks all human mysteries. Hence, Spiritualists are the masters, the educators of the ignorant world in everything pertaining to its religious theories and experience.

All forms of government have been the offshoots of pre-existent religions. Hence, all the relations and asserted rights and duties of man, as a citizen, are the outgrowths of his religions, the solution of which pertains to the Spiritualistic Philosophy. All the great strides of nature, in her evolutionary career, have been ascensional. The last one always higher than the preceding. Spiritualism, the last unfolding of humanitary life, is consequently the highest. The last, the highest, includes the essentials of all below, all that preceded it. It cannot be understood, cannot be interpreted by anything else; but it, from the very nature of things, is the interpreter of all which has gone before. The religions, the ethical, the governmental, civic and social life are all resolvable by its philosophy. Necessarily, the last, the highest, becomes a reconstructor. It makes all things new. It evolves a new idea, and one new idea will reconstruct the whole system of human thought, just as a new chemical element will completely change any compound with which it can unite. Spiritualism is naturalism, hence, the entire idealism of the old religions is dissolved, and reconstruction must begin. The old theories of government, morals and civic life fall to the ground at once and must be rebuilt.

In the light of these axiomatic truths of Modern Spiritualism, look at the pitiable position of the N. S. A., at its last meeting. With a deprecatory, reverential mien, it came before the religious world and apologetically said in substance: Dear brothers, we have been proclaiming for 50 years that we know something and that you were stumbling along by faith. But we have become hungry for some of the special privileges which you enjoy, and we humbly ask the opportunity to join with you in saying "we believe in infinite intelligence." We will ordain ministers, offer prayers and invocations, sing "Nearer, My God, to Thee;" baptise babies when opportunities offer. So please consider us "one of the denominations," and a legal religious body. We are compelled to use language somewhat ambiguous, but we will have some of our leaders proclaim their belief in a "personal God," and the beauty and glory of the New Testament, to indicate what we are aiming at in the promulgation of our present creed. There is so much radicalism amongst the Spiritualists that we have to proceed with the utmost caution."

Reader, that is the real position of the N. S. A. If the ensuing annual meeting refuses to annul its creed, or if it makes it stronger, in the church direction, as will no doubt be attempted, the death knell of Spiritualism, so far as its present organization is concerned, will be sounded. It will repudiate the universalism of true Spiritualism, and put in its place a degrading sectarianism.

TO CONVINCE MANKIND

The Chief Mission of Spiritualism.

Long absence from home finds me out of touch with the N. S. A. workers, as well as with their wide-awake critics. Has not an unnecessary warmth of feeling arisen among estimable brethren over the composition, size, weight, complexion and prerogatives of the "Infinite Intelligence," or "Supreme Power?" The chief mission of Spiritualism would seem to be to convince mankind that mortals live as conscious entities after death; that they can and do communicate with the inhabitants of earth through appointed avenues; that the after existence offers everyone of us the possibility of upward progression. All beyond these nuclei are, ought to be, and, as I understand it, are intended to remain matters for individual faith. There is room under these principles for every shade of belief from that of a Personal God to the antipodal denial of all else save Law and Evolution. Shall we excommunicate each other because of different views upon a question none of us can absolutely demonstrate, and upon which varying messages through different media show equal diversity of opinion among the denizens of the spirit world? During this very week, one whom I knew intimately in the years before transition said to me through a deeply entranced medium: "I earnestly ask and pray to God, if there is one, that I may reach my family on earth."

Let us remember there is more than one picture of a Personal God. He is not of necessity a relentless avenger, but may be the giver of bread instead of stones, and know better than earthly parents how to give good gifts to his children.

The Christian world having buried the Devil, would now seem to be busily engaged in preparing the obsequies of the God of olden time.

Months ago I read upon the outer bulletin board of a religious headquarters in Chicago, the announcement of a new book by a college president, in words something like these: "Did man make God, or God make man? I felt like pausing long enough to chalk opposite, the answer: Both.

Like the early Greeks mankind is still creating mythical deities and clothing them with fabulous powers as well as with human foibles. The kind of God in which a man believes is very apt to be an exact reproduction of what dominates his interior self.

If the National Association has provided a straight-jacket for each Spiritualist upon the God question, mine must have gone astray. Anyone finding it need not speed it to its destination, but feel fully authorized to return it at railroad speed to secretary Longley, Washington, D. C.

GEO. B. WARNE.

RAISE THE STANDARD.

Six Gods Killed in One Batch.

Will the coming convention of the National Spiritualist Association reflect or express the position or desires of the great body of intelligent Spiritualists? Judging from its past work and efforts it will not. So far the N. S. A. has not been a representative body; its delegates at the Chicago Annual meeting did no more than represent a handful in numbers, and in capacity, experience and wisdom, with the exception of a baker's dozen, the representation was putty—clay in the hands of the potter.

What has the association done the past year more than to maintain from week to week, a dogged, determined dunning for money to help out the Mayer scheme? Are the officers so blind and deaf that they do not see, and know that the Mayer fund, the Spiritual Home in Washington, is not endorsed by the living, acting, thoughtful Spiritualists of America? Do they not yet see and realize that we are not sufficiently subjugated to want a high priest, or pope at Washington? Why can't the leaders of the N. S. A. movement realize that neither of their leading efforts at the Chicago meetings are endorsed? Will they at the coming eighth annual meeting persist in their efforts to try and cram their "intelligence god" and the Washington home down the throats of Spiritualists who have most emphatically refused to endorse either?

If the N. S. A. has exerted any marked influence the past year, it has been to distract, divide and disintegrate local societies and camps.

For an organization labelled National, and Spiritual, at the close of the nineteenth century, at its annual gathering, to go into the business of making a god as a corner-stone for a declaration of principles to rest on, was one of the most ridiculous and absurd efforts possible for the writer to contemplate; to expect anything but division and antagonism from such leaders, is to be woefully disappointed. What a contrast between Spiritualists at the head of the N. S. A. movement, and M. J. Savage, B. Fay Mills and Thomas B. Gregory, and a dozen lesser lights who have been killing off the heathen gods for the past year. Dr. Savage says that "The Gods must die, in order that man may live."

The Rev. B. Fay Mills killed off six gods in one discourse last June; here are their names: 1. The Absentee God. 2. The Limited God. 3. The Negative God. 4. The Unkind God. 5. The Unjust God. 6. The Partial God. I presume he had not heard of the one made in Chicago last October, christened "Infinite Intelligence." I suggest that the N. S. A. Spiritualists' God be turned over to our Christian orthodox and heterodox friends, and if he, it, or she, can stand their tests we might be led to believe we had made quite a decent, respectable God.

Now we all know, who think, that the God question is not a complex one, but a simple one. It has been made complex by manipulation, which has been the work of priestcraft in the past as in the present. Without a god of some sort the occupation of the priest and pope is gone.

It is a simple fact that the gods in all ages of history have been man-made—man gods. They are the same to-day; that is the reason Mills and Savage think it wise to kill off a lot of them; they want to improve our conceptions, they want wiser, more humane, and more Spiritual gods to take the place of the old heathen gods. I say amen to the killing off of those visionary heathen gods; it will clear the atmosphere, we will all breathe more, and our health will be improved.

If reformers demand a change in any direction, it always seems best to wait until we can substitute better things, better conditions, before we remove the old.

My substitute for the present concept is, to make gods of all humanity. The unfolded humanity is to be the "master" of all things, in heaven and earth. The "I Am" is man.

If the N. S. A.'s "Infinite Intelligence" God will stand the test, then their god is in our National Constitution—that old infidel document—and the American Secular Union, and the N. S. A. guard at Washington can withdraw, and our orthodox Christian friends will have to fight to get our young, athlete, heroic god out, and their old three-headed god into, the Constitution.

What are the demands upon the N. S. A. (if such an association is needed) which have not yet been shown? It must do more than meet once a year at a cost of from seven to ten thousand dollars. It must do more than erect visionary gods, it must do more than follow and ape Christianity which to-day stands for a debauched and rotten civilization. It must do more than cater to religious popularity, it must shake off every restriction, every limitation; it does not need money in bank; it needs up-to-date men and women who are imbued with the glories of an exalted unselfish life here and now. Such workers will not starve or go naked. Was there ever a day, or an hour when a Phillips, a Garrison, a Sumner, a Pierpont, a Parker, or a Lincoln were wanted as leaders more than now?

May this world escape the curse of all religious missionaries in the future. A Galveston tornado is a fearful tragedy to contemplate, but a slaughter of a a hundred thousand for Christ's sake in the missionary fields of China puts a damper on anything—any move—in a National missionary effort. The writer is opposed to the principle of missionary work and can give reasons for his position. Modern Spiritualism is not dependent upon National Spiritual Associations, or amateur delegates or leaders. A few Lovelands would soon make a foundation for an association, if one was needed, but the need is not proven by a long ways; thus far the effort of the second attempt, has not proven any more acceptable than the first; thus far all Spiritual organizations that have attempted more than a simple business organization, have proven failures, at least not one has proven a success from an external point of view. Isn't there some significance in this fact? We don't want any creeds, dogmas, churches, or any of the restrictions or limitations of such institutions. Spiritualists of the royal independent intelligent stamp will not be led or restrained by any one person, or any association; this is a historical fact; fifty years has proven it; will the N. S. A. make a note of it? Can the leaders and officers get it into their heads why the ten thousand dollar "Mayer fund" is not in bank? I most sincerely and thankfully endorse Prof. J. S. Loveland's closing sentence in his masterly article of September 22, in The Progressive Thinker. Here it is: "Can any position befitting Spiritualism be imagined except that of Leader and Interpreter of the world's philosophy? We must lead or follow. What shall we follow? Where is the science and philosophy of Life if it is not embodied in Spiritualism? If Spiritualism is only a part, what and where is the wholeness? Who will answer?

DR. M. E. CONGER.

"INFINITE FOLLY."

Does Not Wish a New God.

To the Editor:—I do not feel quite adequate to the article you suggest; nor, with the views I entertain upon the subject involved, do I think it judicious.

For myself, I should be decidedly adverse to any attempted definition of Deity by any company of men with which I was associated. The pen is not yet grown or manufactured that can do it. The mind has not yet come into being that can conceive it. God is incomprehensible; and uncompressible by any hydraulic or other power yet known to that infinitesimal personality called Man. We know nothing of Him but what He has revealed to us. Strike out His revelations, and all is blank, and we are thrown back upon the merest and the wildest conjecture.

I am so at odds with many Spiritualists—and even with you, my dear, good friend—that my pen would run counter to a very strong current of belief. I have faith in the verity of my convictions; unshakable—firm as the firmament—feeling that I stand on a rock compared with which Gibraltar is an unstable and petty pebble; and yet I should know that many others—of greater intelligence, but of less faith—would charge me with credulity. This would only provoke hostility in the ranks of Spiritualism; for, of all futile things, argument on religious themes stands ahead.

I believe in a Personal God; you do not.

I believe in the divinity of Christ; you do not.

I accept the Apostles' Creed except the clause for the resurrection of the body, if it means physical body; you do not.

I believe in the substantial authenticity of the Bible; you do not.

I base my beliefs, in those respects, upon communications which I have supposed, and yet think, came from the highest beings in the spirit spheres. This through years, with countless converging proofs and confirmations. I cannot, in this brief letter, enter upon these evidences; but they sweep me into a faith, clear as the cope of heaven.

I do not accept, as a whole, your quotation from Prof. Draper, as authority. In some respects it is opposed to my advices. I am feal to my own messages. They control my beliefs.

I do not agree that "all revelation is necessarily a fiction." I receive revelation as a reality. The revelations to me from what purports to be from high spirit sources, are, to me, genuine, real, infallible, sacred, verity itself.

I do not agree that "there is no such thing as Providence." On the contrary, I believe that there is no thing outside of Providence; nothing but Providence.

If those who call "the vital force which pervades the world," "God," are "illiterate," as the Professor affirms, then I come within the category of illiteracy.

Prof. Draper believes only in an unorganized diffusive power—though in that case, it should not be spelled with a capital P. He does not believe in a "Supreme Being." I do, fully, absolutely, unqualifiedly, and beyond all possibility of doubt.

I concede the great ability, the technical scholarship, the large repute of Professor Draper; but I venture to differ from some of his views—from some of them toto coto.

I am in accord with your sentiment that every one should form his own concept of Deity. That is his business, and not another's. No convention should bind him to receive such portrait as it may limn. No creature can form a just and competent idea of his Creator; nor, as I think, is he required to attempt it. A spark, struck from the sun, cannot comprehend that solar orb.

I am not sufficiently informed as to the doing of the National Spiritualists Association to judge of its accomplishment. I have never been in full sympathy with it. Some of its action has not commended itself to me. I have not thought that a society could so appropriate the truths of Spiritualism, and claim to be headquarters for them, as to approach the hearts and heads of men to advantage. Those truths, it seemed to me, should be diffused, like a genial atmosphere, amongst all sects, influencing the pulpits, permeating the pews, and reaching the world outside of the sects. If any association assumes to take spiritual truths in its especial keeping, and to dispense them, it might provoke jealousy, and stir up opposition.

If an association proposes, as this suggests, to make a new God, and, by another nomenclature, call this neuter entity—if such a diffusive thing can be an entity—call it "Infinite Intelligence," I should deem it infinite folly, and desire to be infinitely removed from such a society, as "far as the East is from the West."

To change the name of God would require, me seems, an "Act to repeal an Act" passed by the Parliament of Heaven. No earthly corporation has been endowed with such authority. No Constitution has ever been adopted by the Sovereign Power conferring such a privilege. If the Association should resolve to create, formulate, pattern, and evolve, such a—what shall I say?—not Being, for it would not be a Being—only a principle or statement—it is hoped that His—no, its—jurisdiction may be clearly defined, its bailiwick bounded, its powers specifically enumerated, and the proper punishment for any violation of its functions distinctly stated; so that the officers of the association should not be in danger of inflicting too severe penalties.

For myself, dear Francis, I am quite content with the God we have. I do not wish a new one.

If there is no "Supreme Being," I wonder how Prof. Draper's "irresistible laws" got footing in the world. Did they formulate, evolve, and enact themselves? If the world is a mere "automatic engine," who evolved its machinery and motive power and set it agoing? Did it do it itself?

I do not think it blasphemy to think that man was created in the image of God; or to think that there is a kinship and somewhat similitude between the Creator and the created; or that, in man, there is an inheritance of some faint glimpses of the paternal attributes.

Good friend, in reading your letter and circular, I immediately sat down and hastily wrote off this letter, to prove to you why it did not appear to me judicious to write the article you spoke of. Anyhow, I am,

Yours sincerely,

SUGGESTIONS.

Should Reorganize All Along the Line.

Shall the next annual convention of Spiritualists amuse themselves in another attempt at creed-making and ambitious metaphysical speculations? I have no objections. It may encourage and incite to a closer and deeper study of things spiritual and be useful in the development and unfoldment of truth among us. Such creeds are, of course, entirely without authority; we regard such things now as representative only of the views and opinions of the few who create them. To us Spiritualists, they only suggest what orthodox creedalism might attempt if allowed or encouraged by us. All thinking people realize now that all such expressions or declarations represent individual opinion only, and that they are entitled only to the respect they merit. Nothing of the sort can exercise mandatory influence over us Spiritualists who are about as much inclined to be a law unto ourselves as any sect or set of people on earth to-day, I think. Therefore I have no objection to my sisters and brethren affirming their creeds anywhere, on any subject, at any time within reason.

I believe we would not bother so much about such things but for the fear that, unchallenged, such practices may encourage a desire for and attempt at authority later on. I think this is the chief trouble with us now; we are afraid it is an attempt at dictation; that the N. S. A. is assuming to control and direct us according to unsavory orthodox methods. This is where the shoe pinches with most of us, in my opinion, and I suggest and believe this will continue to be the case and greatly retard our success, just as long as we permit this creature of the local societies, dependent upon and supported by them, to stand before the world, in loci parentis, as the dog instead of the tail.

The creation of the N. S. A. in its present form, and our continuance of it, was and is, in my opinion, in the light of the world's experiences of the abuses of ecclesiastical authority and because it is in opposition to our championship of natural democracy and personal equality, a most ridiculous and reprehensible blunder. I opposed it from the start and before it was organized, though I favored the payment of its Jubilee deficit because we had allowed its creditors to, at least, infer that we Spiritualists were behind this laudable attempt to honor our decarnate leaders. But for us who know what aristocracy and ecclesiasticism have done to curse humanity and block the progress of our race; preaching from our rostrums human brotherhood; with all history and our present day experiences crying out in bitterness and woe against the oppressions of our masters; for us, in the light and knowledge of what our decarnate leaders are doing, who apparently know neither creed, class nor condition, but are making even innocent little children leaders of men, choosing their instruments and coworkers from among all spheres of life here, from the poor and the rich, the lowly and exalted, all these working independently of each and the work going on under their care and guidance in a world-wide reformation such as has never been seen before among us; for us, in this land of comparative liberty, the cradle of republicanism, to attempt ecclesiastical forms of control over Modern Spiritualism; to select a president over it and us, and one who shall stand before the world ostensibly as its "Head" and our Chief High Priest; who shall feel that, in some way, he is in authority over us and it and responsible for its progress and our welfare, and should enact or declare a creed for our guidance and so that the world may see how respectable our church is getting to be; that it is now in line with all the others, has a national creed and all the necessary paraphernalia of official existence and consequent gangs of ringsters and strikers. Ah, sisters and brethren, these things are all wrong, in my opinion, pathetically so, and not until we do away with all this childishness, abolish all semblance of aristocratic control among us, will we, as a sect, ever amount to much, in my opinion.

As a national committee whose chief or chairman shall be as the humblest among us, which shall serve as an observant, advisory, statistical and executive body, supported by and serving the local societies, the N. S. A. should be a very useful helper in this movement; as a seat of authority and as present constituted it can never accomplish the worthy aims of its present officials. We should reorganize all along the line, abolishing everywhere all offices of anything but clerical need. We should govern ourselves by the rule of the majority, choosing our presiding officers at will, whenever we meet in convention.

The beginning of this, as with all other popular reform movements, was with the common people, who should, in this, depart from ancient customs and precedents known to be harmful, and retain within their own control, co-operatively, the sole management of it. We need no "Heads" for it here; we have them in the higher spheres, among those who originated and are controlling Modern Spiritualism. The local societies are the basis and support of it with us; these should co-operate and in conventions of different kinds—local, district, state and national—our camp-meetings offering opportunities—discuss and advise with each other on pertinent matters and things. Local societies being purely voluntary associations will, of course, declare their own creeds, or curriculums, after the manner of all other educational institutions. To attempt dictation to them in this relation would be about as impertinent, in my opinion, as for the national government to attempt the control of the course of studies in our public schools.

In conclusion, I suggest that we return to first principles by restoring to the commoners all rights, powers and authority foolishly delegated to any and every one; then let us refrain from all desires and attempts to rule by force, leaving everything to the good common sense of our membership, settling and governing everything, everywhere, in our local societies and in our conventions, after the manner of reasonable beings, by the will of the people as expressed in a majority vote. Then we will be practicing and living in example what we preach, an object lesson to the whole world of the value of our precepts. Then we will have no fear of creeds; we will regard them as simple expressions of opinion and take them at their value. The N. S. A as now constituted must go.

STILL A BABY.

Needs Helping Hands, Not Kicks.

To the Editor:—You ask, Has the National Association failed during the many years of its existence to meet the requirements of Spiritualists and Spiritualism?" The National Association is only seven years old, and seven years are not enough to make it more than a baby yet, and the babe might have been far stronger had it had more helping hands and less kicks. The struggle to make this organization what it should be—the stronghold of Spiritualism, both in a spiritual and financial way, constantly helping to build up state and local societies by active missionary work, aided by the earnest efforts of isolated Spiritualist workers who will interest the people in the thoughts, thus forming societies where there could have been none had not our missionaries responded to their calls—in fact bringing the work to the same perfection the Patrons of Husbandry have done, with its National well-officered and the states keeping in touch with the National, the county and local in touch with both state and National, all working for the common good of the agriculturists of our nation. This, in my belief, may be the future of the National.

If in its struggle to live it had been aided by those who from its first inception have assumed the position of critics none too kind; if the good it has already done could be held up to view, as well as what is claimed its weak points; if every fault-finder had aided by their presence and vote at our conventions; if the motives could be better understood of those who have its interests at heart—in fact, if Spiritualists would try to see alike, believing that by organization they would have an equal power with any other organization, in legislation as to our rights to property, and the protection of our mediums, etc., etc., then almost every will made by a Spiritualist for the good of Spiritualism would not be contested, and being a Spiritualist would not be deemed a fitting for the plea of insanity.

If the National has defects, it has been because in a way it has been crippled and its management could not work out their highest ideal, and that inability has been caused by the apathy or opposition of those whom it would seem would desire to see an organized effort for the promulgation of truths that free from bondage, and heal the broken-hearted.

As for it assuming to cut out or formulate, or fashion and label it Infinite Intelligence," I do not know why as an organization that had not as good a right to a declaration of principles as any other body of people, and the majority rule.

Had the opposers of Infinite Intelligence been there in numbers it could not have passed, therefore there would have been no "Infinite Intelligence." With me it did not hurt at all, only it seemed like going a good way around to evade the word God. I am old-fashioned and I cannot understand principles of nature that always have been and always will be, without asking for the cause, more than I can understand eternal law without wondering about the eternal law-giver. It seems strange that when that which is the most simple in character, or the most wonderful in execution must have been brought into existence by the power of thought in our finite world, how the worlds around our planet earth move in their endless rounds obeying a law that was never made. It takes the mechanic's thoughts to make a chair—but worlds make themselves.

As there are natures acute in all the affairs of life, cultivated, and richly endowed by nature, yet to them the most entrancing music is only "a noise," while others born under the same conditions are always listening with ear and soul for divine harmonies, and back of such natures may be the heavenly rhythm that breathes a lesson that may be felt though it find no expression in words, so in that Supreme Power I find rest and peace. It does not lead me to feel less kindly to those who are comforted some other way, but I would say to all, join hands for the "greatest good to the greatest number."

I thank you as a member of the National for your assurance of sympathy with the National, and also that you are cosmopolitan enough to give all an equal chance for the expression of their thoughts.

THE N. S. A.,

And Its Declaration of Principles.

I have never been in favor of formulating a creed for Spiritualists. The entire so-called Christian world is split into hundreds of conflicting sects, and the creed business is what has done it. The attempt to formulate dogmatic Spiritualism will be attended with no better results.

But the N. S. A. has seen fit to put forth a declaration of principles. Unless it is abolished altogether I am decidedly in favor of some radical amendments. What we know about man, and his possibilities here and hereafter, and not what we "believe" about God, should constitute the sum total of our declaration of principles.

The Spiritualist from the church can believe what he pleases about God, while the Spiritualist from materialism can believe what may please him; but neither the belief of the one nor the unbelief of the other has anything to do with Spiritualism.

There are three things concerning man we can affirm, not as a matter of belief, but knowledge. We know man lives after so-called death. We know he can and does, under certain conditions, return and make that fact known to those still in the mortal body. We know every one must reap what he sows, either in this world or that which is to come.

These things are all knowable and are constantly being demonstrated. All Spiritualists can unite on those things which are known to be both truth and fact, but, on dogmatic matters of belief, you can never unite, but weaken and scatter the forces.

I am decidedly in favor of the N. S. A., if it is to be conducted along practical and not impractical lines. If as a test of fellowship I am required to believe in an Infinite Intelligence, I would have to be counted out. If we must dogmatize concerning any type of God, give the straight-out-and-out, old-fashioned orthodox God of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. But what churchman knows anything about God, and what do Spiritualists know about Infinite Intelligence?

We should confine ourselves to knowledge and the facts we can demonstrate, and by so doing we shall have a tremendous advantage over those who believe, but can prove nothing.

THE N. S. A.

There Is Good Work for It to Do.

The time for the meeting of the National Association of Spiritualists is again upon us, and as I have paid each meeting some attention in the pages of The Progressive Thinker year after year, I will follow my custom in this; but let it be understood that it is with no hostile feeling to any work which will lead to the advancement of the facts of Spiritualism.

The unification of the thought of Spiritualists is an impossibility. To make of it a church is equally out of the range of human contrivance, or for that, even desirability. Who would want another church created? Have we not had enough of that institution? Each person answering that question, would result in many different answers.

The association as a representative body of people tried to give last year some definite character to the work that it had in view. It felt that it was time to set before the world a creed—a set of principles that would so describe the cult that the world might just understand what a real Spiritualist is. Outside there was a great deal of talking and dissatisfaction about this creed, but it was passed with a stout majority. The most trouble has been manifested about the point that a Spiritualist believes in Infinite Intelligence.

It will at once be clear that the definition of Spiritualism must be widely stretched to admit the problem of causation. I cannot see that that problem comes into the subject.

Spiritualism deals with the problem of man's continuous life. It is not a question of the cause of life; but the fact of a future life after the death of the body. It is a particular study of certain psychical phenomena that happen, and do they prove that man lives after death? There may be Infinite Intelligence—there may not be Infinite Intelligence at the back of natural phenomena—nature may be the effect of Infinite Intelligence or it may not. There is no way to demonstrate either side of the proposition. Put it either way and it is but a guess. Is it wise for Spiritualists to teach as true that which in its very nature is and must always be a guess?

Science cannot interfere with the problem of God or no God. Science can only deal with phenomena. Absolute Cause is in the domain of metaphysics and no postulate of modern science.

But whether a man lives after death is strictly a scientific question to be proved by evidence.

I am sorry to say so far the work of the association has been more metaphysical than scientific. The leaders have been bent upon a religion, and have invented that absurd phrase "scientific religion." There may be a philosophy of religion, but there cannot be a science of religion unless it is this, that state of the physiological consciousness in modes of emotion, belief and ecstasy as they differ from ordinary feeling and moral sympathy when excited by the thought of God. A science of religion would be the science of the structure of God and a description of the machinery he employs to reach the mind of man and nature. Such knowledge is impossible, therefore there cannot be a science of religion. Spiritualism cannot be both a science and a religion. But what of that, anyway, but verbiage—words, words. Let it go. There is something very important in Spiritualism, and what is it? The soul of man lives after death and the fact is provable by evidence. This association is doing good work when it adds weight to the proof of the fact.

It is expected of the meeting this year that there will be another tug of war about the meaning and use of the Infinite Intelligence. The delegates will be as interested in the pros and cons as if the universe was concerned in the result.

Probably it will be revealed and given forth what the nature of this Infinite Intelligence is. Probably some high representative of God will appear—some cabinet minister, may be—and tell all about it to the end and destruction of the corpuscular molecularity of the polarities and the natural sequences of the formative forces and co-relation of the mental equipoise of Brother Lockwood. No doubt friend Lockwood will be profoundly edified by the manifestation, and for a time the serenity of his mental corelations and affinities will be thrown into combustible confusion.

But, verily, there is some useful work for this National Association to do beside raising and paying salaries to its officers. First: Let Infinite Intelligence alone. Second: Let religion alone. Third: Turn the attention of the people to the correct study of mediumship, and the production of phenomena that will prove that there is a spirit world to minds that have not yet realized the same.

The medium that can present a fact and demonstrate that fact of spirit return has done a work for mankind greater than any church ever did or any religion performed.

I despise any organization that forms a belief—that creates a faith; I will stand by that organization that gives to the world a fact.

Humanity is weeping to-day over its dead. Let the dead speak and joy will return to the human heart. Light and hope will brighten every eye, and the glee of happy childhood will be a mockery no more. That rust of agony death brings to every mother's heart will be rubbed off, and darkness and fear that fill the manly mind will give place to light and peace.

To this coming assembly of Spiritualists I say, Get down to real work, and blow no more soap bubbles.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1900.

OUR SYMPOSIUM.

Our paper this week is worthy of the especial attention of every reader, and more especially every delegate to the N. S. A. convention. It has been said that, in a multitude of counselors there is safety.

It is safe to say that not on the floor nor in the committee rooms of the Cleveland convention will the subject matters pertaining to the N. S. A. receive so thorough a sifting and analysis as is to be found in the present issue of The Progressive Thinker. The officers and delegates will do wisely to study, digest and take heed to govern their legislative actions accordingly.

Our contributors speak earnestly, each one having full regard for the interests of the Cause of Spiritualism. It is for this they care, and not for personal ends and ambitions. Many are strongly and feelingly opposed to certain methods and aims which they regard as inimical and contrary to the spirit of Spiritualism and of the brotherly association of Spiritualists as a united body. Their words should receive due consideration; the plain expressions of their honest views should be allowed their full weight in the minds of the members of the convention. They may not wisely be ignored and trampled upon as of no account or consequence in the great body of Spiritualists. They are men and women of thought, and independent thinkers at that. It is a grave mistake to designate such persons, who have the interests of Spiritualism at heart, as persons of weak intellects, and accord them treatment upon that basis. To do so were both unkindness and injustice.

We spread the thoughts of these fifty or more thinking minds among Spiritualists, before our many readers, believing that thereby good will result to our cause and to humanity.

The Galveston Sufferers.

To the Editor:—The desolation of our lives here in the wreck and ruin is relieved by the tangible evidence of sympathizing, helpful friends. Up to this date, October 3, we have received in donations, $27.70. Please accept the most earnest, heartfelt thanks of the Spiritualist Society of Galveston, as a personal acknowledgment at present is impossible. JOHN W. RING.

The sum total of $27.70, to date, seems a beggarly response from the Spiritualists of our country, to the sad call for aid, from the Spiritualists of the stricken city of Galveston. There is yet time to render needed assistance, and we hope the friends of our cause will yield to the generous impulses of humane feelings in this case of dire necessity, and will continue to send on their contributions for this worthy object, to Mr. John W. Ring, 2011 Avenue N½ Galveston, Texas.

President Barrett's Annual Report.

We shall probably publish it next week. We hereby give due notice to the delegates of the N. S. A., that unless a copy of the annual reports of its officers be furnished us at least three weeks before the regular convention, they will be completely ignored by us. Sending in reports at the "last minute" will not answer the purposes of this end of the line.

President Barrett.

We extend to him our cordial right hand of fellowship, good-will and sympathy in his arduous duties as president of the N. S. A. He will probably be re-elected as president, through force of habit, if nothing else, which appears to be unusually strong in the N. S. A. delegates. Those who oppose him have got that fact to contend with.

"Voltaire's Romances." Translated from the French. With numerous illustrations. These lighter works of the brilliant Frenchman, an invincible enemy of the Catholic church, are worthy of wide reading. Wit, philosophy and romance are combined, with the skill of a master mind. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

HON. A. B. RICHMOND.

We take great pleasure in announcing that the Hon. A. B. Richmond, the eminent lawyer, author, scientist, and Spiritualist, of Meadville, Pa., will take a prominent part the coming winter in rendering the columns of the Progressive Thinker, especially brilliant and attractive. More particulars soon. Now is the time to send in your subscriptions. We should have at least 100,000 new subscribers.

The Progressive Thinker.

It will be "numerous" at the Cleveland Convention. It will smile serenely on the large gathering, presenting in its columns a variety and vigor of thought unparalleled in the history of Modern Spiritualism. Those who do not read the paper from week to week have missed a rare feast, and, of course, will be behind the times.

The N. S. A.

The Progressive Thinker extends a most cordial greeting to the Delegates that convene at Cleveland, hoping that their deliberations will be characterized with wisdom and harmony, and that they will elect their best man for President, Infinite Intelligence smiling approvingly upon them.

A Variety of Minds.

That fact is comprehensively illustrated in this issue of The Progressive Thinker. We regret that we have not space for fifty or a hundred more contributions from equally as prominent and critical thinkers as those that appear in our columns this week. Space however, would not admit of that luxury. A careful reading of this paper will prove an intellectual feast to every Spiritualist.

Can't Prove It By Us.

There are hundreds of different Deities worshiped by as many religious sects and cults. Which one of the number will be present to overlook the proceedings of the N. S. A. we are unable to tell at this end of the line. Can you at the other end tell?

Views of a Great Author and Scientist.

"We must bear in mind," says Prof. Draper, "that the majority of men are imperfectly educated, and hence we must not needlessly offend the religious ideas of our age. It is enough for us ourselves to know that, though there is a Supreme Power, there is no Supreme Being. There is an Invisible, but not a Personal God, to whom it would be not so much blasphemy as absurdity to impute the form, the sentiments, the passions of men. All Revelation is necessarily a mere fiction. That which men call chance is only the effect of an unknown cause; even of chance there is no such thing as Providence, for Nature proceeds under irresistible laws, and in this respect the Universe is only a vast automatic engine. The vital force which pervades the world is what the illiterate call God, the modification through which all things are running takes place in an irresistible way, and hence it may be said that the progress of the world is under Destiny; like a seed, it can evolve only in a pre-determined mode."

A Practical Suggestion.

We advise the N. S. A. in convention assembled at Cleveland, Ohio, to attach a Double Distilled Back and Front Action Condenser to its next President, which will compel him to contract his annual report into the space usually occupied by the President of the United States in his annual message.

Affection naturally counterfeits those excellences which are placed at the greatest distance from possibility of attainment.—Johnson.

Whatever difference may appear in the fortunes of mankind, there is, nevertheless, a certain compensation of good and evil which makes them equal.—Rochefoucauld.

Stern duties need not speak sternly. He who stood firm before the thunder worshiped the "still, small voice."—Dobell.

So quickly, sometimes has the wheel of life turned round, that many a man has lived to enjoy the benefit of that charity which his own piety projected.—Steele.

TOO WEAK-TOO STRONG

Work of the National Spiritualists Association.

My objection to the National Spiritualist Association is that it is not strong enough, and if it were stronger I should more strongly object. I would not utter one word in opposition to any honest effort made for the furtherance of the truths of Spiritualism. The spheres of activity of individuals differ, as streams from mountain side and fen run different courses, to reach a common sea. The methods of one are not those of another, and need not necessarily be so, a fact, the recognition of which would have saved the hell of persecution which has raged wherever religion has held the power. Hence it is not with a desire to suppress the work of the N. S. A. that I write, but to voice the thoughts of at least one of the many Spiritualists who remain outside that society, and give the reasons therefor.

First, not strong enough.

Why? Because it is composed of delegates, who by their votes decide the business policy of the Association, and lay down the "law and the creed" for Spiritualism, and yet these delegates have in many cases the loosest credentials, and at best have no constituency bound to abide by their votes. Hence it is that the coming meeting after eight years of strenuous effort on the part of the promoters, is little more than a mass meeting, representative of only those who attend, and the preceding meetings have been of the same character.

There is not one Spiritualist in a thousand a member of the association, and it cannot be claimed that the members of societies sending delegates belong, if they do not fully endorse the action of the delegates who assume to represent them. Yet this small, very small minority, has taken upon it the onerous responsibility of putting forth a creed, under the veil of "resolutions," that all the world may know what a man has to believe to become a Spiritualist! I had blindly concluded that we had outgrown the age of "belief;" that we talked of things we know; that Spiritualism had come with knowledge, to assist mankind out of the slough of blind faith, and superstition in the "what saith the Lord" through a priest; and now comes the rude awakening. When I am asked, What do you believe? and I have to confess that I don't know until I have learned how the delegates at the latest convention have voted!

I feel grateful that the great body of Spiritualists are not forced to accept this dictation, for as one of that body, I have striven for the privilege to freely define my own views and express my own ideas, and while I grant to all this inalienable right, I protest with unqualified condemnation against any and every attempt to force a statement of belief, even were such written, not by a committee, but on a tablet of stone amidst the thunder clouds of Sinai.

Yet if there is to be an association to represent the Spiritualists of this great nation, it should be so organized as to represent them, by empowered delegates.

Hence it is not strong enough.

It it were stronger; if it advanced out of the mass-meeting stage; and societies sent their delegates, pledging to abide by their votes in raising money or believing according to their resolutions, then would be formed a body like a church, which might establish a set of resolutions and make "belief" essential to membership. There would be some sense in such an organization ordaining the lecturers of its subsidiary societies as "pastors," and having their churches, and opening meetings with prayer.

Are the Spiritualists of the nation ready for such an organization? Are they ready and willing to turn back the hands on the dial from noon to midnight? Hence I say if the Association were stronger, I should more strongly object, and further it is to be tolerated, because it is weak, and gives no hopeful sign of ever being stronger. The present is its eighth annual meeting, and it made great promises during the interval. It has asked for money in season and out of season, yet it has given nothing for the money it has received. It has taken money from societies and lyceums for charters, and as gifts, under the pleasing assurance than the branch societies would receive great benefits by belonging to the munificent parent. Will one society or lyceum come forward and tell us of what benefit it has received, what has been the gain? One thing—the prestige of having a charter. If, however, the society languishes for funds or in interest, has the National assisted? Is it not self-evident that all the strength of the National must come from the local societies? That it is theirs to give and not to receive?

Have missionaries been sent forth to convert the people, found societies and lyceums, and scatter broadcast the literature of Spiritualism? In the beginning a report was published to advertise the association—at least that was the appearance—and since that time the generosity of the spiritual journals has been depended upon, even to boom the yearly meetings "free for the cause."

Perhaps missionaries are not wanted! The churches want them because they want people to believe, and this too many can be talked into doing; missionarying to convert people with knowledge is quite different. It would be queer, at least, if the American Association of Science should appoint missionaries to go out into the world and preach the people into a belief in astronomy or mathematics. Perhaps, again, it is just as well that tracts containing the "resolutions" were not sown by the million, or any prepared leaflets of "views," sent out on the wings of the mail. Perhaps it is well that the great publishing house has not materialized, for in probability, the writings of mortals and spirits in accord with its policy would have been favored, and thrown on the world with the prestige of the National Society, and the unknowing given their teachings favor.

Lecturers have gained, for if they accepted ordination, they became "Rev." and thus able to secure half-fare on many railroads. But, again, after all that Spiritualists have said about the "fraud" of granting passes to the clergy, it comes with poor grace for them to beg at the door of the ticket office. What do the railroads grant passes for? They do not do so for charity, but to bribe the taker, and this in most cases is accomplished. An hundred thousand preachers saying a good word for the railroads, to pay for the passes in their pockets, is an influence not to be slighted—and now after years of repudiation, the "spiritual pastors" beg for the same favor and are anxious to put "Rev." before their names, for a half-fare ticket!

"Ordained!" A priest ordains because he is given the right and power to impart a super-holiness by the Pope, who has his patent from St. Peter, who received it from Christ himself. That is the fiction. Where does the president of the N. S. A. receive his commission? Is it not time for Spiritualists to strike out in a new path and not imitate the churches? Have they eternally to look back and long for the pot-luck they received in church bondage?

And yet I have the utmost respect and confidence in all the officers who have carried forward the work of the N. S. A. If they have failed it is because the great tide of spiritual thought has been against them. They have labored hard to accumulate a capital to extend the work, but it has annually little more than defrayed expenses and paid their small salaries.

Even for a "home" for the organization, the contributions have been slow in coming, and perhaps the reason therefor is not so much the parsimony of Spiritualists, as because of their doubt as to the association they were called on to house. They wait for it to do something tangible, forgetting that it can do nothing until it has the means, however valuable the projects of its officers.

The Cleveland meeting will be a success as a meeting, largely attended, with able speakers and widely reported. There is no doubt of that, and it is to be hoped that its delegates will wipe the slate clean and not ask for a new materialization of resolutions to be put forward as the "belief" of the body of Spiritualists of this nation.

Intolerant Missionaries.

The International Congress of Peace, in session at Paris, October 4, by formal resolutions gave the missionaries to China black eyes. The Associated Press dispatches say:

"The Congress resolved that the action of the missionaries was often intolerant; that their religious propaganda should not be backed up by diplomatic or military force; that they should go into China at their own risks and perils; that Europe should abandon any religious protectorate in China; that forcible annexation of territory, especially that held sacred by the Chinese, should cease; that the powers should attempt to establish a stable native government, capable of undertaking internal reforms, and that the open door for the honest commerce of the world on equal terms is the only policy which gives any guaranty for the country's future peace and stability."

No rock is so hard but that a little wave may beat admission in a thousand years.—Tennyson.

Most controversies would soon be ended if those engaged in them would first accurately define their terms, and then adhere to their definitions.—Tryon Edwards.

THE UNKNOWABLE.

Herbert Spencer on the God Question.

To the Editor:—Upon consideration I find I have no opinions of consequence to offer upon the question of the National Association. Philosophical questions interest me more than questions of organization.

As for "Infinite Intelligence," I know nothing about it, and think it the height of absurdity to attempt to define the undefinable. I have copied a couple of pages from Spencer's "Unknowable," which you may insert if you choose in some corner of The Progressive Thinker. This gives my view much better than I could express it myself.

NORA BATCHELOR.

Ashland, Or.

HERBERT SPENCER ON "THE UNKNOWABLE."

"Is it not just possible that there is a mode of being as much transcending Intelligence and Will as these transcend mechanical motion? It is true that we are totally unable to conceive any such higher mode of being. But this is not a reason for questioning its existence; it is rather the reverse. Have we not seen how utterly incompetent our minds are to form even an approach to a conception of that which underlies all phenomena? Is it not proved that this incompetency is the incompetency of the Conditioned to grasp the Unconditioned? Does it not follow that the Ultimate Cause cannot in any respect be conceived by us because it is in every respect greater than can be conceived? And may we not therefore rightly refrain from assigning to it any attributes whatever, on the ground that such attributes, derived as they must be from our own natures, are not elevations but degradations? Indeed it seems somewhat strange that men should suppose the highest worship to be in assimilating the object of their worship to themselves. Not in asserting a transcendent difference, but in asserting a certain likeness, consists the element of their creed which they think essential. It is true that from the time when the rudest savages imagined the causes of all things to be creatures of flesh and blood like themselves, down to our own time, the degree of assumed likeness has been diminishing. But though a bodily form and substance similar to that of man, has long ceased among cultivated races, to be a literally-conceived attribute of the Ultimate Cause—though the grosser human desires have been also rejected as unfit elements of the conception—though there is some hesitation in ascribing even the higher human feelings, save in greatly idealized shapes; yet it is still thought not only proper, but imperative, to ascribe the most abstract qualities of our nature! To think of the Creative Power as in all respects anthropomorphous, is now considered impious by men who yet hold themselves bound to think of the Creative Power as in some respects anthropomorphous, and who do not see that the one proceeding is but an evanescent form of the other. And then, most marvelous of all, this course is persisted in by those who contend that we are wholly unable to form any conception whatever of the Creative Power. After it has been shown that every supposition respecting the genesis of the Universe commits us to alternative impossibilities of thought—after it has been shown that each attempt to conceive real existence ends in an intellectual suicide—after it has been shown why, by the very constitution of our minds, we are eternally debarred from thinking of the Absolute; it is still asserted that we ought to think of the Absolute thus and thus. In all imaginable ways we find thrust upon us the truth, that we are not permitted to know—nay, are not even permitted to conceive—that Reality which is behind the veil of Appearance; and yet it is said to be our duty to believe (and in so far to conceive) that this Reality exists in a certain defined manner. Shall we call this reverence? or shall we call it the reverse?

Volumes might be written upon the impiety of the pious. Through the printed and spoken thoughts of religious teachers, may almost everwhere be traced a professed familiarity with the ultimate mystery of things, which to say the least of it, seems anything but congruous with the accompanying expressions of humility. And surprisingly enough, those tenets which most clearly display this familiarity, are those insisted upon as forming the vital elements of religious belief."—First Principles, pages 109, 110.

IRON AND CLAY.

The N. S. A. and Its Creed.

To the Editor:—In a recent note, calling my attention to the coming meeting of the N. S. A., at Cleveland, you ask my views, both in respect to the organization itself, and its creed as adopted at its lost annual meeting. In regard to the first question, I will simply say that for one, I believe in organization; and I show my belief by being a member of the association. That it is perfect, no one will claim; but while others who are competent devote their thought to the obtaining of betterments in the form of the organization, I would prefer to deal more directly with its creed, or statement of belief, as the head of a religious cult.

It seems clear to me that, as it now stands, we are like other sectarians the world over; presenting for a world's consideration our claim by right of discovery to the image of a New God! No, I will not claim that it is a new God, exactly; but a new idol to represent God. "Infinite Intelligence," it is named, and with all due deference to the piety of the sponsors for the newborn idol, I would suggest that at the Cleveland meeting they should present a materialized form of it, that it might be placed in the already crowded Pantheon of images; there to stand for eager eyes, a perpetual witness of divine unchangeableness! To assist them in doing this, by way of pattern, I would refer them to the fine description of an image seen in a dream by Babylon's king. The dream image was that of a man, to be sure; but then all the creedal gods are anthropomorphic, and so we would be "orthodox" if we did take it! Your readers will remember that this image in the form of man, was possed of a head of fine gold; his breast and arms of silver, his loins and thighs of brass, his legs of iron; and his feet, part of iron and part of clay!

True, this was supposed to be a political idol; but then, will it not be good enough, in its reincarnation, for a religious one?

"We believe in infinite intelligence;" so says the creed; but this is what troubles me: Intelligence is self-knowledge—consciousness; infinite is a word of an undefined measure of finites, or things measured. I know that popular usage has made "the Infinite" to stand for "the All"—but in reality it is indefinite measuring of things, and I would that it be so understood; knowing none the less, that the word as commonly used is supposed to include all that there is of its kind. So taking the word in its popular sense, I read: "Infinite Intelligence," and wonder which is the ruling word, the adjective or the noun. Are we called upon to reverence intelligence or is it infinitude? If it is the last; then I see the feet of iron mixed with clay! There is intelligence perceptible in all the orders of life below man; these lower orders, it seems to me, furnish the clay for the feet of this idol. I do not wonder that a stone "cut out of the mountains without hands;" that is, by the natural action of the elements, as it rolled down upon the plain where the image was, "smote it"—overthrew it!

True, I am an evolutionist in my understanding of Nature's processes of creation; and so must acknowledge "my poor relations, the brutes;" but, too, in my study of evolution, I find that there is a something that we call "selection." This leads me to select from this infinite aggregation of perceived intelligence, that which I call "the highest," and if I am a man, I want "the head of fine gold," not the baser metals, not the clay, to stand for the God of this latest born church organization!

But now, do not say that I am an Atheist, because I seem inclined to ridicule infinite intelligence. Far from it! I am a believer in God; in that "power that makes for righteousness"—using the words of Matthew Arnold—a believer in that which our Aryan forefathers named "Od;" a mental force, not ourselves, that has so made itself felt, that every age of man has been forced to worship it in some way; to reverence, too, its oracles of wisdom—for it has ever had its oracles! In every age of man, there have been those who were sure they heard speech, where no form of man was; and yet all the time the speech was human; and hence all the gods have been "in the image of" man!

The past, ignorant of almost everything in nature's processes, fancied that this odic force, this unseen, this "infinite" man, must have been the maker and builder of all the material universe; and so according to their wisdom or their ignorance, they wrote out their cosmogonies, framed their theologies. We smile at their crudities, as doubtless our children's children will smile at ours; but, amid all this conglomeration of wisdom and ignorance, we do find a strain of piety, that runs like a silver cord through all history, that we name Spirituality. The man was in his worship spiritualized, refined, made more and more humane. We see to-day lacking much in its spiritual refinement, but do we not see improvement, as compared with other ages? The race has grown in its humanity as much as it has in its material wealth of mind; and though "man's inhumanity to man" is as marked in the records of churches, as it is in civil governments; still we know that "the church" has stood for righteousness in its creed; its preaching, whatever may have been its shortcomings in practice. And, too, we know that that which it worshiped as God, was and is (and ever will be) its moral standard for the conduct of men.

Worshiped as God. What thing in this unseen but felt moral power, did they really reverence? Was it not its spirit? True, they told of Almighty Power; said that God—this psychic, unknown force of mind—was the Supreme Ruler; and have preached submission to the "divine commandments;" but all this was not the incentive of the people's love and reverence; it has been the cause of the people's fear; that I admit, and it was this superstitious fear of God, that has made the annals of church history the bloody things that they are.

But has there not been a love of God, as well as a fear of God? I would be false to my own sense of things if I did not acknowledge a reverential love for this occult power that "makes for righteousness;" and its cause is found, not in its almighty power, but in the expression of love for mankind. And, too, in all ages, by prophets of every religion, men have been told of the divinely human love of God. There has been doubtless, in every faith known to man, much of superstition; but there is and ever has been love emphasized, and it is the one thing of all things that has attracted the worshipers of this unknown; this occult power that in our Indu-English speech we have in its collective sense named God. It is a spiritual name of that which is "highest" in our esteem.

Now, then, as a Theist, I say that "God" is a known spirit of the human race—it is the highest motive of life as man, of which we are cognizant; it is the spirit of love, wholesome love; but why need we personify it, name it God? I answer, because to-day needs a personifying word, that will distinguish understandingly and easily, between the excarnate world of man, and the incarnate world of man, as we speak one to another of things pertaining to our experience of faith—our knowledge, if that suits you any better.

To-day is an age of discovery; we boast that it is so, and not the least of our discoveries is our discovery of what it is in the experience of mankind, that has produced religion, and established religious observances. More than that: I hold that it is the greatest of all our discoveries; and I write this reverently, for I feel its truth!

My assumption is this: That the occult power which the Aryan named "Od;" which we have Anglicised, and named God, is Immortal Man! We have found by close observation of phenomena, that we are immortal beings; found that death does not end all; found that by various means we can intelligently receive messages of love, of warning, and tokens of spiritual presence. We have found scientifically this evidence of man's continuance of life beyond the period of physical death; and with this, I declare as my most earnest and reasonable faith in a hereafter for us, that we have found, and know for a certainty, the source of this hitherto unknown power, the world has ignorantly worshiped!

Now it seems to me, that the N. S. A. will miss its opportunity of greatness, if it stultifies itself by continuing to mystify, or attempting to mystify the people of the earth, by setting up another idol, under the name of "Infinite Intelligence." The world is not asking for mystery; it is demanding enlightenment; and we of the N. S. A. are prepared, I honestly think; to give enlightenment of religion, and religious experience. Why not be brave enough to do it?

Instead of the weakling's creed, that now stands as our creed, let me suggest this formula, not as a creed, but statement of things generally accepted, though not binding upon the conscience of any, for we believe in the inherent right of every one to formulate his own belief, in "God," or Nature universal:

1. We believe in "God," not as a person; but as a personification of the highest spirit or motive of life as man, incarnate or excarnate, and we reverence it accordingly, whether manifested in us, or in the higher birth of excarnate selfhood.

2. For convenience in designating which class of human existence we would recommend that the term God be used in general speech as personifying excarnate humanity.

3. We accept as a demonstrated fact, the existence and personal identity of individuality after the change called death.

4. We accept as a proven fact, personal communication with the so-called dead; and that in view of this well-established fact, we seek reverently from those who have "gone before," instruction in right conduct, as man has ever done, even when ignorant of God, as we know God.

5. Bound by no creed of the past superstitions, we claim our inherent right as man, to make laws; to set up new and higher standards of social moralities; to amend or annul any or all commandments, and substitute new ones, if such course is found necessary to the establishment of a higher virtue.

FREEDOM

The Genius of Spiritualism

For the greater part, Spiritualists are a free-minded, liberty-loving and progressive people. They not only demand for themselves, but freely accord to others the right of free thought, free speech and free action, holding themselves and others accountable only for the abuse thereof. Therefore it follows that any organization in order to be truly representative of such a body of people must be builded upon and administered in accordance with this fundamental conception of human rights.

Spiritualism is a great truth, a grand science, a noble and all-inclusive philosophy. Rightly interpreted it is the solvent of all religions and systems of philosophic thought, and is the one conception which affords an intelligible explication and an adequate reason for the existence of man upon earth.

If there is one word more than another which distinguishes Spiritualism from all systems of religion extant in the world, it is the word knowledge. Dogmatic religions eschew that word and dread its import, because of its liberalizing and liberating tendencies; hence they impose restraints and limitations upon the human mind with respect thereto. "Thou shalt not eat of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge" has been the paradigm since the days of Adam, of the religious creeds of the world by which those creeds like vampiric incubi have ever sought to hold in bondage the human soul.

Instead of knowledge the old religions have given to the world beliefs, dogmas, superstitions and speculations, and in consequence and in their train fanaticism, persecution, war, devastation and ruin. More than fifty millions of human lives, within historic times and among so-called Christian nations, have been sacrificed upon the altar of religious belief. The demon of persecution, hatred and spoliation has ever lurked beneath the dark and forbidding folds of the priestly robe. There have been no devastating Crusades, St. Bartholomew's Massacres, Holy Inquisitions nor Thirty Years' Wars instigated or carried on by or at the behest of science or philosophy.

"We believe there is infinite intelligence"—so did Pope Innocent III., Torquemada and John Calvin; but Spiritualism troubles itself and the world not with beliefs; it reveals to man the fact of a veritable spiritual life beyond the grave, in which goodly works, love, charity, knowledge and character, here as well as there, constitute the test and means of human progress and happiness.

Spiritualism contains within it the sure intimation of a never-ending immortality. It teaches man that being immortal his destiny is to labor for and to achieve that which is highest and best. It lays down no formula or creed by which human conduct or thought shall be guided or governed; but it leaves the individual free to determine for himself that which he ought to think, to believe and to do; least of all does it curb the bounding enthusiasm of thought that seeks the solution of some mighty problem, by thrusting upon it the unreasoned dictum of ignorance or fear.

The N. S. A. will therefore be in accord with the great purpose and work of Spiritualism in the world if it leave creed-making to the adepts of that art, and bend its energies and efforts to the dissemination of the high-born truths, facts and philosophy which it is ours as Spiritualists to know, to cherish and to love. WHAT HAS IT DONE?

A New Statement of Principles.

An important query for mid-October is: "What has the N. S. A. done to deserve perpetuation?"

In reply I shall answer as I did last year that through the force of the name National it has raised the tide of public respect; outside of that, what?—well, chaos; naught else.

Some fifty years ago a few unwise spirits whispered to some thoughtless mortals that Spiritualists were never to be organized. That because the church and the clergy had sinned in the midst of a well-defined churchianity, Spiritualists should never state their principles, neither should they organize, and that every medial worker should forever more, amen; be known as test and physical medium or lecturer; that said mediums should ne'er be accountable to any Spiritualist body for their deeds; and that any person, no matter where from; no matter how vile; no matter how much of a swindler, could steal those designatory titles and use them until the police managed to gain evidence to stop each swindler separately.

Didn't the spirits in effect say that, when they laid down the rules as dictators that Spiritualists should not organize? The result is that we have about 190,000 avowed Spiritualists in the United States; 200 well-known, honorable public workers; 1,000 located physical and test media; and at least 1,000 slick swindlers passing under the name medium, who are living vile, thievish and beastly lives under a title which should be sacred and dedicated only to Spiritualism. Besides the 190,000 avowed Spiritualists, various well-posted authorities claim that there are at least 9,800,000 other Spiritualists who never acknowledge it to the census enumerator.

I, for one, firmly believe there are over 10,000,000 Spiritualists in the United States. In journeying from city to city and state to state, I naturally meet and talk with many hundreds of people every year; and it is so common to hear people say: "Well, I am really a Spiritualist, and so are most of my family; but I am so tired of hearing the sneers of my associates about these traveling so-called mediums, who sell charms, read (literally) ballots; and swindle people out of their diamonds, that I cannot and will not endure the comments any longer. I should think if those old-time Spiritualists loved the cause they would have had a church and had their workers legally protected by a name. And if there is not incentive enough for the old Spiritualists to work, how can they possibly expect the new-comers to do so? Besides, I do not like the lack of reverence displayed; nearly all Spiritualist lecturers turn my friends from it by pricking at the 'letter of the law,' instead of studying the Bible as Paul said when he wrote, 'God hath made us ministers of a new covenant (Gr. testament), not of the letter but of the spirit; for the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life,' and thus making the book an aid to further knowledge. So I still keep up my connection with the church; but I assure you I should dearly love to belong to a Spiritualist association where the services displayed genuine reverence for the Soul of the Universe; and for the good and true of all ages and of all lands; and where above all things the audience was taught to prepare itself for this higher communion, where the curiosity was eliminated; and where the lives of the workers shone bright and clear; without any trace of charlatanry or of dishonor in past efforts or present history."

Well, perhaps by the time one hears these remarks about 500 times per year, it makes media contented with the present status of effort; but fortunately it does not. I have conversed privately with nearly every public worker in the field and they all tell the same story. Many workers are trying to leave the field, some have already done so.

What can be done to make the N. S. A. of real practical value?

The first necessity would be to station an orthodox minister over each delegate and let him shout: "Oh, utterers of big talk and doers of nothing, you prate about the crimes of ministers, look at the army of thieves and fakes passing under the name medium. You shout aloud that our Bible has dirty spots in it; look at the records of spirits and Spiritists; you abuse us for our failures to be Christians; please step forward and let us perceive how spiritual you are.

"We found hospitals, schools and colleges; our ministers are not wealthy, but they always have food, clothing, and shelter for old age; while your 'instruments for angels' are left ofttimes to private charity or to public almshouses.

"The very ones who brought you this light which you claim to prize have sometimes died beggars.

"You as Spiritualists claim to come so close to the 'soul of things,' now tell us what you have done to establish these truths!

"You leave your honest workers to compete with swindlers who can use exactly the same name as the true worker; you have no churches impregnated with your spirituality and yet prate to us about 'conditions'; you pretend to be Spiritualists, but we cannot conceive of being spiritual and not working for the truth as far as we understand it.

"Your public lecturers rave about our mistakes and rant about our insincerity, yet we have loved our system of thought well enough to seek to establish it; we have done our duty by that if not by humanity wholly; while you, what have you done? Nothing but make people think! Why do you not name yourselves 'Public Discussers of All Questions Under the Sun and Occasional Demonstrators of Psychic Science?' It would fit your combination much better.

"If this is really true that Spirits return; that we progress onward in a natural world beyond the grave; and that the Universe is governed by a Law, Life, Love, Consciousness which is diffused and differentiated but not crystallized as a personal God; if this is really true that you meet your friends and find them natural beyond the grave; how do you expect to feel when you meet your loved ones in the summerland?"

Under such "conditions" the delegates to the coming convention might wake up; harmonize and unify and do something sensible which would help organize for good work.

Now understand my criticisms of that class of Spiritualists; which as I am not a botanist I am unable to classify in their proper family of intellectual fungi; is not intended by any means for our working Spiritualists. We have some grand, good Spiritualists who toil and toil uncomplainingly year after year. They keep the doors open, entertain speakers, play the piano, take up collections, subscribe for Spiritualist newspapers, help in entertainments and do all that their hearts find to do.

These constitute a consecrated band; they sacrifice possibly one-tenth as much as each medium does to keep the work before the public. You will find a few in Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Grand Rapids, Detroit, Brooklyn, New Orleans, and there are still a few left in poor old San Francisco.

Milwaukee, Louisville, Toronto, St. Paul, Minneapolis, have some dozens, and intermediate small towns are occasionally heard from as hard workers.

They comprise the striving, loving, working few. They will not hide for shame in the shadows when they pass to the other side.

The N. S. A. if it ever expects to be of benefit to the cause should confer upon public mediums and lecturers the title of "Medium or Lecturer for the N. S. A." The State Associations should similarly care for located workers, "Evangelists of the N. S. A." might be used for those who had been less than 10 years in the field. After we have lived and worked honorably for years we certainly deserve a name that tramps will not dare to steal. Under these titles we should be responsible to the N. S. A. for our actions, and liable to be churched, for dishonor.

I am well aware that in a good many quarters this would be fought bitterly because we have many who declare they will be responsible to no person; but Spiritualists as a body would support such a move, as would all strictly honorable workers. Under this regime all physical media would find it to their interests to demand test conditions of and give test conditions to the public; they would be thoroughly protected in their circles from bodily assault and from the throwing of wigs, etc., and in turn expect the circle to bathe, put on clean clothes, and leave beer, onions and tobacco out of their clothes and their system.

Nothing secures the respect of the public so quick as to demand something decent of it and see that it is done. Thus the value of physical mediumship would be increased a hundred fold.

Lecturers also might be adjusted I hear; as media sometimes accuse their intellectual brethren with several mistaken ideas; and I am sure it could do no harm to be regulated occasionally; but the question of public tests certainly needs adjusting; for we are now the laughing stock of scientific investigators, and justly so.

Oh, what bad taste it is; and how transcendentally foolish to hear a public worker who professes to commune with arisen loved ones, stand upon a rostrum and announce: "I hear the name of (slowly) Blanky—(slower) Ty (hesitatingly) Blank," (naming some former well-known public medium with the most childlike and bland expression of innocence; "at least I think that is the name. If there is any person in this audience who recognizes that name, please speak out so that the people can hear you." At present some thoughtless ones resent the term "tests," presumably because it is abused; but better a thousand times never give a "message," than mix in such communications (?) The message which is open so glaringly to public distrust is one of the greatest causes of our loss of strength.

The ballot test also ought to disappear under N. S. A. guidance, for nothing is so certain as that any medium who can give an honest "ballot test" can also give it just as easily from a sealed envelope. Sealed envelopes might convince the thinker, but ballots never. Why sleight-of-hand performers have done that trick at 25 cents per head until it's stale! How can we expect public respect with such slip-shod methods?

The term Infinite Intelligence is being largely discussed!

Human minds cannot possibly combine the terms Intelligence and Infinity and leave out the ideas of goodness, peace, plenty. The most intelligent people whom we know are good people.

I confess I should not choose the term, but it's lots better than nothing. Better have a God which is a little too pretentious, than none at all.

The term Cosmic Soul would be far preferable.

Webster defines spirit as "Man's immortal nature," and soul, "the higher and better part of man's immortal nature," therefore "Cosmic Soul" is the higher and better part of the immortal nature of the beautiful order of the universe. An expression which defines my God.

Infinite Intelligence is not within the lion, tiger, West India hurricane or Kansas cyclone; neither is it always active in polar seas or tropic jungle.

Worst of all, when we adopt the term Infinite Intelligence it presupposes that as a body we are fully satisfied with the universe as it is and have no mind to criticise the many failures which the really truly God of all things hath wrought.

Why everybody knows that no self-respecting Spiritualist would want to pose before the world as being supremely contented with the earth, the heavens or anything that in them is. As a body of people we feel that we could do a much better job than any God that has worked thus far, and the term Infinite Intelligence nips all criticism in the bud.

The next necessity on the list is that we should have a few more principles and state them. It has been charged for over fifty years that as a body of people we have no principles to state, worth speaking of.

The mathematician always can affirm principles even while he is studying theories and classifying them as unproven!

One thing is certain, no scientific mind ever yet confounded the word principles with the horrors of the word creed.

Here are some principles which all progressive Spiritualists could subscribe to. Understand they do not comprise all of the thoughts which I, personally wish to endorse, but I would be willing to compromise, for the sake of seeing organization organize.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

Unto the Divine Cosmic Soul we as children give loving reverence.

We acknowledge: The common parentage in nature of all human kind, the continuity of life, individuality and progress beyond the change called death, the return and communion and communication of excarnate with incarnate spirits under proper conditions and recompense for all good and retribution for all wrong here or hereafter through natural law.

EPITOMIZED TEACHINGS OF SPIRITUALISM.

That the universe is the only complete revelation of the Infinite.

That as children of the Cosmic Soul we should evolve our higher nature here below, doing right for right's sake and not from fear of nature's future punishment.

That before races and individuals may progress, mortals must have greater love and charity for humanity and, for all helpless life.

That there should be but one high moral and mental, and but one legal standard for both man and woman.

That, in order that individuals may be happier and a superior race generated, there should be an immediate cessation of pauper, criminal and incurable procreation of species.

That marriage become a legal as well as a spiritual partnership in which it is the solemn duty of the contracting parties to keep love, peace, mutual work for each other and pure lives.

That in all cases of parentage whether in marriage or out, both father and mother shall be held responsible by the commonwealth for the support, education and moral training of all offspring; and that in all cases of failure the defaulter shall work, under imprisonment by the state, and the wages used for that purpose.

That education for life under proper restraint should take the place of the legal murder of criminals.

That arbitration and courts of justice conducted by the Powers would take the place of war.

That we accept the good from all bibles and from all of the inspired teachers of the past, meanwhile affirming that the universe alone is the only complete revelation of the Infinite; that naught but eternity can complete the study and that mortals like children, can only comprehend the Parent Sources of life in proportion to their mental and spiritual evolution.

That the Gifts of the Spirit are a natural inheritance and even as in the past are evolution of Natural Law.

That in seeking communion and communication with Higher Realms we should seek reverently.

That this is religion, pure and undefiled before God: To visit and aid the helpless in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted from evil.

That is is unnecessary to be ill, suffering and discordant, as by unfolding our own higher nature, and relying upon the Cosmic Soul and Angel Helpers for aid we can evolve above these imperfections.

That we should recognize and teach all truth, wherever it may be found; never point out error unless absolutely necessary, and then only in a spirit of kindliness, and be altruistic rather than iconoclastic.

MEMBERSHIP.

Any person wishing to do good and be good, can become a member of this association.

We band ourselves together to work for the enlightenment of humanity and to welcome all demonstrated truth which spiritual and material science may bring.

Ministers and media of Spiritualism in full knowledge of recording Cosmic Forces and of the Ministry of the Angelic Realms do solemnly agree to live the life they teach.

TEMPLES.

All church buildings shall be institutional and include a library of carefully selected liberal and scientific books and periodicals, gymnasium, bath, other entertainment and instruction rooms, and also scientifically constructed and fitted up with seance rooms; wherein the seances shall be so conducted that the medium shall have ample protection and the kindliest care.

The above represents my kind of Spiritualism, not completely, but nearly so. We could build up; conserve our forces, clothe Truth in clean garments, and make of mediumship of all phases a potency for good, under such a statement.

That the N. S. A. delegates may waken and work, we should all continue to pray.

CARRIE F. WEATHERFORD.

The N. S. A. and the Creed Business.

I have expressed myself so often on these subjects that my present effort will be "powerfully weak" and immensely small. As our National Spiritualist Association is about to meet, our spiritual papers will no doubt be well filled with criticisms of the idea of a God, with screeds against creeds, and sometimes even with doubts as to the need of our national organization. For spiritual papers to fight against a personal God or the idea of creeds is to combat men of straw, for Spiritualists do not advocate either. Instead of creeds, the cultured Spiritualist would have a scientific statement of principles with reference to spiritual phenomena and spiritual upbuilding as a help to all students of the cause, just as any other science has its statement of principles. Instead of a religion founded on mere faith and tradition, he would have a religion of spiritual aspiration which leads heavenward and which is sustained by the soul-cheering facts of the living present. We have irreligious Spiritists, materialistic Spiritists, so to speak, who have scarcely reached the halfway house of real Spiritualism, and who, not understanding the grandeur of the cause, will "damn the whole matter with faint praise" or with misty lucubrations.

True Spiritualism has a magnificent philosophy and religion and by the aid of a good organization and earnest workers and money to lubricate its machinery, it will yet conquer and bless the world. When I hear of people who condemn organization, it reminds me of certain trusts that organize to the highest extent for their own aggrandizement but fight to the death all organizations of their employes, knowing full well that an organized body of laborers cannot easily be trampled under foot. We need to send eloquent missionaries and mediums over the whole country, but to do this the N. S. A. needs to be made powerful with means to foot the bills.

DEFENDS THE N. S. A.

A Voice From The Home Office.

To the Editor:—In response to a kindly invitation from your office to give my views upon the work and mission of the N. S. A., and to state whether or no, in my opinion, it has failed during the years of its existence to meet the requirements of Spiritualists and Spiritualism, I venture to submit to you and your good constituents a few thoughts from the home office of the institution in question.

Quoting from "The National Messenger" of 1895, in brief, I find that the N. S. A. has shown that organization is a necessity among Spiritualists; that it has obtained hearing in the United States courts; and that it has brought Spiritualists and societies all over the land into touch with each other and united them as they could not otherwise have been. Well, even this is something to be thankful for, but this is but a small part of what the N. S. A. accomplished in even the first two years of its existence. Since then it has been steadily going forward, and its influence in the Cause of Truth, is felt from Maine to California. Perhaps no one is better qualified to judge of the usefulness of an institution than the one who sits in its central office, week in and week out, during two years, and receives the callers, and attends to the correspondence of the Association from all over the land, and it is from this standpoint that I write to-day. Therefore I feel that I am voicing the opinion of hundreds—perhaps thousands of intelligent Spiritualists, when I affirm that the N. S. A. is a needed association, and that it is the centre of Spiritualistic inquiry, influence and observation at the present time.

We must remember that the National Association is not composed of the members of its board of trustees, nor even of the hundred or two delegates—more or less—who attend its annual meetings and take part in its deliberations. On the contrary, it is made up of chartered societies from the coast of Maine to the far Pacific slope. These societies vary in point of membership, from a score to hundreds—including tiny local societies, and large camps, and State Associations. Therefore each delegate who attends the annual convention, is not necessarily voicing or voting his own opinion, but is conscientiously voting what he believes to be the will and principle of his constituency—the society that honored him, or her, as a delegate and sent the same to the convention.

Great attention may be given to the ten or twenty individual writers who through the spiritual press give public vent to their objections to, and criticisms of the N. S. A. and its work, and much stress may be laid upon these objections, by a few who think that anything that finds publication must be in the majority of opinion, but, to me, it would be interesting to learn whether these personal opinions thus expressed—emanating from the learned philosopher of the platform, or from a more obscure layman—represent anything like the will and the views of half an hundred or more true Spiritualists—while we are certain that the majority who carry any point at the N. S. A. conventions represent a far greater constituency than the casual reader stops to think. In the light of a National organization, the N. S. A. has a place and a time for its existence, and needs no apology for having become established at the Capital of the Nation, or for having come in the closing decade of the Nineteenth Century. It is the opinion of many intelligent minds on both sides of life, that a national association in the ranks of Spiritualism, is in its relation to the State Associations what the United States Government is to the various States, while to the local societies, it is much the same as the National Government is to the towns and cities in their local jurisdiction over municipal affairs. All are necessary to the proper conducting of the work, and for the protection and advancement of their people and affairs. Why there should be any question as to the advisability of maintaining a State Association or an N. S. A. is not yet made plain to hundreds who are in touch with this association, and frequently sending to this office for information or advice upon matters spiritual, that they consider important for the welfare of the Cause in their vicinity.

The N. S. A. has established in the courts the rights of Spiritualists to a respectful hearing, and established before the law Spiritualism as a religion entitled to the same privileges and consideration as any religion can claim. It has also brought the great railroad companies to recognize its teachers and preachers—in the fullness that they never did before—for the granting of special rates to them as platform workers, in their travels upon missionary or other spiritualistic work.

But I have neither time nor space to dwell upon what the N. S. A. has done, those who have carefully read the annual reports of the association or attended its conventions know what has been done, and what is yet to be undertaken in this direction. The question now is, How can it be strengthened, and made to be a still greater factor in human progress and in the growth of Spiritual Truth? Also, whether or not the N. S. A. should presume to formulate a Declaration of Principles that affirms a belief in "An Infinite Intelligence?" That this National Association is not perfect, even its most enthusiastic friends will admit, and that it is open to criticism none will question, since there is nothing perfect this side of heaven, even the most zealous of the friends who do their best to riddle the N. S. A. with mirth-provoking and sarcastic balls. That its true adherents and loyal supporters honestly and earnestly desire to find its weak places and to have them strengthened by the very best of material, we may all believe. No doubt the "Principles" adopted at the last convention can be improved, and if "Infinite Intelligence" is an offensive term to the majority of the delegates it can be revised, or stricken from the roll, without the slightest menace to either Spiritualism or to the N. S. A. That some kind of a "Declaration," that should be acceptable to the majority of our chartered societies—as well as to many who do not live where a society exists—was demanded, was plainly shown by the multitude of letters that came to this office during the year prior to the last convention, and as no protests against taking such action came from workers or thinkers—either to this office or to the convention while it was in session, the inference is that at least a great many Spiritualists desired just what was given. As for myself, I am willing to abide by the consensus of opinion. If the majority desire to rule out "Infinite Intelligence" from the principles adopted, I shall not scathe them in the public prints. "Infinite Intelligence," as representing Supreme Power, Design, Wisdom, Law, Order, or any term that means an Overruling force, is good enough for me, and because I accept it—granting that I do—is no reason that I cannot conceive of that Intelligence according to my own brain power or moral culture, or that I intend to force any one else to hold the same concept of Intelligent Law, that is mine.

Finally, the great need of the world from the N. S. A. is more missionary work. The Association has been handicapped in this line for want of funds, missionaries could not be sent out without means, but we have reason to believe that better work can be done in this line very soon. Thanks to the great generosity of that noble hearted Spiritualist, T. J. Mayer, and to the friends who have grandly contributed to the fund he has created, the N. S. A. is in better shape to carry on its good work than it ever was before, and the outlook for its usefulness is a good one.

Those who scoff and fume at the Association and its workers, do not begin to know the amount of effort made in the name of Spiritualism, and the records we have here of the good work performed by its missionaries and officers. These same critics never try to amend or improve the institution by joining one of its chartered societies and bringing their influence and support to the society, thus gaining the right to help formulate the rules of the National organization, but they stand off and cavil, while the work still goes on, and the chartered societies through their delegates at each convention say the N. S. A. shall live.

Before closing this desultory letter, Mr. Editor, I wish to call attention to the N. S. A. Free Library of over five hundred spiritual and liberal books from the pens of some of the most advanced writers and thinkers of the century. This library is a source of education to a great many people. During the larger part of the year, this lovely city is full of people from all parts of the country. Many of them are seeking light on Spiritualism and the "Higher Thought;" they hear of this library and come here to secure reading matter, which they get free of cost. Words cannot tell the good this of itself has done, nor of the educational force thus going out over the country from the headquarters of the N. S. A.

But I have taxed your space and patience quite enough, let others discuss the usefulness of the N. S. A.—pro and con—your columns can do no better work for the Cause than to have this great question settled. I am satisfied, however, that intelligence, and good common sense, in matters of organization, as well as in every other topic of interest to the world, will regulate all questions to their proper domain, in the area of Public Sentiment, where they will be adjudicated according to their deserts.

With fraternal greetings to all,

COGENT QUESTION.

If a Creed, What Shall It Contain.

Though not a Spiritualist, Brother Francis has nevertheless asked me to contribute to this symposium. It will be understood that I speak from the standpoint of a friendly outsider. The central contention of Spiritualism I grant, to-wit: The possibility of spirit intercourse, or the intercommunion of spirits in the flesh with those that have gone out of the body.

But a fiddle should have more than one string. A party of importance must formulate its views on all vital topics. As with political, so with religious parties, a "platform" is necessary, and a great many "planks" are needed to place the issues. Spiritualism cannot be an exception to the rule. A multitude of scattered, isolated believers in spirit communion can accomplish but little.

There must be close, finely articulated organization—National, state and local. There must be a clear-cut statement of principles. You must present to the world an ethical system—a concise scheme of living, set forth in moral precepts, axioms and exhortations. You need not claim it is "inspired," or pronounce it "infallible," but until you produce something of the kind you are hopelessly handicapped in the race with the churches. Even now, if a Spiritualist lecturer decides to lecture on a given moral topic, he selects a text from the New Testament!

What else can he do? You have no volume containing a like treasure of moral precept, injunction and exhortation. You have as yet no substitute for the Sermon on the Mount, for Rom. 12; I. Cor. 13, or any other of the many fine delineations of the higher life contained in the Christian book.

The church has a splendid organization, and it has a Book. You may cavil at the book, sneer at its inspiration, but it is a fact that the preacher can take that old book and from its pages show men the way of life. He can preach righteousness, temperance, justice, mercy, purity, benevolence, charity, "every grace that adorns the life beautiful."

Spiritualism must organize its forces.

It is imperatively necessary for it to formulate its conception of life and duty, either by accepting the New Testament ideal, or giving us something better. In my judgment organization and the promulging of a full, clear-cut statement of principles, including a book of maxims, moral precepts, injunctions and exhortations, with which to build up and develop the human character, is the pressing duty of the N. S. A. at next meeting.

As to "Infinite Intelligence," I would reaffirm, verbatim, the statement made at Chicago, in 1899.

ELD. H. W. B. MYRICK.

Association and every other organized effort will be crippled and its influence for good destroyed.

In conclusion I will say, if Spiritualism is to be a living power for good, if the National Association is to prosper and cover the nation with its influence, then we must have unity of action, we must recognize all forms of mediumship, we must work for the advancement of humanity along all lines, moral, social, industrial, political and religious.

THE GREAT QUESTION.

It Is, "To Be, or Not to Be."

To the Editor:—The wheels of time are rapidly bringing us around to the point on the dial plate of destiny when the National Association will meet in annual convention to do that which seems to the majority the best for the cause we all have at heart.

Last year I had the pleasure of attending the convention in company with my wife, who represented the Nebraska State Spiritualist Association.

I had no voice myself in the discussion pro and con on the "Infinite Intelligence" plank in our platform, so hope your many readers will bear with me just a little in a sort of all-round criticism of everybody, including myself. I feel like I want to kick somebody, so will commence on myself.

I sometimes think I am very much of a "crank," for I can't agree with the majority on any subject. I have always been on the side of the under-dog in the fight, and see no other prospect but to stay there.

To me it seems to be very much of a truth that there is one thing lacking in Spiritualism, and that is a cementing force of some kind which should keep us more in touch with each other. Up till the present time Spiritualism seems to have developed more selfishness, intense individualism and a desire to rule than anything else. And yet we would not say that this is entirely the case, but in a majority of instances it is unfortunately true. We seem to have been in such a hurry to develop mediumship that we have forgotten to develop brotherly and sisterly love and spirituality. Many mediums have been so anxious to get to the front and become popular, that they have tried to knock other mediums down with a club of unjust criticism in order to climb into popular favor themselves. This has been a death-glow to many organizations all over the land.

Perhaps we have been too unjust in our criticism of the last Convention, yet it does seem that we should spend more time in advocating measures for the spread of the knowledge of spirit return, for the relief of humanity from mental, moral, social and political errors, instead of spending so much time and energy on a subject nobody knows anything about.

Personally I do not care to discuss a question which is entirely incomprehensible and out of the reach of human intellect at the present time. I prefer to come down to facts pertaining to everyday existence. If there is an Infinite Intelligence in the universe, that intelligence will be glad to see us developing a desire to help poor deluded mortals out of the quagmires of superstition, poverty and every form of human misery.

"If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" This was the opinion of an inspired writer a long time ago, and it has a ring of truth about it.

If God is immanent in everything, then we have to love everything to love God.

If intelligence is Infinite and everywhere, then of course we ought to absorb all we can as we go along.

If intelligence survives the death of the body (and we are satisfied it does), then we can take it along into the next stage of life, while all other forms of accumulated treasures will have to be left behind. The only baggage allowed on the trip between the two existences is wisdom, memory and love for old associations and individuals. If we are devoid of these (as Chas. Dawbarn suggests) we will be a mighty poor class of emigrants to settle up the spirit world.

The foundation stone of our movement is the precious jewel of true mediumship, a fraud is a barnacle on our ship, so is a medium or Spiritualist who condemns other mediums by the wholesale without knowledge of their being fraudulent.

Jealousy of other mediums is a big barnacle and one that does a vast amount of injury to our cause.

Philosophy and phenomena should go hand in hand, they could make a strong team together, but they don't very often. Mental and physical mediums are too far apart to make a healthy body of workers. A healthy man or woman is one whose mentality and physical organism are working in harmony together. Inharmony between the two creates disease and frequently death. So it is with our movement, the incessant quarreling between mediums over their different phases of work is creating a distrust among outsiders of all mediums, a disease in our own ranks which will result in general disintegration if not arrested.

The wonderful spread of Christianity is largely due to the fact that Jesus appeared in a materialized form after death. Millions have listened to the story of his resurrection (so-called), and upon this fact have they built their hopes of a future life, and this without understanding the nature of the wonderful phenomena in the slightest degree. And now comes Spiritualism with the same kind of phenomena, duplicating the scenes of the resurrection and also transfiguration on the Mount with the same phenomena under various conditions, "bringing immortality to light" by clothing in visible transient forms the spirits of long lost loved ones, and we have the extraordinary spectacle of spiritual leaders denouncing materializations and denying the possibility of such a manifestation. To make matters worse we find the same skepticism creeping into our own ranks in regard to all other kinds of phenomena. Mediums may spend years in development, they may sacrifice almost everything in order to gain a knowledge of spiritual things, yet as soon as they are able to give a clear-cut "test" in the way of a full name or a clairvoyant description, then some other medium at once arises and whispers to their friends that such medium gets their information from "blue books," that they are padded, "stock tests," and so forth.

Now, Mr. Editor, I for one know positively that spirits are able to give their names at times, and no "blue books," "padded tests," or anything of the kind are necessary. I have often received names clairvoyantly myself, very frequently all parties present have been entire strangers to me. I mention these things because I know there are some mediums who will not admit other people to be honest at all, but they wish to be considered honest themselves, and I further wish to say that as long as this faultfinding, back-biting, envious spirit exists among mediums, the National

SEARCH FOR GOD.

Not Much Matter About The Name.

The anniversary of the organization of the National Spiritualists Association is again near at hand and its members and friends are anxiously awaiting the resume of the year's progress in the cause of Spiritualism, which will be admirably presented as in former years, by its worthy president, H. D. Barrett.

That there has been great progress made and that the National Association has been no mean factor in the making of it, no intelligent observer will deny. This statement does not imply that all was done for the advancement of the cause that the N. S. A. might have done, or that its methods of doing what has been accomplished were perfect, or that its declaration of principles was such as to meet the entire approval of all Spiritualists so as to secure their hearty co-operation, but it does imply that in spite of all discouragements from within as well as from without the ranks of Spiritualists, the N. S. A. has exerted an influence which is felt throughout the world and which has been fruitful of the very best results to the cause of Spiritualism.

He must be a very indifferent reader of the general literature of the day in all its varied forms, who does not observe the cropping out everywhere of the Spiritualistic against the materialistic idea of the 19th century, and the interest manifested in the subject of Spiritualism by the Christian church. I am at the present time in confidential correspondence with a Methodist minister occupying a prominent pulpit, whose interest in the subject is clearly proven by his letters and his expressed desire to witness some genuine phenomena. He frankly confesses as did Rev. R. A. White, of Chicago, last April, that the Bible most emphatically supports the claims of Modern Spiritualism. That public confession of Rev. Dr. White, together with one much stronger by the Rev. H. W. Thomas, of the People's Church, Chicago, who declared that he had been a Spiritualist for thirty years, and that he knows there is a future existence, because he knows he has communicated with relatives and friends gone before, was made at the mass meeting held jointly by the N. S. A. and the Illinois State Spiritualist Association in Chicago, last April, and which would not have been thus publicly made had those associations not existed and given those noted preachers an opportunity to make it. In this one matter alone we can plainly see the benefits of organization to the cause of Spiritualism.

So far as the question of the N. S. A.'s action in formulating a code of principles and of recognizing some power higher than man or nature is concerned, it is sufficient to say that in my opinion it makes but little difference what name or title we give to that higher power, whether it be God, Deity, Nature, Supreme Being, Jehovah, Great Spirit or Infinite Intelligence, as long as we know nothing whatever about the character of that higher power. Like the letter X in the science of algebra, these various titles represent an unknown quantity and it is immaterial which one of them we employ. Because of its brevity my own preference would be for the first mentioned, although the "Great Spirit" would probably be more appropriate for use in a society of Spiritualists. Some kind of a term should be agreed upon and adopted as a working formula for its value to Spiritualism is as apparent as is the importance of the letter X to the demonstrations of algebraic propositions. "Why by searching can find out God?" I don't know; but we have been finding out so many hitherto considered impossible things, that I for one do not feel inclined to give up the search. I have the strongest conviction that the evolution of Spiritualism will eventually find Him out. In the meantime we should not be too hypercritical of the terms employed in our search.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Inquiry is made at this office for the address of Mr. and Mrs. Harry F. Hill. Will some one please send a postal to this office stating where they are located.

Hugh O'Donnell writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "Max Hoffman, pastor of the Spiritualists' Church of Unity, of Chicago, has been exerting a marvelous influence toward the advancement of Spiritualism in Minneapolis ever since the State Convention of Spiritualists was held in this city the latter part of last month. One of the local societies of Spiritualists engaged him to conduct tests at the Sunday evening services in the First Unitarian Church, which has been rented for the purpose. Many gather there every week and the best people of the city are among the congregation. There have been many converts to Spiritualism and the work of the young evangelist is the theme of conversation in every public gathering."

W. O. Knowles writes: "I was called to Rockford, Mich., September 10, to speak to the Philosophical Society, which has had an existence for over forty years, holding four meetings a year. Our meeting was called to order at 10:30 a. m., by Mrs. Roberts, president, and the writer was introduced to an appreciating audience composed of a number of skeptics. My remarks were not lengthy, and were followed by descriptions of friends, who were quickly recognized, getting full names. At 12 noon, tables were set in the hall and all partook of a grand lunch to strengthen the physical body. At 2:30 we were again assembled with a packed house. My guides took subjects from the audience, and descriptions followed to the number of thirty-seven, all fully recognized. The meeting was a grand success. I can be engaged by societies on reasonable terms for lectures and descriptions, being clairvoyant and clairaudient for over twenty-five years. Address me at 247 Coade avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch says: "Eli Stark, a native of Neodesha, Kans., is able in a mysterious way to locate lost articles. His ability has been demonstrated on many occasions. After all searchers are through, Stark asks how the missing property was lost, and, after facing his informant near the place, turns, and stops at a point which is shown him by some unseen power, and is as mysterious to him as to anyone else. He then advances and picks up the lost article. He was put to a severe test when A. C. Speery, a merchant of Neodesha, lost his watch—he knew not in what vicinity. Stark came around and asked his usual questions. He finally said he would search a pigsty on the merchant's place. He did so in the presence of several witnesses, but no watch was to be found. He told Mr. Speery his watch was in some other man's pocket. During the following night the watch was placed under some straw in the sty, where the owner found it the next day. Stark has discovered lost property for A. O. Evans of the Standard Oil company; Otis Huston, the hotel man; Cashier Hill of the Bank of Neodesha; James Keck, Probate Judge, and many others, who marvel at his power. He is now 44 years of age, and has had this power since childhood. He is a cattle herder, and makes no attempt to gain a livelihood outside of his regular work. He has picked up about $100 in rewards."

The society is commencing the fall work under favorable circumstances, perfect harmony existing, and we predict grand results for the coming winter. Frank T. Ripley occupies the rostrum for the month of October."

"J." writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "Dr. Hewitt commenced his work with Unity Society, last Sunday evening, and we think we can safely say that he won in his first lecture a place in our esteem. His manners, his earnestness as well as his apt and ready speech carried conviction, while the matter of the address attracted an undivided attention, and so we can but feel that we have secured the right man. Mrs. Stewart, the state organizer, was also present, and gave us her word of cheer at the close of Dr. Hewitt's address, so that we hope that our Unity will now take on new life, and a renewed prosperity."

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates passed through Chicago last week on their way to Springfield, Ill., where they are to lecture and give tests. Wherever they go they have been well received and are doing a most excellent work for Spiritualism. They are certainly an honor to our cause.

The Trinity Spiritual Society will hold its regular meeting in Van Buren Opera House, Hall A, on Wednesday, October 17, at 1:30 p .m. All are invited. No admission. Mrs. Nixon, president.

Mr. and Mrs. Hatfield Pettibone are located at 594 Euclid avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, for the winter.

Mrs. L. B. Brocklebank writes from 452 East Madison avenue: "The East End Spiritualists' Society of Cleveland, Ohio, has now become a chartered organization. We opened for work on the last Sunday in September, and hope to do a good work this season. We had with us on the 7th of this month Dr. L. H. Freedman, the Australian healer, whose talk was very interesting. The officers for this season have been elected as follows: President, J. Brocklebank; vice-president, Mrs. D. J. Savage; secretary, L. B. Brocklebank. Shall be glad to correspond with lecturers and test mediums of reasonable terms."

Mrs. L. S. Nagell writes from Council City, Alaska: "It has been some time since I had the pleasure of reading one of your valuable papers, and my soul gets hungry for some of the spiritual food it contains. I thought you would like to hear from a worker, and learn the condition of affairs concerning Spiritualism in the land of the midnight sun. I am in the interior, about 150 miles from Nome, north-by-east. Our little town contains about 700 souls. It is a pretty sight to see the log cabins and white tents snuggled up on the river banks, and the spruce trees for a background. There are many very rich mining properties in this vicinity. Most of these are still undeveloped, but the hand and wit of man will soon bring out the golden treasure. I arrived at this point on the 12th day of July, after a very excitable and dangerous trip, and the second day after my arrival I was called upon by a committee and asked to demonstrate some of the truths of Spiritualism. I gave a lecture and many tests, being the first medium to introduce our glorious truth in the Upper or Northern Alaska. The result was very satisfactory, and I am going to remain all winter. I have made arrangements for a church of 'Spiritual Truth,' and we will hold services every Sunday evening this winter. I have taken many fine views of this country, and when I come out in the spring, via Dawson, I will be in a position to furnish you with a few fine cuts if you desire them, and give you a synopsis of my Alaska work in the cause of Spiritualism. I am making a collection of Alaska curios, and when I get out it will be my pleasure to send you a nugget that I have washed out of the ground with my own hands. I have been very successful locating leads and pay-streaks this fall, and have much work to do in the spring of the same nature. Give me your best thoughts for the success of Spiritualism in the land of the midnight sun."

Mrs. Theresa Markham writes from Asheville, N. C.: "I feel it my bounden duty to inform you and the readers of our paper that Mr. Oryvis has been very ill with hemorrhage of the lungs, hence his seeming negligence. I find him a rare specimen of manhood, embracing all that is honest and upright, having the respect of all who have come in contact with him. I think we as a people should be more lenient with our mediums and not expect too much of them. I find that whenever I go to see him, and I am in an expectant mood and feel that I must have just what I want, I do not get the results obtained when I am thinking of other things. For instance, my grand niece, Anna Miller, came to me through him when I least expected it, saying: 'I tried to reach Brother Alec through a medium shortly after my passing out, but failed, as he thought someone was playing a trick on him.' I have received so many letters of inquiry I hardly find time to answer them all".

Mrs. F. B. Jackson, whose excellent work has mostly been confined to Michigan, is now in Chicago, and will answer calls to lecture, give tests, and psychometric readings. Her permanent address will be No. 3133 (top flat) Wabash avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. Nellie S. Baade, 411 Thirteenth street, Detroit, Mich., missionary for the M. S. S. A., and one of its officers, is open for dates at any point in the State upon very liberal terms. Will serve societies, or where there is an interest manifested and no society, or where societies have gone down for lack of interest, she will go to them and reinstate their work. She served the Lansing society, October 7, with two very successful lectures and tests, and with large attendance. For information, address her or May F. Ayres, Lansing, Mich.

Correspondent writes: "Very interesting exercises were held by the Englewood Spiritual Union, at Forbes' Hall, 420 West 63d street, on Sunday, October 7, being the annual anniversary of this society. Services were continuous from 2:30 until 10 p. m., with the exception of intermission for refreshments, which were served in the parlors. The committee on decorations were very successful in making the rostrum beautiful with evergreen plants and flowers, while an interesting program was arranged for both afternoon and evening, consisting of a short address by Mrs. Harrington, president of the Ladies' Auxiliary, and relating to that branch of the organization, followed by songs, with mandolin and guitar accompaniment, inspirational music, recitations, short speeches by a number of the workers and demonstrations by Isa Wilson Kaynor, Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. Riley. The regular address of the evening was delivered by Will C. Hodge, who took for his topic, 'What Good has Spiritualism done?. He was followed by that old-time and sterling worker, Mrs. S. F. DeWolf (who was instrumental in helping to organize this society and was its first speaker) with earnest and practical remarks on the beauty and practicality of Spiritualism, congratulating the society on its success and predicting a still larger measure of usefulness in the future. The exercises closed with very excellent readings by Mrs. Kaynor and Mrs. Lincoln. A fine audience in the afternoon, and packed hall in the evening rewarded the efforts of officers and members of the society to make this anniversary meeting a success, which it certainly was in every way. It is a creditable fact that the society did not suspend the regular meetings even during the heated term of summer, and that the audiences have been uniformly good throughout the entire year. The new year opens under most favorable auspices and with 'Excelsior' as their motto, there is a determination among officers and members alike to maintain their present standard of excellence and hold a Spiritualist meeting which in point of interest shall be second to none."

L. D. Owen writes from Louisville, Ky.: "I have been a constant reader of The Progressive Thinker for the last year, and I assure you I have received more knowledge of the future life therefrom than I ever have by reading Bibles and other publications forty-four years of my life. Just one year past I became convinced of the grand truth that there is a continuation of this life, and it is made possible for the spirits to return to this lower sphere and communicate with friends. In connection with this, I will say that your paper has done more to open the eyes of the people than all other publications combined. For the past month we have had with us Mrs. Weatherford, and she has consented to serve us until next April. She is a lecturer of fine talents, and is doing a great and good work."

J. Marion Gale writes from Quilcene, Washington: "It is really refreshing to me, to once in a while witness dear old Sar'gis hop onto the 'ducks in the puddle,' as our Nanaimo friend would say, and give the superficials an airing in genuine logic with its every-day clothes on. For my part I am willing to waive the question as to whether Jesus really had a navel—but still think it quite as relevant and important as much of the learned loquacity of the professional theorist in Spiritism. Alone in my studio—excepting the presence of the decarnate immortals—I have demonstrated the fact of communication with the denizens of spirit life, often and again; and that, too, with very little assistance from the dead languages, or the dying theories so dear to the heart of the average fadist. I have also in these communings been able to glean much of the true philosophy of the science of life; which Brother Loveland very appropriately affirms Spiritualism to be. I hope and trust most sincerely that the coming convention at Cleveland will unite upon something in the nature of what his current articles in The Progressive Thinker urge as the duty of Spiritualists. I hope, too, that there will be no ambiguity of language to confuse the common plebeian, but a clear, brief and explicit declaration of what we stand for, and that altruistic humanitarianism will not be left out of that declaration. After we agree on what little we know, and express what we propose to do, we should and must have wide latitude as to religious freedom. As to belief, the evidence as it strikes each mind must always compel that. The only choice of belief which anyone ever has is before the evidence is all considered. What would we say of a judge who should decide a case before the testimony was all in and sifted for what evidence it may contain?"

Thos. Harding writes from Sturgis, Mich.: "I preached the 'everlasting gospel' yesterday at the Spiritual church, and although the day was unpleasant, there was a pretty good number out to hear it. The copies of The Progressive Thinker you sent for distribution were quite welcome. Many were carried off by visitors, and some are left for next Sunday. It is a good idea to have spiritual literature placed conveniently in the church or hall at every meeting. I notice that many who are not Spiritualists now like to read about it. Strange occurrences of that character possess a fascination for almost every one and the reading of such produces conversation on the subject and arouses home memories of similar experiences, and then 'all roads lead to Rome.'"

F. N. Burk writes from Denver, Colo.: "Mrs. Ada Foye, pastor of the Denver Spiritualist Society, leaves this city the 22d of October, and takes the steamer leaving San Francisco for Australia, the 31st. Mrs. Foye has received a call from the Victoria Association of Spiritualists at Melbourne, and will remain there one year. Having been in that country before they are familiar with her work. While the Denver Society regrets to lose her and will miss her fine lectures and remarkable tests very much, they feel highly complimented to have her selected to represent the cause in that country. The Victorian Society of Melbourne has been steadily increasing in numbers and influence, and has among its members several of the representative men of Australia. We all wish Mrs. Foye a pleasant journey, and safe return to Denver."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, pastor of the First Spiritual Church, will be assisted by Dr. Mary E. Sellen, Sunday evening, October 21.

Dr. H. C. Andrews writes from Jonesboro, Ind.: "Spiritualism is growing in our midst, and many are being led into the light in this city. We remain here through the present month of October. We shall be ready to accept engagements by November 1, and would be pleased to correspond with societies wishing a good lecturer and test medium. Permanent address, Jonesboro, Ind.

G. F. Perkins writes: "I desire to call the attention of the Chicago Spiritualists to the fact that congratulations are due to our friend and exceedingly bright and energetic young Spiritualist, Mr. George E. Fink, of E. Division street, Chicago, who was one of 165 successful candidates for admission to the bar, at the Illinois State Board of Law examination, October 11, 1900."

The Chicago American says: "Mrs. Joseph Janus, of 8709 Escanaba avenue, South Chicago, was awakened Thursday night by a horrible dream, in which she saw her husband being mangled and killed under the wheels of a railroad train. Last night her dream was realized when Janus lost his life under an Illinois Central suburban passenger train at the grade crossing at Eighty-fourth street. Before the husband went to work yesterday morning Mrs. Janus told him she feared he would be killed before he returned home at night and begged him to remain with her during the day. Then she described how she had seen him fall under a train in her dream. Janus only laughed, picked up his dinner pail and left for the Illinois Steel works, where he was employed. Mrs. Janus rested uneasily all day, waiting and hoping that her husband would return safely to her at night. Shortly after 7 o'clock the news of his fate was brought to her by a policeman. Janus was walking west on Eighty-fourth street towards his home at 7 o'clock, and just as he stepped on the railroad crossing he was struck by the suburban train. He was dragged for several feet under the wheels of the engine before the attention of the engineer was attracted. Terribly mangled and crushed, the unfortunate man was picked up and carried to the South Chicago police station, where he died a few minutes later."

THE NEW DAY.

In the newly dawning day,
Shams will all be swept away,
Right, not might, supremely sway,
And peace triumphant reign.
Our God will be the "perfect love,"
Such as angels know above,
And like a brooding mother dove,
O'erspread all earth the same.

In that new and better day,
There'll be no room for vain display,
For error will be blown away,
By justice, truth and love.
All sorts of slavery sunk from sight,
Beneath the rays of wisdom's light,
And freedom in her upward flight,
Soar on to heights above.

In that new and happy hour,
With truth and love the ruling power,
Like a fresh reviving shower
From angel worlds above,
Will wondrous gifts of life be given,
Creating here on earth a heaven,
Like unto song in sweetest rhythm,
Of peace and perfect love.

In that new and brighter time,
The heart enlarged with love divine,
Will cause the outer life to shine,
With deeds of living light.
And then the "golden rule" will be,
In practice put on land and sea,
And every soul set wholly free,
By the Eternal Right!

Nucleus to a Library.

To the Editor:—I am in receipt of your seven premium books, and though I have read very little in them up to date, I am extremely pleased therewith, and wish to thank you for the offer that placed them in my hands at so nominal an expenditure. I am unable to say which I like the best now, but to me they are all best. It is the nucleus to my library on this subject of Spirit-life. Thanking you again I am

Very respectfully yours,
Mrs. M. K. Haines.

Topeka, Kansas.

Every Spiritualist should have these Premium Books. The world never before saw such an offer as is made by The Progressive Thinker. The seven books form a splendid nucleus for a library.

THE HIGHER LIGHT.

The Radical Thinker Goes Marching On.

The National Spiritualist Association will without doubt have the question presented to it for consideration, whether the work that it has accomplished entitles it to a future existence? and the question will be answered according to the sympathies of the interested parties, whether for or against, which without questioning is the proper course to pursue.

That there should be a foundation upon which to build the structure of the spiritual philosophy is an admitted fact, but what are to be the elements composing that foundation? We are reminded of the colored debating club where the question for discussion was: "Which is of the most importance, land or water?" After the advocate of the supremacy of water had presented his arguments as strong as possible, ending with the presenting of Niagara Falls as a clincher to his arguments, the advocate of the superior importance of land arose and while admitting the grandeur of what his opponent used as an illustration, replied: "But if it wasn't for de lan', where would Niagara Falls be?"

If it was not for the foundation on which Spiritualism rests, we would be as badly left as the advocate of water was in the argument of the colored club. That foundation rests eternal in the heavens, and if the structure that we build here rests on that foundation it can be advanced to a height where it will illuminate the dark places of life, casting its heavenly radiance on those honest but toil-worn souls who are yearning for light that they may see clearly their pathway to higher conditions now while here in earth life, as well as "over there." It certainly cannot be done by trying to ape the dead and decaying form of the old theologies, which at present is repulsive to the sensitive organisms of those who are being quickened by the spiritual power of the advance thought, causing them to come out from among them and to reach forward to higher and better things.

Spiritualism has a glorious mission to perform among the races of men, and it will be accomplished even if some of its professed adherents prove unfaithful; and by being a free lance in the arena of conflicting sects and parties, it can best accomplish the work for which it is intended. Let its adherents leave the question of making new titles and names by which to address that immortal power which every spiritual-minded soul feels coursing through his being, to those who have not outgrown the apparent need of the old theologies, and present to the world the fact that by professing belief in the spiritual philosophy the lives of such believers are lifted up and are enabled to come into more perfect rapport with those white-robed souls who have suffered for the truth and now in the summer land are reaping the reward of their labors. That it can and does exalt the lives of those who are honest in their desires to have a more perfect understanding of the truth as represented by Spiritualism, the lives of many noble souls are evidence; and whoever professes but does not possess the inspiration and spiritual energy that is uplifting, making their daily life an example that is helping others onward toward the goal of a purer and better life, such profession is worse than "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals."

The world every day is growing more critical, pronouncing judgment not from the standpoint of association with religious sects or political parties, but from the position occupied by individual character, thus showing that while sects and parties may if rightly used be a primary school to those who have not outgrown their need, they are only a weight to encumber those who have received the higher light and are in duty bound to let that light shine that others may see their good works and be blessed thereby as they have been.

The radical thinker of to-day, if not steadily marching on becomes the conservative of to-morrow; and such would be the fate of professed believers in the spiritual philosophy, if they undertook to crystallize around some dogmatic assertion, pronouncing that the ultimatum. But rather let them be like that noble martyr, John Brown, tho' his body is in the grave his soul goes marching on. Let them come out from among them who feed on the fleshpots of dead theologies, and touch not nor taste not that which has been pronounced unclean to the spiritually progressive soul, and they will be rewarded by a conscious communion with those who are marching on the highway that leads to a more advanced understanding of the truth of the spiritual philosophy, its needs and requirements.

SPIRITUALISM

Is a Department of Science, Not a Religion.

A "cause" of any kind is valueless unless it upbuilds humanity. Nothing can benefit the race save that which increases its physical, mental and moral development. A discussion concerning gods is of no value, practically, because no exact knowledge can be obtained from such discussion. All "god-intoxicated" nations are, and ever have been hotbeads of tyranny, poverty, vice and crime. Modern Spiritualism has no more exact knowledge concerning Deity than has any other cult. Hence all effort to formulate such Deity is but the old-time effort to establish a priesthood.

If Spiritualism is not a department of science it is nothing. If a science, it is not a religion, and if not a religion, then all forms of worship are out of place in it.

The N. S. A. has no right to ask acceptance of any Deity at the hands of anyone. Its mission if it have one, is to convince the people of the truth of spirit communion. Then to aid every effort to build up a free and enlightened manhood and womanhood, to the end that this world may be the home of a happy, prosperous humanity.

The Declaration of Independence, and the preamble to the Constitution of the United States is a better creed than the N. S. A. can formulate. To establish Justice is far better than to establish a god. To promote the general welfare is better than to promote half-fare tickets on railroads, and to secure to posterity the blessings of liberty is superior to securing a fat salary as a Spiritualist "pastor."

If the N. S. A. desires to continue its existence, let it adjust its trolley to the electric line of scientific progress, stop its mumbo-jumboism, throw its influence, (if it has any) in the scale with a progressive civilization, and it will become a power for good.

So long as men, women and children are starving and dying in the besotted ignorance of Christian godism, and that ignorance is used for their exploitation by politicians and tyrants, reformers have something better to do than to wallow in the quagmire of transcendentalism.

THE N. S. A.

What Its Primal Object Should Be.

The primal object of the National Spiritualists Association should be the promotion of the interests of those who seek to establish more vital and intimate relations between the two worlds. Believing, as all Spiritualists do, that there is a principle in man which triumphs over the tragedy of death and continues to exist as a self-conscious entity in realms of being which are invisible to the average mind, but accessible through the development of especial senses and faculties, it is the duty of those favorably endowed in this direction to have the best possible conditions for the highest unfoldment. The sensitive should be surrounded by an atmosphere free from the influence of adverse environments. So long as the medium stands alone, compelled by the duties and necessities of pressing need to pervert the sacred gifts for gain; to sit with closed doors in darkened rooms, inhaling poisoned air from tainted breaths, transmitting messages from the unseen at so much per hour; urged by the idle curiosity of a few and the selfish desires of others to give advice which aids in the furtherance of ignoble aims, so long will the medium's life be a checkered career; for mediums, like others, are profoundly human; and being sensitive, yield more readily to the influence of surrounding minds.

The National Association should be unanimous in the establishing of means for the liberal support of a few talented speakers and mediums who should go before the world with power to free men's minds from the thraldom of superstition and place the truths of Spiritualism on a foundation that is as broad as life and eternal as time.

To eliminate fraud from the ranks of mediumship, all worthy mediums who can stand the test required of them, should have the moral and financial encouragement of the associated members of the place where the medium lives, and should be surrounded by conditions which are harmonious to the highest unfoldment of the psychic gifts; while those who make false claims and persistently deceive the credulous under the cloak of mediumship, should be punished in the severest manner the crime deserves.

By the organized effort of the National Association the truths of Spiritualism should be presented to the world in a way that will awaken an interest in the minds of the skeptical and compel the recognition of all who seek more light on the great problem of the soul and its destiny. A belief in the continued existence of the soul is the pivotal center around which revolves a multitude of theories more or less contradictory and inconsistent, varying in their natures according to the peculiar characteristics of different minds. Harmony should be evolved from this chaos of conflicting opinions, so far as is possible, by a close study of the phenomena of the mind and nature, and of man's relation to the unseen. But this desirable result will finally be accomplished without a declaration of principles, beyond a simple recognition of truths which can be satisfactorily demonstrated to all reasonable minds.

To embody a statement which affirms the existence of God is to assume definite knowledge concerning that which must necessarily remain unknowable. The finite cannot fathom the Infinite—cannot know the nature of the Absolute and every individual has a different conception relative to the attributes of Deity according to the influence of present and past environment, and the degree of mental unfoldment.

It is only another step from assuming the existence of Deity to enslaving man's mind by demanding obedience to every decree issued "in His name" by titled authority.

GOOD NEWS THE ANGELS BRING.

Am I custodian of the laws
That give immortal youth,
And shall I blush to own the cause,
Or fear to speak the truth?

When angel voices soft and clear,
In accents low and sweet,
Bring good news to my favored ear,
Shall I that news secrete?

Shall I, through fear of what folks say,
And love of worldly gain,
Let baffled angels turn away,
That falsehood still may reign?

Not I—but I will gladly hear
And echo it again,
Despite the scorn and pompous sneer
Of worldly creed-bound men.

The news our angels come to give Us through the "pearly gate,"
Is that, like them, we all shall live
In an immortal state.

'Tis glorious news from Heaven to earth,
Through God's eternal love.
That mortal death is spirit birth
Into our homes above.

That when the failing body dies,
We need no false alarms,
But gently to the bending skies
We float in spirit arms.

When we shall walk in virtue's path,
And live what truth has taught,
No more shall fear or vengeful wrath
Disturb our happy thought.

Oh, blest are ye who come to bring
Such news to mortals here;
In anthems sweet let echo ring
It on from sphere to sphere.

Let every soul arise and sing
Through Nature's vast domain,
That Love is queen and Wisdom king;
That Truth and Justice reign!

J. MARION GALE.

THE OPTIMIST.

He beholds the sun's great splendor,
Though dark clouds obscure its light
As our earth-born selfish passions
Smother Justice, Truth and Right.
He admires the silvery lining
Of the storm-clouds swirling by,
And he says life's storms are transient
As the shadows fleeting by.

His hope is always glowing,
And inspires the soul in fear
With the truth that man is growing.
To a higher, broader sphere,
And our earthly trials are lessons
Which develop the human soul
In its never-ceasing journey
To reach the perfect goal.

KILL THE GERMS!

Spread of Germs Through the Human System Instantly Checked by "5 DROPS."

"5 DROPS" is a germ killer; a preventive of disease; a builder of nerve force; a maker of pure blood; of healthy tissue. Where it is used there can be no disease. It is a natural foe to germ life. Left to themselves, without adequate measures of prevention, the germs which enter the weak human system multiply so rapidly that their numbers become beyond human comprehension, destroying the structures of the body until death comes to the victim's relief. "5 DROPS," if taken in time, is an absolute preventive of disease. IT is the only absolute cure for Rheumatism, driving out of the system forever the uric acid and other impurities which cause it in its various forms. It is taken up at once by the blood. Hence its work is quicker, surer and many times more effective. You should never be without it. Secure a bottle today. You will then be on the safe side. "5 Drops" is harmless and can be used by a child as well by an adult. It is used with unfailing effect in the following diseases: Rheumatism, Sciatica, Backache, Neuralgia, Gout, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Hay Fever, Catarrh, Croup, La Grippe, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Sleeplessness, Nervousness, Nervous and Neuralgic Headaches, Earache, Toothache, Heart Weakness, Paralysis, Creeping Numbness, Etc.

I WAS AT DEATH'S DOOR.

Gentlemen: I want to tell you what your "5 Drops" has done for me. I was for two years a sufferer of untold misery. My feet were swollen so I could not wear shoes and my hands were drawn so I could not open them, nor could I shut them. They cramped half shut. My husband had me try every medicine he could hear of and I still suffered untold agonies. Nothing I could get would ease my pain, until last November one of my neighbors had Rheumatism so bad he could not walk. He told my husband about "5 Drops" curing him, so he got me a dollar bottle, and in three weeks I walked without a cane and could use my hands, something I had not done for two years. I give all the praise to "5 Drops." My neighbors know that I was at death's door. Now I have used four bottles of "5 Drops" and can do my work with ease. I am still taking it sometimes. If this will do any good toward getting suffering people to use "5 Drops," use this as you please. If any one doubts this, send them to my friends and neighbors. ELIZABETH C. YET A CHILD.

The N. S. A. and Its Work.

The N. S. A. is yet a child, being only eight years old. Why should critics expect it to have attained to perfection? By the way they scold one might think they supposed it had attained its majority and ought to make no mistakes. But what matured body of men or women is exempt from blemishes and blunders? I know of none. But is the N. S. A. a necessity? I think it is. Is it answering the need reasonably well? I think it is. Has it made any improvements worthy of its claims? It seems to me it has, and there is room for more. Does it need an iron-clad creed? No! An elastic india-rubber one is better. Does it need any creed at all? Yes! Every body has a creed, and every institution has one. There can be no united work without one.

Has the N. S. A., as a body, any right to create a new God and foist him, her, or it, onto the Spiritualists of America, as their expression of faith? No! Nor do I see that any such attempt has been made by the N. S. A. It is not to be expected that all Spiritualists will accept without reserve, any creed or any "declaration of principles," or any moral code, or any intellectual standard as a guide to right reasoning, that any man or body of men, or angels, can devise and express. Indeed no Christian creed is accepted without reserve or protest, by all who subscribe to it—and it may well be doubted if any accept the whole creed as written as an expression of their private belief. And Spiritualists by common consent, recognize in all our co-operations and fellowship, and agreements, in purpose and general acceptment, the right of private judgment in all things, and no ostracism for heresy. With—or without a creed—every Spiritualist realizes that there is nothing binding but truth, and that is only partially revealed to any one.

The God idea in history is not an accident. It has been, and is a pivot of action, around which culminate the working hypotheses and spiritual energies of all ages and people. If there be no God, the idea is an evolution of nature, and its qualities and functions in the history of civilization are yet potent, and essential.

The criticisms offered usually indicate a narrow view of the God idea, as interpreted by scholarly, broad-minded Theists. Whether God be a person, or principle; a creator, or only a director of affairs; whether he, she, or it, be Love or Wisdom, or both; whether material or immaterial, or both; whether he, she, or it, thinks, reasons, wills, and directs, or whether he, she, or it, be the sum of all thinking, willing and directing—the totality of all that is and is not; whether it be called God or Nature, or "Infinite Intelligence," may be left to each soul to settle—if it can be settled—according to the reason, intuition, and conscience of the Ego. The expression "Infinite Intelligence" may not be the fittest; but what name can be given to anything that represents the boundless unknown, and all that the finite mind can conceive of it, that will not be open to criticisms and cavillings?

We may differ as to the infinitude of intelligence. So we may differ as to the infinitude of matter, or energy, or principles. We may deny that matter is intelligent, or that intelligence is a property of matter, or that there is any intelligence in nature except as it is evolved in living organisms. But to deny does not settle it. It would seem that what nature evolves must exist within her domain before it was evolved. If not then evolution creates! If it can create intelligence, why not create the matter in which intelligence is evolved? Is matter more real, or impossible of creation, than intelligence—which surveys, analyzes, and directs its movements? If intelligence inhere in matter, and matter be infinite, why not "infinite intelligence?"

Every objection that I have seen urged against infinite intelligence, may be urged with equal force, against infinite Cosmos. Neither God, Nature, or infinitude can be comprehended by the finite mind. But must we reject as false, or inimical to our interests, all that we cannot comprehend and reconcile to our limited knowledge, and erring reason?

Universal Ether is an assumption of the scientists, to explain natural phenomena. But its existence is an inference, as really as the God of Theology.

I fail to see the alarming tendencies of the N. S. A. in this presentation of an assumption, as a working basis, which, for the time being, meets the approval of the majority representing the National body of Spiritualists. No one is bound by it. It can be canceled, amended, enlarged and improved as the minds that lead the affairs of the N. S. A. grow and learn. But why choke this young child to death with a God-phobia gag before it has had time to cut its first business teeth? Already it has shown vigorous symptoms of approaching adolescence. It has had many phases of mumps, measles, whooping-cough and worm colic, and survived them all, and come out the better for the discipline. Its enthusiastic president has shown surprising qualities of vivacity, elasticity, business tact, and energy, bullet-proof vitality, and tenacity, and an unswerving devotion to the Cause and the interests of organized work, worthy of all praise and imitation. If he, and others with him, stumble and fall, they get up again and work the harder; while critical grumblers laugh, and frown, and hold their iconoclastic clubs over their heads, and shout, "You are down now; you better stay down. You can never accomplish any good. I told you so, and you'll fail, and fail, and fall again, because you did not consult us before you fell, and ask us if you might get up and try again."

We are evolving as rapidly as is healthful, and we must take the wind and weather into our sails and expect some cyclones and hurricanes, some wrecks and losses, some failures that presage success, some pitfalls and plagues, some mirages and miasms, some fickle pretenders and false counsels; but the Cause we are trying to serve is worthy of all it can cost, and the world is feeling the pulses of this organic power.

The N. S. A. stands for Spiritualism without an adjective. Friendly to all other cults, it has no use for the special counsels and dictations of "moonshiners" who train in the mystic valleys of occult illusions and claim to have advanced beyond Spiritualism, into a higher revelation!

THE MAYER FUND

has dragged along for nearly two years, to secure a sum which any live church would have raised in a month; yet we boast of the decline of the church, and the superiority of Spiritualism as a high incentive to noble, generous effort.

With this fund raised, a home secured, and a "sinking fund" for the use of the N. S. A., we may expect to see more of the practical effects of its works.

But this child of destiny has already organized many new societies, held many mass meetings, carried the glad tidings to thousands in outer darkness, impressed organized bodies, corporations, and officials in high places with the fact that Spiritualism has a progressive vitality and cosmopolitan mission, and is entitled to recognition as a leading factor in the civilization of the age.

It can do much more and greater works, if all who love the cause will unite to help it on; laying aside the prejudice, and cultivating a liberal charity toward it and all the weak spots and mistakes, and help it to improve and grow, and vitalize the world with its educational and humanitarian efforts and encouragement of all true mediums, and faithful co-workers.

Let us have the strong help of the Lovelands, Tuttles, Lockwoods to trace the intellect and scientific spirit blended with the spiritual life and love, and enthusiasm of the Barretts, Longleys, Peebles, Twings, Kateses, etc., and sink all personal prejudices, ambitions and gossips and give the supreme good an open field and Spiritualism a permanent victory.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

P. S.—It seems to me we should aim to conserve all that is valuable in religion, and respect those devotional instincts which are the life and inspiration of so many thousands, without compromising reason, or scientific truth; and be very careful how we dogmatize, either in the interest of religion, or the claims of science. I have never heard a negationist attempt to refute the God idea, that did not show an illogical conception of the subject, tinctured with the same sectarian animus of which he complained in the churches. On the other hand many Spiritualists attack the materialists, who believe in matter as the matrix from which spiritual life evolves, and apply the term in much the same way that Christian bigots substitute argument with epithets, by dubbing all who dare to think as "infidels." Let us adhere to scientific methods, and assume nothing as settled that cannot be conformed to science; and let science concede that it does not know all that may be true in the realm beyond its demonstrations. Then religion and reason, science and God may co-operate in harmonious accord.

OUR "GOD."

What Shall We Name It?

That there is some invisible force, power, energy, principle or principles, constantly promoting all visible forms of life, all are forced to admit. The fact that these forces or energies work uniformly in producing definite results would seem to indicate intelligence. Man in every age and clime has sought to name this power, and hence the multiplicity of Gods, or multiplicity of names applied to the same God. Whether we use the term Jehovah, the All-Wise, the Great Over-Soul, Supreme Power, or Infinite Intelligence, it is but the effort to name that wonderful, mysterious, incomprehensible and all-potent power which all recognize, from the savage in the wilderness to the highest unfolded savant upon the planet.

It was not the purpose of the N. S. A. to formulate a creed which should in the remotest degree interfere with freedom of thought and its honest expression, but because of their effort to give name to that power which all recognize, many have been aggrieved and we have had a long and wordy intellectual war over the term Infinite Intelligence, upon which subject there have been arguments pro and con without number. Any other name would not improve the situation to any appreciable extent, for no matter what name may be given to these invisible powers and forces, there will arise among Spiritualists some person or persons to combat it, and a long, and it seems to me useless disputation over the meaning of words will be the result. If we are to have any organization it must in order to accomplish anything, stand for something beside the simple proposition of communication between the visible and invisible expression of life, something to attain to, something to be accomplished. No movement has ever yet attained any great success without organization, nor can it do so. In union there is strength, but there can be no union without organization. We have been boasting these many years of the great number of Spiritualists, estimated all the way from five to ten millions, while the fact remains there are not a half million Spiritualists who can be depended upon to contribute twenty-five cents a year in a concerted effort to promulgate the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism. This is not only true, but the situation is even more deplorable. There is not even one-quarter of a million who will give yearly the beggarly sum of ten cents to further the interests of organization in this direction. This would amount to twenty-five thousand dollars, and the Mayer fund of only ten thousand dollars is not yet completed. This amount placed yearly in the hands of the N. S. A. would enable it to become a power in the world by doing a work which it has failed to do simply for a lack of money.

In making this statement of facts I am not unmindful of the many self-sacrificing, generous souls who have given largely of their means to sustain the cause, but am only trying to show what an easy matter it would be to raise funds if all were interested in sustaining a practical organization, as it would be a very poor Spiritualist from a financial standpoint who would not give ten cents yearly for this purpose.

The N. S. A. is a necessity if we expect to be recognized as a force or power in the world for good, and in my judgment it is of equal necessity that we have some definite statement of principles. We all believe in something which precedes all visible manifestations of life. What shall we name it? Spiritualists generally have objected to the term God, and every effort to substitute any other name that shall include the all of life, has utterly failed. Is there, after all, any better or more comprehensive term even for Spiritualists, leaving each person to define it for himself? Even Prof. Draper, the profound scholar, and author of world-wide repute, recognizes a Supreme Power and invisible God, and I apprehend he means precisely what the N. S. A. means when it declares for Infinite Intelligence.

For my part, I am weary of the everlasting disputation over terms where all are trying to express the same thing, and can accept Infinite Intelligence, Supreme Power or Universal Intelligence, and am perfectly willing to call it God.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

Civil, Religious and Mental Liberty.

There is probably not a single Spiritualist in our country who does not on principle oppose the attempt of certain religionists to foist a recognition of God, the Bible and the Christian religion into the United States Constitution. They recognize that it would in intent and purpose deprive the millions of non-Christian people—constituting the majority of our population—of civil and religious liberty, it would strike a deadly blow at freedom of thought and religious opinion, and deprive our people of their proper civil rights.

Yet the same vital principle is involved in the set attempt and determination of certain Spiritualists to foist a creedal declaration upon the great mass of Spiritualists, who are opposed on principle to such attempt, because they recognize that it would, so far as its influence and authority went, be repressive of liberty and thought, of mental and religious freedom.

Some will contend that a mere "statement" or "declaration of principles" is not a creed at all.

Well, if it is not de facto a creed, it bears a strong family resemblance—as witness the output of "beliefs," etc., by the last Convention of the N. S. A. It is a child of the same family descent.

Every religious creedal declaration, of accepted authority—which it must be, to be of any practical use whatever—must tend to bind and limit the range of freedom of thought, of the sect or body of people of whom it is put forth as the express declaration or statement of views believed.

The creed limits truth to its own narrow bounds—to the range of the conceptions of truth held by those who formulate such creed.

Thus the Presbyterians, for instance, are bound by their creed to the Calvinistic statement enunciated by the divines of the Westminster Assembly—which has been a clog, an obstacle to freedom of thought, a deadlock to progress in religious views in that church since the day it was established. And so of other churches and sects, their creeds are and ever have been hampering obstacles in the way of progress in religious thought.

The few brave souls that dared to think beyond the bounds and limits of the creed have been ostracised, persecuted, branded for heresy—and made, as far as possible, to feel that they were religious outcasts.

Such is the tendency of creeds, conjoined with the weakness of imperfect human nature. The natural tendency of creeds is toward intolerance and mental and religious despotism over all who do not accept and bow in subserviency to their teachings, and especially toward those who, holding contrary views, exercise their natural right to openly express them.

If a number of Spiritualists—be they delegates or not, or be they "authorized" or not—have the right to formulate a statement of Spiritualists' belief, to be published to the world as such, they will also have the right to declare that all who do not entertain such stated belief are not Spiritualists nor entitled to be considered as such, nor to exercise in Spiritual societies the rights that pertain to Spiritualists only.

The essence of the wrong in the efforts of the God-in-the-Constitution zealots lies wrapped in the fallacious and dishonest idea of thus making it appear that the United States is a Christian nation. The fact is that the large majority of our population is non-Christian, even after taking no account of the distinctively anti-Christian element. But if by force of persistent effort—sometimes of a very shady nature, too—these banded zealots can succeed in their design, it will, they say, make us a Christian nation—this although the professed Christians constitute the minority. The claim is hypocritical in its very nature. The claim puts the non-Christian majority in the false attitude of being Christians, when they are not. This is an aggression on the rights of all non-Christians, an aggression undemocratic and immoral.

Similarly the forcing of a creed upon the great body of Spiritualists—who are Spiritualists without a creed, fully as much and truly as anybody can be with one—puts the opposers and rejectors of the creed in the false attitude of believers—or else falsely and unjustly places them in the ranks of non-Spiritualists and anti-Spiritualists.

This is what no Convention, delegated or otherwise, can possibly have any moral right to do.

It is an imposition not only unkind, but unworthy of high-minded persons, and out of character with that refined delicacy of feeling which prompts truly spiritually developed people to have their actions accord with the Golden Rule.

It violates the vital principle of brotherhood, in attempting to fasten on good and true Spiritualists a mental yoke they are unwilling to wear, and which their liberty-loving hearts reject and repel.

Wherein, in principle, does the work of a N. S. A. Convention in formulating a statement of belief in a God in the shape of "Infinite Intelligence," or any other form, as a plank in the platform of Spiritualism, differ from the attempt of Christian zealots and bigots to put God in the Constitution and so make this a Christian nation?

If the N. S. A. can do this, why may not the Christian zealots do the other thing, and so make this a Christian nation—nolens volens?

For one, if I am forced to choose between the Spiritualism of a creed, and perfect soul freedom to think, learn, and freely grow in ever expanding and expansive knowledge of truth, I shall not hesitate to stand for mental liberty.

Liberty is life—a fossilized creed is a synonym of stagnation and death. A change in it is not a process of natural growth, but must be effected by a process analogous to a painful surgical operation. In proof, witness the painful throes of the Presbyterian church to-day in the endeavor to reform its creed.

No doubt there may be mental progress with a creed, but it is progress in spite of the creed, not in consequence of it, and ever falls far short of the progress found in complete mental liberty.

No one can believe that the orthodox churches, Catholic or Protestant, would stand where they do to-day, in the far background of religious thought, were they not nailed down by creeds, which stand to them as sacred truth, a "statement of principles" for all coming ages of time.

It is said, it is a poor rule that will not work both ways. To illustrate and make more clear the workings of the principle: Suppose that you and some others get together and formulate a creed, a statement, or whatever you may choose to call it, and you impose it upon myself and other Spiritualists as an embodiment of Spiritualism.

Now, suppose that I, in conjunction with others, formulate another "creed," etc., in some degree contrary to and conflicting with yours, and impose the same upon you. How would you like the imposition? Neither do we take kindly to your imposition—for such we feel it to be.

Emerson says: "No truth is so sublime that it may not be trivial to-morrow in the light of new thoughts."

In the depths of my being I feel that all Being and all Eternity are mine—mine to have, to hold, to possess, to know. Mine is the conquest of universal nature, of universal truth. I can not be tethered or circumscribed by any limitations of time or creed, or finical statements of "belief" about "God," or "Infinite Intelligence," etc.; and who has a moral right to impose, or to try to impose, his "belief" or "statement" upon me, a Spiritualist? You must show a higher than your own self-derived authority—for I also am a man, your equal.

Organization of Spiritualists may be desirable, but a creed is not necessary in order to organize; nor is organization desirable for the purpose of going into the creed-making business.

I do not oppose organization—on a proper basis and for suitable purposes. Some special advocates of the N. S. A. would do well to remember that making petty flings as to the intelligence, etc., of those whose views are contrary to their own, does not constitute argument, neither does misrepresenting them by charging that they are "opposed to organization."

As a matter of broad basic fact and essence, Spiritualism is the philosophy and science of Being or Life. Were the N. S. A or any other organization, society or individual, to make such declaration, as a matter of fact or knowledge—not of "belief"—probably no Spiritualist would raise any objection.

Hudson Tuttle well says, in his splendid and masterly Arcana of Spiritualism, p. 279: "Spiritualism comprehends man and the universe, all their varied relations, physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual. It is the science and philosophy underlying all others." And in his Introduction he says: "Spiritualism has no creed, for it cannot formulate a dogmatic system. It is the Science of Life, here and hereafter, and is founded on facts."

Let the N. S. A. build on this foundation, leave wabbly creeds alone, quit running after "strange gods" and it will stand on the solid rock.

Of more worth than all creeds, or substitutes for creeds, by another name, is the perfect freedom of the soul to think and learn, and ever seek for and receive that which appeals to it as the highest expression of knowledge of truth; freedom to accept to-day the truth of to-day, and accept to-morrow the newer and larger truth of to-morrow.

Less than this were as if the soul were to limit its truths for eternity, to the poor, ignorant and imperfect conceptions and knowledge of this mortal life.

A RENASCENCE

Of Spiritualism, by Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—In regard to the N. S. A., it is possible the writer may not possess the judicial temper for a dispassionate article on that subject.

He has very positive views and very decided sympathies, and the one does not always run parallel with the other.

For example: Man is a gregarious animal, and association is necessary to his activities and indispensable to any efficient action in his social sphere. And Spiritualists are not exempt from this necessity. That association among them is desirable and necessary goes without saying. Organization is not a synonym of Association. This may to some seem hypercritical, but here is the essence of the whole subject. Association begets harmonious concerted action after free interchange of opinions. Organization means authority, control and rule. The one is desirable, proper and practical to the purpose and conditions behind it all. The other is neither of these. The present situation as to the N. S. A. illustrates the difference between the two forms of action by a body of people holding to a common fact.

The organization demands a creed, a declaration of belief as to certain things that do not admit of knowing. A believes so-and-so. B. does not. C sides with A, and the organization promulgates that belief as what the three "stand for" before the world. But this action only irritates and alienates B, without changing his opinion—puts him in a false position—and when he protests and refuses to act in accord with the rules laid down by the majority, he is turned out or dropped from the organization. But all three agree as to the important fact that in the first place brought them together. That is just the difference between the one form of action and the other. It has been a cause of stagnation, reaction and disintegration in the churches, and accounts for numerous ecclesiastical organizations in christendom. It is one reason why Spiritualism has had such a reinforcement from the ranks of theology. It gives the consolation of a knowledge of immortality without any whereases attached.

So one portion of Spiritualists say: "We will have no creed." "We will have no sect." No man's opinion as to a God, a "First Cause," "an Infinite Intelligence," or "Natural Law" is authority for any one but himself. And an attempt to make it so by a majority vote makes a creed and a sect.

It is not needed here to discuss or criticise the action of officials or official personages. These are transitory, and any friction from such sources is remediable. People are differently constituted. Some are ambitious or emulous of place and pleased with popular station, while others are retiring and diffident or averse to publicity. A certain temperament is needed for efficient workers, and all have a right to do their best in their own way, for that is the only way they can do effective work. Association calls out just such talent and encourages it. In war it is the captain who says, "follow me," that wins the confidence and enthusiasm of his men. But the one who says "obey me," and go, scolds and finds fault, is not the ideal leader with his command. So it is in all association of people together.

Let the N. S. A. drop its creeds, its declaration of principles, its efforts to "boss" people, and come together as Spiritualists on the common ground of a knowledge of continuous life from the evidence given by our dead friends through mediumship—allow metaphysics to be as each mind can see such things—and we may have a renascence of Spiritualism through Spiritualists.

To make a profession of Spiritualism by "Rev." or "Prof." or any other form that requires a financial system behind it, and a salaried living provided for a set-apart few, is a sect, a priesthood and—a decline in the spirit of Spiritualism.

SAR'GIS.

SOMETHING SCIENTIFIC.

For Prof. Loveland and the N. S. A.

From a recent article in The Progressive Thinker it is to be inferred that Prof. J. S. Loveland does not recognize faith as a legitimate principle in nature. He says: "Even the National Spiritualist Association, at its last meeting, gave science as square a slap in the face as Christianity did in the adoption of the Nicene creed. Like the Christian church, it proclaimed its belief in an unknowable, imaginary, undemonstrable, incomprehensible idealism."

In view of the annual Convention to be held in Cleveland, it is time once more to consider these things. The above quotation, viewed in the light of later assertions in the same essay, are enigmatical. The N. S. A. did not give science a slap in the face; and there is no parallel between its action and the adoption of the Nicene creed. It is very strange that a person of Prof. Loveland's eminent attainments should thus overlook some of the most obvious principles of the science that he champions with such rare ability and zeal. According to his ipse dixit I suppose it is not scientific for us to say we believe anything.

The fact is, his position (although he does not seem to know it) is about the same with our orthodox brethren—with faith first, and knowledge afterward. At this point the difference begins; for, while orthodoxy still clings to the fossilized faith of antiquity, Prof. Loveland seems to think that any faith is only a relic of superstition. What I am about to say is not guess-work, is not opinion, is not impressions that indicate a lingering remnant of the lessons of childhood. It is knowledge. Faith is a well-known principle in human nature. True faith is as surely scientific as a rule in metaphysics. Superstition is the exercise of faith without the light of reason. Faith alone is utterly blind. Reason alone is absolutely without a motive, and inimical to the best facilities for human progress. Human nature is the legitimate province of man. Man is a complex being with more than forty well known principles in his mental constitution. When one or two of these principles greatly predominate over all the rest, the person so constituted finds it difficult to realize that the other thirty-eight or forty principles have any claims on his attention that he is bound to respect. So Bro. Loveland, with large benevolence and active reasoning faculties, is almost hopelessly committed to the idea that faith is an excrescence with no legitimate place in the realms of nature.

I am not sure that my remonstrance will do any good; but I am sure that our friend does not know himself. Self-knowledge is the most important of all knowledge. I am certainly not writing as I would if recognized by the N. S. A. as a writer with a free commission to help in bringing order out of chaos, and establishing the incontrovertible fact in the minds of men that man is a spirit; and that Spiritualism is nothing more than a true knowledge of man and the exemplification of that knowledge. In the allotted space this essay cannot be demonstrative.

The following quotations from Prof. Loveland's essay are absolutely correct and true and irrefutable:

"All bases of true organization and methods of action must rest upon, or be constituted of absolute demonstrations of science. In other words, the scientific method must underlie and support all our systems of action, whether personal or social. Even a system of ethics, not grounded on science, is absolutely worthless as a working force for human uplifting."

"It is supremely important that we have a true and full definition of Spiritualism for our own guidance and for the enlightenment of the general public."

These statements are beyond criticism and require no comment. But the last assertion should be disseminated and repeated and reiterated until the N. S. A. and the State organizations and the local societies shall take full and definite action relative thereto, and let the world know who and what they are. In this age of the world we are going too squarely in the face of public sentiment in trying to sustain an organization that has no principles. It is true there was a meager group of principles enunciated at the sixth annual Convention; and it has been pretty severely criticised by people who do not believe in anything but themselves, yet perhaps by none more emphatically than by Prof. Loveland, who has no patience with the idea of anything that is infinite. It is here perhaps as much as anywhere that he manifests his want of self-knowledge. But, while all of the critics partake of this want, they display a singular lack of perception in keeping up the hue and cry of "creed" as a descriptive epithet for a simple declaration of principles.

Another error is the oft-repeated absurdity that we cannot believe what we know. May it not be prudent, in view of much prejudice, in many things to say we believe, and thereby challenge investigation rather than downright opposition? But, as to the infinitude, let me give a very brief illustration: Here is a block of marble in the hands of the sculptor. In the block of marble there is a perfect image; and all that hinders from presenting it to the view of beholders is the outside marble covering. It cannot be denied that the image is there, and that it is perfect. As anything that is perfect cannot be more perfect, the perfection is infinite. The universe is all space and everything therein. It is infinite, because unlimited. Coeval with infinite space is infinite spirit; and if the N. S. A. places infinite intelligence at the head of the universe, it does not exaggerate but comes infinitely short of full truth, inasmuch as it does not mention infinite goodness and infinite power. It requires these three principles of infinite intelligence, goodness and power, to constitute infinite spirit. If you say this is something that we do not know anything about, I would reply that neither do we know anything about infinite progression. But we have absolute knowledge of certain facts that open up to us the beginning of this path of endless progression, and give us reason to believe that the path is endless.

Faith is as surely one of the constituent principles of human nature as reason, and begins where knowledge stops. You, who have been so captious with the N. S. A., believe in infinite spirit, and that belief is faith. We have absolute knowledge of spirit communion and continued life. This, with a definite knowledge of human nature, gives us an abundance of room for our faith in the beneficence and wisdom of the infinite spirit, without the occasion to apprehend that a blind and unreasoning faith is likely to lead us astray.

SOME SUGGESTIONS

Regarding the National Association.

A few suggestions are here offered for the consideration of the delegates who will meet in the coming convention in Cleveland, Ohio.

In all the social affairs of life, harmony and co-operation are necessary. How these shall be effected in the equal interests of all concerned, is the problem yet to be solved. Association in which the interests of those associated are equally secured, is the end sought. Can this be obtained by organization? Organization is the concentration of power. It consists of separate organs, different in structure and function, acting to one end.

Power implies authority, and authority, obedience. It is concert of action that is needed. In the meantime, the liberty of the individual must not be abridged. Authority cannot justly impose intellectual guidance, nor demand the acceptance of a belief; and yet, uniformity of purpose and exercise of power are essential to the harmony and welfare of the organization.

Spiritualism rests upon a series of facts as real and demonstrable as any other facts of science. A Spiritualist is one who accepts these facts as a matter of knowledge and evolves from them such conclusions as he deems the most rational and satisfying to himself. When I say a Spiritualist, I do not mean a mere believer in spirit return and communion; but one whose spiritual nature is sufficiently unfolded to enable him to realize and appreciate the value and significance of such return and communion.

To demand unanimity of belief as a condition of membership in an organization, is a curtailment of liberty; and yet, voluntary co-operation is indispensable? How shall this co-operation be secured? A public recognition of the essential facts of Spiritualism, with the toleration of individual conclusions, is sufficient. These conclusions will be founded on self-evident facts demonstrating the return and communion of those who once lived on earth. Let these basic facts be affirmed. Let all mutually agree to regard whatever conclusions may be severally held, with equal respect as regards their own.

It is true that Spiritualists have many things to contend with; some of which are quite difficult to overcome. The active opposition of the church, the bigotry of scientists, and the ignorance and prejudice so generally prevailing; we have then, special interests, pride of opinion, and stupidity and prejudice to oppose and overcome.

We feel the want of power, and resort to organization; we formulate beliefs to secure unanimity of opinion, which of course, must be accepted. This cannot be enforced. Such an attempt tends to divide, rather than to unite.

The more strenuously we oppose others, the more strenuously we will be opposed. The less we say against others' opinions, the less will be said against ours. Action and re-action are always equal.

We can have no conception of the Infinite. All that we can conceive of is finite, because we are finite. The stream cannot rise above its fountain; but must partake of its character.

My idea in regard to the National Association of Spiritualists is, that its conception and purpose are noble and beneficent, and its aim should be the recognition of a fact of vital importance to mankind. The recognition of this fact by a large and increasing number of intelligent men and women will give it prestige and attract the attention of other intelligent men and women to the consideration of it.

Let that organization eliminate from its declaration of principles and purposes, the "Infinite Intelligence" belief and all other beliefs, and most emphatically affirm and declare a positive and absolute knowledge of the fact that those who have once lived on earth, return and communicate with those now in their mortal bodies. This will cover the whole ground.

Any association of Spiritualists has the same right to incorporate, as any association of Christians; to enjoy the same rights and privileges, and exercise the legal power and authority.

ITS SPECIAL AIM

Should Be Unity on Vital Principles.

To the Editor:—The approach of the convention of the National Spiritualist Association, which convenes at Cleveland, O., 16, 17, 18 and 19, interests all earnest Spiritualists, however remote they may be or humble they may be as spiritual representatives in the great cause of human love and progress.

The controversy that is going on in the ranks among some of the leading Spiritualists regarding the word God, Deity, misnamed "Infinite Intelligence," as formulated in the articles of belief of that body, has been the means of distracting the attention from the real object of the Association which should have had for its special aim unity of thought on all vital principles and the brotherhood of the human race. It seems to me that the unfortunate words "Infinite Intelligence" must feel highly complimented with so much useless and worthless criticisms and learned disquisitions going on through the press and on the rostrums so adverse to the real cause of spiritual truth when the crying need of uplifting practical truths from our spiritual rostrums today, to aid struggling human souls to live closer to divine light and love, makes such demands on our inspired workers. It matters not to the spiritual-minded, the lovers of truth, what name you may use to designate the great first cause, so that the Christ spirit is not crucified and tortured, and humanity left waiting hungry and shivering in the cold. This discussion going on is typical of the absurd and material thinking of the pseudo Spiritualists whose much learning, as Paul said, made them mad. It is no wonder with so much polemic controversial spirit going on among the leading Spiritualists, that it should have a tendency to lead the minds away from the legitimate object of the great work, and disintegration should follow in the wake of all organic effort at establishing any permanent good as a body, and our organic cause weaken and the general cause languish. Spiritualism that Spiritualizes does not stickle about names so much as facts, and only knows that hungry souls are waiting for the crystal waters of life to quench their spiritual thirst. The question is, will Spiritualists supply the much needed want, or will our liberal Christian brothers appropriate the truth as they are fast doing and make it not only organic but patrician? SPIRITUALISM:

It Stands for Humanity, Not Gods.

It has not been my good fortune to attend any of the National Spiritualists Association conventions, and it may be thought that a non-attendant thereon ought not to criticise the action of those in attendance. And yet, why not? The N. S. A. claims to represent the thought of the great body of Spiritualists of the United States, and all cannot attend the yearly meetings, and yet all may be interested therein, and many desire to have a voice in the proceedings; and Brother Francis has given opportunity through The Progressive Thinker, to "speak in meeting" without being present.

It is not for me to say that the N. S. A. has failed to meet the requirements of our great cause, and yet in formulating a new God I think if it has not transcended its legitimate power, it certainly has over-reached the need. It seems so strange that Spiritualists cannot let go their hold upon the God and worship business.

In the babyhood of the race, when the people knew nothing of natural law, nor, as Prof. Lockwood would say, "eternal principle," when the elements of nature were all unknown, when the correlation of forces was undreamed of; when vibratory action and chemical affinity and formative energy were all unheard of; when the idea of evolution had not dawned upon human consciousness; when the phenomena and manifestations of nature were all mysterious and unexplainable; when death was an unsolved problem, when ignorance upon all these things reigned supreme, then gods were necessary to explain everything and the priests manufactured them in abundance. But now, when through the higher intelligence, the intuition, the skill and genius of humanity, nature is adequate to answer all questionings—what need of a god? And if there is a God—and nobody knows that there is—but if there be such a thing, it does seem that Spiritualists might give him, her or it, a rest.

Will some one explain in what way Spiritualism has been advanced, or Spiritualists made better, or the world blessed during the year, because of the creed adopted? The N. S. A. in convention soon to be, could better use valuable time in working for the interests of humanity, in striving to formulate some plan of action whereby the weight of influence of Spiritualists can be brought to bear toward righting the wrongs that everywhere exist, and ridding the world of poverty—the direst curse of all—than in wrangling about "Infinite Intelligence." And it is to be hoped that the coming convention will wipe out the creed with the orthodox "Golden Rule" attachment, completely. Give us a declaration of Principles, if you will, friends, tell what Spiritualism stands for, what its aim is, and then let us proclaim it to the world.

Spiritualism stands for humanity, and not for gods or christs. It affirms the spiritual nature of man; it affirms a conscious, individualized, progressive life for the spiritual man beyond the grave; it affirms intercommunion between spirit and mortal, and it stands for the education, the betterment, the progress, the freedom both of body and soul of humanity.

Let us push humanity to the front and leave God in the background; if he has all power or infinite intelligence he can take care of himself without man's help.

I think the idea of holding the convention every two years instead of yearly, a good one. The great expense attendant upon holding the meetings is probably not overbalanced by the good accomplished. CLARA WATSON.

THAT PLATFORM.

A Worker Presents His Decided Opinions.

As the time is near at hand when the Solons of the N. S. A. are to meet and discuss some of the important questions relative to Spiritualism and Spiritualists, I would like to call the attention of that august body to the deplorable state of affairs that confronts public speakers and mediums in every city of the United States. We find it difficult to determine which of the two lines of opposition is the most disastrous, viz., the traveling mountebank and all-round fakir, or the moss-backed has-beens who have seen, heard and known so much of the phenomena in the past that they are overfed, and have no appetite or desire to support either the occasional lecture or an organization.

When taken together, these lines of psychological influence are most crushingly discouraging to a worker who devotes his entire time to the work, and has no other means of support.

In vain we appeal to the "influential" Spiritualist who used to do so much but now is only an annual Spiritualist every camp-meeting, for assistance even to pay hall rent, but it is like pulling stumps of oak trees.

Many of our readers can easily comprehend the points to be made on this line, without using your space to go into details; so let us try to comprehend the facts that the present discouraging condition must be laid at the doors of these people who have become so selfish and narrow as to care nothing for Spiritualism as an ism," as a movement, or for any of the struggling workers.

These people who do not want any code of principles, God, creed, National, state or local organization, are furnishing ground rent free to the unprincipled charlatan and the wonder-worker who gets a living like a pirate, grows fat, while the old workers, unless they adopt a portion at least of the methods employed by marvelous fortune-tellers, grow gray-headed, worn-out and discouraged, and die broken-hearted for the lack of support.

While the N. S. A. is trying the best it can to keep the ship afloat, and wrestling with "Infinite Intelligence," I beg to present my code of principles or creed, if you will, to which I will adhere in the future regardless of anybody, with the faithful spirit guides to support me. I intend to present Spiritualism according to the following:

1. A belief in, and a reverence for the Supreme Power designated as God.

2. That the glory and sublimity of a progressive and immortal spiritual existence is the natural inheritance and experience of all mankind.

3. That the continuity of life can be practically demonstrated by intercommunion between embodied and disembodied human beings through the laws and philosophy of mediumship.

4. That in order to properly develop his physical, mental, moral and spiritual powers man should study and apply the principles of phrenology, physiognomy, psychometry, psychology and astrology, as expressed by the term Psycho-Biology.

INFINITE ASSUMPTION

Leave the God Problem Free for Each to Decide.

I consider it almost a waste of time, paper and ink to express my views of the N. S. A. in regard to its ability to fill the requirements of the Spiritualists and Spiritualism. It would seem as though there had been enough written already, on the position and requirements of the N. S. A., for it to realize that it had a subject of vast importance before it, to establish no less than the basis of Spiritualism, for the present and for the future. The theory of Spiritualism is well grounded, and is taking deep root among the people, but it requires time, thought and investigation for the masses to receive its philosophy. You ask: Has it failed to meet the requirements of the Spiritualists and Spiritualism? To which I reply, in my opinion, in a great measure it has.

It has failed because it has not met the criticisms or expectations of its followers. The Spiritualists as a class are a well-informed, high-toned, independent-thinking people, and no surface literature, nor no indefinite Infinite Intelligence will find a lodging among the masses. No doubt many of its followers, yet tinctured with the sophistries of orthodox teaching, retain hold of their orthodox God, and to them the words Infinite Intelligence is par excellent, and is rolled as a sweet morsel under their tongues; while others discard and spurn such teaching and such ideas of a God altogether.

I do not think that the N. S. A. or any other association of freethinkers will ever harmonize the Spiritualists into a unit of thought, for they are as a class independent thinkers, dissimilar and divergent in their opinions, having thrown off the mantle of pre-educated orthodox theology, many of them will refuse to be reharnessed, or subscribe to any code of principles.

Investigator asks: Who and what are the Spiritualists? Instead of having a comprehensive answer to give inquirer they say: "O, they are a fanatical class of people, that believe in the communication of departed spirits with the living."

Why do you believe?

"Because we have positive tangible evidence of the same."

What is their motto?

"We believe in Infinite Intelligence" (assumption).

Why do you believe? Where is your evidence?

"Universal existence."

Existence does not establish an origin, or an originator—and who can tell its origin? Echo answers, Who? and to call it Infinite Intelligence is short-sighted and superficial.

What will remedy its defects? The first requirement to be met with and established is Unity, which must result from a spirit of harmony. To harmonize we must have a central nucleus broad enough to meet the ideas of a majority of the people, around which all can rally. I do not mean a great long code of ethics or principles, a yard long, that would give a person indigestion of the stomach, or the headache to read, but a short, sharp, and concise intelligent production, that would define just who and what we are.

I do not endorse assumption, and call it Infinite Intelligence, for Intelligence cannot exist outside of an organization, and to call an organization Infinite presupposes an Eternal length of time for such an organization, which is beyond our intelligence or conception, and is pure assumption.

I have no evidence to believe in a personal or an impersonal God, and for one would entirely ignore the God question from a code of principles, thus leaving the God question free for each one to decide for himself—as there are already too many public Gods in existence for profit, and for the Spiritualists to formulate a new one would be like adding fuel to a fire that we were anxious to extinguish; but would form a code of principles, based on the question of present and Eternal Spirit Life, and our obligations to our fellow man.

Present, active, surface Spiritualism is at a low ebb, from the fact that a majority of the Spiritualists, and a portion of the thinking people, are convinced that the theory of a Devil, Hell, and Damnation, are terrors of the past, and hence lapsed into a condition of retired security and apathy.

There are a plenty of fossilized Spiritualists in the land and thousands of Spiritualists under the skin, and what is required, is a strong dose of dynamite quickening, on the one hand, to arouse them from their present state of lethargy, and for the other, a strong dose of sensible purification to drive the orthodox disease to the surface, where it can be recognized, and dealt with according to its merits.

THE N. S. A.

Views of a Pantheistic Spiritualist.

To the Editor:—I have no doubt that the N. S. A. has done much good, and that its officers and members have rendered the best services possible for them to do. Have no criticisms to offer on their conduct or their motives.

But, allowing myself to be the judge, I believe they made a mistake in trying to load upon the Spiritualistic movement a personal god in the shape of "Infinite Intelligence."

In the manufacture of a god at the close of the nineteenth century, for an investigating people—a thinking people—a free and truth-loving people—it needs something more than incongruous words and assumption.

Permit me to dissect this god, and discover, if possible, what kind of a being he, she or it may be. Infinite means without limit of any kind or character. As applied to a Deity the word means unbounded, limitless and perfect.

Is nature governed by an unbounded, limitless, and perfect intelligence? Conceding this hypothesis, there is nothing for man to strive for, to work for, to promote or suppress. If there is at the helm of nature a limitless, boundless and perfect intelligence, shaping, governing and controlling all the phenomena of the universe, what is there for a finite intelligence to worry over? Can the finite govern the infinite?

I am at a loss to discover how intelligence can be an attribute or faculty, of an infinitude. The word has three distinct meanings: 1. The power of comprehending or discovering, intellectual capacity, understanding; 2. News, information; 3. A spiritual being.

I apprehend that it was the last of these meanings that the N. S. A. intended their use of this word to express.

Then we have an infinite spiritual being. Now the word being has two meanings; 1. Existence, or state of existence; 2. A person existing, any living creature.

So that we have an unlimited, perfect, spiritual person. If so, how can we cope with he, she or it? How feeble our finite intelligence to oppose he, she or it? If this be so, we should take things as they come, and be mum.

Could such an unlimited, perfect being organize a limited, imperfect being and expect much of it? Could such an unlimited, perfect being organize a limited, imperfect being? Would not the fact of such an organization be proof positive of imperfection in the organizer or creator?

No, my friends of the N. S. A., you have reasoned yourselves out of court, and the verdict of the jury must be no cause for action.

Therefore dismiss your Infinite Intelligence, your personal God, and allow us to explore nature.

To my mind, the sun-worshiper is on a higher plane than the one who worships an anthropomorphic being. Pantheism is as far above anthropopathism, as knowledge is above ignorance, truth above error.

When we worship space time, law, matter, spirit and life, the all of the universe, as God, we cannot be much out of the way in our worship. And I believe in worship and am a Pantheistic Spiritualist.

Nor could all the N. S. As. that may ever be organized induce me to worship a personal God, who stands outside of nature as the creator of nature.

I believe in space, matter, time—spirit, life, law, these three great polarized states of existence. That through their wonderful and mysterious combinations of energies all personal identities are unfolded and developed.

This gives to me a view of my personal identity that is beautiful and valuable. Something to do. An entity that I may purify, beautify, strengthen, and enjoy.

Emerson once said: "Conscious law is king of kings"—and law may be conscious; but if so, it is a quality of consciousness that rises above the consciousness of man and all his passions, attributes and intelligences.

GODS OF PAST AGES.

And the Part They Have Played.

The gods of the past ages have nearly destroyed the peace and happiness of humanity. All manner of isms and religious societies have been inaugurated, and they flourished for a time, and then fell to pieces for the want of truth to sustain them.

"And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels. And prevailed not; neither was their place any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceived the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him."—Bible.

It will thus be discovered that the Jewish and Christian warfare commenced in heaven, and the end is not yet.

Gods have no more power than those that produce them.

Buddha was in the real estate business, but left it and was the starter of the Buddhistic religion. His god originated in his own mind, and he answered his purpose very well.

Confucius, the Chinese philosopher, who lived three hundred years before Jesus, is now worshiped as a god.

Mohammed was his wife's farmer, but started his religion, and is now equal to any of the gods.

Moses, the Jewish historian and Bible writer gave his god the power to create worlds and make men and women fully matured at the time he constructed them.

Joseph Smith, the Mormon hero and prophet, borrowed his gods from the Jews and Christians, and lost his life in defending them.

It was believed when Spiritualism first came to the front, that all the gods had had their day, and the dear people would soon be rid of them; but the habit of worshiping individual gods has become thoroughly chronic, and it will be some time before the symptoms will all disappear.

The National Spiritualists Association is concentrating a wonderful power which we hope will be for the best interests of our glorious cause. Our faith in the future of Spiritualism is not to be shaken or even made doubtful, for its source is so fruitful and so abundantly supplied with angelic intelligence that it surely can never fail.

The God question was the main thing that brought the angels to the earth to help us settle it; the time they first came was in 1848.

The gods have all been tested, and found wanting.

It is to be hoped that the inspiration which will surround the delegates of the N. S. A. will unanimously agree that the God in nature will suffice for the whole of humanity, and the question of godship will never be raised again to disturb the happiness of the people.

The strategy of the gods, brought on the war in heaven, and it requires the generalship of a Devil to settle it on the earth.

To please their gods the Christians have carried the war into the Oriental regions, and the Oriental gods are not pleased with the situation. The gods of each nation serve their own people the best. The god of nature is found everywhere; his extended knowledge is displayed among all the nations of the earth. We are all his children, and he loves them all alike. Dogmatic creeds have no weight with the holy powers of the heavenly spheres. Eternity makes no changes in his formidable teachings. The love of the God of Nature is so great that he serves all his children exactly alike. He is the Father of all life, and all life is a part of him. His great power is extended to every planet. His greatness and goodness is everywhere known and felt. He requires no worshiping or high sounding words of praise; on the contrary if we love one another as we should, the God of Nature will never forsake us.

When the love element prevails on the earth, there will never be any more wars in heaven, for all human souls are a part of the divine soul, and all warfare will surely come to an end.

Fortunately individual gods and credal empires are on the wane, and Christian divisions will soon commence to heal; then there will be more righteousness on the earth than was ever known before. All the gods that have been born of women, and all other gods that have "created themselves," will take their departure into oblivion and will be remembered no more forever.

THE N. S. A.

Intelligence in Every Particle of Matter.

As the time approaches for the meeting of the eighth annual convention of the N. S. A., to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, all who are interested in the success of the Spiritual movement will be watching anxiously for the result of its proceedings. For over fifty years I have been an earnest student of Spiritualism and have carefully noted its influence upon human progress and happiness, and while I believe in its general elevating tendency, and am always glad to see its principles more widely known and appreciated, I am not at all in sympathy with that somewhat numerous class of critics who are so violent in their denunciation of any kind of a declaration of principles. I could never understand why such a large number of Spiritualists should be so afraid of what to them is such a terrible bugbear, a creed. To me the idea of any form of creed having the power to hold Spiritualists to a belief in any false doctrine or philosophy seems perfectly absurd. I have not the least fear that such a thing could ever prevent me from investigating any subject that I might think worth my time and study, and I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion there is not the least danger or possibility of Spiritualists as a class ever being influenced or harmed by anything of the kind. With all thinking people creeds have become a thing of the past.

There can be no monopoly of Spiritualism. It is something that may come to every human being who is ready and willing to receive it. One of its most general teachings is that every one must acquire knowledge for himself, and be responsible for all his acts, thoughts and feelings. It matters not how much of wisdom and goodness another may have attained, it can be of no value to me till I am capable of understanding and accepting it for myself. I believe that Spiritualism came to the world when it did because the age was ready for it, and the millions of wise and purified beings in the higher spheres of spirit life were ready and desirous to use their united power for the purpose of educating mankind and helping to lift them up to a higher state of civilization and happiness. The millennium has not come, and there is plenty of ignorance, selfishness and wickedness in the world, but when we compare the intellectual and spiritual conditions of the most enlightened nations with what it was fifty years ago, there is much cause for rejoicing.

How much of this change has been caused by spiritual influence it would be impossible to tell, but I have no doubt that it has been a very important factor in producing the final result. I think we need not flatter ourselves that this spiritual work has been done entirely through those who call themselves Spiritualists. Infidels, Agnostics and church members all have their spirit friends and no doubt are often unconsciously inspired by them to work for more rational methods. Believers in church doctrines feel this power and call it Jesus, and often members of Christian churches who claim to know nothing of Spiritualism are really more spiritually minded than many who are known as Spiritualists.

Our friends in spirit life seem anxious to reach all classes. The question is as to where they can have the most influence and do the most good. Without doubt more can be done through those who have made a study of the conditions that favor inspiration and spiritual intercourse. This spiritual power has come to stay whether we approve or not, but the work to be accomplished will depend very much upon the workers on this side, and the conditions we furnish. The work will go on whether the N. S. A. continues to exist or not. The question for us to consider is whether the Association is of value as a helper. I believe that it is an important factor, and that while it will probably never represent the whole of Spiritualism in this country, it can wield an influence that will be of great value to the cause, and I hope that it may continue to be an influential power in promoting spiritual interests. I also hope that it will continue to give a declaration of principles, whether it gives them just as I would or not. I am willing to let the majority rule, even if they should still believe in Infinite Intelligence.

In fact the more I study into the principles of nature and the laws that control all life and matter, the more I am inclined to admit that there is intelligence in every particle of matter in the universe. When I see the wonderful perfection in all life, from the lowest living germs to the highest development of human life, I am constantly more and more filled with wonder at the mystery of it all. The wisest person cannot tell how a blade of grass grows. Its invisible life principle is beyond our reach, but it is there and it makes no mistakes. The wonderful combinations of the chemical elements necessary to maintain life seem perfect and none of them could be spared. Oxygen, an invisible gas, is more than half of the whole earth and much more than half of our physical bodies. Without it there would be no water, no air, no granite rocks and no life.

When I turn my telescope upon the moon, or Jupiter with its satellites, and Saturn with its rings, or upon the nebulae of the Milky Way, where, though it only magnifies 125 diameters, it reveals thousands of stars that are invisible to the naked eye, suns to other worlds, so far away that it would take their light thousands of years to come to us, I have to admit that if there is no Infinite Intelligence, there is an Infinite something that is entirely beyond my comprehension, and I rejoice with exceeding great rejoicing when my spirit friends give me good reason to believe that in a spiritual world where I shall have vastly more favorable conditions for investigation than in this, I may still continue to make further study of the Infinite mystery.

HOPEFUL.

The "Principles" Can Be Improved.

To the Editor:—I am looking forward hopefully to the meeting of the National Spiritualists Association, which will shortly convene at Cleveland.

I have been connected with the N. S. A., as missionary at large, since its organization in 1893, and feel a deep interest in it. I am a firm believer in organization, and feel that unless Spiritualism maintains itself as a distinctive organized movement, its beautiful system of philosophy will be absorbed by various other organizations. Already the liberal churches are appropriating a portion of its teachings; Theosophy and Christian Science are claiming other portions of its philosophy as their own. Some of its revelations are being taught and practiced by unscrupulous individuals under the guise of high sounding and misleading names.

Healers and others are practicing and teaching what they have learned in the seance room under these different names, and without giving credit to the source of their knowledge. Still worse, most of them deny it, deride Spiritualism, abuse, malign, and insult its mediums and advocates, while they after adding the popular name of "Christian," Universal Religion, Wisdom Religion, or something as meaningless, and mixing together some of the beautiful and helpful teachings of Modern Spiritualism with a great deal of ancient myth, mystery and nonsense, give it to the world as their own wonderful inspiration and infallible wisdom coming down from God.

I am opposed to allowing our Spiritualism to be adulterated with such nauseating absurdities, therefore I advocate the thorough organization of true Spiritualists, for the purpose of studying its glorious philosophy, of demonstrating scientifically its phenomena and of promulgating its beautiful and natural religion, that the world may receive its revealed system of phenomena, philosophy, and religion, free from ancient myth and miracle, and modern dogma and superstition.

So far as the "Code of Principles" adopted at last year's convention of the N. S. A. is concerned, I think they can be improved, and I trust when the convention meets in Cleveland they may be changed to suit all Spiritualists.

The Infinite Intelligence of the present code should be dethroned in the interest of harmony among us, I think, as there are some who object to it. I am not partial to it, myself, though I am willing to work under it, or even anything greater and more objectionable than Infinite Intelligence, if the Spiritualists will come together in all their strength and with a grand united effort build up a National Association that will be strong enough to demand and receive justice at the hands of our legislatures, our Congress, and the law; to establish schools and colleges, in which to teach our philosophy and the higher branches of education, and make homes for our worn-out workers and for the orphans of Spiritualists; to establish a publishing house, which would be of almost infinite benefit to the cause; that we may build temples, or churches and cease to hold our meetings in third-story halls; that we may have modern places of meeting, with good music, such as will be in accord with the talent we are presenting to the world in our inspirational speakers, and mediums for various phases of manifestations.

We now have a National Association firmly established; let us sustain it.

Let us come together at Cleveland with a determination to correct all errors that may be found in the organization, and with the determination to harmonize ourselves and work for the interest of the National, state and local organizations.

May all Spiritualist societies see to it that they are represented in this, the most important convention the N. S. A. has ever held, is the wish of PARALYZING.

"Infinite Intelligence" Is a Hoodoo.

To the Editor:—I notice in your columns that the cabalistic "N. S. A." is preparing for the eighth time, to hold a convention. I am a well-wisher, but not a member. Am one of those born psychics who have long been seeking alignment with the broad thinkers of the world. I believe in the unity of Spirit, and the duty and pleasure of mutual helpfulness. It seems to myself, that I am in a position to ask of our co-workers, a few pertinent questions, as a friend, without the liability of any charge of partisanship.

Is it not fair to ask of the N. S. A. and its record: What have you accomplished for the cause of Spiritualism? What have you done to harmonize, and draw together the various bodies of broad thinkers, who are willing to affiliate, and in this unity to find added strength and power for usefulness to their kind?

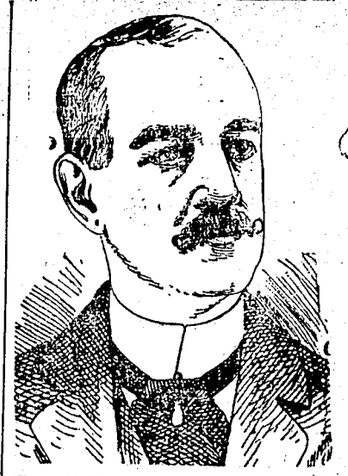
Have you devised any method for continuous propaganda work, embracing an unfolding of well-ascertained conditions "beyond the veil?"

While you say you have a great friendship for mediums, have you set on foot any measures, by which the whole power of the Association can be brought to bear in an emergency, as a protecting shield for worthy workers against all injustice and persecution?

Suppose some of our people should be in the position of the Christian sectarian missionaries in China, could you bring to their aid any physical power to release or protect them?

Have you taken any steps to organize means that in the future can be felt in courts of law, if necessary, so that our mediums or others of our faith could be sure of justice?

Have you put in train any measures looking to the broader spread of the truth as we see it? Of course, the Invisible Helpers are doing all they can on our plane. But, they have never refused our aid, when offered in the right spirit, on the plane with which we are familiar.



Looking over the work cut out for the coming convention, we find four items. The first seems to indicate a waning strength and enthusiasm, from the effort to make the sessions bi-ennial instead of annual. Of the other three, two relate to the selling of special privileges in the association, at good round prices; while the fouth relates to the strengthening of the barb-wire fence which was begun when the association started, eight years ago.

This may all be excellent business, after the "stand and deliver" methods of the self-conscious American of today. But, then, if this is all that a National Convention has to offer for consideration on the most important day of their year, it seems like meagre diet.

We must not forget, however, that in the eight years of active work, they have been able to discover a special and particular God, for the worship of the Spiritualist. Ignoring all that has come out of the Silence, the ether and the wisdom of the ages, they have named IT, "Infinite Intelligence." Think of concentrating for purpose, with the distraction of a seven-syllabled word hoodooing all our spirit power, by its anaconda-like uncoiling. No nineteenthly of an ancient Calvinistic divine could so excel in its paralyzing power on all hope, joy, and active manifestation or growth. It was a pity the promoters of this declaration of knowledge did, not remember:—

"No man knows God; it is the God in man
Who knows Himself in Him and lifts man up
To the conception of what is divine,
In his own nature, Rising up to Him,
We come to God through Christ,
through God to man,
And to all nature in His Holy Spirit."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life from his home in Isabella county, Arthur Cooper, at the age of 75 years. He had been a Spiritualist since the first manifestations. He leaves a wife and children to mourn his loss. Services by Mrs. J. H. Dunham, Ionia, Mich. D.

I was called to officiate at the passing of our dear brother, Abraham D. Hembling, 54 years old, who was a devout Spiritualist and astrologist, constantly in the work. Services were held at his brother's, on West Bridge street, Grand Rapids, Mich., September 20, 1900. The house was packed to its utmost capacity by an appreciating audience of spiritual friends and skeptics.

REV. W. O. KNOWLES.

Passed to spirit life, from her home on Groveland street, Haverhill, Mass., September 30, Mrs. Carrie A. Davis, wife of James Davis. At an early age Mrs. Davis united with the Methodist church. Her daughter preceded her to spirit life fourteen years ago. While passing through this shadow her spiritual nature unfolded and she became aware of the presence of her spirit daughter, and she began to realize the mistaken conception the church has in regard to the hereafter, and also of the truth of spirit return. The casket was covered with beautiful emblems of flowers and the room filled with them, gifts from those who know and loved her. Services were conducted by the writer.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 22 CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, SATURDAY, OCT. 27, 1900. NO. 570

"A NEW HEAVEN AND A NEW EARTH."

Dr. J. M. Peebles' Address at the National Spiritualists Convention in Cleveland, Ohio, October, 1900.

"We find no evil in this man; but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God." Acts 23:9.

"And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away. * * And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, 'There shall be no more death for the former things have passed away.'" Rev. 21:1-3-4.

These are the reputed words of that Patmos seer, whom the late brilliant and eloquent Col. Ingersoll pronounced a "lunatic." But sane or insane his inspired words have streamed in silver radiance down through all the intervening centuries.

The seers of the ages live in history unforgotten—loved because they were inspired; and divine inspirations, like truths, are immortal. Seers, intermediaries, or sensitives, susceptible to the intelligent invisible influences, generally reside in mountainous regions. Confucius lived on the rocky range of the Loo mountains, Socrates in mountainous Greece, Jesus in Palestine, Joan of Arc on a hillside hamlet of Dom-Remy, overlooking a lovely valley, and Swedenborg in Sweden, famous for its mountain springs and magnificent scenery.

No Emerson, Carlyle or Humboldt ever graced a clime where bananas grow; nor was a prophet medium ever born in the low foglands of any country. Evolution is the law. Surroundings, physical and social, are as necessary to scientists as to sensitives in producing given results. Environments abound everywhere. The door that that swings must have its hinges.

Inspiration, an influx from the Divine life, is universal. It overswept the epochs of all ages. But God did not speak his last word to Lao-Tze in China, Manu in India, Moses on Sinai, or to John on the rugged Isle of Patmos. He speaks in every true soul-thought to-day. Inspired books are neither closed nor sealed. The highlands of Scotland and the granite hills of New England are as sacred as Israel's mountains; our rivers are as holy as the Jordans of Asia, our prairies fertile as the plains of Shinar, and our forests as beautiful as the olives and cedars that shaded Lebanon.

Let us not in avenging malice decry the past; without it the present were impossible. Something does not originate from nothing. The same sun, that in ancient times ripened the grain under pyramidal shadows, filled Egypt's granaries with corn and deposited the deeply hidden coal-beds that light and warm our homes, shines to-day, and it is quite satisfactory. The pessimist may see only the spots upon it; still it shines in transcendent splendor. And so the Sun of righteousness, that Christ-spirit of love that thrilled the seers, the vision-dreamers and the sensitives of old, is now kindling the fires of inspiration in a thousand souls for the structural realization of the new heaven and the new earth.

Past revelations were well for their time. Let us not deride antiquity, nor abolish the memories of our mothers. Truth is never old. It never changes. Our conceptions of it only, change. Aspiring souls must have living truths. They must feed upon the manna of mental and moral science, and drink from our own ever-flowing upland fountains, rather than from Siloam's pool, or Ganges' sluggish waters. Thoughts must be as free as the air we breathe, and ideas, to nourish hungering souls, must be as fresh and as bracing as the music-making winds of spring-time.

Life and energy are everywhere immanent. Infinity cannot be exhausted. The inspirations of the seers allied to the Divine, whether breathed in the Orient or the Occident, can never know a finality. They manifest in all forms of life; in the progressive movements of the ages; in religion, art, and science; in the moral heroism of reformers; in the tender affections of woman; in the ministries of spirits; and withal, they are the precursors of the new heaven and the new earth, "wherein dwelleth righteousness."

The source of all inspiration is spirit. Jesus said, "God is Spirit," infinite, unchangeable and all-energizing Spirit. This is the foundation stone of all true Spiritualism.

"If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God." The possibility of a spirit's speaking was denied by none in that era, except the Sadducees. Jesus chose the twelve because of their spiritual gifts. Paul later saw the heavenly light, listened to the voice from heaven and while praying fell into a trance. Multitudes to-day fall into the trance and spirits and angels speak to them. The continuity of history is just as demonstrable as the continuity of life.

Considering law and the reign of law, ancient and modern Spiritualism are a unit. Churchmen deny this, "fight against God, who is Spirit, essential and immortal."

The N. S. A. has been bitterly if not maliciously attacked by a forlorn few in its own household because expressing belief in "Infinite Intelligence." What else could it have done? Spiritualists are not atheists. The most exalted spirits teach the Divine Existence. The brainiest scientists of to-day the world over believe in God. They have so done in all past time.

"Half science," said Bacon, "leads to atheism." Liebig, the great scientist and chemist, said, "Everything that touches organic nature opens a wise end and reveals a Supreme Intelligence." And that distinguished astronomer, Kepler, declared that "since God is Unique Intelligence, the character of these laws that he has given the world must be unity and universality."

Edison, scientist and inventor, of whom the world is proud, declares that "Chemistry undoubtedly proves the existence of a Supreme Intelligence. No one can study that science, and see the wonderful way in which certain elements combine with the nicety of the most delicate machine ever devised, and not come to the inevitable conclusion that there is an engineer at the head of the universe." The immortal Plato said to the materialists of his time, nearly 400 B. C., "Can we believe that He Who is Absolute Being, can be without life or thought; that He is deprived of Intelligence?" This inquiry supplies its own answer.

That profound thinker, Gen. W. H. Parsons, Washington, D. C., writes thus: Cicero, the most celebrated of Roman philosophers and the world's greatest orator, said: "If the coincidence of atoms can form a world, why can it not construct a house, a temple, a city? It would be less difficult and complicated. He who gives credence to such an opinion should also believe that a heap of golden or silver letters thrown on the ground, would so group themselves together as to form the story of the Aeneid. As for me I do not think that hazard would be able to compose such a verse in such a manner." But if not hazard, then purpose, and if not purpose, then Infinite Intelligence.

If a human being were blown to atoms by a dynamite explosion, it would be impossible to believe that the atoms, cells, molecules, ligaments, tendons, arteries, veins, capillaries, eyes adapted to seeing, ears to hearing, would go to work without any intelligence or purpose, and put themselves together into a thinking, rational man again.

Alfred R. Wallace, the great English naturalist and Spiritualist, says in his "Limits of Natural Selection as Applied to Man," "All force is will force * * and the whole universe is not merely dependent upon, but is actually the will of one Supreme Intelligence."

"Adore with me," exclaimed Voltaire, "the design manifest in all nature, and consequently the author of that design.

"Religion, you say, has produced thousands of crimes—say, rather superstition, which unhappily reigns over this globe; it is the most cruel enemy of the pure adoration due to the Supreme Being."

"I believe in one God," said Thomas Paine, "and no more, and hope for happiness beyond this life. * * The existence of an Almighty Power is sufficiently proven to us in nature."

Scholarly thinkers tire of hearing the platform phrase, "Made by the laws of nature." Laws make nothing; laws are not creative. They are modes and methods of operation. The swing of the clock pendulum creates neither the pendulum nor the clock. Laws are the methods of intelligent forces, which forces as naturally relate to Infinite Intelligence as does the drop to the fountain. These laws are so uniform in action, that an astronomer standing with Thales 500 B. C., could calculate an eclipse of the moon and find it took place precisely at the time related; and so could he go forward and calculate for 5,000 years with the same accuracy; and all because this is a universe of law, of purpose, of order, implying Infinite Intelligence.

The highest inspirations of the ages, the consensus of intellect and wisdom, from remotest antiquity to the present, has expressed an unquestioned belief in "Infinite Intelligence." Pythagoras, Plato, Proclus, Philo, Hillel, Jesus, Epictetus, Mahomet, Maimonides, Kepler, Newton, Cicero, Bacon, Goethe, Shakespeare, Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Mazzini, Coues, and such fathers of modern Spiritualism as Prof. Hare, Judge Edmonds, Owen, Brittan, Denton, Kiddle, etc., etc. Surely the N. S. A.'s declaration of principles finds itself in good company, a company of immortal Theists reverently believing in God, Spirit, "Infinite Intelligence." And herein centers the solid foundation rock of Spiritualism—a Spiritualism originating in God and grounded in man's moral and spiritual nature.

God being Spirit, and men being made, "evolved" in the image of God, they are necessarily spiritual beings; and as love responds to love, as music responds to music, so by the law of sympathy and vibration, all spiritual beings respond to, and under proper conditions may correspond or converse with the spirit intelligence of this and all worlds invisible and visible. Spiritualism is therefore naturalism on a plane of spiritual activity.

From time's earliest morning Spiritualism, the antithesis of materialism, has under some name manifested to humanity. It has been God's perpetual witness of immortality. Gymnosophists, hierophants, oracles, sibyls, Yogis, Rishis, visionists, prophets, diviners, intermediaries, mediums, psychics, sensitives—these were not frauds. It was those who persecuted and refused to hear them that were the frauds and the fossils of their time. Priests die, but the prophets, seers and sensitives are immortal on history's pages.

The world moves in cycles. It was when a rabid atheism began to abound about a century ago, and when cold agnostic German materialism, a reaction from the 17th century creeds and confessions, came rolling in upon us like a flood, that the world was startled by a muffled sound from the silence—a concussion that shook to its very center the sleepy Protestant world. It was a message from the skies to humanity. It demonstrated that the dead lived. It was a fact, and so is the X-ray. Telegraphic communications and cablegrams are facts; but there is nothing necessarily moral or spiritual in them. A rattlesnake's bite is a fact; the lies of a pot-house politician are facts, or transposed, it is a fact that they will lie for the glory of their party. Facts may blight and curse, or they may be so manipulated as to strengthen, build up and beautify human character.

Though these varied manifestations from the unseen world were new to us, they were and are both ancient and modern in Oriental countries. China to-day is an empire of spiritists. Ancestral worship is almost universal. India is another country of spiritists. In the Shastras we find the Rishis communicating with both the dead and the living by mental telegraphy. Crossing the Atlantic a few years ago, the Korean minister was my cabin-mate, and he related to me by the hour of the wonderful spirit manifestations of his country. The Maoris of New Zealand held converse with the spirits in caves dimly lighted with gum-knots. Mormons are spiritists boasting of their healing and spiritual gifts, and Roman Catholics never denying, have for centuries admitted the facts of spirit intercourse, though they have cursed the methods and the results when transpiring outside the pale of their own church.

But are Chinese, Hindoos, Maoris, Zulus, Mormons, Roman Catholics, Spiritualists? Do Spiritualists so consider them? Is it not about time that the Spiritualists not only presented to the world a straight-forward declaration of principles, but exhibited sufficient culture and energy to differentiate Spiritualism from spiritism? The words are not synonyms. They should never be used interchangeably. Al, an Arabic particle, is a prefix to many words, and is an equivalent to definiteness of mental and moral qualities. It has still more potency when a suffix. No good writer would confound office with official, or idea with ideal; then why should he confound spirit with spiritual, or spiritism with Spiritualism?

This latter relates to angel ministries and to the quickened consciousness and religious aspirations of the races. Its horizon is not bounded by Hydesville, America, or any other nation. It has a divine grip upon the moral constitution of the nations, which constitutions require such sustenance as spiritual knowledge, vision, faith, trance, prayer, heavenly impressions, loving angel ministries, and holy inspirations from the Christ-Heavens. "It is the spirit that giveth life," said one of old, "and to be spiritually minded is life and peace." "The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." "If we live in the spirit," said the apostle, "let us also walk in the spirit * * endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." This is practical Spiritualism, and what the late Prof. J. R. Buchanan, Kiddle, Brittan, Dr. Crowell, and other eminent Spiritualists denominated "Christian Spiritualism" as distinguished from the Chinese, Mormon, and Voudou spiritism, which goes little further or deeper than "talks with the dead," talks perhaps about finding an affinity, or discovering a gold mine, or an oil well, or inquiring who will be the next President, and what will be the price of oats next year? This is spiritism. Has it redeemed China, Korea or the world? Has it inaugurated a new heaven and a new earth? Is the world saved? Stepping higher, have Spiritualists any more zeal for the truth they profess than other people; or are they more earnest, benevolent or harmonious? Have they built any more homes for the aged, retreats for sensitives and worn-out lecturers, and hospitals for the poor? Are they morally any better fathers, mothers, neighbors, than the orthodox, whom they sometimes savagely condemn? By their fruits, men and their doctrines are to be known—by their fruits, spirits and their teachings are to be judged.

If Spiritualism is not morally uplifting; if it is not religious, if it is not Christian in the noblest sense of that word; if it does not touch the soul's depths with convictions; if it does not quicken the spiritual consciousness, and develop justice, freedom, reciprocity, fraternity, and pentecostal altruism, it is of little avail. But Spiritualism—true Spiritualism, being of God and aflame with the Christ-spirit of love—being in its inmost a phenomenon, a philosophy and a religion, the universal religion of all inspired souls, does arouse the spiritual nature and lay the foundation stones for the new heaven and the new earth.

While there are multitudes of spiritists, necromancy test-hunters, consulting border-land earth-bound spirits, thus opening the door to obsession, there are in the land comparatively but few highly and harmoniously unfolded spiritual Spiritualists, ablaze with altruism. When a clergyman asked Emerson what he thought of the "influence and the success of Christianity," he replied, "Christianity has never yet been tried." So Spiritualism in the richness of its mentality and in the fullness of its spirituality, has never yet been tried.

It is reported that in the city of New York the leading Spiritualists attend the Rev. Heber Newton's Episcopal church, the Rev. Mr. Savage's Unitarian church, or other liberal churches. In Chicago, the Rev. Dr. Thomas' congregation abounds in Spiritualists. In Gentryville, Missouri, and vicinity, the Spiritualists flock to hear the Rev. Elder Myrick. And why? Because they are tired of atheism under the guise of Spiritualism—tired of hearing Jesus Christ pronounced a "myth," or if he lived, a "beggar," a "tramp," a "thief," and all religion, "superstition."

Is Spiritualism then dying out? A thousand times NO! Never a truth perished. That it lives however with such a coterie of semi-atheistic advocates is a proof of its divinity. Spiritualism was never making such rapid strides as now, but often under names. The churches are accepting it. It is the world's great need. It is the real bread-of-life pabulum of the popular religion. Talmage condemns it, and yet in his better moments preaches it. It is the leaven that is permeating, broadening and spiritualizing the creeds of Christendom. Only recently in Battle Creek, Michigan, I lectured to our Spiritualist society on Sunday night, and the following Monday night to the members of the Y. M. C. A. in their hall. The religious world moves. Theology is no more religion, than spiritism is Spiritualism, or a road-way sign-board a city.

Spiritualism, being divine in origin, my soul hates any pretended Spiritualism for gain, for curiosity, or for glory. It abhors hypocrisy. It loathes the conjuring up of old Hindu Vedantaism, Sankyanism, Patanjalaism, and other Oriental mysticisms, saying nothing of the Sakti-worship, and palming them off as "progressive Spiritualism." This is a worse fraud than that of the tramp frauds, who in pitch-dark seances materialize spirit make-ups at a dollar a head.

Solid intelligent Spiritualists have had quite enough of this "higher Spiritualism," high as a Hindu conjurer's wand—enough of this pompous pan-American, Sannyasin slush-philosophy, that leads to bewilder, dazzles to blind, and promises "illumination," "inspiration," "adeptship" and occult Yogi-union with A. U. M. Those who wish to sit cross-legged in dingy Hindu huts plastered with cow-excrement, to "meditate," "concentrate," "illuminate," and to so develop as to become one with OM—A.U. M., have a perfect right to do so, but they have no moral right to call it Spiritualism. Positively I never saw, though seeing scores of them, a clean Yogi. I saw one utterly naked sitting to "concentrate," and when English ladies approached he donned a dusty, dirty hip-cloth of scanty dimensions. Evidently he had never heard of comb nor had he enjoyed a bath. He was gazing at a hole in the wall and was engaged in "divine breathing to consecrate." If some of our spiritistic Yogis would "concentrate" towards a wood-pile and saw wood for a poor widow, it would be decidedly more practical and spiritual. They could engage in "divine breathing" while sawing the wood. Col. Olcott assured me, when I was stopping with him at the Theosophical headquarters in Adyar, India, that with barely an exception, "The Yogis were a shiftless set of impostors and beggars." Any effort to hitch Yogaism, or any other Hindu superstition onto Spiritualism, will be a failure.

Truth is a unit—a unit with variations in expression. Considering the radical difference between the Aryan and the Semitic, the phenomena, the Christianity of the Apostolic times, denominated Christianity, and the true Spiritualism of our times, are in perfect accord. Hudson Tuttle, in one of his happy, highly inspired hours, wrote and published the following in the Religio-Philosophical Journal:

"If we analyze the secret power of the life and character of Jesus, we shall find it all in this intense love. He is a sacrifice for the sins of mankind. He dies that others may live. He is a vicarious substitute, willingly by choice, and his last words in the agony of death are those of forgiveness, charity and intercession. The silver tongue of oratory never need be silent in words of praise; the poet has abundant fields to idealize; the painter is at no loss for a subject. This one characteristic takes Jesus out of the realm of humanity and allies him to the celestial."

In this eloquent soul-felt passage Bro. Tuttle meant, "out of the worldly selfish realm of humanity," and allied "him to the celestial." Jesus Christ, the Martyr of Calvary, was allied to the celestial. He is still allied to and with the Celestials, souls of antiquity, Confucius and Socrates and an innumerable company that make radiant the Christ-Heavens of immortality. He is still preaching through divinely unfolded intermediaries to "Spirits in prison," spirits incarnate and discarnate.

While Plato was aflame with wisdom, Christ was aflame with love, pure and self-sacrificing. And it is this Christ-spirit of tenderness, benevolence, brotherhood and love, guided by wisdom and vigorously impelled by a highly purposed will, that will ultimately save the world, crowning it with beatific peace and harmony.

And just so far as atheism, or any form of atheistic spiritism abolishes "Infinite Intelligence," derisively annihilates Jesus Christ, sneers at prayer, scorns invocations, denies moral responsibilities, pronouncing all religion a "superstition becoming Bible stories and silly women," just so far I am not a Spiritualist, nor if the above be Spiritualism, will I be known as one. Any Spiritualism without "Infinite Intelligence," without the Christ-spirit, without religion and prayer, and invocations and angel ministries, and spiritual messages, altruism and activity in all reform work is a farce—a phenomena-farce that is chilling and blighting with the dry-rot of atheistic angularities, disorganization and death to many of our Spiritualistic societies.

When I speak of Christianity, the pure and the genuine, I have no reference to the Jewish Jehovah, or to churchianity with its bloody record, its creeds and confessions of faith. They are but clinging barnacles. Jesus Christ framed no creed, but distinctly said, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love for one another." When sectarian churchianity becomes Christianized, and Spiritualism spiritualized, then will Christianity, Spiritualism and the higher Theosophy, sinking petty differences, clasp hands and work for the education and the salvation of humanity. By salvation is meant soul-growth, the unfoldment and harmonial development of all the emotions and faculties up to the divine standard of the perfect man!

"Give us your help," says Willard J. Hull, the able editor of the Light of Truth, "so that the twentieth century shall find Christ's gospel, Christ's economics, Christ's manliness, Christ's patience, for the first time in the history of Spiritualism, the one working hypothesis of those who call themselves Spiritualists."

It was my good fortune to once meet Victor Hugo in Paris at a spiritual seance. He was a devoted religious Spiritualist speaking reverently of the Christ. The great London Times, termed the "Thunderer," in criticising Flammarion's new book says that "This eminent French astronomer holds the absolute conviction of a communion between the seen and the unseen, and that the whole universe is governed by spiritual laws." Certainly he does; and so do the brainiest men of the world.

The Rev. Mr. Haweis, who is rector of St. James in London and a special preacher at the Westminster Abbey, says that "Spiritualism leads to the center and the source of life and tells us of a future remedial world. It reveals to us the bright galaxy of ministering spirits, the Jacob's ladder which reaches from earth to Heaven; it has more fully explained our Bible, given us back our Christ, and given us back our God, the tender loving Father of all." Concurring, Miss Lilian Whiting adds, "Spiritualism is simply the result, the inevitable result of the full acceptance of the teachings of Jesus, of the authority of the inspired truths of the Bible and of the latter day revelations of science."

The phrase, "Knowledge is the world's savior," has been harped from spiritistic platforms and published in a portion of the spiritistic press till it has become actually sickening. Knowledge saves neither individuals nor nations. The English are an educated people and so are the Boers; did it save them from a bloody war? During the French and German war, when the Germans scored one of their greatest victories, thousands of Germans marched through Berlin's streets singing,

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Three thousand Frenchmen sent below."

Forgers are good pen-men; bank embezzlers are good accountants; train robbers are skillful mechanics; Ruloff, the superior scientist and linguist, of Ithaca, N. Y., murdered, boxed and sunk his wife in Cayuga Lake. Dr. Webster, professor of chemistry in Harvard University, owing Dr. Parker a debt that he could not pay, murdered him and employed his knowledge—his medical knowledge in using every destructive and dissolving acid known to chemistry, to disintegrate and destroy every vestige of the body. Did knowledge save this man—has it saved any tribe or nation? The greater the knowledge the deeper may be the wickedness of the plot. Proud selfish knowledge is dangerous, unless influenced by justice, by principle, and governed by a high moral nature.

Spiritualism is an affirmation. It not only demonstrates a future conscious existence, but it gives us a partial geography of the better land, with descriptions of the conditions and the occupations of those once vestured in mortality. There is a winter-land sphere of retribution and suffering over there as well as a summer-land of moral loveliness. No one by dying gets away from himself. Memory, consciousness and conscience continue. God constructs no hells—damns no souls here nor anywhere. Men build their own hells. They reap what they sow. Every child born is a possible arch-angel or a wandering prodigal in Cimmerian spheres. Death is not a sponge that cleans life's slate by a dying spasm, nor does it make saints of savages in the twinkling of an eye. Man is a spirit now, a moral actor now and in all worlds. There is no escape from just punishment. It is cause and effect, and yet merciful and disciplinary. The door of mercy is never shut. The gate of opportunity is never closed. God is not only consciousness and life, but wisdom and love. Not only has Spiritualism opened the doors to immortal spheres, but it has disclosed some of the unspeakable beauties awaiting us in the many-mansioned house of the Father. These mansions—aural spheres, enzoning stars and planets—are real, substantial, and adaptively fitted for the abodes of spirits, angels and arch-angels. These, aflame with love, are ever active in some educational or redemptive work. Heaven's rest is not idleness; the soul's activities are intensified by the transition. The future life is a social life, a constructive life, a retributive life, and a progressive life, where the soul sweeps onward and upward, in glory transcending glory, through the ages of eternity.

In its infinite reach, Spiritualism means this hour and its duties. It means this day and the rightly making of the most of it. It means to-morrow, a future life—eternity! It means the overshadowing potency of all the liberalizing movements that gladden humanity—toleration, brotherhood, temperance, anti-capital punishment, women's suffrage, co-operation, altruism, international peace and other redemptive movements of the last half century.

Among our needs are unity of sentiment, concord of action in all constructive work and benevolent enterprises, whether initiated by ourselves or by the various religious denominations of the country. It is not dogma, but love that unites. We are brothers all. Instead of sinking non-essentials, such as reincarnation and other theories and clubbing together, we too often have clubbed each other. It was Franklin who told the Americans in those old Colonial times, that if "they did not hang together, they would all hang separately."

Frauds there are and frauds there will be just so long as spiritistic wonder-hunters patronize them, and sad to state often defend them; but frauds and fraudulent mediums are no more Spiritualism than noise is music, or than forgery is finance.

If in a given latitude Spiritualism has an unsavory name, there were inducing causes, for Spiritualists are judged, as are others, by their principles, by their home lives, by their honor, their integrity, their ethics, their intellectual and industrial activities, their labors in all reform-fields, and by the characters they build up in a community. Is it not time that we quit boasting of numbers and devoted more time to quality, or as the Quakers would say, "To quiet self-examination."

Based in the moral and spiritual consciousness of the soul, the Spiritual philosophy cannot be compressed into a confession of faith, enshrined in a creed, a cathedral, or a pagoda; and it is altogether too voluminous and cosmopolitan to be booked in any of the world's Bibles. It is a spiritual force, a life—a Christ-like life of well-doing, non-resistance, and love to our fellowmen.

What have Spiritualists learned of the future life during the last half century and more? Much—very much! Through psychic sensitives, that, leaving their physical bodies and traveling through both border-land spheres and the wisdom spheres, we have learned that the spirit-world is the real world, and that this is but a changing, flickering shadow—largely an illusion! These sensitives, who like Paul, were caught up to the third heavens, have there beheld gardens, groves, fountains, cities, schools, universities, crystal rivers, evergreen fields, scenes and scenery indescribable, and in majesty incomprehensible.

While science, reason, analogy may help, and faith point upward, still all we know positively of the future life comes through our personal spirit experiences, or through the psychic experiences and messages of finely attained intermediaries. It is through these that the secrets of the silence have been revealed, that the gates have been pushed ajar, the tide of despair rolled back, and the "word of the Lord" of old, proven in the light of to-day to have been the voices of guardian angels.

Psychic phenomena are indispensable to investigations and students of the higher, finer soul forces; and genuine conscientious intermediaries are the spiritual kings and queens of the household, the message-bearers from an overarching cloud of witnesses, the Olympians that upon the mountain tops catch the first rising sun-beams and transmit them higher to convince the skeptic, enlighten the intellect, calm the tremulous emotions and feed with the bread of life the hungering souls of humanity. Give, I pray you, to the psychically gifted your best thoughts, the kindest, sunniest surroundings, and the best possible conditions of harmony, trust, prayer and good-will vibrations, as the Psychic Research Society gave Mrs. Piper. If sensitives were given such or similar conditions, there would be more Dr. Hodgsons of Cambridge, and Prof. Jameses of Harvard, and Prof. Hyslops of Columbia University, to give in their adhesion to Spiritualism.

Among our pressing needs are more home-seances; more substantial organization; better educated speakers; larger society libraries; more genuine enthusiasm; more missionaries afire with inspiration; more and a superior quality of music; more heart-felt consecration; more religious fervor; more of the spirit of non-resistance and peace; more self-sacrifice along altruistic lines; more inviting church edifices with the inauguration of the church of the new heaven and the new earth. I would have the doors of this church swing both outward and inward, free to all. I would see inscribed above the doors, "Come in all ye that labor and are heavily-laden—come all ye that are weary and needy—all ye that are sad and disconsolate—all ye that are dissatisfied and disheartened, regardless of creed or country—all ye that seek rest for the soul, come to this sanctuary of spiritual gifts, this baptism of the new life!?

I would see these church doors open each day and each evening for music, for silent prayer, for meditation, concentration, good thoughts and ennobling resolutions. On the walls I would see paintings of the seers, sages and martyrs to truth, wreathed in the emerald leaves and olive branches of peace. As an opening hymn I would hear sung these words:

"One family we dwell in Him,
One church above, beneath,
Though now divided by the stream,
The swelling stream of death."

Or the following:

"Love is the theme that the seraph chimes
Are now hymning through the stars;
And we catch the strains from their golden lyres,

When our souls let down their bars."

I would see this church of humanity—this spiritual church of the living Christ—supported by voluntary offerings, and in its consecrated walls I would see prince and peasant, youth and maturity, sit side by side, all hearts warm and vibrant with brotherly love, aspiring for more soul growth and religious culture; a very sanctuary of peace and perfect trust; a retreat for the penitent, the weak and the way-worn toiler, where love is law, benevolence the ever-burning incense, and perfection of character the crowning aim and purpose.

Over the altar of this consecrated church-temple where these sincere truth-seeking worshipers meet for meditation and aspiration, I would see inscribed, "This is the gate of Heaven—a Heaven now and here. Welcome, welcome all! How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, and in the bonds of peace."

When the crowds are departing from these quiet church-temples, may they receive some such benedictions as that breathed in rapturous sympathy by the aged Apostle John, who according to the legend, when weighed down under a century of years, would slowly arise in the church at Ephesus, as the services were about to close, and extending his tremulous arms and hands, say in broken accents of fatherly tenderness—"Beloved—beloved children, love ye one another," and the retiring audience, catching the inspiration of love and sympathy, would say, "John—dear St. John, who said 'God is love,' and who upon Olive's Mount so trustingly, lovingly leaned upon Jesus' bosom, blest us—blest us, and so will we, more and more, love and bless one another."

SYCAMORE CAMP, CAL.

Mrs. F. A. Logan Visits the Camp.

To the Editor:—The leading guiding powers opened the way for me to visit the camp, which has been successful financially, if rightly informed. Spiritually the right man in the right place, in the person of Mr. Allen Franklin Brown, presided with dignity and self-composure which are so essential in maintaining harmony on all occasions. Time and order strictly adhered to, insomuch that some inspirational unpaid speakers felt too much hurried to do themselves or the cause justice. I confess that I am old-fashioned enough to prefer camp-meetings where all speakers and mediums, as well as the campers could meet together at least once a year and contribute their services for the good of the cause, without money and without price, leaving it to the generosity of souls that might be quickened to newness of life to contribute sufficient to meet the expenses of camping privileges. Pentecostal seasons might be had, and all would feel that they had met for a spiritual baptism, with less formality and more spirituality. Why in heaven's name cannot we have one meeting next year where the speakers, mediums and all concerned might contribute their services alike and thus all participate and all be equally blessed? "'Twould never do! We must ape after the churches in order to be respectable—mustn't allow undeveloped mediums to be influenced before a promiscuous audience!" As the spirit giveth utterance, because, forsooth, they are not on the program and have not had the sanction of the committee of arrangements, whose financial interests might be interfered with as the sequence.

Who shall say the psychic influence does not obtain in the midst of a concourse of great minds through which the invisible world can manifest through a sensitive brain for the first time; never before having had just the elements requisite, and so favorably adjusted. Must the spirit world be thwarted in its endeavors to give great living truths to mortals, by rules and regulations of minds in the form, lest outsiders might misjudge and turn up their noses with scorn and ridicule? Had such a course been taken by the writer, never would her meetings have been resolved into the "Circle of Harmony;" and while she has strength to walk, and talk, such meetings shall be established in this lower country, not only in Los Angeles, but in Passadena and the towns round about, forming a circuit, not to teach Methodism, but to unlock the door between the spirit world and this, that light may beam into the creed-bound structures of orthodoxy and materiality. An added power is vouchsafed to me in more ways than one, but what encouraged me greatly was the following communication, written on the type-writer more rapidly than I had ever before witnessed, by Mr. Brower, a fine medium, in whose seances the most wonderful music is prepared that I ever heard: "My Dear Friend, Mrs. Logan, I come to-night to write you. I intend to do some work for the good of the cause, and I have chosen you as the instrument, so to-night I came to tell you. Respectfully, James G. Clark."

The above was repeated at another sitting, with much more added, assuring me that I would be instrumental in doing much good; to be of good cheer; that things "would be better soon," and again signed his name, which thousands know is held in sweet memory of his melodious music and sublime poetry.

Perhaps I am making my letter too long, else I would speak of all the good mediums in the camp and the fine lectures that we had the privilege of listening to. The music was grand, but that of Zoa Barnett penetrated to the depths of the soul. I hope no great master will get hold of her and drill her according to the fashion of this world, as her musical voice is heavenly and is undoubtedly inspired by some great unfolded musicians in the spirit world. Her father's voice blends perfectly with hers, and her mother is a good medium and speaker, and I predict their influence will yet be felt world-wide.

Un expectedly there came to me on the camp-grounds friends from several states in the Union, with exclamations and a warm grasp of the hand, saying, "O, you stopped with us in Princeton, Ill., when you lectured there, many years ago." Another, "Do you remember of breaking up the fever of a little girl, nine years ago, with one treatment, at our house in Los Angeles?" Another, "Oh, you stopped at our house in Long Lake, Minn., and taught our little girl gymnastics so that she could lead the lyceum." And, "Oh," exclaims a dozen or more, "I have been in your meeting in San Francisco, called the Circle of Harmony—such harmony I never experienced before." So with kind remembrances, assurances and pressing invitations, I hope to have strength to continue the good work.

NATIONAL SPIRITUALISTS ASSOCIATION

Annual Report of President Harrison D. Barrett, and an Account of the Proceedings of the Convention.

Report of President Barrett.

To the Spiritualists of the United States of America and Dominion of Canada, Greeting:

It falls to my lot at this time, in compliance with the requirements of the Constitution, By-Laws, Rules and Regulations of the National Spiritualists' Association, to present my report as President of that institution for the past twelve months. This duty is doubly pleasant in view of the attainments of the National body during the year just closed, and its hopeful outlook for the future. Seven years mark an epoch in the history of any great social, political and religious movement. Seven years have passed since our present National Association was organized. To-day we stand at the threshold of the eighth year of its existence, and have the right to feel that the period of uncertainty, indecision and indifference has passed, and that our honored Association is entering upon an era of prosperity and activity never before known in the history of Spiritualism.

THE PAST YEAR.

The past year has been a period of great activity in Spiritualistic circles. The attention of the public has been called to the subject of psychism with greater frequency than in any corresponding period during the past half century. The secular press, the great periodicals, the leading pulpiteers, and the men of science, have referred to Spiritualism again and again at such length and in such commendatory terms as to awaken in interest in matters occult on the part of thousands of people who never before have given the subject any thought whatever. Soon after the adjournment of our last annual Convention, Rev. Minot J. Savage published a remarkable book entitled "Life Beyond Death." It was read with avidity both by Spiritualists and their opponents, while the reviews of the work in the secular press showed the great interest felt by the reading public in the questions discussed by this progressive Unitarian preacher.

Prof. James H. Hyslop, of Columbia University, about the same time, made known the results of his phenomenal experiments with Mrs. Piper, the well-known psychic of Arlington, Mass. The columns of the secular press were filled with references to the statements of the learned professor, and many of the leading dailies and periodicals commented at length editorially upon his positive declarations with regard to the truth of spiritualistic phenomena. Even in England and upon the continent of Europe mention was made of the experiments of Prof. Hyslop. In every instance the references showed the intense interest felt in the subject with which he dealt. It does not matter that many of those who commented upon his work failed to arrive at the same conclusions he did. It is enough to realize that the opponents of psychic science were forced to defend their materialistic positions, and thereby recognize Spiritualism as a matter worthy of their attention.

So great was the interest manifest on the part of the people that many clergymen felt constrained to attack Spiritualism in a most unjust and wholly unwarranted manner. Such choler only showed the mental calibre of the attacking parties, and advertised Spiritualism the more widely among the masses. One preacher from Buffalo, N. Y., one from Washington, D. C., and another from Chicago, Ill., were especially virulent in their attacks, using language that no dignified pulpit would ever tolerate. These men were promptly silenced by one of our ablest workers, Moses Hull, who read them a lesson they will not soon forget. I recommend that this Convention acknowledge the distinguished services of Mr. Hull in this matter in a fitting testimonial. The words of these three preachers were widely quoted by the secular and religious press. The replies that were made to their false and malicious statements were utterly ignored by the religious press, but were given good positions in many of the leading secular journals. No stronger argument can be advanced in proof of the intolerance and bigotry of sectarianism than this action of the religious press.

The course of the bigoted and ignorant pulpiteers just mentioned led many of the broader and more progressive clergymen to make Spiritualism the subject of one or more sermons, in which many of them gave it fair and impartial treatment. This was especially true in the case of Rev. Heber Newton, of the Episcopal Church, and also of many of the spiritually illuminated among the Unitarians and Universalists. It is but fair that attention should be called to the fact that this widespread interest in Spiritualism, awakened during the year, is due to people outside of our own ranks. The Society for Psychical Research, the scientists, and up-to-date clergymen have created public sentiment, and turned the attention of thousands of people to the subject of psychism. It is true that Spiritualism is benefited by their efforts, and that the results of their work will redound to the good of the race. It is to be regretted, however, that Spiritualists have not had a hand in this good work, and been able to call the attention of the thoughtful to their well-authenticated facts, even as those outside of our ranks have done in the instances named. I earnestly recommend that this Convention make due acknowledgment to those who have been instrumental in carrying forward the educational work named, and formulate plans by which Spiritualism, through the efforts of pronounced Spiritualists, may have a share in the work of educating the public in the great truths of psychism.

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that Spiritualism as a whole, has had a most prosperous year, outside of the organizations conducted under its name. In some instances it has received additions to its ranks, through its local societies, from those who have been awakened to a knowledge of the truths of the Spiritual Philosophy. The widespread advertising our Cause has received has led to a more general study of our literature, and I am pleased to report that there has been a deeper interest manifested in the writings of our ablest representatives than has been apparent in any preceding year of the history of our National body. No novel of the day is at all popular unless a vein of occultism runs through its plot. The demand for the works of Lilian Whiting, M. J. Savage, and kindred writers, as well as the renewed interest in the writings of that greatest of all seers and philosophers who have ever lived upon the earth, Andrew Jackson Davis, are also pleasing evidences of the growth of Spiritualism in the esteem of the public. We cannot do too much to sustain educational work of this kind, and I recommend that this Convention formulate some plan by which Spiritualism may be given greater power and influence through the dissemination of its valuable literature.

NECROLOGICAL.

The past year, fraught with blessings though it has been, has also thrown many shadows athwart our pathway. Some of the bravest, brainiest, and noblest of workers have fallen in the great battle of life, and gone to their immortalities. One of them was full of years and rich in spiritual knowledge, gathered through a long and useful earth-life. He was esteemed as an anthropologist on all continents, loved as a spiritual teacher by the millions, and honored as the discoverer of psychometry by all Spiritualists. He fell just as the sun was sinking in the west in a glorious, golden sunset, behind the hills of life's years, and sank into a sweet, refreshing slumber from which he awakened in the "Morning Land" of the soul to enjoy his well-earned rest from his hard labors on earth. Earth-life is poorer, but the realm of the soul is richer, because of the transition of that gifted author, scholar, scientist and statesman, Joseph Rodes Buchanan.

The next to go was one whose years were barely half-told, who was but beginning to pass from the old age of youth into the youth of old age. His is a name that was famous throughout the world as authority on ontology and bacteriology. He was thrice decorated by one of the governments of Europe for his great discoveries in the field of science, and for his philanthropic work among the sufferers from the cholera scourges that swept over several nations in the "Old World." He was considered a leader in his especial line of work, while as an advocate of psychism his rank was equally high. His writings in defense of scientific Spiritualism have been published in several languages, and his efforts to establish a Psychical Institute for the study of mediumship are too well known to need extended notice from me. This noble-hearted, broad-minded, open-handed friend of our Cause and supporter of this Association, has fallen in the midst of a most useful career, when the world had greatest need of his services. He requires no encomiums from me at this time. He has left his mark high upon the scroll of fame and gone to his reward. I can but speak his name, and in the silence of the soul pay my tribute to the sterling worth of Dr. Paul Gibler.

Two other prominent men have gone from us since we were last assembled in Convention—John Clark Ridpath, the eminent historian and statesman, and Col. S. P. Kase, the old-time Abolitionist, and personal friend of Abraham Lincoln. Prof. Ridpath, while not an active supporter of our Cause, was yet an avowed Spiritualist, and never hesitated to acknowledge his interest in the great questions with which Spiritualism deals. Col. Kase was a tireless worker for our Cause for more than forty-five years. He rendered the nation at large, and Spiritualism in particular, a signal service when he interested President Lincoln in psychism.

In common with our brethren over the sea, we pause to pay our tribute to that noble woman whose services in behalf of Spiritualism were gladly acknowledged by her friends on all continents—Mrs. Emma Hardinge-Britten. She was ripe for the harvest, having spent more than threescore-and-ten years in the mortal form in the service of her fellow-men. Her works will live in after years, and she will be remembered with loving gratitude by the thousands to whom she ministered when her life was young and her hope strong. Nobly hath she lived, and grandly hath she triumphed over seeming death. Peace to her memory!

It is but right that this Convention should take notice of the departure of these eminent personages. I therefore recommend that the Committee on Resolutions be instructed to present a special testimonial to their worth and services, that the same may be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, and copies forwarded to the families of the arisen ones.

GROWTH OF THE N. S. A.

Our Association has added a small number of societies to its membership during the past year. It is true that we have met with some losses, but the character of the newly-acquired societies in the way of activity and interest more than compensates us for the loss of the few that were only half alive. One new State Spiritualist Association has been formed, that of Wisconsin, which gives promise of great usefulness in that State. Ohio has been quickened into new life, and excellent work has been done in that State for our Cause. The bonds of affection between it and the N. S. A. have been strengthened, and an era of good feeling inaugurated. The feelings of amity and good-will on the part of all State Associations toward the N. S. A. have been augmented and, so far as is known to your Executive Board, the most harmonious relations exist between the National society and its auxiliaries. Our societary growth, though small in numbers, is of a permanent character, hence is of great value.

The N. S. A. has grown in the esteem and confidence of the people far beyond any corresponding year of its existence. It is now looked upon as a permanent institution, and is receiving the attention from Spiritualists that has hitherto been withheld. It has grown into the notice of the opponents of Spiritualism, and is looked to for reliable data as to the status of our Cause by all classes of people. Spiritualists are awakening to the fact that their National Association is receiving the respectful consideration of their opponents, and that it is of value to them in the dignity and standing it gives to our movement as a whole. I have never received so many letters of inquiry, nor have I been approached by the officers of so many secular and religious institutions, for information concerning Spiritualism as has been the case during the past twelve months. It is true that there has been a special incentive to attract the attention of the people, through the munificence of our beloved Treasurer, Theodore J. Mayer; yet that very influence has been helpful in the way of creating permanent interest, and establishing a feeling of security in regard to the future of this great organization.

WORK OF THE N. S. A.

The executive officers of the N. S. A. have had their time well occupied with Association work throughout the year. The correspondence of both the President and Secretary has been large, and has produced some very interesting information as to the standing of our Cause throughout the nation. Our Secretary has been unremitting in her efforts to establish and maintain the most harmonious relations between this organization and its chartered auxiliaries. In this labor she has been eminently successful, and she has also succeeded in interesting many prominent laymen in the work of the N. S. A. She has kept in touch with nearly all of the workers in the spiritual vineyard, and has ever striven to show them that the interests of the N. S. A. were identical with their own.

Very little missionary work has been done during the past year. Several trustworthy missionaries received commissions to work for the N. S. A., but it was not possible for them to devote their time to the work, and, in some instances, the results were too discouraging to warrant them in continuing their efforts. One special missionary, Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, was sent into the field to arouse an interest in the N. S. A. and its purposes. She was engaged, under contract, for a period of six months, at a salary of fifty dollars per month, and expenses. She began her work December 1, 1899, in the State of Indiana. From the very first she met with determined opposition and the most serious obstacles. The people would not respond to her letters, and several local societies failed to give her a hearing. Whenever she did speak, she faithfully endeavored to interest her hearers in the N. S. A. In some places her efforts bore fruit, but in many instances the people seemed to feel no obligation whatever in the matter. Our missionary was being paid by the N. S. A., and they did not feel called upon to contribute even one dollar to aid her in her work.

I regret to say that so great was the apathy of the people that her thirty days of constant labor, in which she traveled hundreds of miles, gave twenty-three lectures and one funeral sermon, returned to the N. S. A. the sum of twenty-nine dollars. The salary of Mrs. Ballou was fifty dollars and her expenses for the month. Of course, this was a heavy loss to the N. S. A. The people were imbued seemingly with the idea that they could get something for nothing, hence they accepted her hard labor as a matter of right to themselves, and complacently forgot their own duty in the case. Mrs. Ballou then tried other fields of labor, but the results were much the same. Your President and Secretary tried to arrange her route to the best advantage, but the distances were too great and mail transportation too slow to make it possible for them to aid her as they wished and strove to do. At the close of her fourth month of service, at the request of your executive officers, Mrs. Ballou kindly canceled her contract. This was found necessary as a matter of economy, and was done solely to prevent the depletion of our treasury. Your officers make no complaint of the work of Mrs. Ballou; she did her best, under great difficulties, and no blame can justly be laid upon her.

Mr. E. W. Sprague, one of our truest and most steadfast friends, in connection with his regular engagements with local societies, rendered the N. S. A. much valuable service in missionary effort. Several other missionaries did what they could, by occasional references to the aims and objects of this body, to interest their hearers in it. Your President also did some missionary work during the year, but did not devote himself exclusively to it as he did in '94, '95, '96 and '97. The results of the year's work in the missionary field are not up to the records of former years. I am yet of the opinion that live missionaries are the best means of educating our people in the spiritual philosophy, and in explaining to them the value of the N. S. A. It is evident, however, that new methods must be devised for carrying on that work. I do not feel that it is the sole purpose of our appointed missionaries to collect money for our treasury. There is a higher purpose than this that should be the first consideration both of the missionary and this Association. That purpose is to show the necessity of thorough organization, and the duty of the people to support the same will soon become apparent to them.

It will be necessary to show the people that they cannot expect to get something for nothing—that "live and let live" is the motto of the N. S. A., and that it should be theirs. The field of labor for each missionary should be carefully selected, the routes definitely determined, and dates made far in advance. Each person so employed, if thus equipped, will do much for the N. S. A. I believe that if six live missionaries are employed, and their entire time devoted to their work in this direction, they can be self-supporting, if they work with a will, and at the close of the year have a comfortable balance to turn into the treasury of the N. S. A. At this point, I must suggest that not only should our missionaries organize new societies, but they should also do everything in their power to strengthen those now in existence. This part of our work has been neglected too long, and we are now suffering from the ill effects thereof. I recommend that missionary effort be continued another year, under methods to be prescribed by this Convention, and that not more than six active workers be specially commissioned, under fixed salaries, to devote their entire time to this important work.

THE MAYER FUND.

It will be remembered that early in September, 1899, our esteemed Treasurer, Theodore J. Mayer, offered to deed, in fee simple, the present magnificent headquarters of the N. S. A. in Washington, D. C., provided the Spiritualists of the nation would place the sum of fifteen thousand dollars in our treasury. Mr. Mayer afterwards reduced the proviso to ten thousand dollars, and has extended the time from date to date during the year, hoping the fund would be raised in full, but we come to this Convention with nearly one thousand dollars lacking. One year of constant effort on the part of your executive officers has not sufficed to bring forth the required amount. From the report of our Secretary you will learn that she has faithfully endeavored to fill this important trust. Nobly has she striven, and no blame can be attached to her for the present deficit.

Your President claims that he, also, has done his best to induce the Spiritualists of America to meet Mr. Mayer half way. One man has asked thousands of men to do as much for our Cause as he would do alone. This point I have emphasized, iterated and reiterated with voice and pen throughout the year. Under instructions from our Board of Trustees, I sent out eight thousand, six hundred and eighteen circular letters to the Spiritualists whose addresses were at my command, asking them to donate to the Mayer fund. Several thousand made no response whatever, but a goodly number at once sent in their offerings to this fund. I received about two thousand dollars in cash, and pledges of about fifteen hundred dollars additional. I also penned one hundred letters with my own hand to personal friends, from nearly all of whom I received generous responses. From all sources I have received and turned into the treasury of the N. S. A. more than three thousand dollars in cash. From the pledges made to me direct I expect to receive about three hundred dollars in addition to what has already been paid. I regret to say, however, that over six hundred dollars of the pledges remain unredeemed. The parties who made them have been repeatedly requested to meet their obligations, but it seems that they gave their pledges with the feeling that the Mayer fund never would be filled, hence feel justified in refusing to make good their word of honor in this respect.

The failure of the parties in question to redeem their pledges leaves us with nearly one thousand dollars to raise ere we can claim the bounty of Mr. Mayer. Such a condition of things is indeed lamentable. It is a sad commentary upon the popular interest in Spiritualism that has developed during the past year. If outsiders appreciate Spiritualism at a higher rate of valuation than ever before, surely Spiritualists ought to do the same. The fact is, many people left their pocketbooks in the church when they embraced Spiritualism. Some means by which the hearts, souls and purses of our Spiritualists can be reached at one and the same time must be devised by this Convention. No other religious body in the world would have taken a year to raise so small a sum as ten thousand dollars. With a following of possibly one quarter of a million of people, there is no excuse for such extreme parsimony. In speaking thus, I cast no reflections upon the generous souls who have contributed to this most worthy cause.

It is to some of them that I am indebted for the inspiration that prompted me to persevere in my efforts to fill this fund. Many of the letters were touching in the extreme, and proved the sincerity and devotion of the writers. To such as they the world is indebted for the presence of Spiritualism among men; to such as they must we look for evidence of the trustworthiness of and faith in human nature. Many of them, out of an income of ten dollars per month, contributed one, two and five dollars each to the Mayer fund. What a difference between them and the men of wealth who have hugged their gold to their hearts and refused to give even one penny!

Simple justice compels me to admit that those who gave most willingly out of their little stores were people far beyond the age of three score and ten years. I deeply deplore the failure of the Spiritualists as a body to appreciate the great value of Mr. Mayer's unselfish offer. The old desire to get something for nothing, by making other people pay for their religion for them, is all too strong with the majority of our Spiritualists even to-day. I most earnestly recommend that this Convention make it its chief duty to complete the Mayer fund at the earliest possible moment.

MASS MEETINGS.

The last Convention instructed the Board of Trustees to institute and hold a series of mass meetings in the large cities of the land in the interest of the N. S. A. These meetings were to be held, as far as possible, under the joint auspices of the State and National Associations, each organization to share and share alike, in the expenses and profits of the same. Joint Conventions were planned in the States of Michigan, Minnesota, Illinois, New York and Ohio. It was my privilege to attend all of the meetings save the one held in Minnesota. They were all helpful to the cause of organization spiritually, educationally and financially, and were the means of interesting hundreds of people in Spiritualism. The Minnesota Mass Convention was a grand success, and Trustee G. D. Pguden represented the N. S. A.'s interests in a most acceptable manner. Other mass meetings were designed, but, owing to business changes, ill health, and the lack of interest on the part of some of the local workers, it was found necessary to abandon the plan.

The work performed, however, is so satisfactory in character as to warrant the recommendation of its continuance another year. I therefore urge that instructions be given to the incoming Board of Trustees to arrange for not less than twenty mass-meetings in all sections of the nation during the year next ensuing. I further recommend that they be held under the joint auspices of the several state Associations and the N. S. A., wherever State Associations exist, upon the plan of last year, a mutual sharing of the responsibility and profits that these meetings may entail or call forth. I urge that these meetings be made the first care of the board after its members are inducted into office.

CAMP-MEETINGS.

Our summer camps have always been sources of revenue for the N. S. A., and the past year has been no exception to the rule. I visited seven camps in the interests of the N. S. A., and received the hearty co-operation of the officers and visitors at all of them. I was given a considerate hearing at the Chesterfield (Ind.) Camp, and paved the way for better work next year. Niantic, Ct., Temple Heights, Me., Onset, Mass., Verona Park, Madison, and Etna, Me., in the order named, were my other fields of labor. Each of the six last named were most generous to the National Association, and we are under obligations to the officials of the same for their kindly co-operation. These six camps contributed, in the way of collections, donations, and services of your president, $605.45 cash, and 27 in pledges, of which sum Onset, Mass., gave nearly $400. Onset's offering includes the generous check of John Q. A. Whittemore, the able and efficient president of that organization. The other camps are much smaller in the point of numbers in attendance, yet they did proportionally as well. Etna, Me., gave $81.41, Madison, Me., $75.54, and the others smaller sums, all of which should be duly acknowledged by this body.

At Onset and Madison your president was assisted by several of our prominent speakers and laymen. Dr. George A. Fuller, Dr. N. F. Ravlin, Mrs. A. Ritchie, Hon. Thomas M. Locke, Mr. F. A. Wiggin, Miss Susie C. Clarke and Mrs. Rachel Walcott did much to make the day a signal success, as did also Miss Christine Brown in her capacity as vocalist. At Madison, Mrs. Jennie Conant-Henderson, Mr. F. A. Wiggin and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond lent willing hands to the good work, and helped to make the day a profitable one to the N. S. A. The Schubert Quartet rendered excellent music and did all in its power to interest the people in our work. I recommend that suitable acknowledgment of the services of these good friends, the generous co-operation of the camp officials in all instances, and the liberal contributions of the people, be made by this convention. I further recommend that efforts be made to secure N. S. A. Days at all of the camps for the season of 1901, and that special representatives of this body be sent to each camp to look after the interests of the N. S. A. on those occasions.

LOCAL SOCIETIES.

Notwithstanding the fact that Spiritualism has received a great impetus during the past year from outside sources, it is nevertheless true that our local societies, in the vast majority of cases, are in a very deplorable condition. Not more than fifty of them are in good circumstances and qualified to do the work for which they were instituted. In the height of the winter season over seven hundred meetings are held every Sunday evening in this country under the banner of Spiritualism. It is true that four hundred or more of these gatherings are conducted by some special medium, around whose personality the people assemble, out of their special interest in the individual leader. This does not do away with, but rather adds to, the deplorable condition to which I am referring. Only one society in every seven is really prospering, using the above figures as a basis for comparison.

From one side of the nation to the other, I have heard nothing but complaints from the average local society during the past year, as to its inability to meet the expenses and carry on its work properly. The officers have asked the speakers they employed to make special reductions in their terms, and even demanded of some of them that they give two lectures per Sunday for the pittance of five dollars. In many instances the people seem to forget that their teachers must live and selfishly seek to get all they can from them without considering the matter of any return whatever. Inasmuch as our platform was formerly on a par with the pulpits of all denominations in the matter of compensation for the workers employed, the present condition is the more to be regretted and condemned. No speaker with or without a family can live upon the average salary paid by our local societies. If he is alone in the world, he may be able to live on twenty-five dollars per month, but if he has a family, the outlook is indeed dark. In view of the prices paid twenty and thirty years ago, the present condition becomes appalling. There is a hiatus between the two so wide and deep, that even the man who loves to live above the clouds while his feet are on the earth, must needs perceive it.

In speaking as I have of the present condition of our local societies and their attitude toward our speakers and mediums, I do not mean to cast any reflections upon our noble-hearted laymen who have faithfully striven to maintain regular Sunday services in their respective communities. The few who have done the hard work are entitled to full credit for their unselfish efforts to sustain the Cause of truth. There is a cause for the steady decline in the numerical and financial strength of our local societies. I ask this Convention to determine that cause and apply a remedy. Permit me to offer a few suggestions with regard to this especial work. It will be seen when the report of our Committee on Delegates' Reports is rendered that the average membership of our local societies is less than thirty, while the attendance each Sunday often averages over two hundred persons. Why do the many throw the burden of maintaining an organization upon the few? Cannot some plan be outlined by means of which the hundreds of interested visitors at our meetings can be led to become active members of our societies?

There are certain matters to which I invite your particular attention, viz., the places of meeting, music, door fee, and platform management. Will better halls attract the people and induce them to become members? Will a higher grade of music produce the same wished-for result? Will the abolition of the door fee aid to the dignity and standing of our movement financially as well as ethically? Will the separation of the phenomena and philosophy have the same effect? These are practical questions, and I hope that this Convention will, in its wisdom, deal with them in a practical manner. In the early days, the largest and most attractive halls, the finest music, free admission at the door, and no phenomena outside of the wonderful inspiration of the speaker attracted thousands of the most highly-cultured people of the land to our meetings. These people can be reached today if we will provide them with the same nutritious pabulum with which they regaled themselves in the earlier years of our movement. Some remedy must be found for the jealousies that now exist among our local workers. It should be impressed upon the mind of every one who claims to be a Spiritualist that no person has any moral right to withhold his support from a local society for personal reasons of pique or envy. It should also be emphasized that Spiritualism can only exert a wholesome influence in educational and reform work through strong local societies.

This subject is the most important of all matters that will come before this Convention. It would be possible for me to argue this question at length, but it is not necessary for me to do so. The facts are before you—our local societies need help—they have already lost ground for the past four years—they should be given new life and power by this Convention. I urge you to consider this subject at length. Do not pass resolutions with regard to it, but find some solution for this knotty problem and apply it. I have only this recommendation to offer concerning this momentous question—that this Convention authorize the incoming Board of Trustees to send out a special missionary to visit all chartered local auxiliaries and give them a helping hand in their struggle to uphold the banner of truth. It should be the duty of this missionary to solicit donations from individuals outside of the societies, and not from the societies themselves. He should be instructed to use all honorable means in his power to strengthen, rather than deplete the treasuries of the locals, and seek by every possible method to prove that the interests of the N. S. A. and its auxiliaries were one and the same. If such a missionary is sent out, he could, by judicious effort, interest people of means, who are liberal in their religious views, in the N. S. A., and perhaps induce them to endow it. Not only this—he could also gather data as to the causes that have so signally weakened our local societies.

SETTLEMENT OF SPEAKERS.

I am constrained to urge upon your attention the great advantage that Spiritualism would derive from continuous engagements for our speakers. Whenever the plan has been faithfully tried, the results have been highly satisfactory. It is really one of the best methods of strengthening our local societies that can be devised. An engagement for one or more years does away with the worry of travel, and gives each speaker an opportunity to study the mental, moral and spiritual needs of his people. It gives him a chance to visit public libraries, and to familiarize himself with the views of the great thinkers of the present age through the leading periodicals of the day. Through a permanent residence he can exert a helpful influence in social and educational circles, besides making Spiritualism a power for good in all reform work. The itinerant system has done as much to retard the growth of our local societies as any other known cause. It has squandered the finances of the society, depleted the physical and spiritual powers of the speaker, and deprived him of the comforts of a home. It has also made some speakers mentally lazy, by causing them to be content with reiterating their few lectures that they composed in the early years of their public work. I recommend that this Convention set the seal of its approval upon long engagements for speakers, and give this most worthy cause every possible assistance.

HALF RATES AND ORDINATION.

Under this caption, I can only renew my recommendations of last year, viz., that we as Spiritualists take steps to secure the abolition of half-rates for clergymen upon all lines of railroad in America, and that we petition the law-making bodies of the nation to prohibit by legal enactment, the conferring of ordination as a special rite upon any person whatsoever. I also urge that that special efforts be made to take from all clergymen the right to solemnize marriages, and all other special lleges and immunities they now enjoy. A body of people whose motto is "Equal rights for all—special privileges for none," surely ought to condemn half-rates on the railroads, and the pernicious practice of conferring ordination upon any class of individuals, under the pleasing delusion to those receiving such rite that they have been filled with divine unction and inoculated with the Holy Ghost. Let us as Spiritualists use every honorable means at our command to secure the overthrow of both these customs that have become parasites upon society in all sections of America.

MEDIUMSHIP.

This word means much to every enlightened Spiritualist, for it is one of the corner-stones upon which the grand spiritual temple rests. The N. S. A., from the very first, has declared its recognition of mediumship as the source of the inspiration and power of Spiritualism, and has ever sought to protect and defend all true and worthy mediums from unjust attacks. During the past year the statement that the N. S. A. was opposed to mediumship has been widely circulated. Such an assertion is false in every particular, and is uttered by those who know it to be false. The officers of the N. S. A. do not hesitate to declare that every phenomenon offered in the name of Spiritualism, from the highest inspiration down to materialization, rests upon the solid rock of facts. They are also the outspoken friends of every medium who is true to his high calling and to the forces in spirit life who seek to use him for the good of others. It is true that they are opposed to counterfeiting and to all kinds of chicanery, and do not hesitate to say so. The N. S. A. is not designed to be a cloak for those who ways are dark and tricks vain; it is rather for those forces on both sides of life who are endeavoring to further human progress and to add to the enlightenment of the race. As such, it is the steadfast friend of every true medium, and the loyal supporter of genuine phenomena of all phases.

I urge that the question of mediumship be given special consideration. Its right development means much to the future of our movement. Last year I recommended that the N. S. A. give its moral and active support to the Psychical Institute, founded by Dr. Paul Gibler, for the investigation and development of mediumship. The transition of that gifted man removes one of our most reliable aids, and doubles our responsibility in the case. It should be our aim to establish an institution of the character of the one founded by Dr. Gibler that has been overthrown by his removal from earth. I respectfully suggest that the work of the N. S. A be outlined with this end in view, and earnestly recommend that this convention urge the re-establishment of the home circle, so popular in the earlier years of Spiritualism, as the safest and best means to that end. Let us prove to the world that we cherish mediumship by sustaining our mediums; let us give them the most favorable conditions for development, and aid them in their noble work. As the sybils and oracles of old were protected from the storms of life, so let us guard our modern prophets, that they may become blessings to their fellowmen in all quarters of the globe. All honor to true mediumship, through which the light of spiritual truth is thrown upon the souls of men! At this point I am constrained to recommend that the methods of work, the aims, objects and accomplishments of the organization known as the Mediums' National Protective Association, of which W. L. Jessup, of Indiana, was the first president, be duly investigated, and a report submitted to the next convention.

SCHOOLS.

As a means to the higher psychical and educational development of mediums and speakers, schools are absolutely necessary. This convention cannot speak too strongly in favor of institutions of this kind, and every possible effort should be made to multiply their number throughout the land. I once more recommend that the Seminary at Belvidere, N. J., and the Spiritualist Training School at Lily Dale, N. Y., be given the hearty endorsement of this body, and the earnest moral support of all Spiritualists. The Bush Sisters at Belvidere have struggled against heavy odds for some years, and it is to be hoped that endowments may be secured in the near future for this worthy institution. The seminary is healthfully located, and is an ideal spot for a school for sensitives. The importance of the school at LilyDale cannot be overestimated. Mr. Moses Hull, Mr. A. J. Weaver, and their co-workers, have labored earnestly to make it an institution of value to embryo platform speakers, and they have rendered our cause good service by so doing. The school and its promoters deserve well at the hands of all progressive Spiritualists.

SPIRITUALISTIC LITERATURE.

From year to year I have urged upon the delegates to our National Conventions the importance of preserving the literature of Spiritualism in some durable manner, and venture to repeat that suggestion at that point. I feel that at least one copy of every book ever published in the interests of Spiritualism, likewise one copy of every book issued in opposition to it, should be in the library of the N. S. A. I can conceive of no better way of providing an authentic history of our literature and a record of our authors. The complete files of all Spiritualist papers, from 1849 down to the present time, should be in the library of this Association. Progress has been made in this direction during the past year, but there is yet much work to be performed. I therefore recommend that the incoming board of trustees be instructed to continue the efforts of past years, that the files of all Spiritualistic journals may be obtained, properly bound, and duly placed in the archives of our Association. An appropriation of a sum not to exceed one hundred and fifty dollars, a portion of which is yet unexpended, for the purpose in question, was made three years ago. It will be a matter of economy to apply the unexpended balance, and even a sum additional, for this good work, as it will be of material benefit to the future historian of our movement, as well as to the students of our own day, in search of reliable information.

HISTORY OF SPIRITUALISM.

At three former conventions this subject has been briefly argued in the report of your president. It is a matter of vital interest to every Spiritualist in America, hence needs additional mention here. Last year Mr. Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y., was elected historian, with the proviso that he should be directed to enter upon his duties when the special history fund was large enough to warrant such action. I regret to report that this special fund has not received even one dollar additional during the past year. Five gentlemen have privately informed me that they would give two hundred dollars each to this fund, provided Mr. Howe was made chief historian, whenever the N. S. A. was ready to act in the matter. The work of completing the Mayer Fund occupied so much time, and was so poorly sustained, that it was not deemed wise to make any particular effort in regard to the History Fund. The question, therefore, is before you in precisely the same condition that it was last year, with this addition—a historian has been chosen to do the work when the cash is in hand to pay him for his services. Our veteran workers are rapidly passing to the higher life. It is to them that we must look for authentic information with regard to the men and women who upheld the banner of Spiritualism in the earlier years of its history. One of our veteran workers has been elected to an office that was created by our last convention, and no provision has been made to set him at work. It will take time and money to prepare a history worthy of the name. The work of Mrs. Emma Hardinge-Britten is good in many respects, but it is sadly incomplete as it is, and stops with the year 1869. It needs correction and completion. I recommend that steps be taken at this convention to swell the History Fund, and that the incoming board of trustees be instructed to make the history of Spiritualism a matter of special interest throughout the coming year. I also urge that one or more assistants be provided for Mr. Howe, if needed, the preference to be given to such able writers as Dr. Dean Clarke and Fred L. H. Willis.

N. S. A. CONVENTION

PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

Under this caption your president last year urged a closer union of effort between the N. S. A., and the Society for Psychical Research. I am impelled to renew that recommendation at this convention. Our friends of the Psychical Research have for many years been doing a work that the Spiritualists ought to have done for themselves and the cause they love. That society is still endeavoring to present the grand truths of psychism to the world, through the evidence of scientific fact. The majority of its members are friendly to Spiritualism and willing to co-operate with us in the work of presenting psychic facts to our fellow-men. From the time Prof. James of Harvard first suggested a union of forces on the part of those who are interested in psychism, down to the present day, I have ardently hoped that the Spiritualists of America would awaken to the necessity of demonstrating their truths to the religious and scientific worlds. Thus far they have multiplied their phenomena until their evidence has become cumulative; but they have made no effort to reduce their facts to orderly form, nor have they published the same for the enlightenment of the masses. This important work has been done and is still being carried forward by the Society for Psychical Research. By co-operating with that body we can make Spiritualism of great service through the opening of our storehouse of facts to our friends and at the same time prove to the world that ours is an educational movement rather than the outgrowth of the emotions, designed for amusement rather than instruction. I appeal to the delegates to this convention to make it possible for the truths of Spiritualism to be demonstrated by Spiritualists as well as by outsiders who are connected with the Society for Psychical Research. An alliance with that society in amity and spirit will be productive of great good to our cause.

A PSYCHIC QUARTERLY.

As a means to advance psychic science in this country, I renew my recommendation of last year that, as soon as practical, a psychic quarterly, of the same general character as W. T. Stead's "Borderland," be established by the N. S. A.

SPIRITUALISM FOR CHILDREN.

The future growth and permanency of Spiritualism naturally depends upon the children of the Spiritualists of to-day. Something should be done for the children by this convention, and I ask you to consider well this important subject.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

The Declaration of Principles adopted at our last annual convention has given rise to a great deal of criticism on the part of both the friends and opponents of the N. S. A. In many instances those who criticised the action of that convention adversely were in favor of a declaration of some kind, but wanted one of their own making, or none at all at that time. Some Spiritualists who have never attended one of our conventions are publicly urging the repeal of last year's code, and the adoption of something more comprehensive—at least, to them. Others, many of whom are veterans in the service of Spiritualism, are vigorously defending the present declaration, and urging that it be retained in its present form. Whatever may be the action of this convention, I feel warranted in saying that the adoption of a code of principles at our last gathering was a wise and highly beneficial step.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Two amendments to our constitution are offered for your consideration, to which you are earnestly requested to give your thoughtful attention. They change in a radical manner the working machinery of the N. S. A. One of them is the proposition to make the meetings of this Association biennial instead of annual, as they are at present.

The other amendment that so vitally concerns the mechanism of this organization is the one that purposes making individual members of the N. S. A. for a period of five years, or for life, upon the payment of twenty-five, or one hundred dollars in money.

In the N. S. A. five-year memberships are substituted for honorary memberships, and life members must pay one hundred dollars into our treasury in order to become such. This will give them the right to vote at our every convention, and give them equal power with the delegates from our chartered locals.

THE FINANCIAL QUESTION.

I have already adverted to this important topic in my references to the Mayer Fund. If it has taken thirteen months to raise a trifle over nine thousand dollars for such a noble purpose, it is evident that it will be no easy task to keep the full sum in our treasury when the fund is completed. Ways and means for the creation of a permanent income for the N. S. A. must be devised by you. Comparisons are said to be odious, yet it is well for us to contrast our own work with that of our Unitarian brethren during the past years. The A. U. A. has three hundred and thirty-seven churches affiliated with it. From those churches it received over sixty-one thousand dollars during the past year. From life memberships, special donations by Sunday-schools and individuals, over fourteen thousand more; from bequests by will and gifts, sixty thousand more; from the income of the funded investments, some sixteen thousand more, making a total of over one hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars as an income for the year.

The N. S. A. has two hundred and twenty-five societies connected with it. From these societies, from individual donations, special gifts, and the labor of the president, the N. S. A. has had an income of less than ten thousand dollars in cash. The Spiritualists of this country outnumber the Unitarians three to one. The latter have seventy-five years of organization against only seven years for the former. Perhaps the financial difference between the two bodies can be accounted for through the lack of organization on our part; yet it does seem as if one hundred and fifty thousand Spiritualists might make at least one-half as good a showing as fifty thousand Unitarians. It may be urged that the Unitarians are all people of great wealth. Such is not the case. It is true that they have people of wealth among them, but in no greater proportion than do the Spiritualists. Many Spiritualists are indeed poor in purse, and so are many Unitarians. The people of small means among the Unitarians love their religion as devotedly as do their wealthier brethren, and give accordingly. Among the Spiritualists, love for Spiritualism is perhaps felt, but it certainly is not often expressed. Some there are in our ranks who give beyond their means, but they are the exceptions and not the rule.

On several former occasions I have recommended the appointment of special financial agents to make house-to-house canvasses for funds for the N. S. A. This method has been quite successful in several instances, as is proved by the example of Miss Buckwalter, of Royersford, Pa. Her success is ample proof that the same plan would be of infinitely greater value if tried upon a larger scale. I yet have faith in the plan named, therefore I recommend that at least twelve reliable persons be appointed by the incoming president, and sent out as solicitors of funds for our treasury. I again recommend that the special missionary sent out to assist our struggling local societies, be instructed to make special efforts to reach individual friends of our cause in the same way.

REFORM WORK.

Something should be said by this convention upon the reform issues of the day. I urge action upon the subject of capital punishment. It is a relic of barbarism, and every Spiritualist owes it to our cause to labor with might and main to secure its abolition. The question of the age at which young girls can legally consent to their own ruin, is one in which every delegate to this convention should feel a lasting interest. It is one of the giant evils of the times and should be dealth with in no uncertain manner. Social purity, political integrity, industrial improvements, equal suffrage for men and women, the initiative and referendum, protection for the youth of our country, temperance in all things, the abolition of war, the maintenance of international peace, opposition to medical monopoly, the administration of justice, class legislation and kindred reforms are all questions of moment to all lovers of liberty. I recommend that this convention, through its committee on resolutions, proclaim to the world its position upon all of these great questions and all other issues that effect the welfare of our fellow-men.

PARIS SPIRITUALIST CONGRESS.

An International Congress of Spiritualists was held in Paris, France, Sept. 15 to 24, A. D. 1900, S. E. 53. To that Congress the N. S. A. was invited to send delegates, and the last annual convention directed that your president should appoint representatives from among those Spiritualists whom he knew would visit the Paris Exposition. Accordingly, Mrs. Addie L. Ballou, of San Francisco, Cal., Mons. Carlos Libert, of Detroit, Mich., and Dr. Dean Clarke, of Boston, Mass were duly commissioned as delegates. Both Mrs. Ballou and Mr. Libert attended the Congress, but Dr. Clarke was obliged to return to America before that body had assembled. As yet no report has been received from the N. S. A. representatives, but there is every reason to believe that they attended to their duty faithfully, and that they will render a just and true account of their stewardships. No expense accrues to the N. S. A. on account of these efficient envoys.

A SUGGESTION.

In view of the fact that the Mayer Fund will be filled ere this convention closes, and of the other associate fact that Mr. Mayer will deed the present headquarters of the N. S. A. to this association, as soon as the fund is completed, I venture to suggest that it would be wise to dedicate one room in that Home to the investigation of all psychic phenomena.

GIFTS.

At this point I wish to acknowledge two gifts of real estate to the N. S. A. during the past year. Brother J. D. Munger has given one hundred and sixty acres of land in Scott Co., Kansas, to our association, on account of the Mayer Fund, while Brother E. A. Smith has also deeded two lots at Lake Pleasant, Mass., to the same worthy purpose. These gentlemen have set their brethren throughout the nation a noble example, and have earned the sincere thanks of every friend of co-operation for their generosity. It is to be hoped that dozens of Spiritualists may be inspired to follow in their footsteps in the near future. I must also call your attention to the generosity of Mr. Samuel I. Fronce, an octogenarian New England Spiritualist, who gave eighteen hundred dollars in cash to the Mayer Fund. Mr. Fronce earned his competency by the "sweat of his brow," having been a working-man all through his life. Out of his hard earnings he saved enough to enable him to do something for his religion, and at the same time, keep want from his own door, in all forms. This man is a true-blue Spiritualist—one who believes in Spiritualism in the fullest sense of the word, for he is willing to seal his devotion by dividing his means in his old age that our good cause may be sustained. I ask that special recognition be given to the three gentlemen above named for the noble example they have set their brethren in this nation.

TREASURER MAYER.

Let me devote one paragraph at least to our honored treasurer, Theodore J. Mayer. It is to him we owe the inspiration of the Mayer Fund. Realizing as but few Spiritualists have, the great value of the N. S. A., Mr. Mayer resolved that it should have the means at hand with which to do its work. With him to resolve is to do, and he at once conceived the idea of giving the present headquarters of the N. S. A. to this body for its permanent home. Recognizing the law of reciprocity, he asked the Spiritualists of the nation to meet him half-way, by giving as a body less than he gave alone to the cause. He was not satisfied with that proposition, but gave five hundred dollars to the fund he asked the people to raise. He stands forth as one of the most devoted friends of Spiritualism found in the form to-day. It is to him that the N. S. A. will owe much of its future success. His pocket-book, heart and soul were all converted together. He needs no encomiums in words from me. His deeds speak for him, and constitute a monument to a noble, unselfish life.

CONCLUSION.

This convention completes a term of seven years of service for your present president. I cannot close this paper without expressing my gratitude to the many friends who have stood faithfully by me during that period. The cause of the N. S. A. has always been most dear to me, and to-day I am as deeply interested, aye, even more so, in its welfare than ever before. Through its mediumship great good has already accrued to Spiritualism, and by its means our cause will go on from success unto success. It is the one hope of the future usefulness and prosperity of our movement. Let us cherish our N. S. A., and seek by every honorable means to rally all Spiritualists around our glorious gold-and-white banner of truth and purity. I can only say to my friends, east, west, north and south, "I thank you, one and all," for the repeated assurances of your confidence and esteem, for your many helpful thoughts and timely aid, for the tender memories of past associations, and for your generous responses to every appeal in behalf of the N. S. A. and the cause of co-operation that I have ever made during the seven years now gone from us forever. Let us face the new year with courage, and resolve that the work of the past years shall not have been in vain. Let us go from this place filled with the inspiration that is born of nobility of purpose, and make this day an epoch in our lives, even as it is in the history of the organization in whose interests we are here assembled.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

HARRISON D. BARRETT,
President National Spiritualists' Association of the U. S. A. and Dominion of Canada.

SPECIAL REPORT OF FIRST ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS OF PHILADELPHIA.

To the Officers and Delegates of the National Spiritualists Association in Convention Assembled, Greeting:—The past year our meetings have been extremely successful from an educational standpoint. We were fortunate in securing the services of Dr. N. F. Ravlin for the entire year, who will also serve us this season. During our session of eight months, we held three meetings each Sunday, the Progressive Lyceum and Young People's Meeting preceding the regular afternoon service.

We find the best results come from having a settled speaker, and recommend that other societies try the same method.

We have just received a gift from one of our oldest members of seventy-two acres of farm land. This old gentleman is eighty-eight years of age and was for many years an earnest member. We have also been made—as has been mentioned before—the legatees of property to the amount of $30,000. This was to come to us as a Building Fund at the passing out of the heirs who are to receive annuities. They, the heirs, were strictly enjoined not to contest the will under penalty of losing their yearly income. The will was probated and we heard nothing further until we were served with notice that suit was about to be brought and an attempt made to break the will. We immediately secured good counsel to defend us. Suit was brought and the suit was sustained, but an appeal was taken by the heirs and we are expecting another contest in a higher court. To defend a will requires funds, and knowing that there is a special defense fund for sustaining the wills and bequests of Spiritualists, known as the Babe Will Defense Fund, which can be used for no other purpose, we respectfully ask that as we are the oldest Spiritualist Society in the world, holding continuous meetings practically since 1841, first as a Psychical Research, afterwards called Society for the Study of Nature's Divine Revelations, by Andrew Jackson Davis, and finally merging into the First Association of Philadelphia, and hold as such charter No. 4 of the N. S. A., that you will appropriate such sum from that fund as will help us meet the expense of these suits. It would indeed be unfortunate if we should lose the legacy with which we hope to build a Memorial Hall to the friend who so kindly remembered us. This is what we are instructed to do by the terms of the will.

Therefore, we hope this body will take favorable action on this question, and vote an appropriation to this society to be used for this purpose. We hope that in the future there will be more personal interest taken by the officers and members of the Board of Trustees of the N. S. A. in this Association.

We extend any and all of them a most cordial invitation to visit us at any time. Yours fraternally,

CAPT. F. J. KEFFER, Pres.
F. H. MORRILL, Sec'y.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DELEGATES' REPORTS.

Mr. Chairman and Delegates of the Convention:

Your committee reports that out of 200 societies chartered by the N. S. A., only 40 have filed reports. We think that this is mainly due to the present form of calling for statistics. We therefore recommend a revision of the same, or substitute brief written reports, embodying such statistics as can be furnished by each society.

Local Societies—Membership.—It is very discouraging to note the weak condition of some of the societies numerically and financially. Of the forty reports referred to us for consideration, six have given no information excepting the names of officers. Others state the numbers of enrolled members to be 7, 8, 9, 11, 12 and 14, and some hold less than six meetings during the year. Seven societies give their membership from 20 to 30, and five from 40 to 75.

Financial Condition.—Some of the societies report their financial recipts for the year to be less than $10. Several give their receipts from $25 to $100 for the year. We recommend the consideration of this question to the convention, as it is the opinion of your committee that no local society except in active service should be entitled to representation on the floor of this convention.

Encouraging Features.—In spite of the deficiencies enumerated above, we have many encouraging features to report. Eight societies state that their financial receipts range from $100 to $700, while at least six societies have expended from $1,200 to $2,300 in order to maintain the year's work. Two societies have temples of their own. Very few report a balance in the treasury.

We recommend a fuller report of the work of each chartered society, as from the meagre details furnished this committee it is very difficult to estimate the yearly work of the chartered societies, and that where a proxy must be appointed, direct instructions be handed to such proxy and that such proxy be instructed to carry out the wishes of the society represented as far as possible.

Children's Lyceum.—Two Children's Lyceums connected with the First Association of Philadelphia and the Children's Progressive Lyceum No. 1 of Boston, Mass., send encouraging reports of the year's work. The Boston Spiritual Lyceum No. 2 also sends in an interesting report of their Sunday sessions. This lyceum work being vital to the present and future of Spiritualism, your committee recommends that the welfare of the lyceum cause be referred to the National Lyceum Association.

Camp-Meeting Associations.—The Mississippi Valley Spiritualists Association is the only Camp Association filing a statement. It reports a very prosperous season, interesting meetings and an increase in members. Etna, Verona, Madison and other camps hold charters. These camps have done much efficient work in connection with the N. S. A. and we regret not being able to give them due credit.

At Onset camp $400 was collected, yet owing to the form of organization existing there, they cannot become auxiliary to the N. S. A. Your committee recommends that the secretary be instructed to issue a circular letter impressing upon all chartered societies the importance of rendering a full report of their work.

State Associations.—All of the reports rendered from the State Associations are encouraging. Minnesota, Massachusetts, Michigan, Connecticut and Wisconsin all state that their prospects are good. New York rendered through its president a verbal account of the good work done by the state association.

The Minnesota Association is the Banner Association for the year. Nearly $2,000 was raised during the year and a large portion of it was expended in missionary work. We feel that the flourishing condition of this state association is mainly due to the efficient labors of the state missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Kates, and that this is one of the strongest arguments that can be offered in favor of keeping missionaries in the field. Your committee feels that the labors of such missionaries as Mr. and Mrs. Kates and Mr. and Mrs. Sprague cannot be too highly appreciated and recommend that they be accorded the thanks of this convention.

The Massachusetts State Association reports that they have accomplished much missionary work in that state. They hold special meetings in good halls, with free admission to the public. The plan of organization of this association is in the opinion of your committee one of the best for the interest of propaganda work.

The Ohio State Association reports having held a number of mass-meetings in different parts of the state, and that they are prospering.

The California State Association has also accomplished much efficient work. They hold their annual convention in San Jose, also anniversary services in San Francisco. The board of trustees defended the workers against taxation and unjust legislation. At San Jose a building has been purchased and dedicated through what is known as the "Sleeper Trust Fund." This report was given by the delegate from the California State Association in the absence of official report of the secretary.

President's Report.—Your committee has carefully read that portion of the President's report which was submitted to this committee for consideration. We find that the deplorable condition of the societies as reported direct is verified by the president's report.

Your committee favors the adoption of the President's recommendation that a special missionary be appointed to visit the societies now in existence and especially those chartered by the N. S. A., for the purpose of assisting them in their work and that such missionaries be instructed to solicit donations from friends known to be interested in the cause of Spiritualism, and help strengthen the societies instead of depleting their treasuries.

Your committee requests that this convention adopt the President's recommendation and appoint such special missionary.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

M. E. CADWALLADER, Chairman.

REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS.

A goodly number of delegates assembled Monday evening in the parlors of the Forest City House, and were welcomed in a short speech by Loe F. Prior, the present speaker for one of the local societies here.

Responses were made by President Barrett, Mrs. Longley, Mr. Mayer, Dr. Peebles, Moses and Mattie Hull, Mrs. Lillie, Willard J. Hull, Mrs. Loring, J. B. Hatch, G. W. Kates, Mrs. Twing and John W. Ring. At the conclusion of the program there was a general handshaking and renewing of acquaintances both old and new.

Dr. Peebles, with snowy hair and beard, and looking like a veritable patriarch, still insists that he is quite a young man, and is still determined to round out a century of useful life.

"Our Moses," fresh from new victories, was looking and seemingly feeling as fresh and vigorous as usual, though traveling many thousand miles and making continual speeches for the last six weeks.

The many friends of Dr. Nellie Mosher were rejoiced that she had so far recovered as to enable her to be present, also for privilege of greeting Mrs. Barrett, while the Barrett Baby, in the hands of J. B. Hatch, was very much in evidence as the youngest member of the Boston Progressive Lyceum.

FIRST DAY—TUESDAY.

The convention assembled in the beautiful Chamber of Commerce hall at 10 a. m., Tuesday, October 16, with President Barrett in the chair. Exercises were opened with congregational singing, "Shout the Glad Tidings," led by Moses Hull. Addresses of welcome by President Hayes, of the South Side Society, and by President Black, of the Ohio State Association. Response by President Barrett, followed with short speeches by Mr. Bond, Dr. Peebles, W. J. Hull, Moses and Mattie Hull, D. P. Dewey, G. W. Kates, W. H. Bach, Mrs. Warne, Mrs. Ressegue, Mrs. Twing and Mrs. R. S. Lillie.

Mrs. Longley, secretary of the N. S. A., followed and feelingly referred to our ascended sister, Mrs. Hilligoss, of Anderson, Ind., stating the fact that just before her passing out she desired that her watch and chain (a valuable one) should be sold and the proceeds devoted as her contribution to the Mayer Fund. Mrs. Longley considered the watch well worth one hundred dollars, and suggested if a purchaser could be found the money would be turned over to the N. S. A. Maggie Gaule promptly accepted the offer and the matter was disposed of.

Appointment of committees and rules followed.

The report of committee on rules was accepted seriatim on motion of G. W. Kates. Report on rules accepted as a whole with the exception that a change was made in the closing hour of the morning session. The report of this committee necessitated the temporary suspension of Sec. 2, Art. 1, of the by-laws, as the report provided for the election of officers on Thursday instead of waiting for the last hours of the convention as heretofore.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Committees on ways and means and on resolutions were appointed, followed by reading the annual report of President Barrett. Motion of Mrs. Cadwallader to consider the report seriatim was amended on motion of Judge Dunn and referred to committee.

Reports of secretary and treasurer were referred to the auditing committee. At this point in the proceedings, Alonzo Thompson, of Nebraska, took the floor and made a rousing speech in behalf of completing the Mayer Fund. He cited the fact that life was a very uncertain affair (himself and Judge Dunn being mixed up in the railroad wreck on the Lake Shore, Sunday night) and insisted that the remaining amount be raised right there and then, which was done in very short order, and we are now assured of a permanent home for the N. S. A.

Appointment of committees on amendments, our arisen friends, delegates' reports and auditing followed, when the meeting adjourned.

EVENING SESSION.

A most excellent program was arranged for the evening. Invocation by Mary T. Longley; overture, "Twilight," by Prof. Fessler; lecture, "Spiritualism and its Achievements During the Last Century," by Mrs. H. L. P. Ressegue, who has not lost any of her old-time fire and eloquence. She was followed by Mrs. Flora Russell in a soprano solo which was beautifully rendered.

W. H. Bach gave a short but entertaining speech on the Literature of Spiritualism, and was followed by John W. Ring, of Galveston, who commanded the closest attention of the entire audience. Tenor solo by Wesley Koppe, followed with spirit messages by Zaida B. Kates; soprano solo, Zetta Lois Else; messages by Margaret Gaule, and violin solo by Prof. Anson W. Evans, concluded the program for the evening.

SECOND DAY—WEDNESDAY.

A communication from the Business Men's League of Cleveland, tendering all delegates of the convention a trolley ride to the various points of interest, was accepted for Thursday morning.

The proposition to change constitution relating to the election of trustees, was referred to committee and was followed by a general discussion regarding state associations.

Reports of special financial agents were then considered, followed by discussion on ways and means.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Consideration of president's report.

Resolution by Judge Dunn, that the board of trustees are hereby authorized and directed to employ competent, gifted persons (not more than six) to spread the gospel of Spiritualism among the people. That their field of labor shall be specified by the board, as well as their salaries, and to be paid out of the general fund. That their especial duties should be determined by the board, and they shall report to the convention at the next session the result of their labors. Resolution carried.

Quite a long discussion followed on the recommendation of President Barrett to send greetings under seal of this Association to other fraternal organizations, including the W. C. T. U. Upon the vote the motion was lost as to the W. C. T. U., but was sustained as to the Equal Suffrage Association.

It was expressly reiterated that as a body representing the Spiritualists at large, we still declare for every reform movement that has for its object the elevation of humanity, but in view of the fact that past experiences of many of our earnest and best workers have not been of a nature to warrant affiliation with such bodies as the W. C. T. U., that when attempted they have been met with contempt and a spirit of ostracism, it was thought best by a majority to wait until we can affiliate with such organizations upon an equal footing.

A resolution presented by Judge Dunn, that a room be set apart at headquarters of the N. S. A. for the proper investigation of psychic phenomena, was carried.

A telegram was here read by President Barrett, announcing the transition of Mrs. F. C. Stinehart, of Dubuque, Ia., and a fitting response conveying the sympathy of the convention as a body, to friends and relatives, was ordered.

EVENING SESSION.

Another splendid audience assembled and was rewarded by the rendering of a most excellent programme: Invocation, Carrie F. Loring; violin solo, Mrs. Anson W. Evans; soprano solo, Jennie De Long; lecture, Mrs. R. S. Lillie; tenor solo, Wesley Koppe; lecture, Dr. J. M. Peebles; soprano solo, Mrs. Flora E. Russell; soprano solo, Zetta Lois Else.

Spirit messages of a most convincing character were given by F. Corden White and Maggie Gaule.

We are having most beautiful weather, and the general interest in these evening sessions is attested by the fact that notwithstanding a great political demonstration with "Teddy" as an attraction, over seven hundred people found their way to the hall.

THIRD DAY—THURSDAY.

The morning session opened with the reading of communications from Addie L. Ballou, J. C. Underhill, A. A. McIntyre, J. B. Townsend, G. O. B. Ewell, G. W. Burnham, Mary C. Von Kanzler, R. Watrous, and Mayor Rose, of Wilwaukee, who depicted in glowing terms the beauties and advantages of the Cream City as a location for the next convention.

Reports of various committees followed. The proposition to substitute bi-ennial meetings was lost, yearly meetings being deemed necessary for the best good of the association.

The proposition for individual membership, making life members upon the payment of one hundred dollars, and five-year memberships upon the payment of twenty-five dollars, also failed to carry.

Proposed amendments of by-laws, Art. 11, Sec. 2 by inserting after "local associations," the words, "holding state charters," was lost.

Art. 8, Sec. 3, that no person shall be entitled to represent more than one society on the floor of this convention, or be allowed to cast more than one vote upon any question. Carried.

Art. 8, Sec. 8, by adding, "and a brief report of the work accomplished by such society during the year."

Moved and carried that we proceed to cast an informal ballot for president.

This resulted as follows: H. D. Barrett, 67; E. W. Bond, 3; Moses Hull, 2; Judge Dunn, 2; A. J. Weaver, C. L. Stevens, and G. W. Kates, each receiving one vote.

Nominees for vice-president were C. L. Stevens, T. M. Locke, Carrie E. S. Twing, and Moses Hull. This resulted in T. M. Locke receiving 38 votes; C. L. Stevens, 22; Mrs. Twing, 13; Moses Hull, 2. Neither candidate receiving a majority, there was no election. Thos. M. Locke was then elected by acclamation.

Mary T. Longley was re-elected secretary by acclamation.

The present incumbent for treasurer, T. J. Mayer, was considered to be preeminently the right man in the right place, and received the enthusiastic vote of the entire convention.

Four of the old trustees, D. P. Dewey, I. O. I. Evans, Alonzo Thompson, and C. D. Pruden, were re-elected, while C. L. Stevens was elected to fill the place vacated by Mr. Bond, who declined to serve for another term.

The following resolution was presented by Mr. Bond: No officer or trustee, with the exception of the president and secretary, shall draw from or be imbursed from the funds of this association for any expenses incurred by reason of attending the annual conventions of the N. S. A., subsequent to the present. Resolution lost.

EVENING SESSION.

Another fine program was presented for the evening, consisting of ten-minute speeches, by E. W. Sprague, W. M. Lockwood, Mrs. Cadwallader, Oscar A. Edgerly, Jennie B. Hagan-Brown, Thos. Grimshaw and G. W. Kates.

Spirit messages were given by Mrs. Loe F. Prior, Tillie U. Reynolds and C. H. Figuers. They all did excellent work in their line and gave entire satisfaction.

A short interruption occurred in the program for the purpose of allowing Alonzo Thompson to present the further claims of the N. S. A. and soliciting further funds for missionary purposes. This resulted in pledges and collection of nine hundred dollars.

The meeting was an enthusiastic one, and the climax was reached when Mr. Mayer stepped to the front and presented President Barrett with the deed to the new home.

FOURTH DAY—FRIDAY.

The whole forenoon was occupied in listening to reports of committees, as was a portion of the afternoon session. The following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, Modern Spiritualism is the recognition of universal principles operative in nature, immortality a fact in nature, and spirit return and communication the avenue through which immortality is demonstrated, we submit the following resolutions as embodying our position touching topics now uppermost in progressive thought.

Resolved, That Spiritualism teaches that there is a spiritual world of varying grades in co-relation with this world, which is as tangible and real to those living in that world as the earth is to us.

Resolved, That Spiritualism teaches that the event called death is not disastrous, not a penalty for sin, but an event as natural as birth, and calculated to let us into a world of unlimited possibilities.

Resolved That there is a higher system of ethics than has yet been recognized by state or church; that when we look as carefully after those who bake our children's bread and wash and iron their clothing as we do on the system of ethics that we teach them, the oncoming generation will rise to a higher standard of health, morality, and intellectual attainment than the world has yet seen.

Resolved, That as temperance consists in a moderate use of things beneficial, and total abstinence from everything injurious, physical, mental, and moral, is essential to our well-being, we declare that intoxicating liquors, opiates, tobacco, and all unnecessary stimulants should be avoided.

Resolved, That while we are opposed to the existing medical laws which restrict the right to heal the sick and relieve pain, to those only who have passed examination in some of the present schools of medicine, and to all efforts being made to enact so-called medical laws, we would advise all who attempt to treat the sick to become thoroughly acquainted with anatomy, physiology, hygiene, and the general laws of health,

Resolved, That we are opposed to any law or laws in our Constitution, national and state, recognizing any system of faith under the guise of religion.

Resolved that all wars at this stage of human progress are brutal and morally injurious to the welfare of society, and that all international disputes should be settled by boards of arbitration, thus ushering in the era of universal peace on earth, good will to men.

Resolved, That capital punishment is a relic of barbarism, wholly inimical to modern ideas concerning crime causes and their cure. We favor the abolition of the death penalty.

Resolved, That compulsory vaccination is not only unwise, unconstitutional, and un-American, but dangerous to health, causing eczema, erysipelas, cancer, tumors, syphilis, and often death.

Resolved, That as our children are to be our successors in the work of Spiritualism, it is our duty as an association to do something tangible for the children by way of establishing children's progressive lyceums and establishing a paper in the interests of our young people.

Resolved, That as we believe in a larger development for our speakers and platform workers, we should use our influence in every way practicable, both as an association and as individuals, to assist the training schools now established and to establish others when it is practicable to do so.

Resolved, That we view with gratification the awakened interest in the higher inspiration and guidance of the spiritual world, which, under the name of altruism has taken such thorough hold upon numbers of the workers in our cause, and we feel that continued attention directed toward the working forces of altruism is deserved, looking to the amelioration of suffering everywhere. We urge that special meetings be devoted to this purpose amongst our societies, and the proceeds thereof given to the poor.

Resolved, That all of our camp-meeting associations and all other large and continuous gatherings of Spiritualists be requested to devote one day of their time to the consideration of the work of the N. S. A., and that a collection be taken for its benefit; that some officer of the N. S. A. or other deputized person be authorized to represent the N. S. A. at such meeting.

Resolved, That mass conventions be held in conjunction with the several state associations in every state, in such numbers and places as, to the trustees of this association, may seem proper. That in all States where no organization exists mass conventions shall be called and held by the trustees of the N. S. A., as in their judgment shall seem best.

Resolved, That while we rejoice at the good work being done by itinerant lecturers and mediums, and hope to see their numbers and usefulness greatly increased, we rejoice also at the growing conviction among Spiritualists that there should be settled speakers in every place able to sustain them, and that in other places where one society is not able to settle speakers, several societies may invite and settle a speaker, who can divide his time and work among them, thus giving speakers and people better opportunity to co-operate with each other.

Resolved, That some effort should be made to bring Spiritualism more prominently before those who shall visit Buffalo during the Pan-American Exposition. A headquarters and reading-room should be opened, under the charge of some intelligent person, who could answer questions concerning meetings, mediums, speakers, and other such questions as strangers would be liable to ask.

Resolved, That the work and relation the Mediums' Protective Association sustains towards the Spiritualistic movement should be thoroughly understood, to the end that its legitimate efforts receive proper endorsement when the integrity of its basic principles is established and found to be in harmony with the purposes and intent of our progressive philanthropy, and to that end we recommend that a committee be appointed to confer with its executive officers that greater unity of effort may be established.

Carrie E. S. Twing introduced the matter of the Jubilee deficit which still amounts to about a thousand dollars, and after considerable debate, motion was made to refer it to the incoming board, and it was carried.

The following resolution was introduced by Dr. Emma N. Warne: That the Rev. Moses Hull be made the champion of debate and discussion in the field of Modern Spiritualism, under the endorsement of the N. S. A., which was carried.

A proposition and motion by Willard J. Hull, that the salary of Secretary Longley be increased to $1,200, was declined on the part of that little lady for the reason she did not consider the association able to pay that amount. One instance and proof that there are still some people who are not in office simply for all they can get out of it.

On recommendation of G. W. Kates, it was voted to pay her the same salary as the past year, namely, one thousand dollars.

The proposition of G. W. Kates to pay President Barrett the same salary as was paid last year, was carried.

Mrs. R. S. Lillie referred to the generous offer of Dr. A. B. Spinney, of Reed City, Mich., to-wit, that he would care for the weary and worn laborers and the needy among Spiritualists, at his sanitarium, for the very reasonable compensation of five dollars per week, and twenty-five cents additional for washing, and thought his very generous offer should receive consideration erated his offer before the convention erated his offed before the convention and the matter was referred to the incoming board, with power to act.

On motion of G. W. Kates it was decided to revise the constitution and by-laws in accordance with the notes of this convention.

Quite a lively interest was manifested regarding the place of holding the next annual meeting, Washington, D. C., Milwaukee, Wis., and Buffalo, N. Y., setting forth their respective claims for consideration. The result of ballot taken resulted as follows. Washington, 36, while Buffalo and Milwaukee had 11 each.

Reports of secretary and treasurer of the National Lyceum Association were read and adopted.

EVENING SESSION.

The following and final programme was offered for the evening: Invocation, Dr. J. M. Peebles; piano solo, Prof. C. F. Fessler; lecture, Carrie E. S. Twing; contralto solo, Mary E. Akers; lecture, Rev. Moses Hull; soprano solo, Jennie DeLong; messages, Mrs. Zaida B. Kates; soprano solo, Mrs. Flora E. Russell; messages, Maggie Gaule; soprano solo, Zetta Lois Else; contralto solo, Catholic Arraignment of Protestantism.

"The Brothers of Christian Education," at the Paris Exposition, have sent forth a circular by one of its members, in which they arraign Protestantism, as if they, who are Roman Catholics, were exempt from criticism. In their indictment, which they claim was written by a boy of fifteen, occurs among other things the following allegations:

"Protestantism is no religion; it is only a rebellion against all religions. It has none of the marks of religion. It lacks universality in time, place, and in the world. Protestants descended from Luther and Calvin, and indeed from the heretics of the first centuries, who were rightly condemned because they had departed from the teachings of the apostles.

"Protestantism is unfruitful of good works. Even if England does spend millions in mission work and in the free distribution of the Bible, this work does not end in good results.

Protestants have no unity. Their religion is based on the free investigation of the Bible, and everybody interprets the Scriptures to suit his own taste. Its sects are innumerable, and many are ridiculous communions. Protestants no longer believe in the divinity of Christ. In Germany it is forbidden the pastors to preach that Christ is God; and the most learned Protestant theological professors of that country maintain that Jesus Christ never existed.

"Protestantism is thus really no religion at all. It is a source of great immorality, because it teaches that good works are not meritorious, and thus does not give man the motive or the ability to contend against himself and his evil passions and to grow in good works and virtues. Accordingly Protestantism destroys all moral principles."

With a correspondingly clear arraignment of Catholicism from a Protestant standpoint, a very correct opinion could be formed of the demerits of Christianity.

Then would come the scholar and prove that the Catholic mother church is only a slightly revised Roman Paganism; that the daughter, Protestantism, ashamed of the vices and misdeeds of her maternal ancestor, attempted a reform, but had fallen into the same deep mire with the parent, drinking from a common fountain, and absorbing the identical dogmas which had made the mother the disreputable creature she is.

Occasion for Rejoicing.

There are now three great archaeological exploring expeditions engaged making researches in the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris, and along the ancient canal uniting those rivers near their mouth. The French explorers are directing their attention to the buried city of Tello, which they have resurrected and are compelling to reveal their antiquities and a long-forgotten past. The Germans commenced vigorous work in the spring of 1899, on ruins they found in Babylonia. The students of historic beginnings will keep an eye directed to their movements. But the most successful of these expeditions is that under the direction of Prof. Hilprecht, now at work on the palace of the priest-kings of Nippur. This structure has a frontage of 600 feet. Its library of magnificent proportions, written on earthen tablets, not one of which bears a later date than 2,280 years before our era, and which was found buried under 70 feet of rubbish, is absolutely of more practical value to scholars than any discoveries made in Egypt.

Prof. Hilprecht represents America, and is now in the lead of all other investigators, thanks to the Pennsylvania University, in whose service he is laboring. He is positive that evidence is furnished by these discoveries that there was an advanced civilization in that region near 9,000 years ago. It is demonstrated by these discoveries that Egypt was colonized from the East, and that civilization did not originate there, as many have maintained.

All the world has reason to rejoice that these explorations awaited this scientific age, so that truthful translations will be made, instead of garbled and false renderings to make them harmonize with sacred history.

Positively Criminal.

An act the effect of which is to produce crime is criminal of itself and should be suppressed. Sometimes persons with honest intention, but mistaken policy, engage in doing that which culminates in murder. They vindicate themselves under the specious plea that their purpose was praiseworthy, but ignorant of the consequences when they engaged in it, and are blameless, though wholesale murder followed. Such persons may not be amenable in courts of law, their good intention shielding them from punishment; but in the court of conscience they are not only reprehensible, but actually criminal, and if they do not suffer therefor it is because they are steeled by false education to look complacently on their ill-advised acts.

Take the case of the missionaries who enter upon proselyting expeditions to distant and strange peoples. The intention is probably good enough; but, as in the case of China, they have caused a terrible waste of life, and entailed a world of suffering on those who had never wronged them. Had the missionaries been the only persons to suffer it would be another affair. The real victims are the so-called heathen converts and their families. These converts, before conversion, were living in security with their own people. They were protected by law, and their morals were above reproach. They worshiped a God who had extended better protection to their nation, than had been extended to any other nation under the sun; because it had been preserved intact for thousands of years, and had become many times more populous than any other nation on the globe. True, they did not worship the son of a Judean peasant, neither did they credit him with being the equal of the Creator and possessing the attributes of a God. They loved Buddha, however, a character worthy of any man's esteem, both for his noble life and exalted teachings. But this did not give satisfaction to outside agitators. It was necessary to dragoon them into a new faith, to furnish employment for a body of zealots. The result:

These native Christians assumed superiority on their conversion over their fellows, and became egotistical and arrogant. They talked and acted as Christian bigots always talk and act, as if superior to common mortals, because they held special relations with God.

Human nature may tolerate such a silly claim for a time, but ultimately it becomes oppressive and culminates in ignoring the assumption, and perhaps in giving the aggressor a lesson. This is just what was done in China. Classed as Pagans, represented as incurring divine displeasure, and certain of eternal torment after death, while their ancestors whom they adored, they were assured were companioned with devils in the unseen world. They could not brook the insult. Their government had by the duplicity and knavery of the missionaries opened their doors to these false teachers, and seeing no redress from the constituted authorities they attempted to right the wrongs themselves.

Fanatics in their own faith these Boxers, as we call them, took the power into their own hands, and did what angry mobs always do, became the aggressors.

Were not the missionaries, then, in view of these facts, the direct cause of all this waste of life in China? And were not all those who innocently contributed their dimes and dollars to aid the missionary cause somewhat responsible for the terrible outcome?

Down there in Sierra Leone, in Africa, there was recently a parallel case in a smaller way to that in China. Rev. Mr. Cain, three assistants, Rev. Mr. Clements, his wife, and all the children of his school, with more than 300 Christianized natives, were slaughtered by the natives. Such violence is liable to occur anywhere, and at any time where the "I am more holy than thou" religion prevails.

The Cost of Christian Converts.

The London Times lately published a report of Christian progress in China, as made by its special Pekin correspondent, Dr. Morrison. In 1893, it says, substantially, there were 1,511 Protestant missionaries in the Kingdom, and there were 3,127 Chinese conversions, at a total cash cost of £350,000, or $1,750,000. This makes each convert cost $559.64. But the worst feature from a Christian standpoint is yet to be told: "Very few of the 3,127 converts gained at this enormous expense were genuine believers." They embraced Christianity for $3 a month.

Following along this train of thought and facts furnished by Dr. Morrison, Mr. Arnold White comes to the front with the statement that $350,000,000 have been spent by Protestants in 100 years in Christian missions. He says the account of the success of those missions is based on the interested statements of those missionaries themselves, else from their supporters. Disinterested parties controvert the claims of those missionaries. He proposes the appointment of an independent commission to the chief foreign mission centers, to ascertain the actual facts. The project seems a worthy one. It ought to be known with certainty whether the pennies filched from children, and placed in the missionary box, are really used to evangelize the heathen, or are only used to supply sumptuous homes, with a retinue of hired servants in the guise of converts, at $3 a month, to wait on the missionaries and obey their every wish. Truth never suffers by rigid investigation.

A Mohammedan Census.

The Sultan of Turkey has just completed a census of Islam. He finds the number of Mohammedans in the world is 196,500,000. Of these 18,000,000 are in Turkey in Europe, 99,000,000 in western Asia and Hindoostan, 20,000,000 in China, 36,000,000 in northern and northeastern Africa, and 23,000,000 are scattered in other parts of the world.

If these figures are correct Mohammedans are more numerous than Roman Catholics, nearly double the Greek church, and are more numerous by many millions than are the Protestants. They do not seem to be a quarrelsome people, for there are reported twenty millions of them in China.

Expunge the accounts of man's inhumanity to man from the world's history, and a small volume would contain the rest.

It is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in providence and turn upon the poles of truth.—Bacon.

Error Never Sleeps.

A Mrs. E. Blanchard Cook, president of the Chicago Women's Educational Union, has compiled a book of selected Bible Readings, which interested parties are trying to introduce into the schools of Chicago, and we presume elsewhere, for reading lessons. It is claimed the book is valuable because of its ethical teaching. Its great worth, of course, rests upon the claim that the extracts are made from the "Word of God," thus carrying a falsehood to the minds of pupils before they have taken a single lesson. Then they would be introduced to the Lord's Prayer, to the Ten Commandments, and to selections from Proverbs as emanations from God; and yet they want the authorities who have charge of the public schools, to understand it is ethics, not religion, which is taught in the book.

The Bible in the schools supported by taxes on all the people, would be a gross outrage, and cannot be tolerated. Were it to be introduced, the first question would be: What Bible, or extracts from the same, is to be used? The Catholics will repulse the King James translation; the Protestants won't submit to the Douay translation; the Jews have their own rendering of the Old Testament; some of the sects would want the late Revised Edition; and a multitude of people don't want any of them, fully conscious the morals of the present age are infinitely better than those of two thousand or more years ago; besides we have living witness acquainted with our schools, and the children to be taught in them, who are a thousand times better qualified to supply present needs than was any priest of any preceding age. Besides this, they will not be compelled to impose on the world, and say the book was God-inspired, to make it acceptable to those who may use it.

As we write we notice the School Board seems to consider Bible Reading in the schools of Chicago as settled by its past action, and it has no disposition to revive an old wrangle. It is probable it will act officially on the question before we go to press, and we trust in harmony with its former judgment.

They Want to Go Back.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is in session in St. Louis as we write. The returned missionaries expressed an earnest desire to go back to China and continue their work, but they want the armies of the world to continue there to protect them in their mission.

If these zealots wish to wear a martyr's crown no one has a right to oppose them. It is a suicidal act, and our observation has been that if people ambitious to die can't find one method to "shuffle off the mortal coil" they will find another, and the world is not a serious loser by the exit; but as an American citizen we do protest, and most earnestly, against using the military and naval arm of this government to the propagation of creeds, either at home or abroad.

The fathers of the Republic wisely determined to divorce Church and State. They expressly provided in the Constitution that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," and declared "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office."

Guarding the people at home against the wiles of priestcraft it was never supposed the government would be asked to protect them in proselyting missions abroad. But that is now asked as if it was a natural right.

Preaching and Labor Won't Mix.

Though Paul was a tent-maker, and worked at his trade while he preached—see Acts 18:3—the Methodists, in Conference in this city on the 9th instant, refused to admit John B. Armstrong, a stenographer, to the ministry, he desiring to continue his short-hand work a portion of the time, giving the residue to evangelical labor. The Journal, mentioning the fact, says:

"The Conference decided positively that in the opinion of its members secular and religious work would not mix, and by a good majority the application for membership was rejected."

Paul is a back number. He worked for a living, and advised wine drinking, and a great many other foolish things that would mortify Methodists if preached from modern pulpits.

Hurry Forward the Missionaries.

Dispatches from China report a rebellion has broken out in the southwestern provinces of that empire, of a very serious character. Five missions have been destroyed at Han King Chau. Besides warring against missionaries and foreigners in general, the rebels are resisting the reigning dynasty. It is claimed 100,000 soldiers are needed at once to put down the rebellion. The allied forces are thus brought in contact with a new enemy which will tax their resources very heavily.

Those missionaries so zealous to Christianize the Celestials, should rush right in as quickly as possible, for "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."

Score One for the Methodists.

Three times the use of tobacco in its various forms came before the late Methodist Conference in Chicago. Once it declined to admit to the ministry a candidate who used the pernicious narcotic in any form. Finally a resolution was introduced and adopted, by practically a unanimous vote, prohibiting all preachers, including those of advanced years, from its use.

Spiritual lecturers, and particularly those who love to have Reverend attached to their names, here is a lesson, and a good one, you can borrow from the orthodox. Don't let them lead you in practical reforms.

France Has Taken a Forward Step.

The French government has suppressed the historic Red Mass, celebrated in the Saint Chapel, and the formal opening of the law courts by cardinals. It has also declared against the advancement of officers to higher grades who practice religious flummery in Catholic churches. The design seems to be to secularize the government and all persons connected with it.

This is clearly the correct position for any government. Let the people worship as they will, or not worship at all, with the clear understanding that the government has nothing whatever to do with the matter, its mission to insure to every subject however feeble, ample protection against wrong from the hands of the rich, the strong, or those criminally disposed.

Mystified by a Beautiful Woman in Black.

Strange occult manifestations are occurring everywhere. The latest and most striking is related by the Cleveland Plaindealer. It appears from the account given that until last Sunday Mayor Farley's stenographer, Edward H. Ellenwood, didn't believe in ghosts and things supernatural. He does now, though, for he is confident that only a spook could have been responsible for a strange experience he avers he had in Detroit last Sunday.

Saturday night Ellenwood took the D. & C. boat for the City of the Straits. He spent the early morning hours after his arrival in a ferry ride across the river to the Queen's domain and in trying to figure out what time it was from the City Hall timepiece and the Postoffice clock. As nearly as he ascertained from the difference of opinion existing between these chronometers it was about 10 a. m. when he started to call on his aunt, Mrs. Charles C. Grece, who lives in part of a large, white brick house at the corner of Lafayette street and Fourth avenue.

When Ellenwood reached his aunt's home he drummed briskly on the panels of his relative's front door. There was no response, although there seemed to be someone inside. He knocked once or twice more and then stepped to a front window, through which he peered. Pacing back and forth inside was a beautiful woman, clad in mournful black. It was not his aunt nor his cousin, Mrs. Vincent Haylor, who is his aunt's guest at present. Back and forth the figure paced, paying no attention to his knock at the door or to his greetings. Somewhat puzzled, Ellenwood finally left.

It was perhaps 4 o'clock that afternoon when he again called at his aunt's home. He knocked at the door. Once more there was no response, nor was he able to attract the attention of the mysterious woman in black, whom he is positive he again saw pacing tirelessly back and forth from the reception room into another apartment, the latter brilliantly lighted. He was told by one or two little boys who noticed him at the door that his aunt and her daughter had gone away. The boys were positive there was no one at home, yet there was the mysterious woman. Ellenwood hastily scribbled a note, stating he would call later, and pushed it under the door.

That evening about 10 o'clock Ellenwood called again. He noticed, he says, as he mounted the steps that his aunt's home was brilliantly lighted—fairly flooded with light. He knocked one, two, three times, and there was no response. Stepping to the window Ellenwood solemnly declares he saw the same mysterious woman, this time clad from head to foot in garments dazzling white and shining with weird, ghostly radiance. By her side stood a young man. The woman's face, he asserts, was half hidden by a filmy veil. She was very beautiful.

This much Ellenwood says he observed before the lights were suddenly extinguished. Puzzled, he turned toward the door again. He raised his hand to knock again, and quickly the shimmering light flashed up. Then he saw through the parted curtains at the glass in the front door the head and shoulders of the wraith—Ellenwood is sure the presence was a supernatural being. Back and forth the figure swayed. Then the lights faded. Once more they flashed up and the eerie vision unnerved Ellenwood. Once more the radiance quickly changed to gloom and a third time it quivered back again, more brilliant than before. Then came two long, quivering groans, Ellenwood asserts. Quickly the light vanished and at the same time something smote Ellenwood on the side of the head.

Half dazed, entirely mystified, Ellenwood staggered to the street. He ran up the sidewalk a few steps, meanwhile looking backward toward the haunted home. As he did so he almost ran into a couple of boys. They, too, had seen the apparition and were as much terrified as he. Then a man and woman came along and Ellenwood told his experiences. They advised him to talk to the people in the other half of the house. Dr. McConnell occupies the premises jointly with Ellenwood's aunt. He was positive Mrs. Grece and her daughter had not been at home all day. He advised Ellenwood to hunt up a policeman.

After leaving the Doctor's apartments Ellenwood met a young man, who was gazing curiously at his aunt's apartments. He, too, had seen the ghostly visitation. Ellenwood didn't want to venture back again, but his companion was more courageous. According to Ellenwood this young man saw the mysterious woman in white and the same quivering, fading evanescent radiance. Both were completely mystified.

Ellenwood's companion examined the side of his head where the visitor from spookdom had smote him. There was no mark, but Ellenwood's head throbbed and he was dizzy from the force of the blow.

Ellenwood had only a few minutes left to catch his boat, so he hustled for the D. & C. docks, leaving his companion gazing wonderingly at the windows of his aunt's home. At the docks Ellenwood told a policeman his troubles. The officer promised to make a report and have the matter investigated.

In his younger days Ellenwood was a circus performer. He has traveled far and wide over that portion of his Uncle Samuel's domain where the Constitution and the flag do business together, but never in all his wanderings has he met with ghosts. Ellenwood is a total abstainer and the only thing stronger than river water that passed his lips in Detroit was a glass of milk.

He can't account for his experience in the Michigan metropolis and has written his aunt for an explanation, carefully detailing his several encounters with the mysterious visitor of her home. He is confident that the place is haunted by the perturbed spirit of a former occupant of the residence, who may have departed this life by violent means. He is also fearful that a death may have occurred in his aunt's family or that the apparition comes as a warning of impending misfortune.

A Remedy Suggested.

The late Methodist Conference experienced a world of difficulty in relocating its ministry. Bishop Merrill is reported as saying: "There are too many big men and too few big places."

Take a lesson, Bishop, from Donnybrook Fair, and shillalah all the heads that tower above their fellows, then your "big men" can occupy inferior places.

A Wail of Woe.

The Rock River Methodist Conference was late in session in this city. A wail of woe came from the Presiding Elder, J. M. Caldwell, in his annual report. He said during that report:

"One of the most unfortunate facts is the lessened interest attached to revival and evangelical efforts. * * We need earnest revival work to reach the unchurched and unsaved, and the preachers more in demand in most of our churches are those who succeed in this work. Probably 1,000 persons have consecrated themselves to the Lord during the year. This is much less than we ought to have expected from the labors of sixty preachers and 8,000 members."

What the Methodists and all other churches in fact need to make more converts are preachers skilled in hypnotism. Instead of great institutions of learning where science is taught, and Infidels are made, as a leading clergyman lately represented, they need the services of professional hypnotists who can look sinners in the eye, then:

"I have you. You can only think and act as I wish. From this forth you are a servant of the church. You can't help going to church every Sunday, and believing all you hear there. Your soul's salvation depends on it. Swallow down everything the preacher says as gospel truths. His words will reinforce my hypnotic influence, which would be wholly lost but for this constant reiteration."

The writer well remembers his own personal observation at one of these great revivals long years ago. The operator, usually called a revivalist, was a fine specimen of humanity, some 40 years of age, of robust form, coal black hair, sparkling black eyes, ruddy complexion, closely shaven face, a musical voice and polished manners.

His discourse ended for the evening, wherein he had depicted the great love of God in sending down his own and only dear son from heaven to earth to rescue fallen man from the depths of a bottomless pit. He dwelt upon the sufferings of that son engaged in his great task, and of his final death on the cross in terrible agony, as the closing scene. He imitated the dying groan, repeating "It is finished," proving himself a great actor. Coming down from his pulpit he visited the ladies, on many of whom he had turned his eyes when in his most pathetic moods. Looking one sharply in the eye: "Do you love Jesus?" Answered in the affirmative. "I was sure you did. You are bound for heaven. I shall meet you there. Did you ever have religion before? I thought not. You have it now," patting the dear sister on the shoulder, his eyes still in hers: "You are now one of the redeemed. The pearly gates of the New Jerusalem will open wide on your approach. Be faithful to Jesus and walk right in."

Thus in substance night after night the skilful hypnotist plied his mesmeric arts, and souls were saved by the hundred.

This is not a fancy sketch, but is truthful to the letter. The operator was charged with being a libertine as well as an evangelist. It is more of this sort, less the libertine, the churches need to-day to secure new recruits to their ranks, but it is a role educated clergymen are reluctant to occupy.

Converting the Chinaman.

When I first met him, says Poultney Bigelow in the North American Review, the Greek archimandrite had been forty years in Peking, and had never been anywhere else except for two caravan journeys to Russia. He was an elderly gentleman, with a smile like Benjamin Franklin's, and was famed at the Chinese capital for keeping the best wines and the best tobacco. He was a bachelor, and to-day I recall him when I try to fancy Epicurus in the body. He wore a Chinese pigtail and clothes to match, and people said he could give Chinese mandarins points on etiquette. He gave me, at least, many happy hours, for he talked with a frankness and facility rarely united in a Russian, least of all an archimandrite.

One day, for instance, I asked him bluntly how many converts he had made. He answered that he thought he had made one, but he did not wish to be taken as stating this positively. When I returned to China after an interval of twenty-one years, all my inquiries led me to respect the honesty of this Russian. He said, furthermore:

"I have been here forty years, and perhaps I have converted one Chinaman. When missionaries tell you that they have done more than that, do not believe them."

A Mathematical Problem.

If an Annual Report of the President of the National Spiritualists' Association requires two pages and two columns of the Banner of Light, how much space would be required for his annual message if he were President of the United States?

Was It Christian?

A Miss Duow, a Chinese missionary, instead of having been massacred by the Boxers, lately arrived in San Francisco, on the way to her home in Albany, N. Y. Imbued with the spirit of revenge, she is reported to have said in an interview:

"There is no use talking settlement until we have the heads of Prince Tuan and of the empress dowager. It is foolish to think of honest peace while they are living. In my judgment they should be beheaded before negotiations for peace are entered into. That is all I have to say about the Chinese troubles in Pekin."

Others are probably better qualified than we to determine whether the missionary exhibited genuine Christianity in her desire for blood.

WHAT I SAW, HEARD AND DID, IN A SIX WEEKS OUTING.

Moses Hull's Account of His Trip to Nanaimo.

I think it was in May that I began to receive letters from George Campbell, the president of a small Spiritualist society at Nanaimo, British Columbia, telling me what they had suffered from the attacks and misrepresentations of one Baer, a Methodist parson with more ability as a schemer or a pettifogger than as a preacher. This man had been crowing, blowing, bragging, brow-beating and misrepresenting Spiritualism, until with the little Spartan band in Nanaimo forbearance had ceased to be a virtue.

These letters urged me to come loaded for Baer; I could, at least, show the people that this man's bite was nothing, compared to his barking. After an exchange of several letters it was decided that I should make the over three thousand miles journey, and debate, providing a debate could be arranged on anything like equitable terms. Accordingly on August 27, I started for Nanaimo, via Lake Shore, St. Paul and Great Northern railroads.

On my way I stopped and held meetings at Wheaton, Minn., and Seattle, Wash. Wheaton is a fine little town in Northern Minnesota, of perhaps two thousand inhabitants. It has a fine little Spiritualist society, of not more than fifty members. They are mostly, if not all, Scandinavians. They work together more harmoniously than do very many of our larger societies. Geo. W. Kates and his wife, I believe, organized that society; if they did not, they have at least made one or two visits and done good work here.

At Wheaton the Spiritualists own their own temple; it is a large schoolhouse, which they have bought, moved and fitted up. It is a good place for meetings. Brother I. E. Brown, an enthusiastic worker, is the president, and his wife is a true help-meet in Spiritualistic, as well as in other work.

In order to reach Wheaton I had to leave the Great Northern at Fargo, S. D., and take the St. Paul about 80 miles south. My first day at Wheaton was the first day that the law would allow of the murder of ducks and other game. The result was that Wheaton was filled with strangers, who, with blood in their eyes and murder in their hearts, had come to slaughter, and very little else could be heard or thought of. Even the most of the citizens of the little city were engaged with their horses and wagons to take hunters with their dogs and guns to the "field of blood and carnage," or they were shouldering their own shotguns, pulling on their rubber boots and marching out into the battle fields where innocent birds and beasts were doomed to be murdered for the sake of catering to civilized appetites.

Notwithstanding all this, and that the weather was unmercifully hot, we had fair audiences, and all seemed deeply interested in what was said. I was urged to come again; this I hope to do, sometime in the future.

I next pulled out via Fargo, where I left the Great Northern for Seattle; but I am a little like the very profane farmer was, when "once upon a time," he took a load of apples to market; he got along very well until just as he was entering the market town, as he had got to the top of the last hill the tailboard of his wagon came out and his apples went rolling down the hill. He stood and watched his load of apples roll out and each one of them start on a journey on its own hook to the stream of water at the foot of the hill. He watched with tightly closed lips his wealth of fruit starting off on a voyage, when a neighbor said, "Why don't you swear?" He answered that he had not the talent to do the subject justice.

This is my fix on these descriptions. Esepcially did I think this was true, as I went up and down the "switchback." I had often heard of the switchback, but I never realized what it meant until I crossed some of those immense mountains over it. We simply went sideways over the mountain. One end of the car was said to be never more than four feet higher than the other, only as we were changing from a forward to a backward movement, and vice versa. We pulled up the side of the mountain as far as we could go, then we switched off and backed up the other way until we could go no farther; after which this was repeated again and again. At one point I could distinctly see the road three times below and twice above me. The angle up and down, I was informed, was fully six percent. Some places this journey looked extremely hazardous, but I thought as others had made the journey before me I would make it without fear.

While ascending the Cascade mountains on the east side I witnessed one of the most charming thunder storms it was ever my lot to enjoy. Chain lightning apparently rushed from peak to peak, and ear-splitting thunder echoed and re-echoed until it could hardly be told where one peal left off and another began. For a few minutes only the cool refreshing rain fell, until—well, the windows of heaven seemed to be literally thrown open. I had but little fear of a deluge catching me however, for I was ascending fast enough, and I thought high enough to keep out of the way of any deluge which the God of Noah might send along.

When the summit was reached, all was calm and serene. No storm had been there; in fact it did not look as though it had ever stormed. We went down the west side by the light of a full moon; the sights were glorious beyond description.

I reached Seattle before noon on Saturday, September 8, glad to get an opportunity to rest. This I found at the residence of dear Brother and Sister Gifford. Seattle was at that time about the busiest place I ever saw. It has increased its population since I was there in 1891, from about forty thousand, to eighty-one thousand. Building are going up everywhere, and yet there is not a house to rent. All are full. When I was in Seattle, it was boasting that it had outstripped Portland, but before I got away the census report from Portland arrived, showing it to still be five thousand behind. Seattle, when it really learned that it had been a little too previous, took its medicine manfully, and doffed its hat to its larger brother.

I stated that my home while in Seattle was at the house of Brother and Sister Gifford. The name of Mrs. Lena Ingram Gifford deserves special mention. She is one of the best and most devoted workers in our ranks. While her speeches may not create the interest that many of less merit do, I assure the readers of The Progressive Thinker that they are sound in doctrine, and as well stated as the best of our speakers can do. She should surely be kept at work all of the time. She is not only a good speaker who should be kept at work, but she is a poet of rare ability. Mrs. Gifford is educated; her reputation is without blot; and taking her all together, she is just the kind of a speaker that I like to endorse and recommend to the world at large. Mrs. Gifford prepares and studies her subjects and presents them in an analytical form.

My reception at Seattle amounted almost to an ovation; it was refreshing to preach to such honest and earnest souls. Mr. Little, the president, is a retired school-teacher, and eminently qualified for the place he fills. I once before, in the city of Denver, worked under his administration. I was astonished to here meet Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Patterson, whom I knew, and with whom I occasionally dined in the city of New Orleans. They have settled in Seattle with the determination of placing their "light under a bushel," but I exposed them to a few friends, who have faithfully promised to give them no rest until they drop into their proper places and go to work.

While I was in Seattle they came at me, good and strong, to settle there; they pleaded that the east was certainly much better supplied with first-class speakers than the Pacific Coast. Now, would I come? I must come; I told them of Mrs. Watson, and of Mrs. Lillie in San Francisco; but that was too far away. Washington, Oregon, and British Columbia wanted a speaker of their own; in fact, Seattle wanted a first-class speaker all by itself.

While I cannot now think of such a thing as settling in Seattle, I did partly promise to change my plans enough to give the Pacific Coast a few weeks, or, possibly, a three months' visit before starting to Europe next fall. Wherever this announcement was made it was hailed with joy. Already we have more calls than we can fill in the time we had allotted ourselves.

I was more sorry than I can make people understand, to be compelled to decline more calls than were accepted in Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia. When the Macedonian cry comes with such earnestness, it always hurts me to be compelled to turn a deaf ear.

Nanaimo, B. C., was my objective point when I started from home, and from Seattle, I went via Victoria, directly there. At the station I found Brothers Campbell and Watters in waiting. I was piloted to Hotel Williams, where I had a good home during my almost two week's stay there.

Rev. W. W. Baer had boasted that the unexpected would happen—that he would compel me to debate with him at the time, and on the terms he wanted. He had been preaching there several years, during which he brought his big guns and his little guns to bear against Spiritualism—now I was to have no chance to have even an introduction to an audience—no opportunity to say a word until I met him in public debate. Thus, I was to be forced into public discussion, with no opportunity to remove the prejudice against me.

Our friends supposed that they had secured the opera house for me some months previous; but when they got ready to advertise the meetings, lo! and behold, Mr. Baer had played the card which he held in his sleeve; he had the opera house engaged. He would let us have it for the debate, and for no other purpose. It was now manifest to us that we were not dealing with an openhearted foe, but with a Christian trickster.

It happened that Queen's Hall, a much better place than the opera house for public meetings, and a hall that would seat as many people as could be seated on the main floor of the opera house, could be obtained, but there were no seats for it. Our friends hustled and obtained seats, and thus the Baer was defeated in the first round.

Mr. B. tried in every way to find out what the hall cost us. He went to the manager of it and wanted it very badly; but in this he failed. He boasted of a game he had for Victoria, and Vancouver; but his cards did not work there. He went to Vancouver and tried to hire the hall away from the Spiritualists; but this time the telegraph was faster than the steamboat, and he was defeated. When we learned that we were dealing with a man who knew nothing of "civilized warfare," we were prepared for any kind of game he might choose to play. He even tried to create a disturbance between the Spiritualists and myself. He reported to me certain uncomplimentary things concering the Spiritualists of Nanaimo, and in the debate told them that I had said to him certain naughty things concerning them. The worst was, that I had indeed said about what he told them in the debate, but when I re-said it after him, it sounded very different from the way he told it. He failed to create the least ripple between the Spiritualists and myself. The Spiritualists have learned to receive all that man says of Spiritualists and Spiritualism cum grano salis, so his poisoned arrows must ever after this be harmless. They do one good thing; that is, they show the animus of one specimen of the ursa horibilis.

Well, the debate came off; I think nobody was killed. Mr. Baer treated me much better than I expected. His arguments were about almost every subject except the subject supposed to be under discussion. Perhaps twenty minutes of his last speech, of one hour's length, and fifteen minutes of the speech before related to the points at issue; all the rest of his talk related to almost anything else as much as it did to the issues before the house. I liked him as an opponent better with each successive speech. He treated me well. For his treatment of the subject, I could not say so much.

The Spiritualists of Nanaimo I found to be a good and intelligent people; and I surely never met a more hospitable people. They will long be remembered, and always with feelings of gratitude and affection. They are a small band, but they are Spartans, who under all circumstances do their duty.

On Sunday morning, September 23, I went to Victoria, the capital of the Province of British Columbia; there I was to deliver three lectures. After a delightful railroad journey of something less than 100 miles through the mountains, I arrived at Victoria, in time for my noon meal. I was met by a band of workers and taken to Hotel Vernon, where I was made as much at home as one could be when three thousand miles away from home. Victoria is, perhaps, the most picturesque city in the Northwest. Good Brother Broadhurst took me in his carriage and showed me the most interesting places there were to see. A more interesting city to drive around, or to pass through I have not seen.

At Victoria we had good audiences; all listened as for dear life. They argued that I should visit the coast next year, take Mrs. Hull with me, and be sure and not forget them; I must surely stay longer next time. It takes a little time for the people to find out that they have anything worth hearing.

The society at Victoria is officered by good, intelligent men and women—men and women who have the good of the cause at heart. If some good speaker,

EGO ENTRANCED

By Charles Dawbarn.

When we selected the trance mediumship of Mrs. Piper as our special illustration it was because it seemed best adapted for careful analysis. The published reports of the Society for Psychical Research have been prepared with a scientific precision of detail always lacking when the amateur tries his prentice hand. Her personal honesty has long been proved to be above suspicion, and the problems involved belong altogether to the psychic side of life. The volumes of "Proceedings" of most direct interest to the student are those of February and December, 1898; and February, 1900; but are too full of monotonous detail to suit the general reader.

In our last article we pointed out the previously unnoticed fact that spirit George Pelham, while communicating, was unaware he was using the medium's hand for what is called "automatic writing." And further, the spirit who was talking did not at the time know that the hand was being so used. The legitimate inference is that the tongue was being used as automatically as the hand; and that neither spirit was making use of the medium's brain. Of course there are differences in degrees of mediumship, as well as in its phases, but one general principle applies to all alike. Thus, for the physical reasons then given, we may safely assume that no spirit knows how, or in what form his thought is finding outlet, until his attention has been called to the effect produced. Then, of course, although he is still ignorant of "how he does it," he knows, and perhaps watches the particular sense instrument that is responding to his will power.

We have thus seen that this far-famed communication between the two worlds is really nothing but an interchange of thought, which, on the mortal side is received and discharged through organs responding to certain vibrations. But scientific experience demands that both sender and receiver of thought, whether through atmosphere or wire, shall vibrate in perfect harmony. And, as this is impossible between spirit and mortal, we are still in "fog-land" until this point has been cleared up. That thought is itself a vibratory action, manifesting in ethereal waves, may be taken as proved by universal experience.

We have listened for half a century to inspired orators pouring out eloquence in hour-full profusion, and claiming that it is spirit utterance thus given to the world. We have also the inspired works of many fluent writers; some clothing their efforts in the garb of romance, whose author is said to be a spirit; and others as solemnly declaring the presence of some wise angel visitor who is uttering wisdom and experience by the folio. Such writers and talkers, when facing the fact that spirit thought can no more vibrate under our atmospheric pressure than spirit hand strike blow for mortal freedom, usually declare that sister, brother, father, friend, give absolute proof and test of their presence by narrating facts of their earth experience. This is supposed to not only settle the question but to reach much further, and become a voucher for every word of the romanced story of spirit life, and the truth and profound wisdom of spirit utterance. In our everyday life we have orators and writers, whose imaginary pictures become alive as we read or listen. The character in the tale often lives for its author, and converses with him as he writes. The orator brings us into such hypnotic harmony that the thought his brain pictures becomes our thought too. If the Spiritualist declares these are effects outwrought by returning spirits, he is only begging the question, and asserting that which remains unproved. As a matter of fact, we are unable to distinguish between the inspired and the uninspired, either with pen or voice. Nevertheless the mortal who writes and talks in the name of a spirit often produces what he calls "tests" as proofs of spirit return. Some of these tests cannot be fairly reduced to telepathy, in its generally understood meaning. Such phenomena are surely worthy of careful examination.

We notice that a returning spirit cannot directly impress any physical organ. All he can do is to discharge his thought into what Mrs. Piper's controls call "a human shell with certain light spots in or on it." These spots of light, are, they assert, a form of energy evolved by the mortal sensitive, and may accumulate on brain, or eye, or hand, or elsewhere. But it is always such a spot that is sensitive to the vibrations of spirit thought. Intelligence consists in the interpretation of vibrations by which sense tells its tale to embodied life. The medium's brain becomes entranced, that is to say, silent or normal vibrations. In this condition the subconscious self—another personation of the same Ego—can and does, amid that silence, catch more or less of the spirit's thought vibrations, and record them on the sense organs, or whatever may be the "light spots" of the medium. The very possibility of any communication between spirit and mortal depends upon the presence of Ego in another of his personalities, and that he finds conditions such that he can, to a limited extent, broaden out the normal personal consciousness of the mortal. The student reader will now begin to discern a glimmer of sunlight in this fog-land we are exploring. And he will now be ready to utilize a little more of these wonderful and instructive experiences through the sensitive Mrs. Piper.

Dr. Hodgson, who is arch-investigator, tells us that the spirit acts like a man nearly asleep, and gradually becomes more and more drowsy, till at last, thoroughly exhausted, he declares the light has failed. Then he retires, and we presume immediately takes a refreshing nap. A man who is nearly asleep is a poor kind of a witness in any court. Here is a spirit trying to come back, and perhaps sensing a telepathic call from some mortal. His effort plunges him into the dark, which I call "fog-land," and the only light he gets is from certain spots, which reflect a little surplus energy accumulated by the medium. I suppose a drowsy spirit is better than none, but we must remember we have been trying to build a mighty philosophy on the utterances of these very sleepy spirit visitors. If we were altogether subconscious, and knew a truth whether we met it in dress suit or in its everyday attire, we would be a little better off. But here in earth life Ego works by reason, and a delicately adjusted brain, which has a habit of making a fool of itself on the slightest provocation. We must remember the sitter claims to be particularly wide awake. He has taken every precaution to make sure the medium was fast asleep, but it has never occurred to him that his visitor was far too drowsy to recall much of his normal experience as a spirit. This ignorance has been most natural, for after he (or she) has come a few times the appearance of confusion usually wears off. Then it is that, at any rate for a brief hour, the spirit seems as wide awake as the sitter.

We now ask ourselves the question, what is it that has become wide awake? It cannot be the spirit, for the vibrations of earth atmosphere are as abnormal and sleepy as ever for him. That which has evidently taken place is that the medium's organism has become more and more in harmony, and therefore more sensitive to the thought flashed by the spirit. Through her organism the spirit senses more and more of earth life, and thus gains access to the brain pockets where the medium's and sitter's experiences are stored away in the shape of memory. He grows more awake to earth life, but remains, necessarily as foggy as ever to his spirit manhood. We must remember that even if the medium's Ego is for the time crowded out or asleep, everything that medium ever knew or heard becomes accessible to the spirit who is controlling her organism. And his power as one who KNOWS rather than reasons necessarily includes the sitter in a mental outlook that is startling in its power of detail. Everything the medium ever knew or experienced, and often very much of the life of the sitter will gradually become accessible to the visitor who has grown thoroughly accustomed to controlling a mortal organism. And this acquired power of sensing earth life brings back much of that control's own earth experiences that had been silent to spirit vibrations.

The hypnotized mortal will have no secrets from her hypnotizer. But the medium's power or innate mental capacity will nearly, but not quite, limit the intellectual expression of her spirit control. I say "not quite," because in the mortal vibrations will occur again and again some of his own experiences in earth life. He will feel his way to them more or less clearly, till presently they will represent something of his lost personality to that spirit visitor. But he will necessarily remain drowsy as ever to his normal spirit life, for there is nothing in mortal vibration can help him to recall them. We watch the highly educated visitor halt woefully through the uneducated medium, but give him time and experience and he will gradually work up to the utmost possibilities of the mortal he is using. That which at first was automatic, whether through tongue, hand or eye, at last vibrates direct through mortal brain, and some day the spirit feels quite at home on the earth side of life. But he remains sleepy as ever to the spirit, and continues unable to explain how he makes use of the medium's organism.

Under these more favorable conditions you may get a reflection of the spirit's earth life, to a limited extent, but usually far short of a rational identity. The grand old mandarin, who has talked wisely and well through J. J. Morse for over a quarter of a century, cannot even to-day talk Chinese, or write a sentence in that language.

Occasionally a visitor will jabber in some forgotten language of earth life through the lips of a sensitive, and even converse with a sitter in a tongue unknown to his instrument. Sometimes a spirit who has but recently cast his mortal skin can remember that he hid his door key under the mat, and perhaps use his medium's abnormal sensitiveness to gather distant facts in earth life connected with his death. These then are accepted as remarkable proofs of identity, and we hear the unprofessional sensitive declare that he—or she—has absolute proof that her loved one has not forgotten an iota of his earth's experiences.

We will now turn, once again, to the experiences of the learned investigators of the Society for Psychical Research, and learn the lesson of the facts they have so carefully gathered for us. One of the most interesting unprofessional mediums ever identified with Modern Spiritualism was the late Stainton Moses, probably better known to many of our readers as M. A. Oxon. He was a highly educated gentleman, and a clergyman of the English church. For a number of years he was also editor of Light, still published in London, and extolled by W. Stead in Border Land. This educated gentleman was a magnificent spirit instrument, having all the Piper excellence and something more, for his "spots of light" permitted physical phenomena as readily as that of the trance. His controls, or spirit visitors, were, for the most part, educated gentlemen like himself. The student reader will here recall that, no matter who or what they represent intellectually, they were as subject to the laws holding the spirit drowsy to his normal spirit life as the controls of Mrs. Piper. These guides of Mr. Moses became very wide awake on the earth side of life and talked long and learnedly, as well as often, by way of instructing mortals. Thus the various publications of M. A. Oxon (Rev. Stainton Moses) are classic literature to the educated Spiritualist.

Here, then, we have mediumship under its most favorable aspect. The utterances and teachings are flavored with righteousness, as became their clerical mouthpiece. Certain spirits claimed control of the medium and assumed responsibility for the teachings. This mediumship was never scientifically reported, analyzed and criticised, as has been that of Mrs. Piper. So we will not stop to learn its lessons, but watch the Reverend medium after he himself has become a spirit, and is invited to report through Mrs. Piper.

We now find ourselves in presence of the spirit of the experienced M. A. Oxon, whose teachings concerning spirit return have been accepted by thousands. His old controls, known as Imperator, Rector, Mentor and Doctor, are also ready to play their part in this drama of Two Worlds.

Mr. Moses, like the rest, comes sleepy and confused, misunderstanding what is said to him, and giving most irrelevant replies. He was a fine Greek scholar, but has apparently lost even the alphabet of that language. He had placed the real earth names of his controls, as given to him by them, on record in England, but cannot now recall them. Unfortunately he soon announces that he has regained his memory, and gives these names. But if he is right now he was all wrong in earth life, for the names are not the same. Yet the reader will please note that we are dealing with the real Stainton Moses, for he is guaranteed as genuine by spirit George Pelham, who has already satisfied Dr. Hodgson—the arch-investigator—of his identity. Poor Moses, like his namesake when the light was out, found himself in the dark, and cries piteously for more light. He attempts tests, and fails. On one occasion, and with the help of George Pelham, also a Greek scholar, he fails to translate a Greek sentence. Spirit Moses explains: "I could in time recall all the Greek I ever taught. It seems like awakening from a dream to call this to mind."

Medium Moses had taught clearly and distinctly certain dogmas concerning the fate of sinners in the next life. Through Mrs. Piper the drowsy George Pelham had contradicted these teachings, and now sleepy spirit Stainton Moses says George Pelham is right, and he himself was wrong, although it was so given him by spirits. Our natural question at this point would be, If a spirit has entirely forgotten the Greek he once taught, how much of his other teachings could he be expected to recall? On yet another occasion he gave one or two names correctly, but remarked, "It is very singular how the names of former friends that were in my mind, now run through my mind, just at this moment."

Such is spirit return as presented to us by the revered medium M. A. Oxon, as identified and accepted as genuine in the reported Proceedings.

We next turn to "explore" the several renowned controls of Mr. Moses, whose saintly fame has resounded through the realms of Spiritualism. These celebrated spirit teachers may have found themselves unusually drowsy when returning through Mrs. Peper, but to the unbiased onlooker they seem to play the part of dreamers of nonsense. For instance, Mentor maintains that he is Ulysses, and often sees Telemachus. He could not remember the name of his wife (Penelope) but claims she is always with him. The real names of Rector and Imperator have been lost forever in the fog, unless the English record be assumed to be correct. But it is quaintly amusing to find Rector warning Dr. Hodgson "not to rely too much on statements made by George Pelham, because G. P. is too far away from earth now to be clear in regard to tests."

It is understood that at this time Imperator, and the rest of the experienced controls of the late Mr. Moses, have assumed the entire charge of Mrs. Piper, and her mediumship, with the full consent of Dr. Hodgson. We are told they have already helped the medium physically, and in her mediumship. Their object is declared to be "to exclude earth-bound spirits from further use of "the light."

Surely it is now plain to the student reader that returning spirits leave most of their spirit experiences and memories behind them, when they come back, and have to gather up, as best they may, the old details of their earth life, when such are demanded as proofs of identity. These illustrations have been given to prove the assertions already made (1) That a returning spirit can only control by thought power. And (2) that as a narrator of other world experiences he is necessarily unreliable.

Of course, at this point, the experienced medium, and the Spiritualist of a myriad seances, will produce their several experiences, and thus endeavor to prove that Mrs. Piper's mediumship is really a most inferior article, by which returning spirits are necessarily obfuscated and perplexed. We shall hear again, as we have long heard, accounts of fluent utterances in the name of some celebrity, and be asked "do you call that spirit sleepy?" We shall have the dear friends coming back to find a lost paper, and recall a long forgotten incident. A departed relative will be returning with charming incidents of civic and private life in the "summer land," adorned with biographical details. We shall be expected to be smothered by these proofs of spirit identity, and memory of events in the spirit's earth life. And these are claimed to substantiate the spirit's fancy pictures of life in the spheres. Even the casual hunter of the dark seance will laugh at the idea of a "drowsy" spirit. And above all it is almost sacrilegious to analyse the experiences of the whole-souled mortal who claims her loved ones return, as she waits in silence for prudence and counsel. With such a sincere believer not only has the question of identity been long since settled as holy truth, but she will usually quote long teachings by such spirits, telling us how God creates and works in love to a destined end, which end is to be the happiness of his human children. The fate of other forms of life which have lived and suffered as much as man, is not recorded in "fog-land."

As a matter of prudence I positively decline to criticise even one such experience. I only present facts as discovered by the exploring student, and leave them to sprout or die according to the mortal soil in which they may find lodgment.

One such fact is the general level of the trance addresses given by platform mediums in the name of some spirit guide or control. Look back to the commencement of the career of almost any one of such speakers, and we find their early addresses equal in general ability, and instructive effort, to those delivered to-day. The spirit is usually working at the utmost normal level of the capacity of the instrument; and in some noted cases has kept his instrument from independent study, lest his own supremacy be imperiled. Surely that spirit has advantages in his present home which should enable him to startle the world with new and needed truths. I know of but one or two brilliant exceptions among our public teachers, and they are personally up-to-date students, and undoubtedly guided by spirits in full sympathy with their efforts. I suspect there is a yet deeper cause for the successful development of such public teachers. I believe they have been psychometrically presenting the right conditions for their own subconsciousness to instruct their mortal manhood. Such a teacher becomes twofold in power, because he is combining the wisdom of two of the personalities of his own Ego.

And how about the highly esteemed sensitives, with whom we are all acquainted, who declare themselves in almost daily intercourse with a loved spirit? I believe their statements to be strictly veridical. But love does not change law. The spirit who returns must plunge into "fog-land" and take the consequences. The sitter may be wide awake, but the spirit must be befogged by earth atmosphere and conditions. That spirit can only communicate by thought, and that thought will hit the most accessible "light" spot of the mortal organism. Whether that spot be tongue, or ear or hand, or some other spot, is a matter of ante-natal sensitiveness. Presently the spirit visitor grows more and more clear as to earth memories, and the use of her (his) medium's organism. She can telepath, and practice clairvoyance, if the mortal organism permits. She soon becomes "hail fellow, well met" on the mortal side. But that leaves the spirit as cloudy as ever to her own spirit experiences. This must be so, for, just as the X Ray vibrates through and through certain solid substances, so must all spirit thought moving amidst still finer vibrations utterly fail to make contact with the mortal form and its various organs. Of course, while very close to earth life, either because earth-bound, or because just passed over, the returning spirit finds such difficulties somewhat lessened. But for the growing spirit it must ever be as Rector said of George Pelham, he becomes too far away from earth to be reliable.

Let the student reader carefully note that it is out of such materials poor mortals have woven their theological systems, and built up their imaginary hereafter. The medium with a vivid imagination, and a genuine control in loved sympathy, may picture vivid scenes of spirit life. But every time, and every where, however attractive such scenes may appear, they are necessarily unveridical. This must be so because the spirit who would visit earth is necessarily befogged as to spirit experience, even if he (she) become more and more reliable when discussing his earth experiences with old-time friends.

It must now be remembered that if we are to attempt further explorations into the mysteries of "spirit return" we can only hope to be successful by making the veridical acquaintance of our own subconscious Ego. Because to seek information from a spirit visitor is to ask direction from one who is already befogged by his approach to earth life.

MOSES HULL'S TRIP.

one who loves the cause better than he does his salary, could be induced to go through all the places I have named, they could do a great work and would receive a fair compensation.

I suggested everywhere that Lyman C. Howe would be about the man they wanted; and I can assure Brother Howe now, that if he chooses to take a long trip through the West, it will be of advantage to himself as well as to the cause we love. If he decides to go he can call upon me to help him to an introduction to some as good Spiritualists as he ever addressed. In my debate at Nanaimo, I gave the audience to understand that it was possible that Mr. Howe might visit them. At this Brother Baer seemed to rejoice, and informed the audience that if he came to Nanaimo, he might expect him for an antagonist.

On Wednesday morning, September 5, I boarded the steamer "Islander," for Vancouver. A more delightful day, or a more delightful journey could not be imagined. A journey on the Sound, with towering mountains on either side, some of them raising their snowy peaks nearly or quite a mile in the air, is not to be had every day.

I arrived at Vancouver shortly after twelve o'clock, or as the Canadian Pacific Railroad has it, shortly before thirteen o'clock. They go on the twenty-four hour system. One minute before midnight it is with them 23.59. Brother Matthews, the president, and the secretary of the society, whose name I failed to record, and cannot now remember, met me at the landing, and took me to Hotel Commercial, where I was well entertained. The first two days after I was in Vancouver, Brother Matthews visited me often, and took me to see many interesting sights. He worked very hard, in fact left no stone unturned to make the meetings a success. I am sorry to say that after the second day he was taken with what the doctor called la grippe, and was not able to be out. When I left some thought it doubtful whether he could recover. I hope to hear that he is better; he is too good a man to be cut off from the work on this side yet.

Brother Illingsworth got a fine carriage and took his wife, Mrs. Reese, of Nanaimo, and myself to ride around Vancouver's immense park. Vancouver has a park over ten miles in circumference. It may be enumerated among the wonders of the world. In it can be found almost any kind of scenery one wishes to see. One can stand among trees ten feet in diameter, and four hundred feet high, and see boats coming in from China or Japan, or starting to the great foreign seaports of the world. Beside here are mountains and lakes, and animals and birds from almost every part of the world. In fact it is a show of which the Vancouverites may well be proud.

The next day, Mrs. Sibley and her beautiful daughter, Maggie, took me out in other directions for another drive. All seemed anxious to show off the wonders of their wonderful city.

Vancouver is the largest city in British Columbia. It has now 85,000 inhabitants, nearly all of whom have moved there within the last fourteen years. Now it is improving in every sense of the word faster than ever before. It bids fair to some day rival San Francisco. The Canadian Pacific Railroad has done much for this city. It has builded many fine buildings there, one of which is a million-dollar depot. This depot is the finest I ever saw, except the new depots in St. Louis and Boston. I believe it is called the finest depot built by a single railroad in the world.

While the people of Vancouver are generally very progressive, they are, in religious matters even behind the Canadian people in general. They are surely fifty years behind the people of Boston, Buffalo and Chicago. They may be said to be very clannish; they regard Spiritualism as a kind of Yankee invention, of which it is their duty to beware. However, my last audiences were much the largest audiences I had. The Spiritualists of Vancouver, after the first two lectures made up their minds that the meetings were too valuable to be lost by any one, so they threw the doors open and invited the public to come in without money or price. This caused the Spiritualists to have to put their hands deeply into their own pockets; they considered it money well invested, and cheerfully paid the bills, and asked for another opportunity to do the same.

I took no books with me to British Columbia; I think if I had I might have sold five hundred dollars worth. As it was I took orders for about one hundred dollars worth. I sent the books by mail paying the postage myself.

On Monday, October 1, I boarded the Canadian Pacific train for Buffalo. I had before been over every route between the East and the West. Each road has its advantages; each its scenery, but there is no scenery elsewhere in America to be compared with that which one passes the first 600 miles after he leaves Vancouver. As one passes rocks, rivers, boulders, glaciers, mountains and valleys he can only make an exclamatory O!, six hundred miles long. I shall not try to tell the readers anything about it. There is fine scenery all along the north side of Lake Superior, in-so-much that one gets surfeited in looking.

On Friday night, October 5, we pulled into the Central depot in Buffalo, on time. Mrs. Hull, grand-daughter Alfa, and several others were waiting in the depot to welcome me. The great welcome, however, was reserved for Sunday. I went to the Temple with no idea of what was to happen. I generally manage the Sunday meetings about as I think best. I was astonished to see President Albee go up on the platform, and take charge of the services. I had noticed that the Temple was most tastefully festooned; also a beautifully decorated three yards of muslin hung opposite the rostrum, with letters nearly or quite two feet long, "Welcome Home, Pastor." Even that brought tears to my eyes. Other things which by this time I began to discover, soon convinced me that I was not "in it," so I sat down and tried to behave myself. Soon the president announced a song, "written by Mrs. Hull, and printed for the occasion, by W. H. Bach." When the whole audience arose and began to sing the following song, I was surprised.

SONG OF WELCOME.

(Air: "Home, Sweet Home.")

'Mid scenes that are brightest our footsteps may roam
With those who are kindly away from our home.
But memory pictures the faces we love,
We cannot forget them wherever we rove

Chorus:—

"Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
There's no place like home,
There's no place like home."

The skies may be fair in the climes far away;
And blossoms as sweet that are strewn on our way;
Strange voices be tender to guile us with cheer,
But the soul yearns for home and its friends who are dear.

Chorus:—"Home, home," etc.

Accept now our greeting from home and from friend;
We love the dear cause you so nobly defend;
Safe from the long distance to us you have come—
We welcome you, pastor, to church and to home.

After the song an eloquent speech of welcome was delivered by Brother Albee, after which I was called on for a few "feeble remarks." I was almost beyond speaking. I gave a brief description of my journey and my work. After this the Misses Baken—two of our lyceum scholars—were called out and beautifully rendered another song of welcome, which so deftly described the work that I had been doing, that I could have guessed where it came from; but I did not give my thoughts away. The joy expressed in the song at my return, again uncorked the fountain of tears.

During my absence, Brother Victor Wyldes, late of England, officiated in the Spiritual Temple. I hear no words except those of praise concerning him and his work here. May he be as successful everywhere.

Yours in the work,
MOSES HULL.

THE SHORES OF SILENCE.

Through the dark, grim gateway of silence
There comes not an echo of sound,
And the land of the hidden hereafter
To men is an untrodden ground.
But why do I strain sight and hearing,
To catch but a fragment so small?
Oh, why should I wait for the swing of the gate,
Or hope for the future at all?

Ah, sweet in the moments of slumber
The glimpse of a happier land,
And bright is the light and the glory
That falls on the wide golden strand,
For sometimes I see the light shimmer
In fitful but glorified gleams
On the sea and the shore of a glad evermore,
The fanciful island of dreams!

Sometimes in the hours of my waking
I seem to hear music and mirth
That floats out of chaos and silence
And reaches the sin burdened earth.
But I know that the glow and sadness
Is empty as odor and air,
And the music I hear is in some other sphere,
The land of my longing and prayer.

Some time there will be ripe fruition,
And I shall be dreaming no more;
I'll give up the shadow for substance
And sail to that glorified shore.
Ah, then will I lift the dim curtain
And know e'en as I have been known;
My bondage shall break when my soul shall awake,
And my spirit shall come to its own!

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Inquiry is made at this office for the address of Mr. and Mrs. Harry F. Hill. Will some one please send a postal to this office stating where they are located.

Ben and Mattie Hayden writes from Lawrence, Kan.: "The Leavenworth County (Kansas) Camp-Meeting Association has just closed its fifteenth annual session at the home of Father T. C. Deuel, near Wallula Railroad Station. The weather could not have been finer if made to order. The attendance was good and a deep interest manifested. Perfect harmony prevailed and every one felt it was good to be there. Bro. W. E. Bonney, of Blair, Neb.; Mrs. Lull, of Lawrence, Kan., and your humble scribes were the speakers. About all phases of mediumship were represented and well patronized. Taking all in all the meeting was a grand success, and we feel sure much good will grow out of this spiritualizing influence that goes out from this nucleus of power. At the close of the meeting we came here to Lawrence, where we find quite a number of earnest and truly spiritual people who meet regularly at the home of some member each week. Thus the fires are kept lighted upon the altars. Sunday evening, the 14th, we held forth in their hall, Mrs. H. following the lecture with quite a number of tests, all of which were recognized. We hope to do a good work here. We are open for engagements to work for old societies or organize new ones on reasonable terms.

Dr. Wm. Cleveland, the veteran Spiritualist and healer, of Minneapolis, Minn., is our authorized agent to receive subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker. Dr. Cleveland is the author of a work called the Religion of Spiritualism, which has received considerable attention among thinking people. His clairvoyant powers are fine, and his tests are always recognized. He has done a most excellent work for Spiritualism and humanity.

Fred Johnson wriets from South Chicago, Ill.: "H. J. Moore gave a few trumpet seances here. The voices of the spirits could be distinctly heard and the people present were more than satisfied, some getting as many as four messages during the seance. His hands were held by some person in the room during the entire seance, so as to convince the most skeptical that it was the work of spirits. After the seance J. K. Hillis gave some very good tests."

The dedicatory exercises of the First Spiritual Church of Chicago will take place Sunday evening, October 28. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond will give the dedicatorial address. Dr. T. A. Bland, Mrs. Lucinda Chandler and other prominent workers will take part in the exercises. Mrs. Cooley, assisted by Mayflower, will give spirit messages. An excellent musical program will be an addition to the rest. Services at 7:45 sharp.

The Chicago Inter Ocean has the following: "Professor Francis Carlin, a former citizen of Fort Worth, Texas, and now a resident of Wyoming, tells the following story of clairvoyant prophecy concerning the Galveston horror: In June, two years ago, the professor was contemplating a removal to Galveston, and in fact had perfected all arrangements for his purposed change of residence. One day, on the streets of Fort Worth, he met an old friend, to whom he mentioned his intention of going to Galveston. The friend said: 'Before going be sure and consult Mother Ryan, the clairvoyant. She has told me some wonderful things and given me warnings which have protected me from danger, if not from death itself.' Impressed by his friend's earnestness, Professor Carlin paid a visit to Mother Ryan. The door of the woman's apartments stood ajar, and as Carlin walked up the steps he heard a voice say: 'Come in, Professor Carlin. One of the voices has just whispered to me of your coming, and I was expecting you. Do not go to Galveston. That city, within the next two years, will be submerged by the sea, and thousands will perish. The voice whispering to me has an icy breath, and you must go north, instead of south, for danger now threatens yourself and family in any clime where the frost king reigneth not.'"

L. A. Austin writes from Excelsior, Minn.: "I have received your third volume pertaining to things or aspects beyond ordinary states of consciousness. I find it very instructive, interesting and suggestive. The most promising signs of the present times are that the number of individuals are increasing quite fast, who realize that they have not cornered all of the truth."

Claude Whiteside, of Chattanooga, Tenn., has received the seven premium books and is well pleased with them.

Dr. A. A. Kemball is now located at 891 Main street, Bangor, Me.

Maud C. McClure writes: "I wish to call your attention to a mistake made in your coulmns recently in regard to the officers of the Central Iowa Spiritual Association. The vice-president, G. A. Hinton, M. D., and the secretary, Maud C. McClure, are of Oskaloosa, instead of Ottumwa, as stated. Will you please correct it in your next issue, and also state that at a recent meeting in Marshalltown of the trustees of the C. I. S. Association, it was decided to hold a midwinter meeting in Oskaloosa and employ Mr. and Mrs. Kates. The meeting is to be held in January."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Capt. L. Barney, prominent as a journalist and Spiritualist in Cincinnati, Ohio, writes: "Your journal is alert, incisive and outspoken, thoroughly edited and handsomely produced. I hope it has 100,000 prompt subscribers."

Bishop A. Beals writes from Summerland, Cal.: "I saw in your late papers a request to know if anyone had a copy of the book entitled 'Edwin Drood.' If you desire the book, I have no price to set on the copy I have, although it was a present to me under peculiar circumstances. I was in Boston the time the Banner of Light publishing company got out the book, and before I saw it. One night the spirit of Charles Dickens came to me with the book in his hand and requested me not to mention the incident as he wished to present me the book as a test of his presence with me. This was in the fall of the year 1873. I went to Brooklyn, N. Y., that same fall and remained through the following winter, speaking for the Spiritual society there. I had nearly forgotten the incident mentioned when, Christmas morning, I received the book as a present from a lady, Mrs. Rodgers, a writing medium. When I called to thank her for the present I asked her how she came to send it, and she replied that Dickens' spirit came and influenced her hand to write, requesting she send the book to me to fulfil a prophecy he had made to me. This was remarkable, as I had mentioned the matter to no living soul, and at the time of the fulfillment of the prophecy I had nearly forgotten the matter."

The Pittsburg Dispatch says: "Hypnotism is being worked to death in several lines. It figures as the ground plot of the Rice will forgery, and to-day a music teacher announced that it was aiding him in the instruction of pupils. Scientists regard this latest innovation with doubt, but both master and pupil declare it is of actual benefit. Arthur Ballard is the Svengali and Miss Bessie Burney the up-to-date Trilby. Miss Burney says she has taken three lessons under hypnotic power, and the improvement over former methods of instruction is very marked. She is put into a hypnotic sleep and then 'commanded' to execute certain movements, which both declare could not be done with equal success were she conscious all the time. As a result of the Rice forgery case a crusade may be started against so-called schools of hypnotism, where methods of application are taught for certain amounts. Its $100 course is said to have made one man so proficient that he put an aged millionaire completely in his power. It is a new problem, however, and the police are puzzled to know just where the line should be drawn."

Scribe writes from Detroit, Mich.: "G. W. Kates and wife held two very interesting meetings in Detroit, Mich., Sunday, October 14. Their services were secured by A. G. Brown, secretary of Island Lake Camp-Meeting, and one of the finest halls in the city was secured. Large audiences greeted these well-known workers; and they were people of representative character, that shows what a need exists here for a proper effort to be made. We hope to see a popular movement made here to more properly present our cause to the public. No better field of labor exists for practical Spiritualism than Detroit offers. Mr. and Mrs. Kates each gave us a splendid lecture, and the spirit descriptions were forceful and convincing.

The Chicago Times-Herald says: "Because Joseph Janus would not heed the warning of his wife, conveyed to her in a dream, he met death last evening. Thursday night Mrs. Janus dreamed that her husband was killed, and so vivid was the impression made upon her that she begged her husband as he left his home at 8709 Escanaba avenue for his day's toil at the Illinois Steel Works to spend the day at home. He laughed at her presentiment and joked about it to his fellow employes, but on the way home he was struck by an Illinois Central suburban train and was so badly hurt that he died an hour later.

Mrs. E. E. Compton (formerly Mrs. Downey, of Indianapolis, Ind.) is in the field again as a medium between the two worlds. Her address now is 322 Fourth street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Mary C. Von Kanzler, after a six weeks' vacation at the camp-meetings, is now located at 120 South Salina street, Syracuse, N. Y.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley is again located in Chicago, and ready to fill week-night engagements at a reasonable distance from the city.

The Philadelphia North American says: "Annabell Walker, a beautiful girl, who was born twenty-four years ago in the hills of Old Virginia, and who of late has been living at 801 Spruce street, in this city, was taken to the Pennsylvania Hospital two days ago suffering from nervousness. Her pretty Southern accent and kindly ways made friends for her of all the nurses and attendants from the start. And their kind and careful treatment has done much to improve her condition. The first night that she passed in her cozy room on the third floor of the private ward was remarkable for a vision which came to her at the midnight hour. As the clock was striking 12 she opened her eyes and saw, perched upon her bureau, a pretty little Japanese boy. The lad was dressed in the bright colored garb of his country. A little belt encircled his waist, and his skirt was bespangled with colored beadwork in the form of fiery dragons and flying birds. He was laughing and seemed to be very happy. Standing back in the shadow and towering above him like a grim pursuer, stood a tall, dark man, with a long flowing beard. He wore a skull cap and a black cloak, which enveloped him to his feet. His eyes gleamed and were fastened upon the boy, over whom he made passes with his hands. Annabell Walker sat up in bed and watched the strangers. She was not afraid in the least. She spoke to the little boy. She was attracted by his gay attire. "Little one," she whispered, "who are you?" But the child paid no attention to her. Instead, he took the hand of the man, and, still laughing as if he were pleased at the idea of going on a journey, he disappeared through the window with his guide. The next morning the stout colored woman who takes care of the rooms appeared bright and early, for the little Southern sufferer was a favorite with her. When she heard the story she rolled her eyes and trembled with negro superstition. Glancing hurriedly toward the bureau, she backed out of the room, saying: "Missie didn't dream nothin' like dat? De las' patient in dis room was dat lill' Japanese boy." The nurses and the hospital records corroborated the negro's statement. The patient who had occupied the bed just before was a Japanese boy named Okada. He was a medical patient under Dr. Packard. He got well, and his uncle, a tall, gray-bearded man, who, like a Hindoo, took him away. Laughingly, he had gone out of the hospital on the arm of his tall guide, bowing in his foreign little way to the nurses who had been kind to him. Miss Walker had never heard of or seen the child and never knew that he had been in the ward. The colored woman cannot be induced to enter the room in the evening now."

Ransom H. Randall, president of the Chicago Theosophic Society, writes: "Theosophists, Spiritualists, Metaphysicians and Occultists of all kinds are greatly interested in the promised tour of Mr. C. W. Leadbeater, of London, through the United States in the near future. Mr. Leadbeater was formerly an Episcopalian clergyman and has spent eighteen years studying, traveling and lecturing in India, Burmah, Ceylon and Europe, and is perhaps best known in America through his published writings. He may be considered as an expert authority on occult investigations in realms invisible to ordinary vision. Some results of his researches in this line are found in his books—The Astral Plane (including Purgatory), Devachan (the Heaven World), Clairvoyance, Dreams, Invisible Helpers, and in his recent articles in the Theosophical Review on Ancient Peru and Ancient Chaldea. He will arrive in New York about the 15th of October and reach Chicago November the 8th. He will make a four-month tour from New York to San Francisco and return, lecturing in various places on the following subjects: Some Misconceptions About Death, Clairvoyance, The Heaven World, Prayer, The Rationale of Ghosts, The Human Aura and cognate themes; touching upon such minor points as Psychometry, Astral Traveling and the Astral Telegraphy, Past Lives, Materializations, Haunted Houses, Planchette, etc."

Mrs. J. E. Staner writes: "The first musical, literary and card party given by the Spiritual Research, on October 11, proved a grand success. The hall was beautifully decorated with palms and flowers. All the selections were very fine, both afternoon and evening. Supper was served, and the table was filled with all kinds of good things to eat. All present expressed themselves as being well pleased, and went home feeling very happy. We intend to give one of these parties every month. The next one will be held November 8. The Spiritual Research holds meetings every Wednesday in Hall B, Van Buren Opera House, corner of Madison street and California avenue, beginning at 2 o'clock p. m."

Will J. Davis relates some excellent tests which he received through W. C. Jessup. They were about the same as usually occurs in seances for physical manifestations, and which have been related in The Progressive Thinker hundreds of times.

Mrs. E. F. Jay Bullene has been paying the friends in Chicago a visit. She has been prominent as a lecturer in days past, and will probably enter the lecture field again. Her home is in Denver, Col.

The Detroit News says: "Marguerite St. Omer Briggs is meeting with her usual good success at her Sunday evening meetings in Prismatic Hall. Her lecture on 'Where is my Wandering Girl To-night,' received rounds of applause. One old man exclaimed: 'I wish all the church members in this city could hear the lecture; it would do them good.' Another was heard to exclaim: 'That beats all the sermons I ever heard preached.'"

We have received numerous letters offering us a copy of "Edwin Drood." We have received one from J. J. Jones, of Philadelphia, to whom we are indebted for many kind acts.

Mrs. F. A. Logan, of San Francisco, holds meetings every Sunday evening at 7:30, in Caledonia Hall, 119 South Spring street, Los Angeles, Cal. She will also by invitation establish circles of harmony in the various towns adjoining, that home talent may be brought out and utilized. Keep the veteran at work, and may the angels of earth, as well as of the spheres, sustain her in it.

Mrs. M. J. Crilly has located at 14 East Stockton avenue, Allegheny, Pa. She will reopen her meetings at the hall, South and East Diamond street, October 21.

Laura B. Payne writes from Topeka, Kan.: "Mrs. L. A. Maybee and myself are now holding a series of meetings at Neosho Falls, Kan. There has never been such a thing as a Spiritualist lecture in this place before, and last Sunday when we held our first meeting all was excitement and expectation among the people. We held the meeting Sunday afternoon in a park. There was a large and attentive crowd. All the week we have been holding meetings in the opera house. Sister Maybee gives lectures from the Bible, and I for a change give them lectures upon various subjects, all of which have been very favorably received and commented upon. As there is every facility here for a good camp we are seriously contemplating organizing and holding a camp here next fall. There is a fine park here, by which flows the beautiful Neosho River. The park belongs to the public and can be had free. Neosho Falls is a beautiful little town nestling among the trees and situated on the Santa Fe and M., K. & T. railroads. There is not a more convenient nor pleasant spot in the West for a camp than this place, and there will be one I am almost sure. Our meeting here will close Sunday evening, when we will return to Topeka. Letters addressed to me at Topeka will reach me no matter where I am. I wish also to say to the public that I am now ready to make engagements for camps next year."

Henrietta Lichtig writes from Springfield, Ill.: "We feel that it is good to occasionally let the outside world know that a little life still exists in this city. Our little society here is slowly progressing and is about to become one of the children of the State Association. We have with us for the third time Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, who found a little time to spend with us on their way to the National Convention. After each of their visits they leave us with new recruits added to our list through the able lectures of both and the clinching tests of Mrs. Kates. 'Tis with many regrets that we can keep them so short a time and hope we may be able to secure their services again in the near future. They have so endeared themselves to the people of this city that they will always find a warm welcome awaiting them here."

Mrs. Maggie Waite writes from Syracuse, N. Y.: "I can be addressed here until further notice. Dr. Butterfield has engaged Mrs. Elizabeth Brewer, of Belmont, N. Y., to lecture for the First Spiritualist Society during this month. Already she has won her way to the hearts of the people. The appreciation of my labors in the past are shown by the large attendance at my meetings. I wish to thank the many friends for their kind testimonials in reference to the sittings they have received through me by mail. If you do not get your replies as soon as you expect, it is not my fault, as I take each letter in turn as I receive them. I have some letters now that have got no address; some that it is impossible to make out their writing. Should those sending such letters read this, I trust they will drop me a postal, so they may receive their replies."

"Cor." writes that Dr. Hewitt delivered a splendid address on "The Evolution of Religion" before the Unity Spiritual Society of Milwaukee last Sunday evening, that was enthusiastically received. This was his second lecture, and there was a fine audience out to listen; several new faces, and many of the leading men of the city.

Mattie L. Monroe writes from Seattle, Wash.: "The annual convention of the State Spiritual Association of Washington, will be held in Tacoma, Wash., November 22 and 23, 1900; the hall for same to be decided on, and published at a later date. All parties interested are cordially invited to attend and co-operate with us at that time. Tacoma seems like home to the S. S. A. W., it having been organized there, and we look forward to a very pleasant time. Notice of details will be published later when programme is arranged."

John Lamms writes from Portland, Ore.: "I have received the premium book, and consider it worth five times the price of it. Those books are great educators, and are reaching many in this way. Verily, you will have your reward."

Mr. L. LeSieur, corresponding secretary, writes: "We had a large attendance at our Band of Harmony rooms, 608 Handel Hall building, Thursday afternoon and evening, October 18. The ladies met early, at 1:30 p. m., to sew for our coming bazaar, which will take place the first Thursday in December next. We expect everybody to come and buy Christmas presents, as we shall be sure to have just what they will want, no matter what it is. The evening exercises were especially interesting, and of varied character. Several of the little folks were present, and Ouina gave them name poems. Miss Carrie Richmond's recitation brought the house down; she was obliged to respond to an encore. The most impressive feature of the evening was the conferring upon our president and pastor, Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond, the degree of LL. D., by the American Health University of Chicago. Dr. Dutton, dean and secretary of the university, in a few well-chosen remarks, conferred the degree. Mrs. Richmond responded in a most beautiful manner, thanking him for the honor, and for his deep appreciation of her life-long work for the upliftting of humanity. She paid the doctor a glowing tribute for his long years of unselfish work, which in the coming time, she assured him would become more and more recognized. Our meetings are constantly growing in interest, and the spirit of harmony and fellowship prevails. We are quite likely to outgrow the limits of our hall. We entertained nearly one hundred at supper."

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Renner, mediums for full form materialization, trumpet and light physical seances, can be addressed for the winter at 95 Industry street, Pittsburg, Pa.

Prof. J. Hilling, clairvoyant, palmist, and mystic, has removed from 81 Shawmut avenue, Boston, Mass., to 145 Pleasant street, the same city.

R. J. Williams writes from Denver, Colo.: "Your premium books came to hand in due time, and am like many others, cannot see how you can give so much for so little. I will say the books are fine, but that verdict will not do justice for the good old Progressive Thinker, as I think it is one of the best papers published, and am afraid that many Spiritualists do not realize what a good thing they are missing by not becoming rebular subscribers. Mrs. Ada Foye has been here some time, but leaves next week for Australia, to be gone a year. May the good spirits guide and protect her on her long journey, and bring her back safely."

H. E. Chase, spirit photographer, trumpet medium, lecture and test, giving full names and descriptions, has open dates for the last half of November and December. He would like to correspond with societies East or West. Adaress him at 86 Perry street, Cleveland, Ohio.

Ella M. Johnson, secretary of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, writes: "Friday evening, October 19, the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association ordained Mrs. Mm. Hilbert, of 183 Blue Island avenue, pastor of the Progressive Spiritual Society, at their hall, North avenue and Burling street. Dr. Geo. B. Warne, president of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, presided over the meeting and presented the ordination papers, after which Mrs. Hilbert thanked the I. S. S. A. and her own society for the honor bestowed upon her. Among the speakers of the evening were Mrs. Cooley, Mrs. Irene Dobson and Mrs. Summers, who gave short addresses. There was also a piano recital by Miss Pearl English, and a recitation by Miss Hattie Burmister. Supper was eserved by the members of Mrs. Hilbert's church in the hall, after which dancing was in order."

Lillian DeArgyle writes from Kansas City, Mo., that she holds public meetings at 1222 McGee street.

F. P. Wilmarth, secretary, writes: "Sunday, October 14, was the regular annual meeting of the Hovey Spiritual Society of Springfield, Mo., and as Mr. C. M. and Mrs. Josie K. Folsom have returned from their eastern trip, the latter took the rostrum and spoke for forty-five minutes, after which she gave tests. All were recognized. The meeting was then turned over to the worthy president, F. J. Underwood, who made a few remarks and then called for the election of officers for the ensuing year. Mr. Samuel Strunk was elected president; Mrs. Egbert, vice-president; F. P. Wilmarth, secretary; J. S. Crist, treasurer; trustees, Frank Buerger, F. J. Underwood and J. H. Martin. There were also seventeen names placed upon the roll of membership to the society, and by subscription there was money enough raised to pay three months rent for hall. We want all the old members and all the new members to turn out in strong numbers. We have excellent mediums in Mr. and Mrs. Folsom, and both are anxious to have all come and meet with us. Our beloved brother, John T. Shank, passed to spirit life a few weeks ago. We lose in him one of our oldest and most faithful members. We hope now that the Folsoms have returned, that we shall have some interesting meetings."

NEW YORK ITEMS.

Some of the Liberal Preachers, Etc.

The autumn season is upon us and those that have been fortunate enough to go away for the summer have returned to the metropolis to their winter duties and occupations. Rev. Minot J. Savage returned to his pulpit in the Church of the Messiah, on October 7, and his subject was "Back Again to work." It was an able discourse, as he alone can deliver; although it was raining in torrents, the church was crowded, which only goes to show that the general public want something more satisfying than the old worm-eaten orthodox creeds. I often think of the people west and south who read Dr. Savage's discourses, if they could only hear him deliver even one discourse, what a treat it would be to them, for sometimes when he reaches the heights of oratory in his discourses it is well worth going any distance to hear. I would like to state that Dr. Savage has regained his health during the past summer, which will be good news, I know, to his friends and well-wishers throughout the country.

Nellie Temple Brigham commenced her meetings for the season at the new hall, 713 Lexington avenue, October 7. This grand inspirational speaker is worthy of having the largest hall in New York filled to the doors every Sunday.

Rev. Henry Frank commenced his meetings, October 7, at Carnegie Lyceum, and he intends to give for the next two months a series of discourses on the recent revolutions in religion. His first subject was, "The New Thought of God." The peculiar virtue of Mr. Frank's discourses is that they are abreast of the age in scientific and philosophical lore.

For some years it has been a question whether it would not be wise to sell the Bible House in this city. In the face of keen business competition the American Bible Society and others of similar character are no longer self-supporting. The old Bible House is situated at Fourth avenue and Ninth street, its home for nearly fifty years. Business men in this city say there is no longer any money or profit of any kind in Bibles.

James O. West, a prominent New York merchant, who passed away last week, left a clause in his will which showed great foresight, and pleased me very much on reading it. He left the bulk of his estate to his widow, five sons and two daughters. Estelle Louise West, is known as Sister Mary Victorine, and is an inmate of the convent of Mount St. Joseph, at Dubuque, Iowa. For her use the will directs that $3,000 be set apart, the income of which is to be paid her in sums not to exceed five dollars at a time. The will says: "I have not made her share equal to those of my other six children for the reason that she is in a situation where money is not required for her use or maintenance,, while my other six children are to a great extent dependent on their interests in my estate for their establishment in life." This was a wise father, especially in fixing it at five dollars at a time, so that the church does not get much out of this estate.

Dr. B. F. DeCosta, who one year back left the Episcopal church and joined the Roman Catholic, has a long article the past week in the Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic organ of this city. He says that "the House of Bishops is divided, and criticises Bishop Potter, and resents slurs on the church. I wish to ask, why does Dr. DeCosta meddle himself now with the Episcopal church, when he has been away from it one whole year? Is he anxious to return to the Protestant church again, and has he grown weary of the Roman Catholic church?

I notice that Jesuits will have charge of the religious work in several of the Roman Catholic academies in Boston. They have just been appointed the past week.

Mrs. Thomas F. Ryan, wife of the millionaire contractor and steel railway owner, met the Red Star steamer, Westernland, one day the past week, to welcome a mother Superior and five nuns of the Order of Perpetual Adoration. The sisters were brought to this country from Brussels at the expense of Mrs. Ryan, who has just built and endowed a convent in Washington, at a cost of more than $100,000, the first one of this sisterhood to be established in this country. A novitiate is to be opened and I understand several applicants have already petitioned for the privilege (what an honor!) of entering and taking the veil. There will never be a moment when one of the nuns will not be kneeling before the blessed sacrament of the convent. The nuns will do work ordinarily done by women of the world. Is not this a terrible thing, to have a convent like this erected in the capital city of the United States, and we are upon the dawn of new century?

J. OSBORNE LUNT.

New York.

Prof. J. S. Loveland.

I was out to Sycamore Grove twice in the time of camp-meeting. Saw Professor Loveland, of Summerland, and listened to some brief remarks by him. It was not his lecture day. It is surprising to see a man of his years so youthful-looking, energetic and sprightly. He is eighty-five, and appears younger every way than many I have seen at sixty. His eyes bright, face flushed and but slightly seamed with time, with a full head of hair, and beard (not yet so very snowy), a form perfectly upright and noble in its bearing, and a step as elastic as in youth, he might well be called a "grand old man!"

His home in Summerland is beautiful, spacious and airy, and on one of the highest foothills in that section, and which doubtless he goes up and down (to the center of the town) every day of his life, although a steep and quite lengthy ascent. He has for his housekeeper a widowed niece, and a very nice woman, whom I have often seen and conversed with. I have often seen the Professor moving about on the streets as briskly and bright seemingly as any of the younger men of the town. He must surely be one of the leading, and most brilliant lights of the age in which he lives.

There is quite a number of veteran Spiritualists in Summerland besides Prof. Loveland, and enthusiastic supporters of the cause, some of them over eighty years of age; and one, whom I have often seen about town, is over ninety by several years; a former "Reverend" of the orthodox doctrine. I think his name is Davis. He was married some two years ago to a widow who is now past four score years, and is fast going down toward the happy goal which will open to her the golden gate to those blissful abodes above where time cannot blight, nor death destroy.

NEBRASKA CONVENTION

A Record of Interesting Doings.

The seventh annual convention of the Nebraska State Association was held in Richards' Hall, 1034 O street, Lincoln, Neb., on Sunday, September 30, and Monday, October 1.

Our Sunday sessions commenced at 10:30 in the morning, with an invocation by Mrs. Mary J. Bonney. Miss Myrtle Klock, of Lincoln, acted as organist, and President Campbell gave us a fine opening address in which he reviewed the struggles of the past years in introducing the subject of Spiritualism. It was a forcible and exhaustive exposition of the needs of the people as well and full of food for thought. Brother Campbell believes in bringing the teachings of Spiritualism into practical manifestation as a means of alleviating poverty, misery and ignorance among human beings on earth.

Miss Edith Evelyn Edwards followed with some striking tests and readings.

At the afternoon session, Mr. G. S. Klock gave us a very instructive lecture on "Truth," which was appreciated by all.

Later on I gave an address on "The Benefits of Spiritualism," and Mr. Scott Bledsoe, of Lincoln, gave a very eloquent address from the standpoint of a retired minister. Mr. Bledsoe is harder on the clergy than the average spiritual lecturer; he seems to know whereof he speaks, and gives some telling blows on our side of the controversy.

Mrs. Bonney and Miss Edwards concluded the afternoon session with tests and messages.

The evening session found us with a crowded hall, the influence of the preceding sessions having gone forth and helped to rouse the Lincoln people from their lethargic condition.

We were very highly entertained by the presence during the early part of the evening of a violin quartette; unfortunately we did not get the names of the performers, but the association was highly gratified with their performance.

Dr. Madding gave us an instructive and forcible address on "The Savior," showing the need of self-culture, self-improvement and self-saving principle. Mrs. E. S. Bledsoe followed with an inspirational lecture on "The Analysis of Man." It was a grand effort, and the closing poem, referring to the convention, literally brought down the house.

After some very accurate and satisfactory tests by Miss Edwards and Mrs. Bonney, the day's services were closed.

Monday found us with rather a small attendance for business (as usual at Spiritualist meetings), nevertheless we pulled through all right.

In the absence of the secretary, Mr. Paul S. Gillette, the convention called upon me to act in that capacity. The election of officers resulted as follows: James Campbell, Havelock, Neb., president, re-elected; W. G. Washburn, of Beatrice, vice-president; W. A. Dole, Beatrice, treasurer, re-elected; W. E. Bonney, Blair, secretary; A. T. Hinshaw, of Alvo, and G. F. Staub, of Lincoln, trustees.

A committee was appointed to solicit correspondence in regard to next year's camp, and to consider the best means of securing a good location. It was the almost unanimous sentiment that a camp should be held and the committee will use their best efforts toward that end. We urgently request all Spiritualists who would like to see a permanent camp established in Eastern Nebraska to write to some of the committee, give us your ideas and suggestions and your financial support. Perhaps we may find some Spiritualist well provided with this world's goods and wealth who will generously donate a few acres for a camp-ground without further trouble. The committee on camp is as follows: James Campbell, Havelock; W. G. Washburn, Beatrice; G. F. Staub, Lincoln; or W. E. Bonney, Box 173, Blair, Neb.

THE INVISIBLE.

The Microscopic Organisms.

According to the statement of the Secular Review, the presence of pus in a wound is due to a small organism which is in the atmosphere, and which, entering the wound, multiplies and causes the suppuration to commence. In the present day, since the discovery of this fact, care is taken by surgeons to get pure air during an operation, and to use solutions which at once destroy these organisms if they should come in contact with the wound. And when such precautions are used the most extensive operations frequently heal without the formation of a drop of pus, putting the chance of blood poisoning out of the question. By far the largest number of cases of blood poisoning which come to the notice of the public are those in which the victim is a physician, who has slightly wounded himself in dissecting or holding a post-mortem examination. It would seem that the greatest danger would be in working with a body in which decomposition was advanced considerably; but the fact is that these wounds are most dangerous if made while examining a body soon after death, and the danger of poisoning lessens as decomposition advances. Thus it is that physicians are frequently the subject of this disease. They examine bodies soon after death, either to gain knowledge of the cause of death in obscure cases, in coroners' cases, or by request of friends, and their lives frequently is the reward. The wound may be made by the point of a knife or the tip of a needle, and, at times, heals up without any trouble; but the first unusual activity or exercise renews the inflammation, with absorption of poisonous material following. The blood of a victim of blood poisoning is found to literally swarm with microscopical organizations mentioned above, and the bodies of those who die with it are found to decompose much sooner than usual. It seems that these organizations, which are known under the general name of bacteria, are very active, and may be taken into the system in decomposed food or by inhalation of impure air. The writer remembers a lecturer who demonstrated this action. He showed under the microscope a specimen of his blood, then a drop of water out of a glass in which had lain for several days a piece of putrid meat. The water was alive with bacteria. He then drank the water, and two days afterwards appeared, and, drawing a drop of blood from his finger, showed it full of the organisms before present in the water. He recovered after a few days of illness. It was a splendid demonstration, but one which few would care to undertake.

Microscopical organisms are ever a source of danger. If the air is impure, they are there; if the water is stagnant they are there; if fever rages they are there; in every case their presence is made known; in consumption their ravages are easily discernible. It is not to be supposed, however, that the microscope reveals them all. You never can exhaust the possibilities of minuteness. No microscope is powerful enough to accomplish that. But it is gratifying to know that there are health-producing animalculae, as well as those productive of disease. A philosopher once even imagined that an atom might be inhabited by "human" beings, of course, infinitesimally small, yet sensing as much in their short lives as the average man of earth. They may be capable of receiving hundreds, thousands, or millions of impressions while man receives only one, hence may realize in a brief life as much as he does in his three-score years and ten. All the works of God have not yet been encompassed, and much remains yet to be learned.

A COMBINATION OF
"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books complete and at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptaion of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to def

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. E. A. Palmer: Q. We have had home circles for thirty years. We want the truth, demand the truth, and consequently get nothing but the truth. Can you give further advice?

A. This is the position of all others to take, and as would be inferred this correspondent is satisfied fully with the results he has obtained. There have been no lying spirits" nor "obsession," but every seance has been marked with something gained. As he is in the right path, all that can be advised is to go right on.

R. M., Dallas, Texas: Q. Will the Texas catastrophe be repeated?

A. There is one aspect of the terrible catastrophe which has overwhelmed one of the most opulent cities of the South, which has not been presented. The city was built on a site selected for its commercial advantages, which from the beginning was known to be menaced with the very ruin which has overtaken it. The ordinary high tides reached the danger limits, and it was known that when accompanied with a tornado the streets of the city would be swept by the inrushing waves. Yet in defiance to these conditions, public buildings, palaces of commerce, and residences were erected, and the great railroad corporations built their vast warehouses along the very brink of the flood, tempting the devastation which has come. And this fearful object-lesson is not enough. The wreckage is being cleared away, and new buildings are to be erected on the foundations of those destroyed.

In the order of events, it is only a question of time when the destruction will be repeated. Vested interests and natural advantages will hold the city in its present location, but its inhabitants may feel that a repetition of this disaster may befall them at any time. The situation is such that no engineering skill is available in construction of seawalls or defenses of any kind sufficient to meet the magnitude of the requirement.

The people may console themselves that such a storm has not swept the coast for at least half a century, another half may go by, or even many centuries. Pompeii and Herculaneum were built on lava beds which had overflowed towns and country, to be in turn submerged with ashes and overspread with lava. Nearly two thousand years have passed since that time and the hamlets and vineyards over the buried cities have been unmolested.

Yet the volcano ever threatens above, and at times may send forth clouds of ashes and rivers of lava. While the probabilities are that there will be exemption in the future for as long a time as in the past, it is not certain that the city will escape for a single year.

Investigator: Q. As I greatly admire The Progressive Thinker, I ask you a few questions which will be of great value to me: What is the best way to find out if there is a life after this? What have you to say about the Mormons? What disease have I? How can I cure it? What countryman? Happy or unhappy? How many children? My age? My parents' names? Dead or living? What bad habits? Names of dead relatives? Who is my spirit guide? Who is Allen Kardec? Is he dead? If you answer these questions satisfactorily, it will come near convincing me. Please give me all the advice of value to me. If you answer in The Progressive Thinker, keep out my true name—use Investigator. Enclosed find stamp.

I present this correspondent's questions as a sample of numberless others which are received. They perhaps are not as laugh-provoking, nor do they demand as much for so little. To answer Investigator "satisfactorily," and it would be useless to do otherwise, would require many pages of writing and several hours' time. For this he magnanimously sends a two-cent stamp, and appeals to my desire to convert him as a motive. I do not know as I have a special desire to convert him. There are too many such Spiritualists already who will pay a medium a dollar to tell them how many children they have, and after listening to the most brilliant lecture, contribute a nickel! Too many such Spiritualists who can ask questions by the hour about muck, and never one of Spirituality! If I should answer all the questions "satisfactorily" it would not make this questioner a Spiritualist more than he is at present, but he would have his appetite whetted keenly for more questions and answers. I have learned this sad fact by long experience. A psychometrist might tell him all he asks for, without spirit aid, and it would be no test of spirit aid.

My advice is for "Investigatar," whose name I "keep out," for charity's sake, to strive to become more spiritual if he would receive spirit enlightenment.

Parent, Montreal: Q. A while ago an answer in the Question Department held that a child should only be trained by love. Is it not best to so subdue their will, that they will be obedient?

A. The question contains the spirit of the old idea that the will of the child is bad, and ought to be "broken," and parents set about doing so to make it yielding and obedient. On the contrary, they should make every effort to develop a strong and vigorous will. No wonder that those who have been reared in the belief that the will is the seat of moral depravity, and to be severely broken, find it powerless when most needed. A false and vicious system of theological training through countless generations, has made it a weakling.

The child whose will is "broken" has no character, and becomes the tool of the stronger willed. Such a course of training is a crime which ignorance only can excuse. The countless pliant men and women whose training began at home and was completed at school and church, you will find following after those who have not had this training and are not pliant.

By strong will is not meant violent passion, or unrestrained energy of feelings or emotions, but persistency of purpose, a measure of one's capacity, and going straight-forward to an object. Parents should regard the plans and purposes of their children with the greatest tenderness, and when proper should encourage them in their completion. When a six-year-old boy attempts to make a kite and fails, do dot discourage him by saying he cannot and ought to know he could not, and thus make him feel his infirmity, but say to him, "Of course you will fail at first, for it is difficult to balance a kite. You will soon learn the art and make a kite which will fly to the length of your string." Then explain the principles on which it is made, help him put one together, and give him the proud consciousness of success won by his own efforts.

The child may have plans which to an adult are of little interest, yet to them of vital importance. If their schemes can be carried out without detriment, they should not only be allowed, but assisted. A case in point, of a little girl eight years old, who desired to accompany her father to the village. As this was inconvenient and there was no apparent object for her going, he refused. She began to cry, and when questioned it was drawn out that she had an object—she wanted to procure some transfer pictures. You may say that was nothing. To her it was a whole world. She had saved the money and had waited a long time patiently, to go and select them. When her father knew the mind of his child, he at once placed her in the carriage and went with her for the pictures. When she came home, and failed to transfer one to her album, he told her how it must be done, and watched over her until she succeeded.

Thus, in the beginning the will should be trained—not broken—and the child made to feel that there need be no such thing as failure; that everything is possible to the strong and self-reliant mind. Not weaklings trained to be molded like clay in the hands of leaders, but leaders of themselves and those less fortunately educated. Whenever a parent attempts to "break the will" of the child by force, the victim becomes a rebel or a slave. The hot wrath of vengeance is aroused, or the yielding of the broken reed.

The perfectly educated will not only has mastery over the body, defying the pangs of hunger, the fever of thirst, the keenest arrows of pain; it treads the desires beneath its feet, and triumphs over the limitations of the physical body, which it fashions into beauty, and gives that healthfulness that the most poisonous substance, the venomous fang and sting, the malarious atmosphere, changes of temperature, and all forms of disease will be harmless against the strongest force in nature—the human will.

WELL DONE.

Spiritualists Make Generous Response.

To the Editor:—In the last issue of The Progressive Thinker is a short communication from Bro. John W. Ring thanking the donors for $27.70 contributed to the Spiritualist Society of Galveston to relieve the needs of the Spiritualists of that city who were victims of the storm. You proceed by way of comment to say: "The sum total of $27.70 to date, seems a beggarly response from the Spiritualists of our country to the sad call for aid from the Spiritualists of the stricken city of Galveston."

It seems to me that the above is calculated to create a wrong impression of the charitable disposition of Spiritualists toward suffering humanity.

I think it is safe to say that the Spiritualists of the country have contributed as much to the Galveston sufferers—according to their means—as any other class of people. I cannot answer for other societies, but my society went to work immediately the news of the disaster was received and raised fifty dollars in money, besides obtaining the donation of a large quantity of clothing, which we sent direct to Miss Clara Barton, of the Red Cross Society, for distribution, and we have her thankful letter in acknowledgment of same.

Last Sunday night a collection of $10.60 was taken to relieve the wants of a poor sufferer of that awful calamity, who was in attendance at our meeting and whose condition was called to the attention of the audience by myself.

In donating to this cause we did not stop to consider what faith or religion the sufferers professed. It was enough to know that they were fellow human beings.

This is the first instance I know of where an appeal has been made for the relief of any sect. I have seen no appeal for aid from Methodist sufferers, nor Presbyterian or Baptist sufferers, and I think it is establishing a bad precedent.

As I have already intimated, I doubt not that our people everywhere have opened their hearts and their pocketbooks as freely as any class without pausing to inquire the creed or color of those who were to be helped. I protest that $27.70 should not be set down as the measure of the charity of the Spiritualists of the country. Fraternally

A DIVINE LESSON.

Cutter Rats Raised to a Higher Plane.

The only way to introduce the millennium is for each one to lift some one who is more helpless.

A private orphan asylum is maintained by Frank F. Everitt, a Chicago street faker, says the Chicago Tribune. Though a poor man himself, he supports ten street waifs. They live together in a flat, over which he himself presides as philosopher, guide, friend, and protector.

This private refuge, or orphan asylum, is the home of ten boys who would be to-day homeless and uncared-for arabs of the street were it not for the generosity of their patron.

Mr. Everitt has gathered these boys together, one at a time, and organized a kind of club for them, furnished them with a kind of clubhouse, with three good meals a day, and all he exacts from them is the maintenance of order and discipline.

This club of ten is now domiciled in a flat of three rooms in Thirty-fifth street near State. These rooms are known as the "clubhouse," and Mr. Everitt is called the father confessor. He pays the rent of the rooms out of his own pocket, and assists the boys in supplying their larder. He expects the boys to do their share in supplying provisions and their own clothing, so that the little community may become in time self-supporting. No boy in the Everitt home is allowed to accept gratuities of food from strangers unless he has worked for it, and each one is an independent and democratic young citizen with pride and honor.

Nearly all the ten are now employed as newsboys or messengers, but if any one chances to lose his position or becomes ill he is supported and protected by his companions until his luck may turn. They are all well-dressed, well-behaved and precocious chaps, with that cleverness which the reclaimed arab invariably shows, and each one is determined to make his mark in the world.

ALL MUST STUDY.

The oldest members of this little cooperative housekeeping colony attend night school, while the others are compelled by a rule of the community to pursue a certain amount of study each day under the guidance of Everitt. Their protector has supplied school books, a large blackboard, and a set of maps, and lessons are allotted for each day. There are courses in arithmetic, algebra, spelling, reading, and grammar, and two of the eldest are now ready to enter high school.

The money which the boys earn they keep themselves, and each contributes his small mite toward buying supplies. They cook their own meals, and take turns in allotting the labor. Mr. Everitt buys their food supplies by the wholesale, and the little colony always has on hand a generous supply of meat, coffee, flour, sugar, and vegetables.

Mr. Everitt has organized a system of self-government by which the boys are in honor bound to preserve order and peace in the household. Only a few simple rules have been laid down which he insists must be followed. All boys are expected to rise at 5 o'clock in the morning and to be indoors not later than 9:30 o'clock at night. Any lad who creates a disturbance by quarreling with another member of the household is expelled on the first offense for seven days, but on the second offense is expelled for all time, or simply turned out.

PRIVATE GYMNASIUM.

Their suite of rooms is kept in an orderly, well-directed manner. There are two bathrooms, where the boys take a daily plunge. One room is used entirely as a gymnasium, and it is as well fitted up as other and more pretentious establishments. This gymnasium glories in the possession of two punching bags, two horses for leaping and vaulting, a flat board used as a rubbing-down table, a curved table for back exercises, an exerciser with weights for arm movements, and a pair of swinging rings. The boys take turns at exercising with this paraphernalia in their spare hours, and with cleanly, regular habits and plain, wholesome food, they keep themselves in an excellent, healthful condition.

The second room of the suite is used as a dormitory. It contains five beds and two large couches. Each lad controls a certain number of hooks placed along the wall, where he hangs his clothes and other possessions, and no other is permitted to infringe upon his private domain. No lad is permitted to scatter his clothes or other possessions on the floor, so that this large room is always a model of neatness and order. Housecleaning is accomplished once a week by a detailed committee of two or three, who sweep, wash windows, and place the flat in good condition. They do the family washing as well, and are provided with a washing machine. They keep their clothes mended and brushed, and each one is acquiring fast the desire for a good appearance and discovering within his heart the instincts of a gentleman.

The third room is used as a dining-room and a kitchen. Here the boys cook their own meals, and concoct dainty dishes which some good housewife might look upon with wonder. Scotty, who is "chief" of this clan, is also head cook, and each day one member is detailed to help him. They own a cooking range, a rather miscellaneous assortment of china and cooking utensils, but they manage to live in comfort, and they possess a home which many of their former street associates would envy.

A generous supply of reading material is always on hand, and the newspapers, magazines, and books are carefully guarded and classified and preserved by these boys, who read with extraordinary eagerness all literature that comes into their hands. They own five testaments, which are as popular as any lurid novel they may happen to acquire in their library.

Everitt does not seem to have any trouble in finding employment for his lads, and keeps a list of desirable "jobs" always posted in the "clubhouse," so that the unemployed may seek and consider places. Not one of the boys has the trampish appearance of the regular news peddling rounder. They are so natty in appearance that none would ever suspect that they were once mere gutter rats, sleeping in empty barrels and subsisting on chance crumbs and earning only a few pennies a day. Mr. Everitt's "ten" would fight for him in any kind of a situation. Their love and respect for him are so great that they regard him as a kind of superior being.

This world will not advance very rapidly until all have become agents in doing good. The advanced spirits are all engaged in some beneficent work, and why should mortals shirk from doing their duty. If a street faker can do so much good, why not you whose means are more ample. Some day you will have to commence doing a good work for humanity, in order to advance yourself. Selfishness cannot win in the spirit realms. SPIRITUALIST.

"LET THERE BE LIGHT."

Dr. Roberts Declares Reason to Be the Supreme God.

MAN MUST RELY ON HIMSELF—AT THE CHURCH OF THIS WORLD HE POINTS OUT FAULTS OF MISSIONARIES IN FOREIGN LANDS—THEIR ACTIONS UNREASONABLE.

"Let There Be Light" was the subject of Dr. Roberts' sermon at the Coates House Sunday night, October 7. He declared reason to be the supreme God for man in this world, and that there was nothing higher. He said:

The conflict with ignorance and superstition is as old as man. The story of the human race is the story of that conflict. All progress, all advances, all achievements of science, civilization, justice, liberty and art are but triumphs of the mind of man over ignorance and superstition; all progress that is yet to be, all the advance that is to be hoped for, believed in, struggled after and helped forward, will be through the enlargement of human intelligence and the widening of reason's benignant sway. Man began complete, but incomplete; a finished being in potentiality only. Man began his career as a poseidon; he had a brain, but did not yet know how to reason; he had moral instincts, but had not yet experienced sufficient to know the right; his mental activities were exercised under certain unescapable laws, and yet those very laws led him to wrong conclusions. Man had certain religious instincts, certain spiritual needs and aptitudes; he had vague and chaotic feelings about some power above him, or below him, certainly not in himself, but he had no adequate conception, and could form none, of what that power might be. Man became religious through abject fear; ignorant and superstitious, he did not stand so much in awe as he stood in terror; he left the imprint of his knees in the dust because he thought by expressing his humility, his spirit of servitude, his abjectness, his willingness to do anything that was commanded, he might make favorable that great power, whatever it might be.

This spirit of religious abjectness was the parent of endless injustices and crimes. Whenever any man submits himself to God without respect to the reason and the rights of man, he becomes a possible and probable criminal. He may, under that delusion and snare, enslave, oppress and kill; he is swayed now by what he believes to be the authority of an higher power and he is in virtue of that very conclusion put outside of obligation to reason, justice and the rights of others. Swayed by ignorance, possessed by superstition, man became the oppressor of man. Superstition built the cathedral and the dungeon; superstition raised the cross and nailed upon it the immortal martyr and left him to die; superstition piled the faggots around the feet of the philosopher and the scientist and lighted them with its sacred tapers; superstition put under the ban the first institution of learning that was ever founded upon the continent of Europe; superstition did those things not because men loved to inflict suffering, not because men were bad; it did those things not because men were simply ambitious or lusted for power, or loved to oppress; it did them because men were ignorant; it did them because, having subjected or degraded reason, they were following the idea that gave no account of itself to reason and justice.

MISSIONARIES ARE WELL PAID.

There is a very general superstition that the missionary that leaves home and native land and goes abroad in the name of God, is doing something wondrously beautiful and full of sacrifice. I have the honor to be personally acquainted with one of such; he is a man with a large family, his salary is $1,200 a year, with $100 additional for each child, and one servant for each member of the family, with house rent, carriage hire, and servants' hire, and traveling expenses all paid in addition. I am satisfied that this friend of mine, put down here under the flag with perfect freedom to use whatever talent the Lord gave him, could not earn an average of $50 a month. But so long had the idea been current among the people that this thing is done in the name of God and for his glory, that it would be accounted the most rank form of disloyalty for any one among the believers to say a word against the work of the foreign missionary.

It happens that just now there is an international peace congress being held at Paris; the day before yesterday the Associated Press reported a little of the conclusions that conference had reached, and some of them were these: They had resolved, not in the name of the Lord, not in the name of religion, not in the name of the church, but simply and solely in the name of peace, that the foreign missionaries in China were often intolerable; that no European power ought to back up the pretensions and pronunciamentos of the missionaries by armed force; that the nations of Europe ought not to establish a religious protectorate in China, and that there should be no annexation of land, especially that held sacred by the Chinese. And now after more than a century of active and aggressive missionary work, all well meant, all with a spirit that may be admirable, after more than a century of this aggressive work in the name of God, it is a surprising and startling fact that all China asks is that the Christian nations let her and her people alone. If our devoted missionaries had gone in the name of reason, if they had gone in the name of civilization, if they had gone in the name of peace, if they had gone in the interest of men living upon this world now and been loyal to those ideas, the result would have been far otherwise, but they went in the name of God and the trouble began at once. They did not go with the message of reason, they went with a revelation; they didn't go with an appeal to the conscience, the intelligence and the hearts of the people, but they went armed and equipped with a divine revelation; they didn't go with the story of human progress and liberty and justice, but they went with the glad tidings of great joy that all the ancestors of those people were in hell and that their descendants were liable to be. I submit to intelligent and thinking men and women that there is no egotism, no arrogance, greater; that there is no greater insolence than for one people to send another people a divine revelation that turns up side down traditions that were known before that other people as a nation were ever born.

RELIGION BACKED BY AN ARMY.

If, now, our agents and representatives in the name of God had gone and said: "You have Confucius, we have Christ; both were eminent and kindly men; let us compare, let us study them together; in our development we may have missed some of the graces of our own Christ, and in yours you may have failed of some of the excellencies of your great Confucius, but above all the differences of smaller minds, upon the summit where is light, and peace, Confucius and Christ must harmonize and be as one; great men, understood, belong together, but great men, interpreted by small and narrow minds, are in antagonism more and more." If our representatives had gone like that and rested their case upon its merits, and met those men like men, and asked for no support, no backing, expected none, from any armed power, I can see how the intermingling of mind and the comparison of ideas and the greater or less welding of fraternal ties would have been of mutual benefit to pagan China and Christian America. Would it not have been a singular thing if when this Christ was upon the world and was encountering difficulty, was being mistreated by the Pharisees, the Sadducees and the other 'sees, if he had appealed to Rome for an armed force to defend him and vindicate his rights; but that man Christ was so dilated with the divine spirit, he was so persuaded by the reason and the justice of the things he taught, he was so infatuated with the dignity and the grandeur of his mission as he conceived it, that all the armies of the world could not have added one line to his conscious dignity. Whenever a man believes in God he wants an army back of him. The more a man believes in God the more he wishes to see the sun gleam upon the bayonets, but when a man believes in himself, in the justice of the cause he pleads, in the reason that he attempts to utter, he is calm and has no fear of gods or men.

The same superstition about the name of God gets itself uttered in dignified and more or less authoritative ways. It will not be long now till the chief executive officer of the government will issue a proclamation telling about what God has done for this people. Of course he will represent God as an ardent expansionist. It was not but a little while ago that a distinguished citizen paid a visit to this city and delivered an elaborate oration. It was in the order of the events of the passing campaign, and it might not be fair to assume that all that was said was honestly believed; some things may have been uttered for political purposes only; but the fact is that the old superstition about the name of God came plentifully into the distinguished gentleman's address. Again and again it was declared that God had sent us to the Philippines; again and again it was declared that we were there to do God's service. And this is the commonest form of superstition! It can be heard or seen almost anywhere. It is God that wills so and so, and wants this and that. And it is a little surprising that God always seems to want just what man himself wants. Nobody that really shrinks from the Philippines has the least suspicion that God wants him to go there. It is, in short, I affirm, the commonest form of superstition whereby men beguile themselves into believing the things they want to believe. I stand here to say that we know nothing of what God wants; that he has no authoritative representative upon earth; that the officers of his cabinet are not here; that they do not issue pronunciamentos or proclamations, or make known his will, and the man that dare not rely upon his own convictions, backed by his own reason, when there is anything doubtful or dubious about them, but seeks to give them currency or force by appealing to the name of God, is first a coward and then a blasphemer. The supreme God for man in this world is, as always has been, and we must believe shall always continue to be, reason. There is no higher. There is no other, and that once abandoned, dark and treacherous ways await and invite the feet of man.—Kansas City Times.

MORE SUGGESTIONS.

In a Multitude of Counselors there Is Wisdom.

Believing that "in the multitude of counsels there is safety," I will make a few suggestions on the pending issue.

The Symposium in your issue of Oct. 20, contains many splendid thoughts; but the majority of the writers have overlooked the real issue, which is not whether there is a God, and by what name he shall be called; but whether there shall be any creed at all. Some of the writers claim to oppose creeds, and yet favor a "statement of principles." This is a distinction without a difference. If we undertake to state the leading principles of Spiritualism, we must at the very outset recognize Spirit, the Great First Cause, which produced the universe and its laws, yet administers them and ever will. This is exactly what the N. S. A. did, but fearing to use the orthodox term, God, substituted "Infinite Intelligence," which proved worse than "jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire," to the numberless critics, waiting to pounce on anything they might say, whenever they attempted to make a rule of faith for all Spiritualists.

The truth is, that while every man has a right to make a creed for himself, he has no right to make one for other people, and whoever attempts it will get into the trouble the N. S. A. has encountered.

One would think that after all the trouble, expense, war and bloodshed that church creeds, party platforms and national policies have inflicted on the world, reformers at least would abstain from trying to impose rules of faith on other people.

But do not understand me as opposing the N. S. A., as an organization, provided it will abstain from making a rule of faith; and give its attention to scientific and humanitarian work. The Christian and charitable work suggested by Sister Weatherford is good. It might also appoint a large and competent committee to collect psychic facts and statistics from all over the world, and properly classify them. Another committee might thoroughly investigate and report on the various phases of mediumship, and suggest the best means of properly developing each phase. Another committee might investigate fraudulent mediumship, and suggest the means for true Spiritualists to protect themselves and the public from these frauds.

In short, by working on the various lines of Truth, Progress and Humanitarian reforms, the N. S. A. can be made a wonderful agency for good.

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "otherworldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

THE NATURAL PHYSICIAN.

The Physician can only be the servant or handmaid of Nature in the cure of

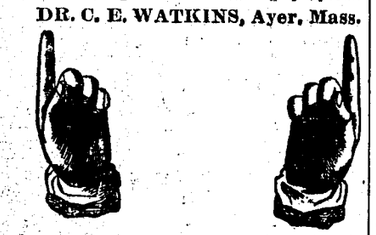
In reality we can do nothing; we can only remove the offending cause while



Nature

Performs the cure, and therefore we lay it down as a fundamental maxim in medicine that all a Physician can do is to act as a Servant to Nature.

DOWIE'S DEFEAT.

Medical Students Break Up His Meeting.

Special cable to the Chicago Tribune from London, Eng., states that Dr. Dowie, of Chicago, met with ignominious defeat there October 18. Four hundred medical students attacked his afternoon meeting at St. Martin's Town Hall, and although the healer's bouncers fought valiantly, they broke it up and drove Dowie to cover.

Dowie's lack of humor and diplomacy, together with his attacks on the London press, is responsible for the popular resentment against him. He went to London with the notion that he could not only browbeat the people into adding gold to his already well-filled coffers, but that he could run his meetings according to his own ideas.

The British people are long on precedents and are always ready to combat any interference with them. Hence, when Dowie undertook to deprive his audience of its right to heckle him he struck a snag. He declared he would allow no interruptions, and added fuel to the feeling against him by denouncing the Church of England, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Pope, the Masonic fraternity, and the press. The newspapers could not overlook these aggressions, and ever since the healer began his meetings have not hesitated to score him. His tirades are fully reported and each article has carried more or less editorial comment, warning Londoners that Dowie's one aim was to squeeze money out of the credulous. One paper dubbed him "the prince of humbugs."

DOWIE STARTS TROUBLE.

Yesterday Dowie announced an address on faith healing. An audience of perhaps 300, mostly old women, was on hand as usual. Four hundred students from different hospitals were also present. Dowie was slow to appear, and for half an hour the students indulged in pleasantries at the healer's expense. They exhorted him to "buck up," and when not singing popular melodies were shouting.

Finally Dowie presented himself and tried to shout down the students. He might as well have attempted to check a cyclone. To the voices of the students was added the noise of trumpets, rattles and whistles.

Dowie, as usual, lost his temper, and implored some one to bring the police. Seven "bobbies" fought their way in, cut out three students, and marched them off the premises.

HEALER RUNS AWAY.

This only incited the rest to further uproar, in the midst of which one student screamed:

"What about a collection, old Money Grabby?"

Dowie replied that there would be no collection that day and declared the meeting at an end.

Having dismissed the faithful, the healer bolted through a side door. He was just in the nick of time, for with a yell, "We want Dowie," the students made a rush for the platform. At its foot fifty of Dowie's bouncers met them. Then ensued a scene of confusion. Sticks and fists were freely used on heads and faces, the furniture flung to the walls, and upon the cleared space the combatants tore and struggled in wild, fierce fighting. The police finally gained the upper hand and the students were dispersed.

The Express says it understands that the Council of Medical Defense Union met yesterday to formulate a protest against the letting of St. Martin's Town Hall to such people as Dowie. The Town Hall Committee meets in the morning, when, with representatives of Scotland Yard, the desirability of allowing further faith healing meetings will be discussed.

Wallula, Kansas.

I have just had the pleasure of attending the annual meeting of the Leavenworth County Association, at the home of Brother and Sister Deuel, the pioneers of Spiritualism in this section. For many successive years these worthy and estimable people have carried on a meeting and much good has resulted from their labors. This year they only held a four-day's meeting, but it was in every way a successful gathering. The workers present were Brother and Sister Hayden, of Indianapolis, who both did splendid service for the cause, Our old friend, Mrs. A. L. Lull, of Lawrence, who is always at home here and always does good work in lectures and improvisations; O. R. Dunakin, of Chanute, a very good medium for tests in circle work, and also a trumpet medium. We did not attend the trumpet seance, so cannot speak as to his powers in that phase. I came here unexpectedly and was invited to speak on Sunday morning. My subject, "The Light of the World," was well received. Since the meeting closed I have held one meeting and had a good local audience. My subject on this occasion, "Do Spirits Communicate with Mortals," was also very well received, the audience being very attentive

Mrs. Dr. Smith, of Kansas City, Kan., followed me with some descriptions and messages, but was annoyed by the levity of some young people present, and finished up by administering to them a kindly rebuke in well-chosen language.

Mr. Deuel is anxious to sell his home and go to California, but we hope if he succeeds he will sell to some enthusiastic Spiritualist who will go on with the annual meeting, and keep up the good work so ably commenced and carried on by Brother and Sister Deuel.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Dr. John W. Lockhart, of Galveston, Texas, departed this life, October 5, 1900, at Chappell Hill, Texas. The interment took place October 7, Mr. John W. Ring officiating. A man of advanced years and an avowed and devoted Spiritualist, he, like a sturdy oak of the forest, succumbed to the angel of transition, knowing that Nature's law led to a higher life. CORR.

Passed to spirit life, near Colon, Mich., Andrew Stalley, aged 68 years, 7 months and 24 days. He has been a constant reader of The Progressive Thinker for many years, and a true Spiritualist. Services were conducted by the Rev. Aunks, at his late home, before a large assembly of sympathizing friends. I. H.

Albert Matteson, the youngest son of Dr. Mrs. B. H. I. Matteson, 248 Division street, Buffalo, passed away rather suddenly October 4, aged about 26 years.

Although Albert never tried to crowd his views on others, he was born a Spiritualist, and passed away fully in that belief. Mrs. Matteson being a medium and his father in spirit life, he frequently used his mother's mediumship to get messages from his father. The last motion he made on earth was to reach out to the, to him, visible spirit friends and tell them he was coming.

Certain environments caused his domestic life to be somewhat unhappy. On this and other accounts his mother and some of his other best friends look upon his death as a real release, on which they congratulated rather than mourned for him.

The funeral was largely attended. Words of consolation were spoken by the writer. MOSES HULL.

Stephen Cushman, of Breedsville, Mich., passed to higher life, October 3, after an illness of many weeks. He was one who had lived a pure spiritual life for over forty years. Although to some he may have seemed hard to understand, yet one whose life leaves a lasting influence for good. Funeral services were conducted Friday, October 5, by Mrs. Lucy J. Williams, of Paw Paw, who presented the truths of Spiritualism, taking for her subject, "Life." SUBSCRIBER.

Mrs. Jennie Cummings, wife of Capt. C. H. Cummings, passed to spirit life, in Genoa, Ohio, October 8. She was a member of the Spiritualist society, and was a persistent and faithful worker. She was a member of the Eastern Star, and Rebekah Lodge. The funeral was held at her late home, and the costly casket and flowers were beautiful. Many friends assembled to pay their last respects, and the lodges attended in a body. Mrs. Webster, of Ashtabula, delivered the funeral service, and Mrs. Else, of Galion, Ohio, sang. The concluding ceremonies were in charge of the Rebekah Lodge, at the grave. MRS. HATTIE WARD.

Passed to spirit life, from her late residence, at Chattanooga, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1900, Mrs. Blanch E. Ralph. She leaves a husband and one son who have the assurance that it is well with her soul. She beheld the spirit forms of the dear ones, and knows that because they lived she should live also. Services conducted by Rev. McAllister. F. H. RALPH.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. Francis C. Stinehart, of Dubuque, Iowa, aged 55 years. She was a woman of more than ordinary intelligence, with many lovable traits of character; a confirmed Spiritualist, a philosophical thinker, a true and noble woman and a sister to the noted medium of old, Mrs. Ollie Blodgett. She passed out of the body, October 5. Her earth body was transferred to Davenport cemetery, and was reduced by incineration to ashes, on October 17, 1900. In memory of her transition, Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, Mass., delivered a beautiful sermon at Odd Fellows Hall, opposite the postoffice, on Sunday, October 21. DR. O. G. W. ADAMS.

A POWERFUL HEALER

The Secret of Dr. J. M. Peebles' Great Power, which Dispels Disease as if by Magic, is the Combination of The Psychic and The Physical which Successfully Combats All Disease.

"DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS HOPE FOR YOU."

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

What is this great Healing Science which cures so-called incurable diseases, and has revolutionized the art of curing to such an extent that physicians and scientists stand dumfounded at its mystical power? Dr. J. M. Peebles, the grand old man who is its originator and has given it to the world, calls it psychic force, and says there is nothing mystical or supernatural about it. That it seems to come from the mysterious deep and have a supernatural origin is because it HAS PERFORMED SUCH MARVELOUS CURES and has dispelled disease of every nature from man and woman when all other human power failed, but that in reality it is a logical method, founded upon scientific study, and now at the ripe old age of 79 I can look back over 50 years of patient work and experiment before I evolved it to its present perfection. The whole secret of the grand success which I have had is that at last I have found THE MIND OF THE SOUL, and demonstrated that by the correct use of my psychic force I can, through this mind, restore the tissues of the body and place that abnormal condition of the body which is brought on by disease into a normal condition and the correct functional working of the entire system; THEREBY DISPELLING DISEASE. The thousands of testimonials which, unsolicited, have been sent to Dr. Peebles are positive proof as to the merit of his wonderful discovery. Mrs. J. W. Henderson, of St. Johns, Washington, who suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness, was entirely cured by the Peebles treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, Marionville, Pa., says she can not express too much gratitude for the results received through Dr. Peeble's treatment. She suffered for years from falling of the womb. Francis Wavering, Seattle, Washington, suffered for twenty years with a severe case of Catarrh; was completely cured through the psychic treatment. L. A. Ford, Elsworth, Wis., was permanently cured of Dyspepsia, and Nervousness. Geo. H. Weeks, of 53 Minerva Street, Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration of health after suffering from Nervous Prostration and Insomnia; says he now enjoys restfulness and sleeps sound every night. Mrs. Mary A. Clair, Lexington, Ky., after thirty years continual suffering from Epilepsy, and trying to be cured by eminent physicians, writes: "Two months of your treatment has made earth almost a heaven to me." If you will send your name and address, also leading symptoms, Dr. Peebles, through his occult power, will diagnose your case ABSOLUTELY FREE. He will also send you his grand book and other literature which will give you the key to his grand science, and which should be in the hands of every man and woman who in any way suffer from disease or abnormal conditions. This he will do WITHOUT ANY COST WHATEVER TO YOU. Remember you are cured in the privacy of your own home without the knowledge of anyone. Dr. Peebles' Treatment KNOWS NO DISTANCE. The work goes on if seas divide healer and patient. Address Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

Dr. J. M. Peebles WILL TEACH YOU HIS PROFESSION, which is the grandest and best paying profession of the age, to any man or woman who wishes to learn it, the only education necessary to know how to read. Full instructions free to all addressing Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life; Counsels and Maxims; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constantly his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

From the German of

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

THE

World's Sixteen Saviors,

—OR—

CHRISTIANITY BEFORE CHRIST.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

New and startling revelations in religious history which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods. This wonderful and exhaustive volume will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which the author has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape, the student of free thought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows to the mark. Printed on fine white paper, 330 pages. New edition, revised and corrected, with portrait of author.

CAUSTIC REMARKS

Touching the Missionaries.

As never in all the course of my life, says the New York Journal, had I heard of a missionary making a sensible remark, the following statement, clipped from a newspaper in which we all have faith, made a deep impression upon me:

Miss Douw, a missionary, whose home is in Albany, N. Y., said: "There is no use talking settlement until we have the heads of Prince Tuan and of the Empress Dowager. It is foolish to think of honest peace while they are living. In my judgment they should be beheaded before negotiations for peace are entered into."

This is so very sensible, practical and real a remark that one wonders that its maker ever committed the dull impertinence of being a missionary at all, and we would suggest that instead of returning to the land of the enlightened Confucian she begin at once a campaign among her own tribe at home and persuade them to stay where they belong and teach Christianity to Christians.

I have no stone to throw at the Christian religion; with all its faults it serves its purpose among Europeans as far south as Turkey, because it happens to suit the needs. Let them live in it and die in it to their sentiment's content, but in heaven's name let them likewise practice the sensible adage, "Live and let live." That, throughout the rapid progress of the new-religion, Mohammedism, Buddhism and Confucianism have refused to tremble on their immemorial pillars, is sufficient proof that Christianity has shouldered to its nethermost borders and must hereafter be content with a third of the habitable globe. So far as my knowledge of all religions go Christianity is superior to the others in one thing only—the stunning quality of its egoism. Each of these other creeds, made as impersonal as profound by the weight of their centuries, is wisely content with the soil which has nourished it richly since the seeds burst. It neither cares nor would it be guilty of the rudeness of attempting to murder another creed. It is only the Christian, in all the fussiness of his plebeianism, who would displace that which his brain is not capable of understanding for the crudities of the country Sunday-school. He reminds me of Senator Beveridge, intoxicated with his rhetoric and the applause of the matinee girls in the Senate gallery, shaking his fist in Senator Allison's face and thundering—in effect, I cannot remember his precise words: "You old fogies have got to listen to and be guided by me—me vox populi!"

Are there any men of high intelligence missionaries? I was quite sincere in my first lines in asserting that I knew of none; and all my life I have read of them, met their friends, and even heard them lecture. Six years ago I went to a church in Yonkers one evening with an evangelical acquaintance to listen to two young Scotchmen on their way to India. They were good-looking, strapping young men, who ought to have been soldiers of the Queen, and they were educated well out of illiteracy. But they did not have a fourth-rate brain between them. They did not make a remark that was not contemptible. They were silly, bathostical sentimentalists, and if they vented the phrase "the sweet old story" once they vented it twenty-five times. No man ever made such an ass of himself in his first love letters, and I felt so ashamed for them that I was uncomfortable and finally got up and walked out. And these young fools were going over to squirt Christianity at Buddha's thumb.

A man I know has just returned from Japan and traveled with a number of missionaries who had escaped the just wrath of the Confucians. On Sunday mornings they held divine service, and my informant, who is by no means a scoffer, but a good deal of a Puritan, said that their want of intelligence, their feeble sentimentalism, made him blush for his country. It was all twaddle, all pathos, never an appeal to the intelligence, to the reasoning powers of educated, thinking man.

This summer, while I was in the Adirondacks, I went to the village church to hear a traveling evangel of some repute. My curiosity took me, for the evangel was a woman, and I wondered what her tactics would be. Perhaps, in spite of a former experience, which I will relate in a moment, I thought that woman might shine in a calling unworthy of an able-bodied man. The first view was encouraging, for she was an intelligent-looking young woman, dressed with a certain taste that indicated common sense. But her discourse was quite the worst I ever heard. She talked for an hour, and she did not make a remark that was not flat and brainless, despite her really pitiful earnestness. I was extremely interested, because she prefaced her address with a long supplication, whose sincerity no one could question, to the Almighty to put the right words in her mouth to move her hearers and fill them with the spirit of holiness. But her appeal left them quite unmoved, those simple mountain people; try as hard as she might she could not "hit them in the right spot." The Almighty had no use for her. He thought her a poor fool, who was going about making an ass of herself, and he would do nothing to encourage her. Otherwise he would have granted her prayer.

I crossed the ocean once with a young woman from some small Western town, who was on her way to India to teach the Buddhists Christianity with a Chicago accent. She threatened to bore me a good deal so I diverted her mind by warning her that if she were not careful India would ruin her complexion, which was her only beauty. This so alarmed and interested her that she spent the lucid moments of her voyage writing down all the complexion recipes the passengers could remember or invent, and if she thought on her mission—for which she was as well fitted as the others I have mentioned—we were not aware of the fact.

How the gods above must grin.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

ROME! ROME!

It Is the Ruin of Nations.

THE VIEWS OF N. V. RUTHVEN, AN EX-PRIEST, IN THE ISLE OF WIGHT GUARDIAN.

When Ferdinand and Isabella ruled, second to none of the great nationalities of the west was Spain. Her commerce was vast, her colonies numerous, her culture rare, her art glorious, her power almost supreme. How came the fall from the heights of her ancient splendor to the gutter of her present decrepitude? But one answer is there. Because of Rome. Romish priests have ruled and ruined Spain; and standing midst the mental decadence, the moral decay, the political ruin, the military ineptitude, the religious degradation, the utter ruin, of the nation, the priests might truthfully, when asked to show the outcome of their power and their influence, answer, "look around." When she entered on her late disastrous war with the United States, Crispi, Italy's great statesman, on being asked his opinion answered, "It is the end of Spain. The Spaniards have shown themselves cruel, barbarous, and utterly incapable of governing the Pearl of the Antilles. The prime cause of all this is the general state of ignorance in the upper as well as the lower classes. It is the priesthood, absolutely sovereign, which has led that fine country into ruin."

Well and truly did Crispi speak, and with the full assurance of absolute knowledge, knowledge forced upon him by the condition of abject misery to which the priesthood had reduced his own country and his own countrymen, until, at last, Cavour and Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel rose up and drove before them, at bayonet point and cannon mouth, the vampire host which for ten dark and sorrow-laden centuries had feasted on the life-blood of the people. Tersely but fully did Garibaldi sum the situation up when, surveying the ignorance, the poverty, the brutal depravity, and the crime-encrusted lives of the Italian people, he sorrowfully exclaimed, "the priesthood has been the cancer of Italy." And as of Italy, so of Spain, so of Portugal, so of every nation which bows down before and is led to ruin by that most miserable of all fetiches, a man-made priesthood.

Examine, even in the most cursory manner, the world's map, and whenever you find ignorance, lack of commercial enterprise, crime run rampant, political decadence, mental stagnation, there you find the priesthood battening on the life-blood of the people, and, as a very cancer eating into the vitals of their industry, their wealth, their possessions, their possibilities for great and good and noble undertakings. Look at the Celtic south and west of Ireland, look at the cantons of Switzerland peopled by the Latins; look at the southern provinces of Luther's land, where Luther's work was not at all, or only partly done; look at Spain and Italy and France and Austria and Portugal; look at Mexico and the turmoil-tossed republics of Central and South America; and in them you see every unlovely attribute of humanity magnified and distorted and made more unlovely still; in them you see ignorance settled as a pall upon the masses of the people; in them you see grinding poverty; in them you see bloodshed and riot, blackguardism, and illegitimacy, and in them also you see, hovering over and blasting all who fell beneath its black, pest-laden shadow, the priesthood.

But light is flowing in upon the darkness; the light of mental liberty, which is gradually driving the shadows of superstition from this old world of ours; the light of liberty, by the glimmer of whose early dawn the hammer of common sense is being lifted up to smite and break in pieces the stony-hearted destroyers of the people, the priests, aye, and many of the preachers, too, who have long been weighed in the balance of the world's patience and forbearance; weighed, only at last to be found wanting, wanting in every attribute of truth and honor and honesty, wanting in pity for the weakly, in mercy for the hopeless, in common justice between man and man. To this increeping of light of liberty, dissipation of the mists of superstition, many things bear witness. In the daily papers of April 25, 1899, we read the following Reuter's telegram:

"Corrunna.—An anti-clerical meeting was held here to-day, attended by 300 people. Violent discourses were delivered against the clergy, the evils affecting the country being attributed to the Jesuits and the monks."

"Barcelona.—Violent speeches were made to-day at a meeting of Freethinkers here. One orator bitterly attacked the Jesuits and said the Philippines had been lost to Spain by the monks."

An that this orator spoke but simple truth witness a cablegram published in the American newspapers of May 1, last. The subject is "The Situation in the Philippines," and he said the situation is summed up as follows: "The friars are a menace and a danger to the introduction of civilization."

In France the exodus from Rome is growing, and the republic has, by a timely discovery, been awakened to the dangers of allowing vast wealth to be accumulated by the servants of the "true church," who play upon the credulity of the living, the terrors of the dying. Quite recently the "House of the Assumptionist Fathers" in Paris was searched by order of the government. In the cell of one holy "brother," vowed of course, to poverty, was found in notes, gold, and securities the tidy little sum of £72,000. And now France contemplates important changes in the law governing religious bequests and the holding of property by religious communities.

In Austria the popular movement from Rome has assumed proportions which are described by Romish authorities as "alarming."

And so the dawn is stealing quietly, yet surely, over the nations of the earth, giving light to the understanding, freedom to the will, and strength to the heart of all mankind. And not from Rome alone are men seeking to be free. Too long and too much have they been vexed by a pseudo-Christianity which, preaching charity, has practiced selfishness. Trading on the names of mighty men who feared not death and persecution, we have to-day "Protestants" who make a living by their protestantism, but who have long ceased to protest. Therefore do we find the churches practically deserted, and by their benches, two-thirds empty, one-third filled with women and with their children, testifying that men have grown weary and heart-sick of the attenuated platitudes preached in the name of the Galilean teacher, who tore the veil of humbug and hypocrisy from off the faces of deceivers of the people.

A HEATHEN'S VIEW

Of the Christian Missionaries in China.

To the Editor:—We have all been told that the missionaries in the Orient are honest, guileless, self-sacrificing creatures who have two purposes in life, viz., to save souls and to follow the example and teachings of Jesus. Worldliness and unselfishness are supposed to be their crowning virtues and the "Sermon on the Mount" the inspiration of their daily lives.

A correspondent of the New York Sun, in a letter from Pekin, China, printed to-day, describes the conditions prevalent in that city immediately after the siege. After telling what the foreigners did, after comparative quiet had been restored, he says:

"The Rev. W. S. Ament, who is at the head of the American Board Missions in Pekin, remembered a certain nobleman's residence from which all sorts of Boxer troubles emanated. While the Chinese were fleeing from the city with the soldiers of the foreign nations at their heels he sought out this place and entered to find it deserted. So recently had it been occupied that food was still cooking on the fire. The Boxer patron's furniture, fine china, winter furs, and even his jewelry and valuables were intact. He had evidently never dreamed of the foreign armies entering Pekin, and had therefore failed to pack up before leaving. Mr. Ament returned for his Chinese followers and a few Congregational missionaries and took possession of the place. He considered himself quite justified in seizing the house, for there was evidence that it had been occupied by a Boxer band in the days of the siege. Several rifles were found in the various buildings about the compound, a number of banners, and all the paraphernalia used in Boxer rites.

"Mr. Ament considered that the Chinese owed him and his converts anything they had, so he took possession of the palace and settled down to make himself comfortable with what he found around him. In the store-rooms he found rice and grain, and in the stables riding ponies, mules and carts. Some 200 Chinese Christians, converts of the Congregationalists, have settled about the place and a small co-operative colony is in operation there. The girls' school has resumed studies in one of the buildings, under the direction of Miss Sheffield. One of the houses has been cleared of furniture, fitted with seats, and is being used as a chapel, where morning prayers are held every day, and regular services every Sunday.

"The other missionaries have sought homes for themselves like the American Board people. The Congregationalists from Tung Chow, headed by the Rev. Mr. Tewksbury, are comfortably stationed in the Yu Wang Fu, the palace of Prince Yu, one of the descendants of the robber chieftain who captured Pekin 250 years ago. This place is a marvel of buildings, courts, passageways and gardens.

"The Yu Wang palace was captured by Mr. Tewksbury and his people in much the same manner as Pei Le Fu was taken by the Rev. Mr. Ament, but after the soldiers of four nations and the Chinese had taken turns at looting it. There was an astonishing lot of treasures left for the missionaries to gather up. Yu Wang Fu has now been a famous place for several days among the foreign element, because its spoils are being sold off to all persons who wish them and the money is being applied to a fund for the indemnifying of Christian Chinese who lost their worldly goods during the siege. Prince Yu, could he be present, would probably cry out in dismay at the ruthless distribution of his treasure, his scores of fur robes, fine sables and wolf skins, richly embroidered garments of every description, household ornaments, fine chinaware and porcelain and even the family jewels which were left behind.

"For several days after finding all this plunder it was a problem to the missionaries to know what to do with it. They considered it unrighteous to appropriate it to themselves, and somebody was certain to take it. The Russians, for instance, under whose control this part of the city had been placed, would have no scruples. So they finally adopted the expedient of selling the spoils and applying the proceeds to the needs of the Chinese converts. So the headquarters of this mission has been the scene of commercial activity for several days. Army officers and civilians, bent on acquiring souvenirs of the campaign, have gone to the Yu Wang Fu with their money and come away laden with genuine relics of rich Pekin. These persons are perhaps sorting over their stock of loot purchased or acquired otherwise, and wondering how much of it they will be able to transport or to pay duty on for returning home."

Verily, while these innocent emissaries of the "meek and lowly Prince of Peace" were looting the homes of unfortunate Chinamen they were crying aloud to the credulous people of America to send "more contributions" to "relieve the sufferings of the Chinese converts" in Pekin. If the "head of the American Board of Missions" led in the looting, what may we expect from the humbler member of the profession?

ONE OF THE HEATHENS.

ECHOES

Of the N. S. A. Convention at Cleveland.

It is a fact that among Spiritualists there are those who are opposed to organization, while there are many others (and their numbers are growing) who see in organization the only solution to the vexing problems which have confronted us as a people. Many Spiritualists have come out of the various creedal denominations, and remembering their struggles in the effort to throw off the yoke of ecclesiastical tyranny, are fearing the formulating of still other creeds that may bind the conscience and prevent freedom of thought, and such have been and are still content to drift along an unorganized and aimless body, with the idea that the dear angels will take care of their own cause without organized effort on our part.

That Spiritualism has made wonderful strides without organization is true, but there are many thoughtful persons who realize that in organized effort much more could have been accomplished. The N. S. A. has now had an existence of seven years, and while mistakes have been made and doubtless will continue to be made, the fact remains that to-day we have a standing before the world not hitherto attained. There have been abuses in the presentation of our phenomena and philosophy which have caused the blush of shame to mantle the cheeks of many Spiritualists, and which could not be remedied under the old order of go-as-you-please, and no one responsible.

We have been powerless to cope with the fake element, the dishonest, the licentious and the intemperate, and have been compelled to bear the sneers of the ignorant multitude when rated as a conglomerate mass without definite aim or purpose, and have lost the co-operation of many excellent men and women, because of our entire lack of common sense methods.

Undoubtedly there are sincere and well-meaning persons who will continue to oppose the N. S. A., but it seems to the writer that had they been upon the floor of the late convention at Cleveland, they would withhold their criticisms and cease their opposition, at least to the extent of giving the association a still further trial before condemning it. Could they have been present and heard the reports of splendid work already accomplished, could they have seen the bright faces and witnessed the earnest manner of every delegate there assembled, each and every one with a sole determination to cast aside all personal differences, and with an earnest purpose to work for what they deemed the best good of all concerned, they would at least have given due credit for integrity of purpose however much they might differ in opinion.

Delegates, men and women of brains, were assembled from every important state in the Union, and if there were any axes to grind it was not apparent upon the surface.

Never has it been my lot to meet the friends in convention assembled where there was so much harmony and so little friction manifested.

It is my belief that all delegates returned to their homes possessed with a feeling of enthusiasm which augurs well for the future of the N. S. A., and for Spiritualism.

We were royally treated by the citizens, by the press, and by the gentlemen comprising the Business League of Cleveland, and accorded every privilege given to any other body of delegates of whatsoever name or nature.

The generous and whole-souled treasurer of the N. S. A., T. J. Mayer, was about the happiest man in the convention as he tendered to President Barrett the deed of our new home. He has a splendid physique and his heart is as large as his body, and I believe every delegate present will echo the sentiment, "May his shadow never grow less."

In addition to a beautiful home as headquarters of the association, there is an endowment fund of over fourteen thousand dollars in the treasury, to be used as the wisdom of the board shall direct. The board is composed of thorough business men who have the welfare of Spiritualism at heart, and who can be depended upon to carry out the will of the delegates, and who feel to acquiesce in the proposition of Mr. Mayer, namely: "Trust us for one year to carry out your expressed wishes, and then if you don't like us, put us out."

It is worthy of note that the railroad officials treated us with marked consideration and said to President Barrett: "You are fully entitled to every privilege accorded to any other body, and if you do not get what belongs to you it will be because you do not ask for it."

With a 25-cent admission at the door, our evening audiences taxed the seating capacity of the hall, and were composed of the best people of the city, all of whom paid the closest attention to the various speakers and to the demonstrators of the phenomena.

Several clergymen were present, and two of them received convincing proof of the continuity of life, which they promptly acknowledged.

Now that we have a local habitation and a name and standing in the esteem of the public on a par with other bodies (all of which is due to organization), does it not behoove every earnest worker, medium and speaker alike, as well as all true Spiritualists, to stand by the N. S. A. and perfect an organization that shall prove a credit and a blessing to Spiritualists and to Spiritualism?

WILL C. HODGE.

Voltaire lived long before the modern style of writing history was in vogue, and he was of the opinion that history is little else than a picture of human crimes and misfortunes.

There are people in this world so constituted that they go looking for vice with a telescope and can't see virtue with a magnifying glass.

No rock is so hard but that a little wave may beat admission in a thousand years.—Tennyson.

RECEIVED A SHOCK.

It Cured Him of Agnosticism and Materialism.

I notice in a number of papers within the last few weeks that "I had an attack of paralysis which was at the time considered serious." I have received a number of letters of condolence from distant friends, and thinking that a few of the readers of your paper may desire to know the truth of these reports, I write this communication. It is all a mistake. I never had a stroke of paralysis that affected my physical system, and I never enjoyed better health than I do at present. In fact I never was sick two consecutive days in my life.

It is true in 1889 I did receive a paralytic stroke which was both severe and decided, but it only affected my agnosticism or infidelity. My scientific studies led me into materialism and disbelief in a future existence beyond the grave. With me death closed the drama of human life. There was no future of conscious existence, only a long eternity of annihilation or nothingness. I visited Lily Dale and the second day of my tarrying there, through the agency of two mediums, Dr. Watkins and Mr. Keeler, I did receive a shock to my agnosticism that was fatal to it, and opened my mental vision to the radiant sunlight of Spiritualism. There could be no mistake; I found that I was surrounded by a number of unseen intelligences that had all the characteristics of friends that had long since passed over the mystic river of death. Their identity was as certainly manifested as that of any of my numerous clients and business correspondents.

Four long weary years I had wandered in doubt and uncertainty. Like a wanderer in the dreary wastes of Sahara's terrible sands and solitudes, I saw nothing around me but an uninhabited boundless area of desolation, with no vista beyond the range of my clouded vision. In a few moments' time there was revealed to me the beautiful oasis of the spirit life; with joy unspeakable I visited it and there amid a wealth of summer verdure of trees and flowers I found a spring of living water. The joy of that moment was unspeakable, and future investigation has shown me that it was not a mirage or a phantom of the atmosphere but a living fact, as clearly proven by the logic of experience and the philosophy of our beautiful religion as any physical force in nature's broad domain.

I care very little for the discussion of the existence or non-existence of an infinite intelligence. To my mind there are three immortal or eternal existences—matter, force and intelligence.

It matters not which name we give to this intelligence. That it exists is evident to every thinking mind. It is as useless for conventions to try to argue out of existence this intelligence as to annihilate matter and force by mental ratiocination. A construction of two different physical forms like the sexes in both animal and vegetable life to produce the phenomena of future procreation is unmistakable evidence of a design which could not exist without intelligence commensurate with the object to be accomplished.

But I wander from my subject; at present I am in excellent health; I am actively employed in the practice of my profession, and growing stronger every year in the convictions of a future for man, and an increasing knowledge of a force that permits a communication with an unseen world.

I am aware of the fact that I am rapidly approaching the boundaries of this life—that in the language of the accompanying poem, by an unknown author, I am growing old; yet with the investigation of passing years I am more and more convinced that there is a life beyond the grave, and that we can and do communicate with those who have preceded us in the pathway of human destiny.

GROWING OLD.

A little more gray in the lessening hair
Each day as the years go by;
A little more stooping to the form,
A little more dim the eye.
A little more faltering of the step
As we tread life's pathway o'er,
But a little nearer every day
To the ones who have gone before.

A little more halting of the gait,
And a dullness of the ear;
A growing weariness of the frame
With each swift passing year,
A fading of hopes, and ambitions, too,
A faltering in life's quest;
But a little nearer every day
To a sweet and peaceful rest.

A little more loneliness in life
As the dear ones pass away;
A bigger claim on the spirit land
With every passing day.
A little further from toil and care,
A little less way to roam;
A drawing near to a peaceful voyage
And a happy welcome home.

LOVE IS LEADER.

Listen to the music swelling,
Hearken how its surges roll,
Grander grows the anthem telling
Of the mysteries of the soul.

Singing through the silent spaces—
Spaces known alone to thee,
Rhythmic ringing from pure places,
Fall the tones in melody.

Life is love, and love eternal—
Legions form themselves in line,
Joyous are the hosts supernal,
Moving on toward heights divine.

Where the air is clearer, purer,
Where the gentle graces grow,
Where the steps are stronger, surer,
Mounting upward, as they go.

Listen to the tone-bells falling,
Softly on the inner ear—
Hearken! They are gladly calling,
Love is leader! God is near!

TRANSFERENCE.

System of Telepathy Among Dogs.

As a breed, perhaps, the St. Bernard may be said to be the telepathist among dogs. We speak of instinct in animals; we call this or that dog intelligent, and characterize the one or other related incident as wonderful or impossible. Telepathy is the most possible explanation, says the New York Sun. In the instance of a St. Bernard owned by a gentleman at Prague we have a case of telepathy. How else can the story be explained or accepted? During the evening of a day on which there had been a heavy fall of snow, and while snow was still falling, the gentleman, sitting alone by the fire with his dog, noticed him growing uneasy and restless in manner. Presently the dog got up and whines for the door of the room to be opened. Thinking he wanted to go to the kitchen for food, his owner opened the door and let the dog out, but the animal returned and seemed to expect something further of him. Going out into the hall after the dog, he found him making the same signs of uneasiness before the hall door. His owner, therefore, took down hat and coat, and thought the usual evening exercise was what the dog wanted. On his opening the door, the dog, contrary to his usual custom, turned to the left, and made straight off in a certain direction. Following him at a run, the owner lost sight of him. Whistling and calling did not bring the dog back. He was able to track the animal's footsteps and found him in the act of removing the snow from a wretched waif, a man still living, who from hunger and exposure had fainted and was half-frozen. This was some half-mile from the house.

A gentleman personally known to me recounted the following experience: "When I lived at Rustchuk-on-the-Danube I had a very clever pointer. The dog was not used greatly for sport, but was chiefly the companion of my children. I was in the habit of taking journeys of several days' duration and uncertain length. Usually I was not able to inform my family of the day of my return. Sometimes the difficulties of traveling made it impossible for me to judge myself when I might return. My dog always knew I used to return home by steamer from the other side of the river. My wife always knew from which steamer I should land by the dog's manner. Shortly before the steamer on which I was about to cross was timed to leave the station on the opposite river bank, the pointer became restless and excited and would go out into the garden to watch the steamer come across to our landing stage. My wife used to say to the children: 'Papa is on the steamer.' The dog never made a mistake, although I might have come by any of the steamers leaving during the day. There was no hazard or guesswork in the dog's proceedings. Simply he knew the moment his master set foot on the steamer, and showed that he knew it. Were the other steps of the journey all a blank to him, or was he, we wonder, through the same means, conscious of his master's doings?"

A dachshund, the friend of the children, acknowledged only one grown up—the children's father. He would lie curled up in the nursery armchair, snoring, certainly sound asleep, until half an hour before the arrival of the dogcart. Then he would go down into the hall and sit in a certain spot. Sometimes his owner arrived at midday, sometimes in the afternoon, sometimes only for 7 o'clock dinner. Certainly the servants knew, and some commotion existed in the house when the return was after a few days' or a week's absence, but nothing disturbed the quiet of the nursery, and carts from the stables might be sent out to fetch provisions or parcels from the station, five miles away, at any hour. The dog knew which cart went for his master, and, what is still more wonderful, if he failed to take that train, a telegram at the station sometimes bade the coachman wait; but never was the dog found waiting any but the last half-hour before the arrival at the house door. This was the stock story of the servants and any one of them would have vouched for it with his or her character, as I heard many times. The dog had fretted greatly at the absence of his master for a year and a half while he was in South America, and this wonderful knowledge of his owner's proceedings showed itself after his return on the resumption of the usual family life of the household.—Pittsburg Times.

LET ME HEAR YOUR VOICES.

Let me hear your voices,
Angels ever near;
Let me hear your music,
Sweetly soft and clear;
Inwardly I listen
For your silent word—
To the spirit spoken,
By the spirit heard.

Let me hear your voices
When the morning calls,
When the noontide gladdens,
When the twilight falls,
In the hour of labor,
In the hour of rest,
By your silent message,
Be my spirit blest.

Let me hear your voices,
When my heart is sad;
In the midst of sorrow,
Let my soul be glad.
Sing your song of beauty,
Hope and strength and cheer,
Till my soul shall answer:
Angels e'er are near.

Let me hear your voices
Breathing sweetest song:
All my soul responsive
Shall the strains prolong—
Sweetest strains of music
Float from heaven's door—
In my inmost being
Echo evermore.

THE GREAT VICTORY.

Death Portrayed as a Blessing.

THE VIEWS OF THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK HERALD.

"Jesus saith unto her, I am the resurrection and the life."—John 2:25.

It is a mistake to suppose that we enter the eternal life after death. It began at our birth. An insignificant part of this eternal life is spent on earth, where we learn our first lessons, like children in a primary school who grasp the simplest rudiments of education, unconscious of the possibilities of the future. And as children enter schools of a higher grade when they have outgrown the lower, so are we transferred by death to other realms, where larger opportunities and duties will greet us.

When that change comes into our experience it will be like opening a door from a dark room to a room brilliantly lighted. Death cannot entail in anywise a loss, but is always an advantage. It robs us of nothing which is valuable, of neither memory or affection, nor in any degree of our personality. The things which seemed necessary to our earthly comfort, our wealth, for example, will be left behind because they will be of no use in the new environment, but all the furnishings of the soul will resist death as pure gold resists the testing acid. Character is indestructible and can be changed only as we ourselves, through some inward motive, voluntarily change it.

The other side, therefore, is far preferable to this side. Life will be more worth living there than here. We are now hampered by circumstances, but there we shall have uninterrupted freedom to follow our noblest impulses and to become our best selves. Heaven is not a place of rest simply, but rather of divine activity. The angels are as busy as we are. God's work must be done by those who remain for yet a little while. The only things that are different are the conditions under which the work is to be done, and these conditions are more favorable than any which prevail here.

If all this be true we should dismiss the ghastly dread with which we regard the change called death. Instead of fearing we should welcome it at the time appointed. Undimmed faith in the future casts a ray of glorious sunshine on the tomb which dispels its darkness. Death is not an entrance into night, but a journey through lesser light into the greater. Our loved ones do not die. They are born again. They do not leave us, for in very truth they may be nearer to us than ever before. Our mutual love is no more destroyed than when they go to some distant land for a season. I even dare to say that when a dear one goes to heaven there ought to be congratulations mingled with our condolence. Perfect faith casts out all fear, and beneath our sorrow at the loss of the visible presence is the glorious consciousness that the departed are awaiting our coming in a land that is fairer than this.

That all conquering faith is sometimes met. It is the normal condition of a thoroughly devoted soul. It is the result of a religion which has stood the test of experience and made us victorious, of a practical religion which towers above the ambitions and avarice of this present time as a mountain towers above the plain.

I sat not long since by the deathbed of a man who had held these views for many years. He was not simply resigned to his fate, he was glad that the change was about to occur. There was no unnatural exaltation of mind, no abnormal ecstasy. His mental faculties were as clear as the daylight, and his heart was as quiet as a summer lake. He knew that he was God's child and that the Father would care for him. This life had many an allurement, but when told that the end was not far off he bade us all good-by as one who goes on a journey, assuring us that we should meet again after a little. It seemed to him the simplest thing in the world to die and the most natural. The other life had a divine attraction and he was almost eager to enter into it.

I came away with the feeling that the religion which can produce such a result must have the indorsement of the Almighty and is the most desirable possession that we can pray for. It makes one strong to bear the ills of life, because they are stepping stones to higher things. It is so practical that it seems like a giant who walks by your side, invisible, but always there and always ready to lift you over the hard places. He who has it is already living within the confines of heaven.

We must recover from some of our blind prejudices concerning death. It is not an enemy, it is a messenger of God, and such a messenger can never be other than kindly. To Christ it must have been an infinite relief, and to us who follow in his footsteps it is the inn in which we sleep on the last night before we reach home. In the morning when we wake from slumber we find ourselves on the brighter shore in the presence of the loved who have gone before. Such faith makes us peaceful, contented and happy, glad to live as long as we may and glad to go when the Father summons us.

MOTHER LOVE.

There's no love like a mother's
So lasting, deep and true.
No matter what her children,
May think, or say or do,
She holds them ever dearer
Than any words can tell,
And though they wander from her,
She loves them just as well.

If any road is taken
Which leads them into wrong,
Her love it never lessens,
But grows more deep and strong.
A mother's love is sacred,
Her heart is always true—
Her tender sweet affection,
Forever fresh and new.

VARIOUS VIEWS OF THE N. S. A.

A Condensed Resume of The Progressive Thinker's Symposium.

Briefly stated, the various views of the N. S. A., and of its creed, as expressed in The Progressive Thinker of October 20, are as follows:

1. So far it has not been a success. Between $25,000 and $30,000 have been expended. The chartered societies are financially weak and unable to contribute but a mere pittance to the parent body. Altogether the fund has been barely sufficient for running expenses. Of the 600 societies, only about 30 are able to maintain meetings throughout the season.

2. "Infinite Intelligence" must be fully aware of what the association is doing. Why not get an expression of its views on the matter? Let a committee be apointed for that purpose with the Rev. Moses Hull as chairman, and give them a year to report thereon.

3. The religious world has been run on Divine Revelations. If the N. S. A. hopes to command respect, let it rest upon Man and not upon God.

4. Substitute "Divine" for "Infinite" Intelligence. What do we know of the Infinite?

5. Gods are of man's creation. Infinite Intelligence is abstruse. Let us deal only with things knowable.

6. Infinite Intelligence in the declaration of principles is not qualified by the word "an." Why not say "Infinite Spirit?"

7. The present declaration is defective. Finite intelligence cannot postulate infinite intelligence without accepting the theory of design—hence personality.

8. Infinite Intelligence in the declaration does not mean a new Deity. It is the same as the Great Positive Mind of A. J. Davis, or the Supreme Mind of A. R. Wallace, or the Our Father and Our Mother, Too, of Theodore Parker. Spiritual organizations have been characterized as Godless, Christless, religionless, prayerless. If there can be a better definition than Infinite Intelligence, I shall be among the first to accept it.

9. Substitute God in place of Infinite Intelligence.

10. Infinite Intelligence is entirely speculative; it is beyond my comprehension. I can conceive of no intelligence which was not developed through the processes of nature. Public prayer is a mere formality. Prayer cannot change nature's laws.

11. Infinite Intelligence is the same old personal God of the church, or it is a new one made up for a special use, or it means Pantheism in its broadest sense. So far the N. S. A. is a sectarian organization. Let it expunge its present creed and substitute a simple one with no expression of belief about God. The Unity of Humanity might form its basis.

12. The Christian world has buried its Devil and now seems preparing the obsequies of the God of olden time. No straight-jacket creed for me.

13. We don't want a high priest or pope at Washington. Gods are all man-made. We don't want any creeds or churches. Missionary work is a mistake. Let Spiritualism become the Leader and Interpreter of the world's philosophy.

14. This new God, this neuter entity which you term Infinite Intelligence, I would rather call infinite folly. I am content with the God we have. I believe in a personal God, in the divinity of Christ, in the Apostles' Creed, and the substantial authenticity of the Bible.

15. Let Spiritualists amuse themselves with creed-making. The N. S. A. is yet a baby.

16. I have never been in favor of formulating a creed. The attempt to do so will be as futile as that of the various Christian sects. The sum total of a declaration of principles should be what we know about man, and not what we believe about God. Science can deal only with phenomena. Spiritualism cannot be both a science and a religion. Let Infinite Intelligence alone and let religion alone. I do not want another church instituted.

17. My objection to the N. S. A. is that it is not strong enough, and if it were stronger I should more strongly obbject. Thus far it has been little more than a mass-meeting. Not one Spiritualist in a thousand is a member of the N. S. A. I protest against any attempt to force a statement of belief. What has the N. S. A. given for the money it has received? Its strength must come from the local societies. Churches send out missionaries to propagate belief. Wouldn't it be queer to send them out to preach belief in astronomy or mathematics? Do we want to imitate the churches? After all that Spiritualists have said about the "fraud" of granting passes on railroads to the clergy, shall we send out lecturers dubbed "Rev." to beg for half-fare tickets?

18. The N. S. A. seems to have discovered the image of a new God. Let it be placed in the Pantheon of images. Babylon's king dreamed of a great image with a head of gold, and feet of iron mixed with clay. I wonder which is the ruling word of Infinite Intelligence—the adjective or the noun! If it is the latter, then I see the feet of iron mixed with clay. I want no such base material to stand for God. The occult power which the Aryan named "Od," and which we have Anglicized and named God, is Immortal Man. God is a personification of the highest spirit or motive of life as man incarnate or excarnate.

19. Instead of knowledge old religions have given to the world beliefs, dogmas, superstitions and speculations. Do we believe in Infinite Intelligence? So did Pope Innocent III., Torquemada and John Calvin. Let the N. S. A. leave creed-making to the adepts of that art, and disseminate high-born truths, facts and philosophy.

20. Fifty years ago a few unwise spirits whispered to some thoughtless mortals that Spiritualist were never to be organized. Now we have about 100,000 avowed Spiritualists, 200 well known public workers, 1,000 located physical and test media, and at least 1,000 slick swindlers passing under the name medium. And it is claimed by some that there are 9,800,000 other Spiritualists who never acknowledge it to the census enumerators. Let the N. S. A. confer upon mediums and lecturers the title "Medium or Lecturer for the N. S. A." Infinite Intelligence is a term I should not choose, but it is better than nothing. Better have a God which is a little too pretentious than none at all. Cosmic Soul would, to me, be far preferable.

21. Instead of creeds, the cultured Spiritualist would have a scientific statement of principles. Instead of a religion founded on mere faith and tradition, he would have a religion of spiritual aspiration which is sustained by soul-cheering facts. We need to send eloquent missionaries and mediums over the whole country, but to do this the N. S. A. needs to be made powerful with means to foot the bills.

22. The N. S. A. in the first two years brought Spiritualists and societies all over the land into touch with each other and united them as they could not otherwise have been. It has obtained a hearing in the United States courts. Even this is something, but it is only a small part accomplished up to 1895. Since then it has been steadily going forward. It has shown that organization is a necessity and that a central association is needed. Some ten or twenty writers have ventilated their objections and criticisms through the Spiritual press. Do their personal opinions express the views of the majority of true Spiritualists? The N. S. A. has established before the law Spiritualism as a religion. It has brought the great railroad companies to recognize its teachers and preachers by granting special rates of fare. If Infinite Intelligence is an offensive term to the majority of the delegates let it be stricken out. But the great need is more missionary work, and the association has been handicapped for want of funds. Thanks to T. J. Mayer and other liberal friends it is now in a better shape to carry on its good work than ever. It has a library of over 500 volumes, and it is frequented by people from all parts of the country, seeking light on Spiritualism.

23. The N. S. A. is no mean factor in the propagation of Spiritualism. It makes but little difference what name or title we give to the Supreme Power. For brevity I prefer God, but perhaps Great Spirit would be more appropriate for a Spiritual society. I have the strongest conviction that the evolution of Spiritualism will eventually find him out.

24. If there is an Infinite Intelligence that intelligence will be glad to see us helping deluded mortals out of the quagmire of superstition and every form of human misery. If God is immanent in everything, then we have to love everything to love God.

25. The dead and decaying theologies are repulsive to those who are quickened by advanced thought and are reaching after higher truths. Leave the question of new titles and names for the Supreme Power to those who have not outgrown the need of the old theologies.

26. Modern Spiritualism has no more exact knowledge of the Deity than has any other cult. Hence all effort to formulate such a Deity is but the old-time effort to establish a priesthood. If Spiritualism is not science it is nothing.

27. To affirm the existence of God is to assume definite knowledge of what must necessarily remain unknowable. A declaration of principles should not go beyond what can be satisfactorily demonstrated.

28. The N.S.A. is yet a child. Is it a necessity? I think it is. Does it need a creed? I think it does—not an ironclad creed but an elastic one. Infinite Intelligence may not be the fittest expression, but I fail to see the alarming tendency of such a declaration. Why choke the child to death with a Godphobia gag? Let it grow; let it secure a home and a sinking fund. Let us aim to conserve all that is valuable in religion.

29. Any other name than Infinite Intelligence would not improve the situation. The N. S. A. is a necessity if we expect to be recognized as a power for good.

30. All religious creeds have been clogs to freedom of thought and deadlock to progress. The large majority of our population are non-Christian. Wherein does the attempt to formulate a creed for Spiritualists differ, in principle, from the attempt to put God in the Constitution? Liberty is life; a fossized creed is a synonym of stagnation and death. Witness the painful throes of the Presbyterians to reform their creed. Organization may be desirable, but a creed is not necessary. Spiritualism is the philosophy and science of Being or Life. Such a declaration, as a matter of fact or knowledge, would doubtless be accepted by all Spiritualists.

31. Man is a gregarious animal, and association is necessary to his activities. Organization is not a synonym of Association. The latter begets harmony, the former means authority and rule. Let the N. S. A. drop its creeds. Let Spiritualists unite on the common ground of a knowledge of continuous life from the evidence given by our departed friends. A salaried priesthood will mark a decline in Spiritualism.

32. The N. S. A. of last year did not give science a slap in the face, as alleged by Prof. Loveland. There is no parallel between its action and the adoption of the Nicene creed. Faith is a well known principle in human nature. True faith is as surely scientific as a rule in metaphysics. Superstition is the exercise of faith without the light of reason. Coeval with infinite space is infinite spirit. Infinite intelligence in the Declaration comes short of full truth, inasmuch as infinite goodness and infinite power are not mentioned. All three principles constitute infinite spirit. Do you say we know nothing about them? What do we know about infinite progression?

33. To demand unanimity of belief is a curtailment of liberty. This unanimity cannot be enforced. We can have no conception of the infinite. Let Infinite Intelligence be eliminated from the declaration. Positive knowledge only should be affirmed.

34. Let the N. S. A. affirm a belief in and reverence for the Supreme Power designated as God. Let it also declare that the continuity of life can be practically demonstrated.

35. The N. S. A. has failed to meet the requirements of Spiritualism in a great measure. Let the God question be ignored. I have no evidence of a personal or impersonal God. Positive tangible evidence should be the basis of a declaration of principles.

36. It is a mistake to affirm a belief in Infinite Intelligence. Intelligence has three distinct meanings, the last of which is "A spiritual being." This, I apprehend, was what the N. S. A. intended to express. To my mind, the sun-worshiper is on a higher plane than one who worships an anthropomorphic being. Pantheism is as far above anthropomorphism as knowledge is above ignorance, truth above error. I am a Pantheistic Spiritualist.

37. Gods have no more power than those that produce them. Buddha's god originated in his own mind. When Spiritualism came to the front it was believed that all the gods had had their day. The God question was the main thing that brought the angels to the earth to help settle it. They came in 1848. Will not the God in nature suffice? He requires no high-sounding words of praise. When the love element prevails on the earth there will never be any more war in heaven.

38. With thinking people creeds have become things of the past. Spiritualism came when the age was ready for it. It has come to stay. The work will go on whether the N. S. A. exists or not. I regard the association as an important factor, even if it should continue to reaffirm Infinite Intelligence.

39. I think the declaration of principles can be improved and made to suit all Spiritualists. Let Infinite Intelligence be eliminated in the interest of harmony. I am not partial to it myself. Let the N. S. A. be sustained.

40. The N. S. A. has discovered a special and particular God and has named IT Infinite Intelligence—a seven-syllabled word, hoodooing all our spirit power by its anaconda-like uncoiling. It is paralyzing. W. H. BURR.

WARLIKE CHRISTIANS.

Judging the Tree by Its Fruits.

There is not a more uncertain word in our language than the word Christian, which is made to mean everything claimed or done in that name. Some are for war and some for peace (even if they have to fight for it). Their gospel says: "I come not to bring peace on earth, but a sword. Except a man hate his own family and kindred he cannot be my disciple." We do not believe Jesus ever taught such a principle nor uttered such language; but if he did, he was a bad man and responsible for the consequences of war and division.

Measured by that gospel, can we find a sane Christian who, if smitten on one cheek will turn the other also? who, if his coat be taken, will give up his cloak? who, if compelled to go a mile will go two? who gives to all who ask and never turns the borrower away? who loves his enemies? who takes no thought of his life or what he shall eat, drink and wear? Can you find one willing to be tested by the rule: "If they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them?" No. 'Tis folly. We do not like these precepts, but Christians profess to accept and approve them sentimentally, although practically they "are weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Christianity is about played out and has little resemblance to the original. We do not say there is nothing good in it. Jesus taught some things that were good and true, but not original with him. He taught things that he said were "of the law and the prophets," and things which we learn from history were taught by Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster and other great reformers who lived before his time. We can reasonably approve facts and true principles wherever we find them, without holding anything especially sacred because a certain person uttered it.

I remember in childhood of seeing the picture in a school book representing a Hindoo woman casting her babe to a crocodile in the Ganges river, to appease the wrath of her god. People thought that was perfectly horrible; yet, in the same book they were taught that the God of the Jews sent his only son for the purpose of being slain to appease his own wrath against the people. They did not consider that horrible, for they said everything this God did was all right. The Jews had to appease his wrath by shedding the blood of sheep, goats and cattle in sacrifice; and they committed many horrible crimes in his name. It is not surprising that people partake of the nature and attributes of the God they worship. With the root of their religion founded on a story of blood and murder, is it wonderful that they were of a warlike disposition, and that Christian nations are always ready and willing for war?

We do not want to be Christianized and do not blame the Chinese for resistance to the encroachments of missionaries in their country. For more than twenty-five years European nations have been planning a war with China, and they made no secret of it. They have got it at last, and now they will probably enforce their mixed religion of Orthodoxy and Catholicism upon an unwilling people.

The Methodist Bishop, E. Cranston, struck the true key-note of Christians and Christian nations when he said: "It is worth any cost in money and blood, if we can make the millions of Chinese true Christians." This is decidedly a bloodthirsty sentiment. They are going to Christianize the Chinese "in the holy name of religion." Missionaries have gone there in advance of armies and acted the part of spies. Sooner or later the sword follows the Bible and the missionary fraud.

Will the Chinese be any better by being Christianized? We say No, if we may judge by Christians in America. It is no credit or honor to a man here, and it is less so in China. It would have been much more commendable if the vast sums of missionary money had been used to relieve suffering Americans instead of paving the way for war. It is not for the love of religion nor of the Chinese that their conversion is sought; because this great nation, to show its intense hatred of that race, has, by its law, excluded them from entrance upon its soil, while it welcomes people of other nations. They have such love for the heathen as the cat has for the mouse, as the millionaire for the tramp.

Rev. Cranston now rises to explain: "When I said that the Christianizing of China would be worth any cost in money and life, I was speaking of voluntary missionary sacrifice upon the part of the church. I abhor the idea of making Christians by the force of arms." His explanation does not help him any. It is a square contradiction of his declaration that "it is worth any cost in blood and treasure, to make the Chinese true Christians." It would relieve him of his embarrassing situation if he will disavow one or the other of these statements.

In his explanation Mr. Cranston is in trouble about the propaganda business—wants the open door for Christianity—wants the civil powers to open it—complains of "our people shut up in Peking" and "the insignificant number of Americans in the relief column"—scolds about "the diplomatic hesitation at Washington as to the use of the troops," and says he "would cut all the red tape in the world and set aside the treaty with China in order to place America in the fore front with England." All this looks like war for propagandism, at a cost of blood and treasure: yet he "abhors the idea of making Christians by force of arms."

Mr. Cranston speaks "of voluntary missionary sacrifice on the part of the church." How much of sacrifice is it for a missionary to go on a free passport to China with a full purse for expenses, dress in fine clothing, live in luxury and draw a large salary? Thousands of church members would gladly embrace the opportunity to make such "voluntary sacrifices." The love of money, which is "the root of evil," is the ruling incentive in such cases. They trust in the Dollar—the Golden Calf, which is their god.

Christians or church members, only, should be the soldiers to fight out this war with China and show the true inwardness of their religion. But—no; it is their province to open the way and depend on the national powers to do the fighting. The God of the Jews commanded them to war against nations and kill them, which was done, and millions of lives lost. They had wars from the beginning to the end of their rule, when the Romans broke them up. Some Christian writers say religion has been the cause of many wars since that time. To what extent will it not go to conquer in its interests?

War, with its principles and effects, are incompatible with the moral principles that churches profess. This is hypocrisy. If they would practice their moral principles there would be no wars, and they would be better prepared to teach the heathens. The churches have become so divided and corrupted that the name Christian gives no weight or value to one's character, but is rather a thing of reproach; nothing in it to commend it to the heathen.

In view of all these conditions and causes, let us apologize for the warlike Christians. They can't help being what their religion makes them—they were educated that way—their doctrine of blood atonement, founded on a tale of murder, together with the horrid narrations of their Bible and church history, all have a great influence in moulding their character. The attributes of malice, revenge, envy, hatred are incompatible with true moral principle, but entirely consistent with popular religion. In view of all the mitigating circumstances we will not condemn the Christians too severely for their bigotry, intolerance, prejudice, combativeness, etc., yet it all goes to show what Christianity is in substance and effect. It will be a great advantage to all the world when Christians shall "See themselves as others see them." We judge the tree by its fruits—good for nothing.

A Letter from Wellington, New Zealand.

To the Editor: I do what I can to spread The Progressive Thinker. I hoard mine up for a few months and then give them away at our meetings, with a few words of praise. Our society here, which has been in operation for eighteen years, is taking a step forward. Last year we registered under Act of Parliament, and this year we have decided to build a new hall worthy of the cause and empire city of New Zealand. The ground is freehold and we hope to establish a fine hall for the Spiritualists of the colony who may visit the capital from time to time.

I think when our new hall is opened, January 1, 1901, we may increase our numbers. It will be a very pretty building, circular ceiling, electric light, nice locality, and freehold property. Of course we are accepting a heavy responsibility, but our committees always work harmoniously and we pull the one way. I have been president for eighteen years, and we had very hard work. I have done a good deal of platform work in connection with our progressive legislation, and was in the house when we passed the woman's franchise, the land bill, shop and factory act, the land for settlement and cheap money, the government takes large estates, cuts them up and leases at 4 to 4½ per cent for 999 years. We also lend money to farmers and others at 4½ per cent. However, politics and Spiritualism do not run together. All the creeds run against me, but I don't mind. I can do as much good out as in. With kindest regards and best wishes, yours sincerely,

WILLIAM McLEAN.

THERE COMES A TIME.

There comes a time to every mortal being,
Whate'er his station or his lot in life,
When his sad soul yearns for the final freeing,
From all this jarring and unceasing strife.

There comes a time, when, having lost its savor,
The salt of wealth is worthless; when the mind
Grows wearied with the world's capricious favor,
And sighs for something that it cannot find.

There comes a time, when, though kind friends are thronging
About our pathway with sweet acts of grace,
We feel a vast and overwhelming longing
For something that we cannot name or place.

There comes a time, when, with earth's best love by us,
To feed the heart's great hunger and desire,
We find not even this can satisfy us;
The soul within us cries for something higher.

What greater proof need we that we inherit
A life immortal in another sphere?
It is the homesick longing of the spirit
That cannot find its satisfaction here.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

UNDER THE STARLIGHT.

If any little word of ours
Can make one life the brighter,
If any little song of ours
Can make one heart the lighter,
God help us speak that little word
And take our bit of singing,
And drop it in some lonely vale,
To set the echoes ringing.

If any little love of ours
Can make one life the sweeter,
If any little care of ours
Can make one step the fleeter,
If any little help may ease
The burden of another,
God give us love and care and strength
To help along each other.

If any watchful thought of ours
Can make the work the stronger,
If any cheery smile of ours
Can make its brightness longer,
Then let us speak that thought to-day
With tender eyes a-glowing,
So God may grant some weary one
Shall reap from our glad sowing.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENG.

CONDITIONS—MEDIUMSHIP.

The necessity for pure conditions in the development and manifestation of mediumistic powers can never be too strenuously urged upon Spiritualists.

In many cases there is an entire lack of knowledge concerning the requirements of the medium in this matter, with the inevitable consequence that much valuable time is wasted and many mediums spoilt. It is only necessary to look at the psychologist in his laboratory, and to study his methods, to discover how great an importance he attaches to conditions.

In order that he may test the power of the individual to detect sound and light waves he has a special chamber built, to which no unregulated waves from the outer world can penetrate. No effort, no expense, is spared to attain this end; and the peculiar care, the application of every known method, to attain his end is a brilliant object-lesson.

If in the study of the effect of light and sound on the recognized senses such great precautions are taken, how much more need is there for extreme care in dealing with those forces which are more subtle, and of a far finer nature than the ordinary waves of light and sound?

The ancients knew much of the laws which govern psychic manifestations, and they in turn used every means which lay in their power to give the best possible conditions to their media.

The vestals of ancient temples were kept pure and untainted within the precincts of the sacred edifices, and thus in a state of constant meditation, and shut off from the grosser affairs of the world, they were surrounded by the necessary atmosphere for revelation, which was often of the most startling character.

The scientist when he wishes to be accurate in detail encloses his scales in an air-tight chamber, and adjusts his balances to such a delicate point that a speck of dust will affect his calculations. His instruments are protected from injury by the most ingenious devices, and no one is permitted to enter that holy-of-holies—his laboratory—during working hours, unless he be a brother worker, an initiate into the mysteries of his special science.

What are Spiritualists doing in this direction?

It is true that Spiritualism is more of a religion than a science among its general adherents. It is a fact that really scientific investigation is rarely discovered among the rank and file of the movement; but this is no reason why the beautiful instruments which act as receivers for messages from the beyond should be neglected or so treated as to be irremediably injured.

Take the Edison-Bell phonograph as a simple illustration. All our readers know how carefully the wax record cylinders have to be guarded from harm. Wrapped about by wadding or tissue paper, they are shielded from the slightest scratch or rough handling. With care the cylinder will last a considerable time, and, being costly, caution is usually observed.

Suppose, however, a careless owner of a phonograph allows his cylinders to lie about without protection; to be handled by the ignorant and the children; the record is soon destroyed, and instead of the beautiful rendering of a concerted piece, the ear is tortured by a succession of grinding squeaks.

The medium's organism is more sensitive than the cylinder of a phonograph; he needs more care than any record yet made for a "talking machine," and if caution is required in handling the cylinder of wax, then far more elaborate precaution is necessary in the protection of a medium from injury at the hands of the ignorant and undeveloped.

What, however, is the case? How are mediums usually treated?

In the case of the trance or inspirational speaker, the medium often steps onto the platform amid the buzz of conversation, which scarcely ceases before the singing of the first hymn.

Frequently whispering is indulged in during the progress of the meeting, and at times, where there is a choir, the choristers are busily engaged in finding the last hymn while the control is endeavoring to obtain complete rapport between himself and his instrument.

All these elements are of a disturbing nature; but when, during the invocation, some individuals enter the hall, and even during the address people enter and leave, all conditions are broken up, and the medium has to endure mental torture, which cannot be comprehended save by those who have had to pass through the torture-fire.

Again, in circles conditions are frequently lacking.

"Order is the first law of nature," and surely it should be the first law of the circle; but often in its place disorder reigns, and the medium, racked by the movement, the inharmony, the lack of sympathy which often exists, is injured instead of helped; and where there should be a flow of spiritual benedictions there is but the wheezing, halting, ear-splitting sounds which come from an organ worn out or out of tune.

Protect your mediums as you care for your musical instruments. Surround them by loving, thoughtful influences, and you will get the best from them they can give, while they will be benefited.

Neglect them, and as an instrument placed in the open in the rain and the wind, whose strings will rust, and whose wooden parts will warp and stretch and lose their use, their spiritual powers will be lost, their music will vanish, and you will be disappointed that they have not developed as you expected.

Make your developing circle holy; let its atmosphere be as the breath of heaven; cultivate the angelic in its midst that it may be the trysting place with angels "from on high." Then the medium, feeling that the circle is a haven of rest after the turmoil of life, will come to it as to a "Bethel," and amid the brightest, calmest, purest conditions the noble spirits, the just and good from the beyond, shall use the organism prepared for them, and Spiritualists shall again receive, as they obtained in the past, the Pentecostal blessing, and the sweetest and most eloquent of heaven's benedictions.

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

The Melbourne Age of August 1 contains a somewhat remarkable article on

THE CONTAGION OF CRIME.

It is not in its originality that the remarkability consists, but in the indication the whole tenor of it presents of the remarkable change that has taken place during the past ten or fifteen years in the attitude of the press, guided no doubt by the trend of public opinion, towards psychic or spiritual subjects. The article referred to (which is a sub-leader) bears on the apparently epidemic nature of individual crime and more extensive collective manifestations of the same kind, such as are now causing so much consternation in China. It admits the fact that "these horrible crimes break out in great batches over the face of the polluted earth, just as do physical diseases," and "that these repeated facts are leading men to look for a similar origin in the cases of moral and physical morbidities." Then, taking Sir Wm. Crookes and Camille Flammarion for authorities, it admits that the latter has compiled a very striking concatenation of links between the "Borderland" of Mr. Stead and the ordinary mundane existence. Flammarion's theory is that these sporadic outbreaks of violence have their

the lower planes of spirit life, and are communicated telepathically or by suggestion by minds on that plane; and this is clearly recognized by the writer, who concludes the article, after referring to our present knowledge of poison germs of infection "that in some mysterious way fill the air," and so infect our bodies with disease, suggests that "it may be established some day that the unseen world of suggestion is the real author of all crime."

Comparing the foregoing with what was written about spiritualistic and psychic theories even ten years since, those who are familiar with such subjects will recognize the immense stride that has been taken towards them in the interim: then it was the effort of the press to find in the physical organism, or on the material plane, a solution of all phenomena of an occult nature; the societies for Physical Research in the main co-operating with the press in this direction: but the truly scientific men among the latter who would allow no bias to divert them from the straight path of investigation, followed that path beyond the limits of recognized matter to the verge of the borderland, and there found the connecting link between the material and the spiritual. The theories of "telepathy" and "suggestion" are now established facts as between one human being and another, and few would have the hardihood to affirm that the thought or suggestion transmitted was material in the ordinary acceptation of the term. From a metaphysical point of view it might be recognized as "spiritual substance," but this still leaves the effect a spiritual manifestation, one embodied spirit communicating with another; and if embodied spirits have this power, why not disembodied ones? Assuming the correctness of the thesis that crimes and moral commotions are instigated by suggestions from the spirit world, by undeveloped and discordant entities who implant their immoral and poisonous germs into the minds of mortals, we must realize that these germs would only fructify in congenial soil. Disease germs will not affect a healthy body, neither will immoral suggestions poison a morally healthy mind. If bands of these misguided beings roam over the earth's surface, scattering broadcast their explosive and destructive crime germs, they only find conditions for their manifestation in minds that are morbid and deficient in moral stamina, whilst those who have the latter are impervious to their contagion, though they may be indirectly sufferers from their effects. This, viewed from a pessimistic aspect, might have a disturbing influence on the minds of the community did we not present the other side of the picture. If we admit the power of the undeveloped spirits to sow unwholesome seed and scatter immoral germs, we cannot logically deny to the developed and benevolent ones the power to sow good seed and introduce moral germs into the minds of men, and we may rest assured that their superior wisdom will enable them to do their work more extensively and successfully. We cannot go so far as some Spiritualists, who affirm that all man's actions are instigated by suggestion from the spirit world; but that each and all are influenced more or less powerfully by the mental sphere of both the spirit and the mundane world, we have good reason to believe. The thoughts we cultivate place us en rapport with corresponding spheres or planes of thought, and the man or woman who habitually lives on a good moral plane is impervious to the intrusion of mischievous and immoral influences from either the borderland or the mortal plane.

Letter from Sturgis, Mich.

To the Editor: I want to tell you about a circumstance which amused me highly. One Sunday recently I met a gentleman friend on the street; he was returning home after church; he attends Episcopal services, and his family are all members of that society. We conversed as usual and after a while he remarked:

"Well, H., I read that Chicago paper you gave me."

"How did you like it?" said I.

"It interested me very much," he said, and added, "the ideas there were quite new to me; the fact is, there is not much sense to the religions going, and, from what I have read in that paper, it seems to me that Spiritualism has more commonsense to it than any other religion extant."

"You ought to read more about it, and post yourself," said I.

"I suppose I ought," he replied, and after a while he added: "Do you know I have a great mind to take that paper?"

"All right," said I, "fork over a dollar and I'll send it to you." And he did, and is reading The Progressive Thinker every week since. T. H.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

THE HYPNOTIC EYE.

The Strange, Weird Power It Possesses.

DANGER OF ITS USE BY EVIL DOERS.

It is a strange, weird doctrine that L. W. de Laurence, the hypnotist, whose demonstrations during the past week have raised such a storm of protest from the medical fraternity, preaches. It is the doctrine of the "power of mind over matter" without the theological phrase which is part of the Christian Science belief. Professor de Laurence declares with the emphasis of deep conviction, that "all that we are is the result of thought," meaning that disease yields to the power of the mind, that suggestive therapeutics furnish a panacea for most all the ills to which flesh is heir.

Physicians claim that hypnotism is a too dangerous science to place in lay hands and argue that its practice should be restricted to the medical fraternity. Though denying their contention in the abstract, Professor de Laurence tacitly admits the danger to society from an indiscriminate dissemination of hypnotic power, for he says:

"To set one person against another and cause him to hate the other, induce deep hypnosis in the regular way and suggest to him that Mr. B. has done him a great wrong or injury, and that when you wake him he will hate and despise Mr. B. When he wakes up he will have no knowledge of what you have done with him or how you have changed his condition of mind toward Mr. B., but he will have no friendship for Mr. B., that can be depended upon. Take a drunkard or a cigarette fiend and give him suggestions that when you wake him up the sight or smell of whiskey or cigarettes will make him deathly sick and that if he tries to take a drink of liquor or smoke a cigarette he will get so sick that he cannot stand up, then awaken him and have someone offer him a drink or a cigarette and he will refuse, giving as the only reason that the sight of them makes him sick. The writer has cured some of the worst cigarette fiends by this method when nothing else would cure or affect them. The hypnotist can by this method and strange hypnotic power change the personality of an individual, and mold his character to suit his wishes, but he should hesitate in employing it for purposes otherwise than beneficial, as he is liable to place the subject in a very unhappy position, and of course be responsible for evil results."

There are various stages of hypnosis, the cataleptic or rigid state, or the lethargic or independent state, both of which, the hypnotist says, are dangerous. Speaking of the lethargic state he expressed the belief that Bishop, the renowned mind reader, who died some years ago while giving an exhibition, was not dead when the physicians cut him up at the autopsy.

"The lethargic state," he says, "is an independent condition next to death, in which the subject ceases to have any connection with the operator, having passed out of his control. It is caused by the operator letting his subject sit inactive too long after he has induced somnambulism or trance. This is a very dangerous state and the operator should guard against it by keeping the subject interested and doing something, for if left to himself and preoccupied he is very liable to pass into this state.

"If you have more than one under control at the same time, keep them all busy doing something to engage their attention. If you cannot use them all, wake some of them up before they pass into this apparently lifeless condition.

"There is no doubt but that Bishop, the mind reader, was in this condition when the autopsy was performed upon his supposed dead body, as his heart and other vitals gave unmistakable signs of life."

On the subject of clairvoyance or second sight, which the greater Bishop claimed, Professor de Laurence said:

"Clairvoyance, or seeing at a distance, whereby a person can be put into a trance so that they can locate lost, hidden, or stolen articles, ferret out murderers, thieves, etc., is possible when this condition is properly induced and a good clairvoyant subject used.

"While in this condition the human mind has the ability to extend its faculties of conception far into space. The condition consists of an absolute suspension of the physical organs, the body appearing almost lifeless, or as if in a deep sleep. The ordinary way of perceiving through the sense organs is for the time interrupted and an independent action of the soul or mind takes place. This action is an immediate perceiving of things, conditions, and persons as they actually and really exist in their very nature, and not as they appear to us, often hypercritically through mediating sense organs, as clairvoyance is finer and farther reaching than the sight of our dull eyes. The mind of a good clairvoyant subject can be made to leave the body, so to speak, and be directed to any given locality anywhere in space, and can give an intelligent and accurate account of things being done at this particular place. It matters not whether it is in the same room, or a mile, or 1,000 miles away, the mind will find the spot. Distance makes no difference because the human mind or the psychic organism of man does not recognize space."

On the subject of self-hypnotization, the Professor says the subject is no longer open to discussion. He says: "It most certainly is a wise provision of nature for anyone to be able voluntarily to place himself in the hypnotic state. He who can by an effort of his will enter the hypnotic condition is complete master over his own mind or soul.

"'He that ruleth his soul is mightier than he that taketh a city.'—Prov. 16:32.

"'He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down and without walls.'—Prov. 25:27.

"These powers lie dormant in all mankind, and can be easily developed by the proper application of the will, or what is known as auto or self-suggestion, combined with concentration. I have often self-induced this condition, and by auto-suggestion am able to remain asleep any desired length of time or make any part of my body insensible to pain. I have repeatedly removed pain from different parts of my body by concentrating my mind upon the affected parts with the absolute determination and desire of removing the pain.

"This psychological fact demonstrates the power and effect of suggestion, either auto or spoken, on disease and pain, for when by the proper suggestions we place the psychic forces on the defensive against pain, disease and death, with the intention of driving them out of our body, we invite and receive in their place health and strength. But when these lines of life forces are weakened by adverse suggestions, disease enters the body at that point where exists the greatest deficiency of vital force.

"To be able properly to induce this condition, the psychic powers must be developed in the following manner: The beginner should go into a quiet room and lie down in a comfortable position, and with the concentration of the mind and sight upon some small article or object in the room, let the body become perfectly relaxed. Take in slow regular breaths, holding the thought and idea in the mind (exclusive of all other thoughts) that every breath you draw is putting you sound asleep, and that you are becoming totally unconscious of your surroundings.

"It is absolutely necessary that you concentrate the mind and whole attention as well as the eyes upon the object and think only of going sound asleep, and that you will remain sound asleep for an hour, two hours, or any reasonable length of time desired.

"When self-inducing the hypnotic sleep, a certain time or hour to wake up should be decided upon, when at its expiration you will surely wake up."

The Professor talks entertainingly on all phases of hypnotism, and is able to fence in admirable style with skilled skeptics.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

PECULIAR VISION.

Saw His Chum in a Vision.

HAD SIX ARROWS IN HIS CHEST—ATTACKED BY INDIANS HE FIRST SLEW HIS HORSES, THEN DEFENDED HIMSELF.

"No, I can't say I go much on superstition and that sort o' thing, but I'd like some o' these wise chaps to explain a little incident that happened to me down in the Pecos valley, in New Mexico, a few years ago."

Grizzled Bob Morrow, veteran cowboy, ranchman, globe trotter and philosopher, took another pull at his cigar as he sat in the Hoffman House cafe, says the New York Mail and Express. A thoughtful look came over his face and his companions at the table awaited in silence his further utterances. After a pause Bob continued:

"We were 'sign' riding, Lee Wells and I. Know what 'sign' riding is? An imaginary line is drawn on the prairie. Two men, one stationed at each end, ride toward each other at a given hour. Any cattle that have crossed that line are rounded up and driven back. The idea is to keep the cattle together as much as possible during the winter.

"Our line was about ten miles long. Lee and I used to meet half way every day, and if no cattle had crossed we'd sit down and smoke and chat a bit. Sometimes we'd visit each other's 'dobes and generally chum together so far as men can when ten miles apart. We each had six horses, the pick of the herd, and mighty proud we were, too, of 'em.

"'Bout that time the Indians were rather troublesome. They generally went in small bands and occasionally the loss of a bunch of horses would be reported by ranchmen thereabouts. Lee and I didn't fear 'em much. They carried only bows and arrows, and if it came to a chase our horses could easily outrun theirs. The greatest danger we had to fear was the loss of our horses. "Lee and I had talked frequently about the Indians and both were of the same mind—if attacked, kill the horses rather than let the marauding thieves get 'em.

"I left Lee at the halfway mark as usual one day, got back to my 'dobe and after eating dinner turned in. I hadn't been asleep very long, when I was awakened by a sort of feeling that there was somebody in the room. I groped under the pillow for my gun, turning over as I did so, and there in the doorway stood Lee Wells. The feathered shafts of six arrows were sticking from his breast and his face in the moonlight looked drawn and ghastly. There was a smile of satisfaction on his face, though, as he said, quietly:

"'Well, they got me, Bob, but they didn't get the horses.'

"I was out of bed in an instant. The minute my feet touched the floor Lee vanished. The door was shut and locked just as I left it when I went to bed. Pondering over the realistic 'dream,' or whatever it was, I turned in again, but it was a long time before I got to sleep again.

"A second time I was awakened by the same vision. There stood Lee in the doorway and again he pointed to the arrow shafts and said:

"'They got me, Bob, but they didn't get the horses.'

"No more sleep for me that night. I looked around the 'dobe thinking perhaps Lee was playing me a trick. I went out to the coral. The horses were all right and no signs of anybody having been around. I sat up and smoked and thought a whole lot until daybreak, then I mounted and set off for the halfway mark. Lee wasn't there, and no sign of his coming, so I rode on to his 'dobe.

"There at the gate of the corral was Lee's body, with six arrows in his chest, just as I had seen them in the vision. Inside the corral lay the bodies of his horses, all killed with bullets.

"It was plain to me that, seeing the Indians coming, Lee had deliberately killed the horses before turning his attention to the thieves. Judging from the hoof prints, there must have been about twenty Indians in the bunch. Lee must have damaged them some before he fell, judging from the cartridge shells lying around. They took his Winchester, of course, and looted the 'dobe. They didn't get much for their trouble, though.

"But what I want to know is: Was that a dream or did Lee Wells really appear before me in some sort of form?"

His hearers could not explain.—Pittsburg Press.

PSYCHOLOGICAL PROBLEM DISCUSSED

Prof. Lockwood Attacks the Physiological Basis of Prof. T. J. Hudson's System of Psychology.

[Note.—At a banquet given by the Medico Legal Society of New York, at St. Andrews Hotel, in honor to Prof. T. J. Hudson, who read a paper entitled "Psychological Problems Relating to Confessions of Innocent Persons," Prof. Lockwood received an invitation to attend and be one of the respondents to the paper read. The following is a revise of his argument]:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Medico Legal Fraternity:

To widen the channels of charity and justice, to mitigate human pain and suffering, and to extend the boundaries of knowledge, have ever been considered the noblest virtues of individual effort, or of sociological bodies of men in the promotion of civilization. From the time of the earliest traditions and inception of history, until the present, the savant and philosopher who have made noble effort for the advancement of human welfare in any of these avenues, have rightly merited the approval and esteem of succeeding generations, and reared for themselves an enduring monument of respect on the page of history.

We have met here to-night to honor a gentleman of letters and thought, who calls our attention to a matter of the greatest importance, especially to members of the legal fraternity, regarding "the confessions of crime on the part of innocent persons," while under the psychological influence of accusers, or the short-sighted judgment of would-be friends. These facts appearing in the transactions of criminal courts, are of such gravity in their relation to human justice, as to be a menace to public welfare and morals, and to merit the combined wisdom of jurist and the careful consideration of the physician in mental pathology. Hence, the guest of the evening honors mankind in the general spirit of his paper, since it has for its object the extension of the horizon of human charity and justice for humanity at large, and the possible modification of all laws and enactments that condemn the accused who confesses guilt under the powerful psychic influence of public opinion. It is then eminently fitting that our guest should be banqueted, and his views and opinions on this important problem in mental phenomena be properly discussed by the able jurists and practical students in medical art here assembled.

While this banquet hall is not the place for hasty criticism, or the occasion one to be marred by the combative differences of individual opinion, as to the special merits or demerits of the essay under consideration, I trust that a brief review of the fundamental postulates upon which he rears his hypothesis of "Subjective and Objective Mind," and a careful survey of some physiological data involved in hypnotic phenomena, will not be construed as a criticism upon the moral and humane idea so timely presented in the general mental trend of his paper—thus enabling me by this exchange of thought, to honor our guest and his effort, and the occasion.

Before proceeding, however, allow me publicly to thank my friend Judge Daily for the pleasure of being here this evening, and Mr. Bell, your corresponding secretary, for the courtesy of being one of the respondents to Prof. Hudson's paper.

The employment of the terms "Objective and Subjective Mind," as fundamental postulates in Prof. Hudson's system of psychology, I suggest, confuses rather than makes clear the basis of the concept, upon which his superstructure is built, for the following reasons:

Since the time of Plato it has become popular to look upon objective nature as an expression of "Divine Mind," so Plato taught; and there are to-day many cults insisting that the physical world that we see and sense is only the mind of God in expression, since he is credited with having spoken it into existence. Now whenever this term "Objective Mind" is used, the popular unthinking element of society—and they comprise a vast majority of the public, instinctively reach the conclusion that this theistic idea is what is meant by the use of the term. While it is true that Prof. Hudson has defined in well set words what he means by the term, yet I must confess that from the plane of the physicist and physiologist, I am led into deeper confusion than before. He says, "Objective mind being the mind of ordinary waking consciousness, it takes cognizance of the five objective senses."

What does he mean? Has the vista of mountains we see in Colorado got mind? Is a rock or a tree imbued with mind? Are these factors of objective nature possessed of a thinker that has comparison, reasoning faculties and judgment? Most certainly not. Men have mind—that is to say some men—the congress of people here assembled have mind, because possessed of a thinker which is capable of comparison of reason and judgment, but these attributes of consciousness and faculties of the intellect are not the possessions of objective nature in the general application of the term. How then can objective nature be said to be "Objective Mind?"

But Prof. Hudson does not say this or imply it in his definition of the term, yet the criticism applies to the commonly received meaning of the phrase. But our friend does say that "the mind of ordinary waking consciousness takes cognizance of the objective world exclusively by means of the five objective senses." The question arises, is man possed or five, or even one objective sense! Let us inquire into this assumption. The word "objective" in its physiological application means "beyond," "apart" or "outside" of the physical organism. Man has no sense or avenue of sensation outside of his physical vascular anatomy. The point I raise here involves the science of cerebral mentology. Physicists, anatomists and physiologists recognize in the ganglionic structure of the sensory system of man, avenues through which sensations are evoked. If these tracts are only avenues that lead to centers of sensation, what is this something that has sensation? The ancients called it "the soul of man"—"his life principle." The modern physiologist calls it "consciousness," "the sentient state of life"—an attribute of the soul. If, then, these avenues are only highly tensioned tracts that center in the citadel of consciousness, it will follow as a logical sequence that man has no sensations, hence no mind or thought until his conscious principle has been impressed. Science speaks of these impressions as being molecular in character and operative only as invisible modes of motion—that is to say, that certain color motions transmitted through space and the optic tract by etheric vibrations, impress our consciousness and evoke a sensation which we call "red." Another color motion evokes a sensation we call "blue," and so on. Analogously, a motion of sound pulsates through the auditory tract, and impressing consciousness evokes a sensation, which we call the human voice, another the ring of a bell. In all sensations evoked through these sensory avenues, consciousness is the factor impressed, before sensation can occur; and these processes are all subjective, since man can have no sensation from objective nature, or from the reactions occurring within his own vascular system, in which consciousness is not involved. Therefore we submit, that the term "Objective Mind" is not sufficiently definite and scientific to express the subjective relations occurring in mental processes. It will be seen that the view we have presented is thoroughly in harmony with the science of cerebral mentology, and it accords with the postulate that "mind is an evolution of man's conscious ego; which view makes thought and mind the result of impressions, and not the entity impressed; hence it cannot be both objective and subjective.

Prof. Hudson's definition of "Subjective Mind" also harbors difficulties of physiological analytical character. He affirms that, "The Subjective Mind is the intelligence manifested in subjective states, conditions and activities, as in hypnotism, trance, etc."

In this statement we are uncertain whether by the term "intelligence," he means the intelligence of the individual in the hypnotic trance, or the intelligence of the operator. It would seem he means the latter, for a little later on he says, "The Subjective Mind * * by virtue of the fundamental law of its own being is compelled to accept and believe, and it does accept and believe and act upon and carry to its legitimate conclusions, every statement, expressed or implied, that is made to it." This statement seems to imply that the hypnotized subject is a mere mental respondent to the mental control and volition of a dominating influence in the person of the operator; and responds to him in a manner analogous to that of a telegraphic sounder responding to the raps of the telegraphic key; or, as a stringed and highly tensioned instrument responds to the vibrations of another instrument tensioned to the same tone.

In what way this reflex expression of the operator's mentality can be called "The Subjective Mind" of the subject per se, we fail to comprehend; and our mental dilemma increases with this additional affirmation.

He says that, "Under the supreme potency of suggestion, a subject may be made to believe himself to be a dog or a devil, demon or an angel, the spirit of a deceased person or a living personality other than his own," and that "he will carry every suggestion to its logical conclusion so far as it is physically possible." Strange phenomena, we grant, but more strange that it can be classified as the subject's mind.

Referring to the mental characteristics of this psychologised state, Prof. Hudson says:

"Reason is dethroned, experience counts for nothing, the evidence of the senses is impeached, the center of control over the dual mental organism is displaced; and as long as the subjective state continues, or as often as it is renewed, the subject is dominated by the central idea embraced in the suggestion."

And yet this induced mental action with its varying phenomena of inconsistent, incongruous, irrational and abnormal ideas—this reflex of the mind or thought of the operator, is one of the dual minds of the subject, in Prof. Hudson's system of psychology.

Let us amplify this point. If I hypnotize Judge Daily (I do not like that term in this connection, since it means "self-induced sleep," and is not a proper term to use in this association of operator and subject)—if I psychologize the Judge, and his mental fiber becomes magnetized to that point where it responds to my mental volition, and carries out all that is expressed or implied by me, the phenomenon of this transfer of my mentality upon Judge Daily's brain, Prof. Hudson, strangely enough, calls Judge Daily's "Subjective Mind."

Now I submit, Mr. Chairman, as you lawyers say, that if in a psychological state on the part of the Judge, I suggest to him ideas that impeach reason and dethrone judgment, to affirm that such mental state is the Judge's "Subjective Mind," presents a questionable commentary on the duality of mind; and were I to affirm that these irregular mental phenomena were a normal expression of Bro. Dailey's mind, he could justly inaugurate proceedings against me for criminal libel, which thought leads me to conclude, that the term "Subjective Mind" in Bro. Hudson's system of psychology, only applies to those in hypnotic or trance states.

The term "Suggestion," as employed in connection with mental phenomena of psychological character, is not, according to my way of thinking, a proper term, since it does not carry the full concept of the allied mental processes. The term "Inductive," in the sense of "tending to induce or cause, is a better and more comprehensive term. And may I add that the phenomena of thought transference by telephone, demonstrates the inductive principle, as is witnessed in the induced action upon the consciousness of the receiver of the message. Eventually it will be seen that the transference of thought, whether the operator be near or remote, will be found to be in keeping with principles of mental polar states. Inductively co-related to each other. An analysis of the principles of wireless telegraphy demonstrates the principles of electro induction, whether expressed in physical nature, or relating consciousness to consciousness. I have in former years psychologized a subject—a boy fifteen years old, as far as I could see him; and the same subject would repeat aloud while standing twenty feet away, my unspoken mental thought. It is such phenomena as these that demonstrate something more subtle in this relation of operator and subject, than can be expressed by mere verbal suggestion. The phenomena of mental polar states, can be studied here with advantage.

One more point of divergent thought from the paper of the evening I will mention, and leave the discussion to others. I refer to the following statement in Prof. Hudson's essay. He says: "It may be set down as axiomatic that Nature is ever kind to the victim of the inevitable. And this is true, whether it is inevitable death, or an inevitable surgical operation. Where the two conditions of immanence and inevitability are present, the rule is inevitable. It is Nature's compensation for the prodigality of life, and the universality of death made necessary by the process of organic evolution."

I fail to recognize this statement as an axiomatic truth in the formula of relentless nature. If is were true, it would make principles of nature more kind than civilizations of men. If this axiom were invariably true, it would rob Calvary and the Cross of its pathos and sentiment. It would deprive Christianity of the story of the pangs of crucifixion, by drying up its fountains of sympathy upon which it has built for two thousand years. It would take away from ecclesiasticism the dogma of vicarious atonement. It would rob God himself of "the plan of salvation." since Christ would be made to appear in the garb of a hypnotic only, who did not suffer very much after all, for the sins of the world.

No sir! I cannot accept this axiom; for in defiance of the monkish mob, Bruno submitted to the torture of burning at the stake—he refused to be hypnotized by priestly dogmatism, or yield up his individual manhood, although tortured by fire. Michael Servetus hurled back into the teeth of Calvin the verbal sentence that despot tried in vain to hypnotize him into saying. Fire and fagot and the horrors of mortal agony did not lose to him his manhood—he defied Calvin and his system of suggestive therapeutics. The heroes of martyrdom would be lost to sight, and heroism itself a morbid expression of human zeal, if Nature interfered with a hypnosis of the "Subjective Mind" at the time of execution. Yet, Mr. Chairman, there is much in the paper of the evening that I can heartily endorse. That the accused are frequently so menaced by the accuser, whether the accuser be an individual or the State, as to confess crime when it appears inevitable upon circumstantial evidence, being in hopes thereby to merit lenient toleration at the hands of the court. I believe this to be a very common occurrence. That all such are psychologized by the dominating mentality of the accuser, or led to confessions of crime by the advice of friends, I do not believe to be true. The case of Socrates is one in evidence. He was accused by the Athenians "of denying the gods recognized by the State, and introducing new divinities, and of corrupting the young." Now the Athenians had a law that when the accused was convicted of guilt, he had a right to name the penalty, providing the penalty named was in keeping with the character of the crime. His crime was punishable with death. But Socrates declared "that for the services which he had rendered to the city, he deserved not punishment, but the reward of a public benefactor, and his maintenance in the Prytaneum at the cost of the State, but to mollify his accusers, he offered to pay a fine of one mina." His friends importuned him to offer thirty minas. He objected, affirming that he had committed no crime. The Judge, exasperated by his calmness and fearlessness, sentenced him to self-destruction by drinking a decoction of hemlock. Circumstances of national religious character, sent him to prison for thirty days. During this time he was offered escape by his personal friend Crito. He refused. That immortal genius that had braved the theology of polytheism, and laid the foundations of inductive reasoning as the basis of truth, that undaunted intellect before whose quiet powers of reasoning, the religious and political oligarchies trembled, was not afraid of death—his clear philosophic vision saw no occasion for mental perjury; to him the realm of reasoned truth was the summum bonum of human greatness, and in this greatness he stood firm and undismayed to the end.

And may I say in this connection, that we of to-day are as fully under the ban of psychological influences as were those of ancient Greece. Its formula comprise the basic effort of political aggrandizement and religious zeal. Its propagandism permeates church and state. Its unsheathed sword is still drawn and wielded to make slaves of men's intellects and to secure the fruitage of their toil. But these efforts of the past and present to enslave mankind will go down to oblivion before the rising tide of human intelligence. The dawn of a new era is upon us—the era of scientific analysis and inductive demonstration. Psychological influences upon the human race will be weighed in the balance of human justice, and its injustice to the temporal and moral welfare of the individual will be seen in all of its hideous selfishness. Hence the effort of our friend to check the continuance of wrong upon the human susceptible to hypnotic environment and tendencies, is a move in the right direction—the direction of moral equity. And the historian of the future, who writes on the page of time the aspirations and virtues of men, will write in letters of immortal light, the name of our guest, who has to-night made public record against the baneful effects of crime confessed by those under hypnotic or psychological influence. Let us see to it, that this phenomenon of mental character and this problem in social and civil jurisprudence, receive a thorough and just consideration at our hands.

A Slate-Writing Test.

I noticed an excerpt from the pen of Mr. Ed D. Lunt, Los Angeles, Cal., touching the so-called independent slate-writing and other phenomena. If he is endeavoring to expose fraud and trickery, he is doing a good and praiseworthy work. If he intends to be understood as claiming all such phenomena are bogus, he is in error, as every faithful, fair investigator knows. Independent slate-writing by some invisible intelligence is a fact. In proof of this positive statement I will give one illustration. I purchased a pair of slates one hundred miles from San Francisco, Cal., washed them with soap and water, securely fastened them together with screws driven through the frames. At no time did any one handle them but myself. I carried them one hundred miles, went to a medium whom I had never seen nor heard of before my arrival in San Francisco, and while alone with the medium in an up-stairs rooms, the slates all the time being fastened together as above stated and held securely by myself, I received messages thereon, said messages being signed by departed wife and relatives, of whom the medium could not possibly have any knowledge. The medium to this day has not seen the messages. If anything is impossible, it was impossible for the medium to have written those messages, equally as impossible for any mortal save myself to have done it, and if anyone can believe that I paid $2 to perform such a silly act, he has my warmest sympathies and congratulations that he is outside of a mad-house. Who will undertake to explain how this was done, if he denies supermundane agencies?

Superstition in all Ages

Or "Le Bon Sens,"

By JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years in France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and asked God's pardon for having taught the Christian religion. He left this volume as his last will and testament to his parishioners and to the world. Translated from the French original by Miss Anna Knoop.

Post 8vo., 389 pages, with portrait. Cloth, $1.00; postage, 14 cents.

"The work of the honest pastor is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind that the last century produced. . . . Paine and Voltaire had reserves, but Jean Meslier had none. He keeps nothing back; and yet, after all, the wonder is not that there should have been one priest who left that testimony at his death, but that all priests do not."—James Parton

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1900.

The Corrector Corrected.

Our friend E. Woodward, of Tucson, Arizona, some weeks ago attempted to correct us in the use of the word "canteen," but he is laboring under a slight error.

The canteen to which we referred is the one described in Chamber's Cyclopedia as follows:

"In the British army the canteen is a wooden vessel, holding about three pints, painted blue, and inscribed with the number or designation of the regiment, battalion, and company to which the soldier belongs. * * It is used by soldiers to contain whatever beverage may be obtainable on the march or in the field."

Webster defines the word "Canteen—A vessel used by soldiers for carrying liquor to drink."

This liquor was not necessarily spirituous, for the word signifies "Any liquid or fluid substance, as water, milk, blood, sap, juice, and the like."

The writer remembers how sacredly a canteen was treasured in his father's family in which his grandfather carried water in his long marches while in the army of the Revolution. It was made of staves scarcely 2½ inches in length. The heads were probably 8 inches in diameter. It was bound by two iron hoops and iron rings were attached for a strap to sling it over the shoulder. It was painted blue.

If those warring on the canteen are directing their labors against the Spanish "cantena," which means a saloon, they had better use its English equivalent, then they will be understood, and we will all join in the fight.

Where Is the Thing to End?

Again the orthodox world is shocked at a new suggestion of science. The assistant at the Greenwich Observatory has just published a book entitled "The Oldest Picture Book of All." That book presents the midnight sky with its constellations, as divided by the ancients, and mapped by the astronomers of the early ages of civilization, as that Picture Book. The author shows from these constellations that the story of Adam's fall was an ancient myth a thousand years before creation, as revealed in Genesis. He shows that these constellations, or divisions of the heavenly bodies into groups, each named after some animal, was intended to symbolize and enshrine legends and stories which even in those ancient days were included in the sacred history of the race. He finds the story of the deluge preserved in these newly deciphered records.

Is this discovery by an able astronomer another weapon to aid in demolishing that silly fiction of ignorance, the gods, who built a little 7x9 world less than 6,000 years ago, and had a host of trouble with the incorrigible wretches with which he peopled it, and was almost deprived of its government by his arch enemy whom he kicked out of heaven?

Expulsion of Tolstoi.

Count Leo Tolstoi, the well-known and greatly admired novelist and social reformer, has been excommunicated from the Greek church. The Count's offence consisted in an exposure of Christian orthodoxy, in his work entitled "Resurrection." He showed that he despised Christianity, as ordinarily interpreted. He was severe on "the meaningless much speaking," and "the blasphemous incantation over bread and wine."

It seems for three years and over Count Tolstoi's expulsion has been pending, but final action was delayed because he was a favorite with the people, and skepticism has made large inroads into the higher, and especially into the intellectual classes of Russia, and it was feared it would add to the disaffection by his excommunication.

It is not in America nor in England only where skepticism prevails, but it is everywhere among thinkers.

A Glorious Trinity.

Rev. J. E. Roberts, of Kansas City, struck a key-note the other Sunday in one of his magnificent discourses when he said:

"If another conception of divinity is to be given the world, and in the form of a trinity, I believe in this: "God the father, God the mother, and God the child." He concluded by adding: "And every home where love sheds its beatific light will be a sanctuary, the dwelling place of all divine, and service will be the only worship, and love the only priest."

All honor to such noble sentiments, and hasten the time when such preaching and teaching shall become universal.

That Missionary Business.

The Methodist Times, an English church organ, replying to the assertion of the Catholic Times, denying that Roman missions in China had done anything to stir up strife, rejoined:

"It is sadly true that ever since the Jesuits went to China they have been political fire-brands there, and have mischievously interfered with China politics. After the last war the French (who are ultramontane abroad and Atheists at home) compelled the Chinese Government to give the Romanists one of the finest sites in Peking for a great cathedral. Quite recently the Romanists have been scheming to secure for their priests the status and authority of mandarins."

Chas. Denby, in the Forum, advocating the interests of the missionaries, and evidently closely allied to them, kindly takes his readers behind the scenes where the wires are manipulated, and tells facts and purposes which are very interesting in this connection. We quote from the "Forum:"

"In the beginning we must recognize the undoubted fact that the Catholic powers—the Pope, Spain, Italy, and especially France—will never consent that the Catholic missionaries shall be driven out of China. Their interests there are immense. There are twenty-eight Catholic Bishops in the empire, of whom three are in the province of Chihli. There are vast establishments over the country with schools, colleges, and asylums. Curiously, the Catholics have not gone into medical or surgical work, but they fill all other fields, covering industrial schools, carpenter and other shops, and all the forms of labor. The great Cathedral at Peking was built mostly by the native Christians. The wealth of the church is enormous. The chief religious societies, the Jesuits, Benedictines, Augustines, Christian Brothers, Lazarists, and Franciscans are found at many places. You cannot turn the dial of progress back. You cannot revoke all the treaties. You cannot undo the work of three centuries. If the continental Catholic remains in China his Protestant colleague will go thither. It is not human nature to stand back and see others occupying fields of danger or of venture, and it is not in Christian nature to disregard the divine command to go into the world and teach all nations."

It is universally conceded that the Catholics gained all their treaty rights in China by shameless frauds. Provisions were made in treaties at their dictation, which the Chinese government did not understand, and to which the people were determined they would not submit. Protestants availed themselves of the advantages of these treaties, and became like their associates, the Catholics, a controlling power in many parts of the great empire.

We are all pained beyond the power of expression at the cruelties—barbarities, in fact, which the Chinese inflicted on the missionaries; but when we recall the outrages practiced by enlightened Americans on the negro, and on persons entertaining adverse opinions to the dominant religion, we do not wonder at these foreign outrages. It is gross ignorance, both at home and abroad, angered by prejudice, and the ranting of demagogues, that causes all these wrongs.

Concede to all others the rights and immunities we claim for ourselves, and no people would go very far wrong. If a person is overreached in a bargain, if he cannot gain redress one way he is very liable to take it another way. And this, it seems, is what the Boxers did.

But note the conclusion of Mr. Denby's: "It is not Christian nature to disregard the divine command, to go into the world and teach all nations." Here we have a "Thus saith the Lord" directing all this missionary work, and it is not surprising that it is met with an occasional "Thus saith the people," as was the case in the American Revolution. Till then all kings claimed authority by "divine right." Thomas Paine controverted this claim in his great state papers, "Common Sense" and "The Crisis." The Continental Congress confirmed his logic by the Declaration of Independence; and each new Republic punctuates Paine's position, as do the people everywhere when exercising their elective franchise. The "Thus saith the Lord" does not control in American politics, nor in American legislation. It has no authority in China, and it is a usurpation when applied there in trying to establish missionary rule among that people.

They Acted Wisely.

The Chicago Board of Education, by the decisive vote of 13 to 6, voted down the proposition to use Bible Readings in the schools of the city. Trustee Keating, voicing the sentiment of the majority, said:

"Once admit the Bible in the schools and the doors will be opened to endless religious discussions. I, for one, would not be in favor of putting the Old Testament into the hands of young children, and these selections would lead them to seek out that book. The Old Testament is not for children."

The Trustee was right. And he need not have limited his objections to children. Presented as the Word of God, with a diminutive conception of the Spirit of Nature, of its deceptive representations in regard to science, and its barbaric history and morals, it has no proper place other than with mythological literature. There, possibly, it would be servicable. And the New Testament is by no means exempt from serious objections as a school book independent of sectarianism.

Foolish Zeal.

"The American Bible Society publishes a list of the Protestant missionaries killed or missing in China. The total is 178, of whom 66 are men, 73 women and 39 children. In this total are 69 Americans, 25 men, 24 women (16 married and 8 single), and 20 children."—Ex.

It would be supposed such a waste of life in the promulgation of a creed would satisfy an ordinary ambition, but the Missionary Boards are calling for volunteers to take the place of the slaughtered. Our sympathies go out to the unfortunate natives who will be misled, and will fall victims a few years hence to another uprising of the people.

The Method of Savages.

Some four weeks ago a German convoy was fired on from a Chinese village through which it was passing. An expedition was sent out from the German headquarters to punish the offenders. The village was burned and 300 men, women and children were killed. Says the report: "No attempt was made to discriminate between the innocent and the guilty." The practices of North American savages seem to be employed by brave Christian warriors in their treatment of the Chinese.

The Progressive Thinker—Its Present Status.

There is a wonderful diversity of opinion manifested among mankind generally. There are no two blades of grass exactly alike. No two flowers have exactly the same tint. No two persons resemble each other so closely that one, on careful examination, cannot be distinguished from the other. See how the various races differ throughout the globe. The dwarfs of Africa stand forth very diminutively when placed by the side of our native Indians.

Difference exists everywhere—exact counterparts and unison nowhere.

We have the apparently infinitely small, and the apparently infinitely large.

The diatom cannot be seen with the ordinary microscope; but one that magnifies 10,000 diameters is able to bring it forth, resembling an ellipse with a straight line passing through its center. Two millions of these diatoms, it is said, can be placed on the head of a pin. There is a wonderful diversity in a homogenous mass, and even in a collection of atoms. Throughout the infinitude of space, in every department of life, no one object is an exact duplicate of anything in its class.

In the human family this diversity is equally as great. No two brains are exactly alike; no two have the same number of cells, nor are the brain centers in any two attuned alike. No two persons have from a mental-microscopical standpoint exactly the same shades of belief, or think in precisely the same channels, hence there are really as many religious cults in the world as there are individuals.

The difference in shades of opinions is no less marked and distinct among Spiritualists. While all believe in spiritual communion, the belief of each one is more or less modified by his experience and drift of thoughts, hence no two think exactly along the same lines.

This fact confronted us when we first commenced the publication of The Progressive Thinker, and we knew then with absolute certainty what to expect. To please all would be impossible with an archangel, or even with a God himself, and much less with man. Hence, commencing with the very first issue of The Progressive Thinker, we displeased some, made some angry, and aroused open hostility in others, and from time to time came the message, "Stop my paper." The reasons therefor have been multifarious, ranging from the sedate down to the ridiculous; in fact they have been as diversified as blades of grass—no two exactly alike, presenting a wonderful kaleidoscopic view of human nature. Notwithstanding this, The Progressive Thinker has flourished—flourished financially as no other paper ever did in the whole history of Spiritualism. The peevish order, "Stop my paper," is followed by the cordial impressive commendation of others that act as a most gentle invigorating tonic against the bad effects of angry ebullitions.

The substantial fact that The Progressive Thinker has prospered in a measure that has had no precedent at any time in our ranks in the years gone by, is sufficient encouragement to us, and when we stop and consider the grand work consummated through its instrumentality, it in a great measure gives us that complacency of spirit that always comes to one when he has reason to believe that his labors are highly appreciated by those who are on the higher planes of spiritual thought and unfoldment.

There is nothing that succeeds so well as success itself; that is a most excellent measure of one's status and standing. Of course there are little dogs here and there that bark, disturbing one's rest at night; so there are little minds in the ranks of Spiritualism who set up a dismal howl against The Progressive Thinker simply because they cannot control it, at an expense to them of the miserable pittance of two cents each week, or nothing at all, while we are compelled to pay out hundreds of dollars, assuming all the responsibility. Such a person who pays two cents per week, and desires The Progressive Thinker to conform to his own exclusive ways of thinking, is an exceedingly small specimen of humanity; and not worth noticing, though he howl and shriek, and gesticulate against us. We always take great pleasure in being boycotted by such dismal specimens of humanity, for it is evidence that the driftwood is going where it belongs.

Thus it is that under these circumstances The Progressive Thinker has risen, has prospered, and is now surging ahead at one dollar per year. Bear in mind, please, as set forth by O. S. Marden, that "man's success in life is usually in proportion to his confidence in himself and the energy and persistence with which he pursues his aim. In this competing age there is little hope for the man who does not thoroughly believe in himself. The man who can be easily discouraged or turned aside from his purpose, the man who has no iron in his blood, will never win. Half the giant's strength is in the conviction that he is a giant. The strength of a muscle is enhanced a hundredfold by the will power. The same muscle, when removed from the giant's arm, when divorced from the force of the mighty will, can sustain but a fraction of the weight it did a moment before it was disconnected. O, what miracles confidence has wrought! What impossible deeds it has helped to perform! It took Napoleon over the Alps in midwinter; it took Farragut and Dewey past the cannons, torpedoes and mines of the enemy; it led Nelson and Grant to victory; it has been the great tonic in the world of discovery, invention, and art; it has helped to win the thousand triumphs in war and science which were deemed impossible. The man without self-confidence and an iron will is the plaything of chance, the puppet of his environment, the slave of circumstances. With these he is king, ever master of the situation."

From the start we have had undiminished faith and confidence in ourself to make a change for good in the status of Spiritualism. We have worked faithfully with that end in view. We now have the only first-class dollar Spiritualist paper in the United States, and we repeat again it is prosperous, for it works on the Divine Plan, a portion of the profits of the office returning in one continual stream to its subscribers. By this means we are able to distribute about 20,000 valuable books among them each year at a nominal cost, thus establishing the nucleus of a grand library in nearly every section of the United States. The fact is, that more books probably enter the mails and express from this office each year than from any other liberal office and book store in the world. Now is the time to awaken, and send in an additional subscriber for our winter campaign.

Sunday-Schools.

The Sunday School system was devised by Robert Raikes, of England, in 1782. It was designed to supply an elementary education to the laboring classes, who until then had been shamefully neglected by the government, the church claiming it was the special prerogative of ecclesiastics to educate the people. Raikes' project met with violent opposition, though the Bible was used as one of his principal text books. It was denounced as sacrilegious, a desecration of God's holy Sabbath to worldly affairs. "Such abuse of the sacred day," they said, "will bring swift destruction to all connected with it, to teachers, to pupils, and to parents who encourage it, or allow their children to attend school."

It was soon discovered the system could be made auxiliary to the church; then war was made on those who desired to limit the teaching to the rudiments of knowledge. It was then determined to use the schools solely in the interests of creeds.

The first Sunday School in America was opened in Philadelphia in 1791. Other societies were formed, but the American Sunday School Union, which swallowed all others, was organized in 1824.

We showed by statistics awhile ago that in some localities at least in America these schools had fallen into disfavor. An English journal before us as we write, giving as authority for its statement "The Sunday-School Union," says:

"Taking the figures as they are presented, we find that during the past year the Wesleyan Methodist Church shows a decrease [in Great Britain] of 5,400 scholars; the Baptists chronicle a decrease of 7,000; Calvinistic Methodists, 4,200; United Free Methodists, 3,000; Presbyterians, 1,400; the Free Church of Scotland, 4,300; and the established Church 7,000. Altogether these seven churches show a substantial decrease of 32,300 scholars in a single year."

Then the paper goes on to say:

"The above figures represent an actual decrease in the number of scholars on the registers of Sunday-Schools, but their significance is increased enormously by two considerations. The first is, as the population increases about 300,000 per year, the loss is really far greater than appears at first sight. Secondly: The register includes a third more than the actual attendance."

The writer then shows from the official statistics that the loss of pupils is from those over 14 years of age.

In every department of church work, in all the Protestant denominations, and in all countries where they exist, there seems a falling away of church workers, and attendance on church services. Men first lead the way out of the church and the women follow. The preachers have occasion to be sensitive on this subject, but vexation won't save them.

A D.D. Who Thinks.

Rev. Francis E. Clark, D. D., president of the United Society of Christian Endeavors, with the subject, "Losses and Gains from the Chinese Uprising," at the Congregational ministers' meeting in Boston, on October 1, is reported by the Associated Press to have said:

"The dragon's teeth of war and massacre were sown by the foreigners, who had come in a spirit of commercial greed to push their conquests. Turn the tables for a moment and imagine China forcing her goods upon us at the point of the sword. Sending her opium here to debauch our youth, compelling us to buy it, seizing the whole State of Massachusetts because two Chinamen were murdered by a mob, and we can imagine some of the feelings which animated the Boxers or the more intelligent powers behind the Boxers."

If missionary societies would profit by experience, turn their attention homeward, and inculcate a true morality among the degraded and criminal classes of our own country, and give less attention to the matter of belief among foreign tribes and nations, they would do well. Creeds are not reformatory. Nearly or quite all the great criminals in America have sympathized with some one of the orthodox churches. The wretch on the gallows, the rope about his neck, frequently rejoices that in a few moments he will be in Paradise, sharing with the thief who died on the cross, the bliss of heaven, because of his belief.

Preachers should learn to teach common sense at home before they engage in teaching distant peoples, foreign to our modes of thought.

As the Catholic Sees It.

A Catholic paper published at Columbus, Ohio, says Protestant colony-founding is a great failure. It claims there were sixteen millions of Indians within the present United States four hudred years ago, and not half a million are left; that the few who remain owe their preservation to the Catholics. It claims "Protestant civilization can be erected only on the ruins of what preceded it." It quotes a Hawaiian as saying to Protestant missionaries:

"You have taught us to lift our hands to heaven, and while we did this, you stole the land from under our feet."

It is difficult to prove that the Catholics are not guilty of the same crushing vices which the editor says characterized the Protestants.

Why Not?

A Mr. John Merwin Hubbard, of West Haven, Conn., has come to the front with a new fad, or, rather, the revival of an old one for Sunday services, which should be promptly adopted by all churchmen, because it is the reputed costume of the ancient Jewish priests. It is a flowing robe, with a golden girdle and a bonnet of ye olden time. Hats and trousers are out of fashion with our reformer. He is organizing a society, to be known as S. O. G. G., which being interpreted means Sunday Order of Gowns and Girdles. The motto is "A Heavenly Sabbath." Membership is open to all. The founder expects to see the new costume adopted by all churchmen who respect the Word of God, and why not?

Power of the Pen.

Warriors brave, listen: "More steel is used in the manufacture of pens than in all the sword and gun factories in the world." So says a well-posted exchange.

Those pens are silent in their action, but they are doing thousands of times more in revolutionizing the world and inaugurating an era of peace, prosperity and contentment than has all the armies in all the ages past.

Was Christ a Commercial Traveler?

All theologians tacitly admit that the whereabouts of Christ from the age of 12 until he entered upon the ministry, at the age of 30, is unknown. Recent researches among the sacred books of Hindostan show a great similarity between many of the phrases and parables of Christ and those of the Hindoo sages who lived centuries prior to the Christian era. The inference is that our Lord traveled extensively in the regions of the far East. It is presumed that, his precociousness having excited the wrath of the Jewish priesthood, it was found advisable to leave the country for a time, and that he joined one of the numerous caravans trading between Egypt and the Indies. Rome, at that period, the proud mistress of the world, had entered upon a period of costly splendor and of lavish display. The whole known world was ransacked to furnish luxuries to gratify the pampered taste of her extravagant emperors and proud patricians. Innumerable caravans were required to meet the demand, and there is not a shadow of a doubt that the leading merchants of those days were the Jews and the Greeks, who were largely engaged in this traffic. The old Romans, those stern masters of the world, considered trade to be infra dig., and, with a grim sarcasm as to the fitness of things, constituted Mercury the god of merchants and—thieves. It is supposed, on the best of grounds, that Christ took part in this business for eighteen years, and made frequent trips between Alexandria, where the goods were brought to Rome, and the Indies.

It is but natural to suppose that one of his extraordinary mental endowments would be an earnest student of the theological literature of the east, to which he could have abundant access. Edwin Arnold, in his "Light of Asia," shows that portions of the Lord's prayer and the Beatitudes came verbatim from Hindoo teachers who lived prior to Christ. A recent publication also shows that there is much similarity in the lives of Chrishnu and Christ. Chrishnu or Christnu was born many years before Christ. He was one of the Trinity of the Hindoos occupying the more central part of India. He came from Vishnu, became incarnate, was considered a savior of royal origin, born lowly, saluted by Divine songs from angels, surrounded by shepherds. Nada, the father, and Deva Maia, the Divine mother, were compelled to flee by night into a remote country for fear of a tyrant who had ordered all the male children to be slain. Chrishnu, by his wisdom at an early age, astonished the elders. He had a forerunner in his brother Rom. He is claimed to have washed the feet of Brahmins, cured lepers, raised the dead, was crucified, descended into hades, ascended into heaven, and sat beside Vishnu, the first person of the Hindoo Deity. The more erudite German theologians admit the astonishing similarity in the Asiatic savior Chrishnu and Christ. This similarity accounts in a great measure for the prevalence of German rationalism.

No less an authority than the Rev. Dr. Proudfoot, of London, Eng., who, in early youth, was trained in mercantile pursuits, has been cited to show that Christ himself, all through his proverbs and other parts of the Gospels, evinces a business training, and that he must have been familiar with the commercial methods in vogue in those days, and much more so than if he had merely followed the carpenter's trade of his father. Dr. Proudfoot is also of opinion that he traveled in India and was engaged in commercial pursuits as an attache of a caravan.

The above, written by James Seymour and published in the American Commercial Traveler, illustrates in a marked degree the declaration that there is no end of conjectures—no limit to theories! The Savior has been a fruitful theme for discussion ever since he commenced to act an important part on this terrestrial sphere. Sects—almost numberless—have been founded on the incidents connected with his conception, birth, life and various utterances. Histories of his life by various celebrities who have a world-wide reputation, have been written, and sermons without number preached from gilded pulpits with reference to him and his varied career, and verily the end is not yet.

As a culmination of the various histories commencing with Renan and ending with Beecher, the above statement by a commercial traveler is most fitting, and is entitled to as much credit as anything previously written with regard to the career of this remarkable character.

We regard Jesus as having been a most remarkable man; a moral philosopher; an iconoclast; a thorough and comprehensive reconstructionist; a remarkable magnetic healer; a medium of wonderful powers; and a seer such as the world had not previously seen. As a reconstructionist, the hundreds of sects in the world point to him exclusively as the cause of their existence, and though, looking from his supernal home he deplores their innate lack of spirituality, yet he recognizes the fact that his life and sayings brought them into existence. If a commercial traveler, he was undoubtedly a great success, and possessed none of the subtle characteristics of those of modern times, whose stories, ingenious prevarications, skilful subterfuges, and weird adventures mark them as a distinct race of mankind, that it would not be well to perpetuate into the far distant future. What will next be assigned to the Savior as a profession, remains yet to be seen, for there is no end to conjectures—no limit to theories!

Did More Harm than Good.

Mrs. J. F. Adams, of Syracuse, N. Y., who was in China during the last six months, and has just reached home, was interviewed by a Syracuse Herald reporter, to whom she said:

"The cause of the uprising was laid to the Russians by the English in Shanghai. It was believed that their purpose was to stir up dissension and then crawl in through the breach. But I think the missionaries were as much at fault as anybody. They had the best intentions, of course, but they did more harm than good."

A Popular Delusion.

Friday has been reputed the unlucky day of the week, a survival of medievalism, priest taught, but by careful observations in Germany, of near 10,000 weekly accidents, it was found Monday led the list; that Friday showed an equal number of accidents with Saturday and no more.

The Progressive Thinker Travels.

The poem, "October," by Thos. Harding, of Sturgis, Mich., which appeared in The Progressive Thinker, the first week of that month, seems to be going the rounds of the press; it appeared last week in the "Republican," of Breckenridge, Colo., the highest city in the Rocky Mountains.

Passed to Spirit Life.

T. D. Kaynor, prominent as a Spiritualist, passed to spirit life, at his home, 8736 South Wood street, Chicago, last week. He leaves a wife, Mrs. Isa Wilson-Kaynor, to mourn his loss. Will C. Hodge officiated at the funeral.

AN ANSWER.

What Good Does Spiritualism Do?

Having just closed a month's work in Williamsport, Pa., some items may be useful, if not interesting. The work of Mrs. R. W. Barton and Mrs. Demorest has made a strong impression upon many. Mrs. Helen Taylor is also credited with a liberal share of the interest awakened. Her prophecy of the discovery of oil and gas, that would be the chief business enterprise in Williamsport, to take the place of lumber now rapidly disappearing, has already began to show up a few miles out of the city. Her prophecy was on record before any outward sign of oil had appeared.

Mrs. Demorest made many friends in Williamsport, and is regarded as one of the best test mediums that has visited the city. A goodly number of church people were attracted, and became thoroughly converted, and one of them, Mrs. Lowry, is a rather remarkable medium and has had many startling experiences in the six months since her conversion. Thus the ranks depleted by death and hypnotic delusions are being recruited by fresh and reliable mediums, whose modesty and merit are in refreshing contrast with some of the egotistic vanity that gets lost in the clouds of romance, and fancies it is above mediumship. Mrs. Barton was over a year in Williamsport, as speaker and test medium.

Mrs. L. W. Dimick, 625 First avenue, thirty-five years a member of the Presbyterian church, was twenty-five years an invalid. Anyone that reads the Presbyterian confession of faith, might wonder that she was not an invalid from the first, and dead before the end of the first decade. If she really understood and appreciated that document, how could she be well? How can anyone contemplate it seriously and thoroughly believe it, and smile? How can a sane person eat and sleep, with such an infinite horror before him? No wonder Mrs. Dimick was sick, albeit she did not attribute her malady to the creed she thought she believed. She suffered terribly from general neuralgia. Her whole nervous system was involved. Not a nerve that did not ache continually, unless deadened with opiates. Physicians could not help her. She was to them a hopeless invalid and a nervous wreck, a pitiful sight to behold—a walking, trembling suffering skeleton. She went to one of Mrs. Barton's seances. Her parents came and gave satisfactory proof of their identity. They told her she could be cured. It seemed too good to be true. Next she had a private sitting with Mrs. Barton. The medium knew nothing of her history, but told her "all she ever did," all about her ailments, taking morphine, etc., and said she could be cured. She told her to throw away all medicines. After a time she suffered from the absence of the usual morphine, sent for Mrs. Barton who gave her a treatment which relieved her. She took six treatments in all, took no medicine or morphine after Mrs. B. took the case, and she is now a robust woman, blooming with health and freshness, and joy unspeakable at her wonderful deliverance. She was reduced to one hundred pounds. Now she weighs 150, and is a picture of buoyant health.

"What good does Spiritualism do?" This is one of millions of cases where it has cured the sick, consoled and comforted the sorrowing, lifted the burden from the oppressed, and given sunshine and gladness to those who had suffered for years, if not a lifetime, from oppression. This case is well known in Williamsport, and no one attempts to deny or explain, except Spiritualists, who understand the workings of the spiritual agencies, and know to whom we are indebted for such blessings. I realize that there are many remarkable cures performed by Christian Scientists and others, who do not acknowledge the help of excarnate souls; and of course the same law is operative in both classes. But it is my private opinion, publicly expressed, that nearly or quite all of the healing performed by any of these are indebted to the co-operation of excarnate souls. But this is no reason for ignoring or neglecting the use of our own powers for good in whatever capacity we may. But to ignore, or discredit the help of spirit friends, is to weaken their helpfulness, and impair our own instrumentality for good. LYMAN C. HOWE.

CHERISHED TREASURES.

Oh, those dear old friendly faces
That once brightly round us beamed,
Have departed, and their places
Are so empty, yet esteemed.

With those faces e'er before us,
In the pictures on the wall,
Comes a charming angel chorus,
And a cheer to one and all.

Here the easels hold the features,
While the months go passing on,
Of those little tender creatures
Whose sweet faces now are gone.

They are painted true as nature
Can embellish ev'ry grace,
And we see the form and stature
In the picture of the face.

Who can aught more deeply cherish
Than the face of one they love,
When the mortal form shall perish
And the soul ascends above.

AUTUMN DAYS.

A Sentimental and Spiritual Discursion.

Who does not love and admire the woods in autumn? Everywhere they are rioting in floods of gorgeous color, telling of the recent visits of Jack Frost, with his icy breath.

We sigh sometimes at the thught of parting with the lovely flowers of summer, and the pleasant rambles under the cool, green branches, and wish for a home in the Sunny South, where frosts never come.

But they who live in those summer latitudes, with their orange groves and roses, know nothing of the glorious beauty, and the wine-like balm of an autumn day in the northern states. Here in northern California, among the foot-hills of the Sierras, the views are especially grand and sublime.

To one unaccustomed to climbing, the sight of these hills, perhaps a thousand feet in height, might dampen considerably the ardor of his first attempt. But we will go up along a winding pathway, that curves in and out, among the great boulders, and groups of pine, gaining gently upon the height, until after many halts by the way, to get firm hold upon our breath, we emerge at last, among the very highest crags of its summit.

Now we have time to look about us, and the view almost sends us into spasms of delight. Below us is the valley we have left, with the little stream, like a silver ribbon, glinting here and there, from beneath the oaks and alders that line its brink. They still hold their summer greenness, with here and there a hint of change. But look along the ridges of the opposite slope, and the mountains that rise beyond, their pinnacled summits crowned with clusters of the yellow pine, at this distance having much the effect of a tuft of plumes in the head-gear of an Indian chief.

The oaks along the plateaus are mingling their warm, russet browns with the scarlet and gold of maples and poplars, among which the green of the yellow pine, and the delicate blue green of the digger pine sets in, like islands in a sea of color.

How they rise, terrace above terrace, in mottled and waving beauty, until the needle-like tops of the pines, seem to pierce the very clouds. And you almost feel that you could unfold spirit wings, and float away across the chasm into that dreamy distance of enchantment. It is worth the climb, is it not, to feel the joy of it, and you are thankful now for the change from summer's greenness, to the glory of frosty autumn.

I sometimes think, as I look through the glimmering, sunlit spaces, if our vision could be opened to spiritual things, what might we not behold in these seemingly isolated, and lonely valleys.

Radiant forms, perhaps, passing to and fro, on errands of love; silvery, magnetic trails lying here and there across the gorges, and beautiful homes above that lovely grove on the mountain side, might be a spiritual village. It seems an ideal site for one in our estimation, and the atmosphere would be pure and free from unlovely thought images, such as may come from more thickly settled countries. The very idea comes as an inspiration, and a sort of recompense for the many privileges of society, which we are forced to forego.

We cannot attend the lectures, the musical seances, and other reunions of kindred souls. But who would regret that fact, if he could consciously entertain visitors from that celestial village over the way, and drink in the inspiring truths which they could give him?

It only remains for us to aspire and labor with all diligence to arrive at that state of spiritual being when we can enter into consciousness of all that surrounds us, and greet our spiritual visitors as we do those on the mortal plane. No place, however isolated, would be lonely then, and all souls could partake of the water of life, as it comes, fresh and sparkling from its glorious source.

N. S. A. Amendment Proposed.

I introduced at the late convention of the N. S. A. an amendment to the article 6 of the Constitution, relating to membership, or primary units.

The intention is to make its auxiliary bodies only state, national or provincial. At present, local societies are represented. These should not be directly members, but gain their allegiance through the state associations, or as national bodies, such as the Y. P. S. U., or the N. S. L. A.

It is true that many states are not yet organized, and that would bar out the local societies of those states. Is it not clearly the duty of these separate states to organize? They can each do so. With employed N. S. A. missionaries, these states can be developed this year—or at least the next, before this amendment will be in force; for it cannot be adopted until in 1901 and be in action in 1902. We should be ready by that time. It has been the intention to make the N. S. A. a delegate body for the state associations. And such it should be. We have a confusion of interests otherwise.

Let us place our organization upon a proper business basis, if we are to have our cause organized. Local societies have jurisdiction in their separate localities, and are allied with the state association which has their commonwealth as special territory. The N. S. A., made up of the states, occupies the nation. The representation will be more thoroughly realized and equally distributed by having the delegations from states.

The state associations will more carefully select representatives, and will be able to pay their expenses to attend. Local societies can claim a delegate from their state association, occasionally, or every year if so numerically entitled.

A more dignified body will result and the proxy representation be solved. Then will cease the present conflict of proper representation, and the work of the N. S. A. be upon a stable footing.

The state associations will be strengthened and the public cause move forward with a more firm spirit of co-operation.

I present this issue now to call out thought and to urge the state and local organizations to candidly consider the proposition. This must result soon; but the question is now, will we be ready for it in 1902? G. W. KATES.

Spirits Antedate Scientists' Theories. By Sar'gis.

To the Editor:—One of the advantages of the impersonal signature is to hear your ideas discussed without the embarrassment of the discussors being aware of the writer's presence.

It was such an opportunity presented the other day to Sar'gis that is responsible for this infliction on the readers of The Progressive Thinker. The criticism was directed to the statement that the progress and new discoveries in modern science were confirmatory of spirit statement made in many cases years ago. The assertion was disputed by some, but as a rule was treated as not proved. But the talk suggested that possibly an article on the subject might not be amiss, as the parties to the conversation were intelligent and far above the average in every respect—and all sincere Spiritualists. But to attempt such a thing did not take shape until after reading in the press a number of papers treating of Life, its origin, its duration on the planet, as well as the earth's age and its continuance. It seems that this is now the one problem preeminent in the discussions of our civilization—or as the politicians would say, the paramount issue. But not even then was it undertaken until the appearance of the article in The Progressive Thinker by "Jus Tice" as to Prof. Loeb's hatching sea urchin eggs at the experiment station at Wood's Holl without the male fertilizing. Or as the scientists say, that parthenogenesis is true—not only as to marine life but to mammals as well. Hence immaculate conception is to become a "scientific" as well as a theological dogma. This Wood's Holl—"holl" being a "narrow ditch"—is a place on the Barnstable coast in Massachusetts that is used as an experiment station by the United States Fish Commission, and a working station for scientists generally in such lines of study.

Parthenogenesis is only a learned form of saying spontaneous generation, and while neither affirming or denying any theory, the design here is to show that spirit theory antedates Prof. Loeb and Wood's Holl on that subject. In what may be said, no statement as to spirit authority will be made that is not of record through mediumship, but the story will not be confused by parenthetical quotation, foot notes, credit by author's names inserted, or other like breaks upon continuity. The writer has no theories, dogmas or personal hobbies to air, and at the outset advises that all herein given is borrowed. This disclaimer is at once to remove any color of egotism from what is said.

In newspapers and magazines was found a reported symposium from several professors of eminence in our own Naval Observatory. Also an address of the retiring president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, all referring to this question of "perennial interest." And why this perennial question? Is it not because science itself, outside this, is simply a congeries of hypotheses, about which there is no absolute knowledge? Science, orthodox science, deals only with phenomena. The very boast that science is progressive emphasizes this fact. What have been the steps of this progress?

The first cosmogony upon which the modern world's thought was based is that of the creation as given in Genesis—the first book of our Bible. So firmly and so universally was this so, that poor Hugh Miller lost his reason in consequence of the contradiction between that authority and the testimony of the rocks, which his trade of stone-cutting compelled him to notice. And it is not too much to say that while the six-day period is no longer regarded, the idea of a "creation" colors the thinking of modern science in all planetary theories, as a rule. And so we read that man has been so many years on the earth, and can only stay so many more. Again, life is limited by some to the calculated supply of oxygen in the earth's atmosphere, while the destruction of forests and coal is hastening the exhaustion of the stored supply of the ages.

Prof. See obviates this by the prediction of the storage of the sun's heat to supply our demands for what is now supplied by coal and other motor agencies. Now, here is the first coincidence between science and spirits: One of the marked features of several annual discourses by Mrs. Richmond has been this very prediction of the time when solar heat would be utilized as a motor power through invention. And so often has this been so, that were it not for the high character accorded scientific men, the charge of plagiarism would lie at their doors in this regard. Were the medium to have thus accorded with science the imputation would be promptly thrown in her face by bigotry—but the years of priority estop this.

Another theory of science ends life by the earth's gradual absorption of the oceans into its interior and becoming like the moon a dead planet. Next, the theories as to being struck by a comet or from a disturbance of the pull of gravity running off the orbital track and colliding with another body, or dropping into the sun. All this adolescent guessing goes by the name of scientific hypothesis. As to the origin of life science has no other theory than that it began after the earth had cooled sufficiently to permit its existence. And this pre-supposes it at one time an incandescent sphere—a burning orb. Stick a pin here.

Astronomers, or the mathematicians, and the geologists differ widely as to the age of the earth, and its duration both. The former will not allow more than twenty million years at most for the life-bearing period of the planet, while the geologist contends for a much greater antiquity. Next come the biologists with whom evolution is a controlling factor, and they incline more to the geologists than to the mathematicians. But as in the case of the others, whose basic concepts are but hypotheses, the evolutionist, after forty years since Darwin opened the way by his Origin of Species for the doctrine, is compelled to admit that its evidence is still indirect—almost if not quite wholly so.

To put the question of human knowledge as represented by science to-day, it stands upon the same ground as does that of theology in its domain—pure hypothesis. Aside from the fact that invention and discovery, aided by mathematics, have superseded a flat earth with sun, moon and star accompaniment for day and night utilities, all are saturated with the old "creation" ideal, and allow it, unconsciously of course, to color their thinking. Neither has a basis of absolute evidence. Even mathematics is found to be but a relation to hypothesis, not a solvent—dependent for its answer always upon the premise—the X. In a former article it was shown that gravity; the cause of light and heat from the sun; the problem of life, its origin, development and duration, as applied to the planet, are all in the nebulous hypothetical condition. What then have we about which these philosophers so wisely discourse—of the Absolute? The situation as described is the answer.

But what does the fact teach? No one for a moment will attempt to belittle the wonderful advance made in the scientific world—the marvels in astronomic discovery; in chemistry; in applied electricity; in mechanics; in sanitary knowledge. These conditions are patent, if not to the comprehension, to the feeling of the race. But here it stops for the present at least, and the student has to admit that as yet science is forever shifting its ground, the hypothesis of yesterday accepted or rejected as the theory of to-day.

As Spiritualists we claim to have answered one of the questions, one asked for ages, the one basic fact of all the rest: "If a man die shall he live again?" To this we claim to say—Yes. It is, as yet, the one categorical answer in human knowledge. And how do we prove it? By the same evidence that we prove anything else, the evidence in kind that science accepts for its hypotheses; the evidence that is accepted by courts in all matters affecting human life and rights—that which appeals to the human senses weighed by human reason and experience. And it ill becomes the man who deals in the hypothetic to reject our direct evidence because it may seem beyond his hypothesis to explain. That is the practical situation to-day and all of it. His position was that of the Psychical Research Society thirteen years ago and last year. But to-day it says as we say—yes. So much then for all these and that.

It has been said that scientific research, experiment and discovery were as a rule but finding facts anticipated by spirit suggestion, often years in advance of the results of the laboratory—and we ought to be able to show evidence for the assertion. And it can be shown that all these questions have been discussed and spirit hypotheses given along the whole field of what we call physical, astronomic or biologic science, with the of course added fact of continuous or after-death life. But it may as well be said at the outset that this spirit outgiving is not dogmatic, but after the scientific method—left to rest for acceptance on the reason and judgment of the student. Did it do otherwise its superior knowledge, if we so concede it, would at once be questioned and questionable—for the primal teaching as to continued life is that it is human in all respects and therefore of limited or finite capacity for knowing. One cardinal principle of spirit philosophy is, that the thing cannot know or comprehend the power behind its being. Hence the scientific knowledge of spirits is as the Keplers, the Newtons, the Franklins or the Darwins in that life may look at its facts and the facts that were theirs in this part of their life. With this in mind the question of the origin of worlds, of life upon our own planet and the forces underlying the primal life—that of the planet itself—may be entered on intelligently and pursued with growing knowledge and satisfaction. There are but two ways open; The one suggested, of investigation and research; or the other, to go back to the six days' creation and the phenomena of nature dependent on the everyday caprice of a personal general manager.

It seems almost a justifiable assumption, that the spirit people who have gone out from us had anticipated the present demand and prepared for it. Hence the work of Swedenborg, of Andrew Jackson Davis, of Maria King, of Hudson Tuttle, Oahspe, and the scores of less elaborate essays. It may be mentioned that the discourses of Mrs. Richmond, from a child of a dozen years to the present, on scientific problems, given her by the most eminent men in Europe and this country, could to-day be studied as profitable by the men engaged upon these "unsolved problems of the coming century." There is not an unscientific sentence in one of them. And so of Edwin D. Babbitt and Prof. Lockwood.

In a former article it was shown how in summing up the work of science the results of laboratory investigation had reached the borderland where spirit could only answer the resulting question. Already in Prof. Lockwood, it seems we have found the pioneer pilot, who takes the first step across the line between material science and spirit, as the solution of the problem. He is certainly purely a scientist in his conceptions and methods, and he is as surely a Spiritualist in his conclusions. No student can go behind his premises or his methods, and his conclusions are as unassailable as mathematical demonstration. Some day the initialed orders will be compelled to call upon him for his assistance in the solution of the next century questions.

But a few years ago it was the theory that space was a void, that the heat and light came from the sun by radiation as from a furnace, the sun being a fire fed by cosmic or meteoric fuel. And the learned professors seemed oblivious to the paradox how this solid fuel could come in such supply from a void? The same forgetful conditions obtain to-day in some of the hypotheses of science, but when it comes to life, its origin and persistence, it is all guess and confusion—and theology is left to the Genesis theory almost unchallenged, while endowed science shrugs its shoulders and says it is not in its department—or as Talleyrand said—"that is left to my confessor."

Andrew Jackson Davis has given us a principia in which these questions are treated with as clear statement, as logical as any hypothesis of orthodox science, and as amenable to intellectual analysis and scholastic rules as any system of the schools. Admit it is hypothesis—that by confession is all that are the others. And why should science refuse to consider his theories any more than Tesla's? This name is used because his discoveries come nearer spirit as their solution than most of his contemporaries. In these spirit discoveries referred to will be found the beginning of the rejection of this void space theory, the idea of the sun as a base-burner heater, and other things growing out of that basic thought. Even the hell of theology had to go when science let go these. Now as to where you stuck the pin:

As an illustration of spirit theory apropos of these Wood's Holl experiments, let us take that of life and its advent on the planet. A quotation would make it too long for a newspaper article, and it will be given as briefly as plainness will allow:

Contrary to the assumption of science as held by Tyndall, that there is no such thing as spontaneous generation, the inference is that there was no other. For example: Given a pool of still water in the hot weather of dog-days and it soon becomes covered with green scum. In a few days put this under a strong lens and it is a forest of plant life. The wind, a stone thrown into it, or a frog leaping in, breaks it up and it floats to the shore, takes root, grows and dies, but in the spring comes into life and is persistent in form. No seed was there, but there is organic life developed and unfolded. It is a sign, so to speak, as to the origin of all life. Now as to the theory of life as we have it on the planet, or for illustration, mammal life:

Simply stated it is this: The normal temperature of the human body, say, is 98 degrees Fahrenheit. A few degrees below or above this, say 94 degrees or 102 degrees, continued for a brief time without change is death. It is at this normal temperature that all life is propagated and incubated, in the womb or in the shell. Is it illogical to claim that it was at this temperature that life made its advent on our earth? If it was first a hot sun and cooled as now, taking millions of years to do so, must it not at one time have been at this temperature and for a long period? It could not come otherwise from the fact that it so comes now and cannot otherwise stay.

The next theory is that space is not void but world matter in solution, and of differing densities, as the nebula we can see illustrates. The solar system travels in an immense orbit through this space and its worlds are fed and fertilized by this matter in solution, or the space conditions passed through. At the time our earth was fitted by changes ready for the advent of life upon it, it entered for a cycle, say two or three thousand years, a region of a density to produce this normal temperature, and the green scum-like conditions obtain for all that period—would it not furnish for life's advent exactly those that exist to-day for its propagation and maintenance? The case is simply put without comment, only to ask, has science or theology ever presented a more rational or a more scientific one? Yet this is a spirit theory. It is not the purpose here to argue this theory as to its bearing on the creation hypothesis or on evolution. It is given as an answer to the charge that Spiritualism never reaches the higher realms of thinking. In this matter it has one merit over its detractors or opposers: It is a theory consistent with itself and with facts as they are in nature—thus giving evidence of logical thought. But at the end it has the frankness to say that though we may account for how life came upon the earth, yet life itself to man is unfathomable.

The whole range of scientific hypotheses are traversed with equal directness—as to gravity, the tides, the formation of rain, hail, snow, meteors and "dead worlds." One of the marked theories of some modern astronomers is as to these dead worlds, invisible but responsive to mathematics. Spirit theory not only recognizes them but so-called dead nebula as well. It also regards oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, etc., as of this world matter, and when as transparent nebula they lie in immense fields millions of miles in extent between the earth and sun our spectroscope observers sometimes mistake them as being in the sun itself or in its atmosphere. Suppose this to be fact, what a revolution it portends in astronomic research.

Science is now discussing the theory as to whether nebula, the fire-mist, etc., is the true one, or that space is absolute cold and dead worlds frozen or not. They contend that the moon is dead, yet insist that it controls the tides by attraction—as if a dead thing can exert power of any sort. Spirit theory makes the earth the manufacturer, so to speak, of its own light and heat, from the power of its own atmosphere as a lens. Space, like the stick of carbon, conducts the force from the sun without visibility, but the atmospheric lens, like the air space between the sticks of carbon, is not equal to that office and light and heat result from that fact. If the earth were a dead planet it could not do this, nor could it sustain life on it. Science is at last beginning to see that a dead thing cannot produce life. So long as our earth can keep its normal conditions at 98 degrees, it will continue to carry its atmosphere, propagate life-forms and produce the light and heat necessary to these ends. But let the temperature go down to a normal of even 94 degrees and life would cease to propagate and the earth soon be a dead planet and invisible to observers on other worlds.

There is no need here of more illustration for the purpose in view—not to exploit or contend for any theory or hypothesis—only to show that what was said in other articles is true: That in the fields of scientific investigation, experiment and hypothesis, spirit was on record with its theories and their exposition, covering and antedating the most important problems of science to-day.

CONSCIENCE: AN INFALLIBLE STANDARD

I do not propose to tell you what conscience is, for I am not sure that I know. I only hope to point out a few significant facts bearing on the question. We state a series of propositions.

1. Right and wrong exist. Some things and actions are good while others are evil.

2. There is a way—a law—a method of some kind by which to determine what is good and what is evil. A standard of right, either absolutely true or only relatively so, also exists.

3. Conscience is that attribute of our being, either inherent or acquired, which approves the right and condemns the wrong. Conscience, in the soul of man, also exists.

We have then to deal with the following trinity: (1) Right. (2) A Law of right. (3) A Something (conscience) which, when enlightened by the law, approves the right. I believe these statements faithfully present the entire field in which conscience plays a part.

First. Right exists, and wrong is its negative or perversion. Anything not right is wrong. One thing is right, many may be wrong. Only one thing is true in a given case, but there may be a thousand lies in regard to the same matter. But let us understand that there is always a right, a good, and that any variation from it is wrong. Two and two added together make four, or just double the first number. This is absolute truth. Any variation, such as saying two and two make five, is absolute falsehood. Sweet and sour stand opposite: day and night are opposite: up and down express diametrically contrary directions. So in the realm of morals there is good and evil. There is that which is right, absolutely right, eternally right. And any variation from that right is wrong—any failure to do it is sin.

A pseudo-science, arising in later times, says all is good and there is no evil. "Whatever is, is right." But human experience of pain, oppression, injustice, neglect, falsehood, gives the lie to this most irrational theory. He that denies the existence of evil is either suffering a mental aberration or else is himself guilty of a fondness for some form of vice. He that denies the existence of evil justifies every sin and injustice that wrongs and degrades the race.

The sense of sin is well-nigh universal. The doctrine of evolution is possible only because man can be uplifted. Whether one believes in the "fall of Adam" or not, it is a fact that man has been down, and that through the ages he has been rising. In order to rise, to become better, he had to cleave to some things and to reject others. Some things hindered, others helped. Some actions secured happiness and concord, while others produced only misery and discord. So he learned to discriminate good and evil, to distinguish between different lines of conduct. The same necessity that compelled him to distinguish day from night, up from down, pleasure from pain, also forced him to make moral distinctions, and to catalogue one class of actions and results as evil and another class of actions and consequences as good. He would be a fool who should say, "All is day, there is no night;" or, "All is sweet, there is no sour:" but not more a fool than the so-called (by himself) "scientist" who chatters his inanity to the wind, "There is only good: evil is an imagination."

But I waste space in this work. The sane, enlightened portion of the race perceive that good and evil both actually exist, and that they are forever at war touching the best interests of humanity.

2. A Law of Right. How shall we know the right? how discern evil? Said the tempter to Eve. "Ye shall become as gods, knowing good and evil." He was right. "There is no religion higher than the truth." To know good from evil—to infallibly decide between right and wrong—that is god-like. A god can do no more, perhaps only a God can do as much. Certainly man has only been able thus far to approximate a perfect distinction between them.

Is there a law of right? if so, where? The first possible reply is: God's Word. A Revelation is proposed. The serpent said to Eve: "God doth know." Of course. If there is a God, he knows. He understands the finest distinctions possible, and can make a line of absolute demarcation between good and evil. It is certain that if there is an infinite and eternal God he is capable of defining finally, and with absolute precision, just what is right and what is wrong. The devil was right—"God doth know."

Moreover, let those who revel in a belief of "Infinite Intelligence" consider this fact: A God who knows is sure to tell. See how different intelligences strive to communicate. We study the languages that we may correspond with other races. Prof. Garner is even trying to master the language of apes. Spirits seek to hold communion with mortals. And God, if so be he exists, will have broken down every barrier and established intercommunion with man. If there is a God, there is also a revelation. "God hath spoken" is as sure as "God is." Deism is the most illogical ism, or conception of things, ever presented, because it assumes the existence of God while denying the existence of a revelation of his will. No: he that will have a God must also have a revelation. To suppose the existence of an "Infinite Intelligence" who refuses to communicate with other intelligences is to suppose an absurdity. A parent who knows good from evil is blamable if he fails to teach the difference to his children, providing for their safety in this way. Likewise God, who "doth know," has provided a Law of right for his children. Where is it? Briefly, in the Golden Rule: more explicitly, in the Decalogue, Sermon on the Mount, and the entire moral content of apostles' and prophets' writing.

The foregoing is the Christian conception of a standard of right and wrong. There is another view held by many. It ignores God and Revelation altogether. According to this our ideas of wrong are simply the conclusions of human experience. In developing by evolution out of savage and ignorant conditions the race has gained by experience all it knows of good and evil. Our wisdom is not the ready-made maxims of a God-given revelation, but the slowly acquired lessons of ages of human experience. We know a thing is good, not because God said so, but because we found it out by trying. We hold certain things to be evil, not because God thundered against them from a contemptible rock in a far-away desert, but because centuries of human experience has convicted the race of their harmful results and tendencies. And so on. The standard thus presented is getting better. We are not perfect but going on to perfection. We learn by experience instead of being enlightened by a superhuman and supernatural revelation.

Here are two plans presented as to how we gain a standard of right. I do not care which you adopt as a theory: practically they come to the same thing. If by revelation, here is the Golden Rule, Ten Commandments, etc. If you say we reach a standard of right and wrong by experience, then human experience can point to nothing more excellent than the Golden Rule, Decalogue, etc. I know there have been some who profess to find flaws in the Decalogue and weakness in the Golden Rule, but such individuals are properly either objects of derision or subjects of silent contempt. Men who criticise the Sermon on the Mount or the Ten Commandments do not expect to be taken seriously—they can hope for no recognition in the common way and hence secure a little cheap notoriety by making faces. That is all. I refuse to believe there is a human being so destitute of moral perception as to really believe these things (Ten Commandments, etc.) are imperfect.

By whatever method we may adopt we reach the same position at last. I incline to the theory that human experience has resulted in production of our moral standard, and that the conclusions are embraced in the Golden Rule and other ethical instruction contained in the New Testament. Here is the Law of Right.

3. Conscience does not decide what is right or wrong. That is settled by the law, by precepts and teaching which we accept as a standard of conduct. "By the law is the knowledge of sin."—Paul. Having accepted a certain line of action as right, or, as Paul says, "I consent unto the law that is good," my conscience approves when I obey that law and condemns when I disobey. Conscience is not a guide, for it allows one man to do things without a qualm and lashes another unmercifully for doing the same thing. One man plays a social game at cards or makes a picnic of Sunday and feels no condemnation: another would be horrified at the bare suggestion that he should do such a thing. It is all a question of how they have been taught. Conscience is a creature of education. As near as I can tell, conscience is only the action of the mind in approving what it has been taught to be right, or disapproving what it believes to be wrong.

Now the sum of the matter is this: We need a standard of human conduct. We need an exact measure of morals. We need to be just what the Devil suggested, "as gods, knowing good from evil." This is absolutely the greatest question before us at the present moment. By what law, or book, or rule of discipline, shall we develop our characters and shape our actions? Shall every man be a "law unto himself?" Shall public opinion, which shifts like the wind, be our only guide? Shall we have no recognized standard of conduct? no clear, comprehensive statement of principles, no collection of moral precepts and maxims to which we may turn confidently as to an authority in all matters of human action?

Brother Spiritualists, I pray you, consider. This is the paramount issue. Christians have such a law, an accepted standard of conduct, a guide in character building. It is the New Testament. Honestly now I do not see how it can be improved: but if it can, by all means let it be done at once. To this supreme end every energy of the N. S. A. convention should be directed. Either officially adopt the entire New Testament, or choice, carefully selected portions of it, or else promulgate something else better to take its place. But do something. As an outsider, as a friendly critic, I declare to you this is your crying need. You must present to the world a standard of morals as your rule of conduct, or else those who believe in good conduct and in being amenable to moral law simply will not desert the churches to flock to your ranks. Without adopting and enforcing such a standard you will continue a disorganized, incapable body of good people, possessing a great truth, but falling short of your duty and opportunities.

You admit right and wrong: you have conscience: but you are without a recognized, authoritative Law of Right and Wrong.

GOD-BUILDING.

"An Honest God Is the Noblest Work of Man."

The God-making season having nearly arrived, please permit me to try my ingenuity in this business, through the columns of your magnificent paper, The Progressive Thinker.

1. I take a trinity of non-substantial infinitudes, viz., Space, Time, Law.

2. A trinity of substantial infinitudes, viz.: Matter, Spirit, Life.

Matter the positive pole of space,
Spirit the positive pole of time,
Life the positive pole of law.

Now combine these infinitudes in the relation that we find them combined in nature and we have a very respectable Deity—Pantheos.

A Deity that is not engaged in formulating any special privileges or providencies, or in enacting laws beneficial to the few, and detrimental to the many.

I dislike very much a Deity who has special privileges to grant; who has a chosen people, and who favors that people to the great disadvantage of other peoples.

Special laws and special providences are abhorrent to me. I detest special laws and favoritism in our state and national affairs, and when carried into nature's affairs they become still more hateful and detestable.

It strikes me that intelligence is a faculty of personality and, inasmuch as you cannot have a personality without a limit, an Infinite Intelligence, becomes an absurdity.

Law, Nature's law, is an infinitude, a universal, it rises above and overrides intelligence; it is the Absolute. It does not, like a person, hate and love, regret and rejoice, be merciful and revengeful, or jealous and forgiving.

Like space, time, matter, spirit and life, it simply is, was, and will be, without beginning and without end, impersonal and impartial, involving and evolving, building in and building out, in one continuous, consecutive and unbroken round.

Space exists everywhere, the negative pole of matter, its correlation; one could not exist without the other, nor the other without the one; both are infinitudes, universals.

Time moves ever on, ever has, ever will; it is the negative pole of spirit, that sublimated substance commonly called energy. Time and energy are the opposite poles of the same universal magnet. They are infinitudes and correlations, and in harmony with space and matter. They are mobile.

Law is the negative pole of the sublimated flame substance of life, its correlation—the existence of the one is inimical to the non-existence of the other.

Through the manifold and mysterious involutions and evolutions of these infinitudes that correlate and are harmonious, all the varied material, spiritual, and life phenomena of cosmos are formulated, produced, and carried forward. To their energies and potentiality personality is incidental. Intelligence, love, justice and many other functions, faculties, and attributes are incidental to personality.

All these working together in one harmonious whole constitute a bird's-eye view of the great infinitude of the universe—without center or circumference—without beginning or end.

Co-operation.

Men have ever been trying to find a way to make men good all at once. Sheep men in our country build a large vat, one side perpendicular, the other side slanting; in this they put a solution of lime, sulphur and salt, and when the sheep get the scab they drive them up to the top of the steep side and dump them, head and tail in, and let them scramble out the other side. So the world has been looking for a solution to dump the wicked in and have them scramble out, "washed whiter than snow." So far they have followed a blind lead, the fact is they are lost in the woods, and are not following any trail. Human experience and human wisdom show that "as the twig is bent the tree inclines." I never knew a man to become a drunkard all at once, neither did I ever know a man to become good or bad all at once, looks all right at first reading, if you are in a hurry and don't think, but when you analyze it with the light of reason and experience, its a cullender and won't hold water.

Why, then, not have an economic system of co-operation that will destroy the incentive to selfishness and greed? Every human soul knows, who has analyzed his life, that in the fortress of each and every character, there is one weak wall. I think it is devilish and inhuman to have a system like the present competitive system that is continually subjecting the sons and daughters of men to every known temptation to do wrong for money's sake. Under a system of economic equality the environment would be good, the incentives would be good; such a system would not pay a premium on crime, as the present one does.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Mrs. Jennie C. Titus, of 822 High street, Williamsport, Pa., secretary, writes: "Lyman C. Howe just closed a very successful engagement with the First Congregation of Spiritualists of this city on the 21st of October, and from here he goes to Olean, N. Y. The public as well as the society was sorry to see him leave, as his lectures were very inspiring as well as interesting. The society would like to engage a good lecturer and test medium. Our society is chartered and has moved into new quarters for the winter, having rented the Reno Post Rooms on West Third street, near Pine, one of the finest halls in the city. It has just elected a new set of officers and will be ready for the winter's work as soon as it gets a medium. The following are the officers: David L. Hess, president; Mrs. L. W. Dimmock, vice-president; Mrs. Jennie C. Titus, secretary; Mr. T. G. Lowery, treasurer."

David Winegarden writes from Pierce, Ala.: "I am still in the work of healing the sick, and I give the angel world due credit for their assistance. I feel like doing some more missionary work. I have now an unlimited supply of 'Biggest Story in the Bible' to give away. To anyone sending a stamp to pay postage I will send a copy free. They are a good thing to hand to your orthodox friend. Let us all push the good work, and resolve that we, one and all, will get at least one new subscriber for The Progressive Thinker. I received the seven premium books. I am well pleased with them. I do not see how you can give all those books for the paltry sum of $2.35."

Eli Link writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "Mrs. L. N. Claman gave the First Spiritual Society of Battle Creek a rare treat consisting of two lectures. The subject of the morning lecture was 'The New Thought of Immortality,' and the evening, 'Evolution.' Both were handed in from the audience. Her descriptive readings were of such a convincing nature as to place her in the foremost rank of platform test mediums. She has a rare magnetic personality."

Mrs. Emogene York writes from Vicksburg, Mich.: "The First Society of Spiritualists here have been highly entertained by an earnest worker in the cause of Spiritualism, Mrs. Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit. The Society here was well pleased with her discourses, and hope to have her among us again soon."

Mary L. Stillwell writes: "Bankson's Lake Spiritual Association (Mich.) is of new growth, having been organized last year, with a list of fifty members. The association held a camp-meeting the past summer, from June 3 to 17 inclusive, with Mrs. Marion Carpenter, of Detroit, Mrs. Amanda Coffman, of Grand Rapids, and Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, of Fort Worth, Texas, as speakers. Although the association ran behind some, yet on the whole it did fairly well for a beginning. There is now a paid-up membership of forty members. At the annual meeting, held September 23, the following officers were elected: President, George H. Prentice, Lawton; vice-president, John Stillwell, Lawton; secretary, Mrs. Hattie Nesbitt, Schoolcraft; corresponding secretary, Mrs. S. T. Beam, Lawton; treasurer, Mr. S. R. Munger, Lawton. Directors—T. Wyman, Lawton; T. H. Nesbitt, Schoolcraft; John Dewey, Marcellus, and S. Beam, Lawton."

Will C. Hodge, who is still engaged for Sunday work with the Englewood Spiritual Union, is open for week night lectures in any locality within one hundred miles of Chicago. He will make very reasonable terms with parties desiring such lectures. Who will be first to respond? Address him at 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ill.

The Church of the Spirit Communion will give a ball at Kenwood Hall, 4308-10 Cottage Grove avenue, Hallowe'en night, October 31. The best of music has been engaged and a good time is promised all. Admission 25 cents.

G. H. Brooks is lecturing to appreciative audiences at Allegheny, Mich. He can be reached by telegram or letter at 909 Sandusky street. He will respond to calls for funerals.

Rev. Harry J. Moore and wife, Bertha Sheneman Moore, would like to correspond with societies wishing to engage speakers and test mediums. Would also be pleased to correspond for camp engagements for summer of 1901. Address, 336 East 55 street, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. F. A. Logan will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. in Caledonia Hall, Los Angeles, Cal., South Spring street, every Sunday. All are welcome to participate. Admission 10 cents.

J. M. White is in Topeka, Kansas. He served the Church of Spiritualism at Lincoln Post G. A. R. hall, on the night of October 28. Parties desiring his services can address him at General Delivery, Topeka, Kans. After November 1, mail will reach him addressed to Box 97 Alvo, Neb.

Mr. G. W. Way, trance, test and business medium of Wheeling, W. Va., has located for the winter at Washington, D. C., and can be addressed at No. 7 N street, N. W. He writes: "I enjoy reading your most valuable paper, and it has been an educator to me in my psychic development."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Trinity Spiritual Society will hold their regular meeting on Wednesday, October 31, at Van Buren Opera House, Hall A. Mrs. Nixon president. All invited.

Mrs. Lee Nora Claman writes: "Last April I came from Louisville, Ky., to Michigan to work for the First Spiritualist Church of Grand Rapids. My work was a grand success. From there I went to Lansing for May, and then visited the different camps, where I was employed, and my work was so satisfactory my services were again engaged for another year. I have done a great deal of missionary work in the State. I have lectured in almost all denominated churches, even the Catholic, speaking the truth and demonstrating spirit return. On last Saturday night I lectured in the Methodist church at Constantine, and the minister, the Rev. Wilson, wanted me to fill his pulpit for him on Sunday night. I told him I must decline as I was booked to lecture for the Spiritualists of Battle Creek. I find more Spiritualists and more societies in Michigan than any State I have ever worked in. Since coming here I have officiated at five funerals. The Spiritualists have a fine organization and the oldest church in America, and the work they are doing is indeed beautiful. I will be with them for two weeks. I send greeting to all the societies and workers in Michigan, and hope to be able to come back here in the spring and take up my work again."

Mrs. Carrie F. Weatherford writes from Louisville, Ky.: "Essie and I leave Louisville for Flint, Ind., soon, and will remain there two Sundays unless called home. We find it necessary to get nearer home on account of my mother's health. Several Michigan people asked me to notify them of my first open dates in the State, but I have lost their addresses. Will they kindly write me at once? I especially want to request that all good workers coming this way should stop off and aid the People's Spiritual Church. They have several very fine workers here, prominent among whom are Mr. Heinzon and Mrs. Mann; the former a reputable business man and fine lecturer; the latter an unusually good test and trumpet medium. While appreciating home workers, outside talent is still appreciated also. This society stands for honor and integrity in mediumship, as do the workers above mentioned; and were it not for such as they we should have no cause left. For a long time I have tried to find an orthodox minister who would discuss the question of spiritual gifts. In going to Flint, such a one will either debate or back out. My first announcement hereafter from all rostrums to which I may be called, and also through the secular press, will be this: 'We are among you to aid in proving to a certainty that the primitive Christian "Gifts of the Spirit" are possessed today by modern psychics, and we also aver that these gifts, like the physical gifts, are from God. In order to aid scientific investigation into these claims we offer our services gratis to any committee of business men, lawyers, editors, doctors, merchants or clergymen who will form a psychic research association, providing a competent stenographer is employed to give the full reports of said research to the public. In the course of said scientific investigation I shall tell people all (or many things at least) that they ever did; demonstrate that we have "discernment of spirits;" that we speak in "unknown tongues" (unknown to ourselves) and that I "give prophecy." I shall give histories of people from photographs, from sound of voice, and from the touch of the hand while I am securely blindfolded; and shall also deliver messages of identification from spirits to their mortal friends.' Societies desiring my services for such an aggressive campaign against materialism can address me at Alaska, Mich."

W. E. Bonney writes from Kansas City, Mo.: "The cause of Spiritualism at Kansas City has for its representatives Mrs. Carrie L. Bean and Miss Edith E. Edwards, two talented ladies whose psychic powers are of a high order and worthy of the support of Kansas City Spiritualists and investigators. These two worthy workers have succeeded in organizing a Society of Spiritual Truth, which holds services every Sunday evening at Arlington Hall, corner of Tenth and Walnut. On Sunday, October 14, I attended their meeting and assisted in the program by giving a lecture on the subject, 'Do Spirits Return to Earth.' The hall was well filled by an appreciative audience. The following Wednesday evening a benefit seance was given at Mrs. Bean's rooms, 611 East Eighth street, which brought out a good crowd. The manifestations consisted of an independent voice through Miss Edwards' mediumship, also inspirational music on the piano and tests by both ladies. Kansas City is not the best field in the world for mediums, as many good workers can testify from experience, and it takes nerve and indomitable energy as well as good psychic power, to take chances in building up a society in this city. One of the principal reasons for this being a poor field for spiritual mediums, arises from the fact of Dr. Roberts' popularity as a liberal speaker. His meetings at the Coates Opera House are always well attended and he is exerting a widespread influence for good. Many Spiritualists are regular attendants at his meetings and contribute liberally to his support. This, however, ought not to cause them to neglect their own meetings where earnest speakers and mediums are endeavoring to give to the world evidence of a continuous existence, a matter which is neglected at the popular Church of This World, as Dr. Roberts' church is called. I assisted again at the Arlington Hall meeting last Sunday, October 21. On this occasion my subject was 'The Religion of Humanity,' which closes my work here now. My permanent address is Box 173, Blair, Neb."

George Campbell writes from Nanaimo, B. C.: "The Hull-Baer debate created considerable discussion on Spiritualism all over this Province, and the result of it will redound to the advancement of Spiritualism. Bro. Hull delivered only three lectures in Victoria, B. C. As a result of his work during his short visit the society in that city gained eight members. I did not hear of any gain in the Vancouver society, but I hear that they charged a high admission fee, which scared away the people. I think it a mistake to charge an admission fee. We should work as nearly in line with the churches as possible. The public do not take kindly to sudden changes. When the doors of the churches are open and a free entrance, it is not wisdom on our part to charge an admission fee. Our little band of workers here are nobly holding out against the strong opposition of the foes of Spiritualism. As soon as we can recover from our financial loss incurred by the debate, we will again engage a good test medium and draw their fire again."

Mrs. Maggie Waite writes from Syracuse, N. Y.: "Again I have returned to Syracuse, N. Y. I am kept busy all the day, not able to attend to all who come, the people here preferring to visit a medium privately rather than attend meetings. A word about my mail sittings. So great has the increase in my mail become that I have got a little behind, but if the friends will have patience they will get their readings in due time. I want to thank the many friends for their kind and unsolicited testimonials which I have received. I have received letters with no address; some I cannot make out. If the friends reading this, who have not received their letters, will write me, I can forward them."

Virgine Barrett writes from Marquette, Mich.: "I am here for a time, and shall be pleased to hear from societies in Michigan. Terms reasonable. Address me for the present, General Delivery, Marquette, Mich."

Dr. W. S. Eldridge, of Saginaw, Michigan, was in the city last week. He has been lecturing at Saginaw and healing the sick.

Mrs. Emmliss Blake, who resides at 369 South Division street, Grand Rapids, Mich., is open for engagement to lecture and give tests.

G. W. Kates and wife held successful meetings in Winona, Minn., October 21-29, excepting the 26th, when they had an interesting session in Minnesota City. The state association intends to hold a series of meetings in Minneapolis this winter, and Mr. and Mrs. Kates to be in charge. A campaign of spiritual conquest is inaugurated, from which there shall be no turning back. Address these workers at 58 Royalston avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Mrs. C. H. Mullins writes: "Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond will speak Sunday, Nov. 4, at 3 p. m., at the Auditorium, People's Institute, corner Van Buren and Leavitt streets."

E. J. Bowtell has been engaged by the Olneyville Spiritualist Society, Olneyville, R. I., for the present season, with liberty to accept occasional calls from other societies within reasonable distance. Can arrange with camp-meeting associations for season of 1901. Address 29 Home avenue, Providence, R. I.

Ed R. Kelley writes: "I do not believe in the divine authenticity of the Bible, but I do believe that there is a great creative power, call him Good or what you will. Now the question is with me, does a man live after this existence in another or spirit world. I want to read your paper and see what Spiritualists generally say upon the subject. I am told that almost every one who attempts to investigate the subject fairly will almost invariably become Spiritualists."

Polly Burrows writes: "A pleasant surprise was given Dr. Burrows, pastor of the Central Spiritual Union of Detroit, Mich., the occasion being the first social given by the Ladies' Spirituelle, when the Doctor was made the happy recipient of an elegant gold mounted umbrella. Mr. John D. Boyle made the presentation speech which was responded to by the Doctor. It was late when the company parted."

F. P. Baker writes from Topeka, Kansas, that Mrs. Maud Lord Drake's address is Angels Camp, Cavalaras Co., California.

The Sunflower Social Club held its first social of the season at Oakland Club Hall, corner Oakwood and Ellis avenues, last Friday evening. Supper was served at 6 o'clock, the table being abundantly filled with delicacies and good things donated by the ladies and greatly enjoyed by all who partook of them. Several remarked that the sociability manifested was worth the price of supper, saying nothing of the excellent coffee and eatables. An interesting program followed, Mr. Byron Stillman, Mr. and Miss Hoffman, Mr. Brewster, Mrs. Cooley and others taking part. The answering of questions by the guides of Mrs. Cooley, as well as the messages by Mayflower, was very much appreciated by all present. The socials will be held the second and fourth Friday of each month.

G. F. Perkins writes: "I am constantly hearing reports to the effect that I am not holding Sunday meetings in Chicago, which is misleading the public. I certainly am, speaking, singing, and giving every Sunday evening, assisted by Mrs. Perkins, at 884 W. Madison street, also every Wednesday, at 675 Larrabee street, reports to the contrary notwithstanding. If the attendants of Spiritualist meetings would read The Progressive Thinker, they could easily locate the reputable mediums and meetings."

The Sunflower Social Club will give a dance in the Oakland Club Dance Hall, cor of 39th and Ellis avenue, Friday evening, Nov. 2. This dance hall is pronounced by lovers of the terpsichorean art to be the best in the city. The elegant reception room will also be at the disposal of the visitors, and no pains or expense spared by the committee to make this affair a marked success. The finest music obtainable has been secured. Card playing by those who do not care to dance. Admission 25 cents.

Mrs. James Alexander writes from Howard City, Mich.: "The Spiritualists Association of this town are highly elated with the five days' work of Mrs. N. M. Russell, of Grand Ledge. Unfortunately we have entertained two fraudulent mediums, hence the people were slow to believe when we told them we had as good a medium as we knew. With test seances she set them thinking. We feel that she has really aroused the people more than anyone we have had to advocate this grand truth."

L. D. Beatty writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "Mrs. M. J. Crilly re-opened her meetings in the rooms of the G. A. R., corner South and East Diamond streets, Sunday, October 21, with quite a large attendance. The audience was held for a time listening to the eloquent lecture delivered by Mr. G. R. Day. Mrs. M. J. Crilly then followed by giving tests. All were recognized. She is a medium that never fails to give satisfaction, both in public and private."

E. W. Sprague and Mrs. C. A. Sprague, missionaries for Indiana, write: "The National Spiritualist Association is now putting forth great efforts to help the Spiritualists of this country to do more effectual work in the cause of Spiritualism, and having been commissioned to work in its interest for the coming year, we will devote our entire time to the work of building up the cause by visiting weak societies, organizing and chartering new ones, and helping in every way possible to spread the gospel of Spiritualism. We wish to hear at once from every town and village in the state of Indiana when we can do good work for the cause of organization. We are both speakers and platform test mediums, and will do our part to help any community to organize. When the state is well organized, circuits may be formed and speakers and mediums can go the rounds in good old-fashioned Methodist style, or three or four societies, if weak, may engage a speaker together, and have meetings once in three or four weeks, if no oftener. In this way we can carry our beautiful philosophy into the thousands of sorrowing homes. Sister and brother Spiritualists, will you do your part. Write to us at once, addressing us at No. 99 Maumee avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind."

Isaac Perry writes from Electra, Florida: "I have a beautiful location containing 76 acres, fronting on the south side of Lake Bryant, which I will give to those who would like to live in a co-operative society of Spiritualists. The land is good sandy soil; no mud or water to wade in after a rain, and as healthy as any place in the United States. Only those meaning business need apply. Address me with stamp, for particulars."

MICHIGAN.

Work of the State Missionary.

To the Editor:—Knowing you are interested in the welfare of true Spiritualism and interested in disseminating the grand truths of our philosophy, I thought it would be of interest to your readers to know that the State Association of Michigan is putting forth every effort to advocate and build up our cause upon a solid foundation.

As it was decided by the board that it was essential to send some one as missionary of the gospel of Spiritualism, to represent the State Association of Michigan, I was selected to do this work, and have been busily engaged, having lectured at Lansing, Vicksburg and Sturgis. Sunday, October 28, at Burr Oak, the opera house having been secured for that purpose. November is all taken. I am to speak at Owosso, Sunday, November 4 and 11; Mecosta, 18; West Bay City, 25. I have calls for other societies, but dates not arranged.

Now one word to the public: You who are interested in the building up of our societies, if you will do your part I will come to you and aid you in the work of organizing new and re-organizing the old. We must work with united effort if Spiritualism ever attains that power for good we all so much desire.

The Spiritualists are composed of people of differences of opinion; some do not believe in organization, also do not believe in an ordained ministry, are opposed to the title of "Rev.," the thought of a Supreme Intelligence seems to greatly distress them; all of these technical points disturb them so much that they have but little time except to find fault with those who differ with them, and seemingly forget that all should have the privilege of giving expression to their highest conception of spiritual things.

For one I am glad that the State Association of Michigan has made it possible for us to obtain clergymen's rates, not because we consider ourselves better but because it makes it possible for us to go out into the highways and by-ways, and at least endeavor to sow the seeds of Spiritual truth, that hearts may be made to rejoice, souls comforted and our cause built up. How many desire spiritual consolation when the life angel removes their friends, and they refuse to be comforted with creeds and dogmas. At such times they cry out in agony of soul for light, more light; and having reduced rates our speakers have been enabled to reach rich and poor without respect of persons, and for one I hope the time will come when Spiritualists will agree to disagree and each one cultivate the latent forces within, that we individually and collectively may realize that the greatest study of mankind is man, and that we have within us the germ of all good. Let us cultivate our spiritual gifts, prove all things and hold fast to the good.

Anyone desiring my services, to officiate at funerals, perform the marriage ceremony, or do any work in our line, will please direct all communications, by letter or otherwise, to my permanent address 411 13th street, Detroit, Mich.

LAKE HELEN CAMP.

Second Excursion to Florida.

My second excursion by water, will leave New York in a fine, large steamer, on November 16. The hotel at the camp will be ready for guests on the arrival of this party. The Apartment house for light house-keeping, and Brigham Hall, for lodgings, will also be ready.

There is much inquiry about the camp, and the prospect is good for a larger attendance this season.

Persons desiring to visit any part of Florida can join our party and get the benefit of the low rate for first-class passage, which is much below the price asked by any other route.

Write for information, circulars, etc., enclosing 4 cents in stamps for postage.

A Prayer.

Oh, Thou, who ever hast been, and ever will be, we come asking for Divine ministry; asking that Thou wilt lift us nearer and nearer Thee. Asking that Thou wilt teach us of the Divine unfoldment, ours to have if we but open up the windows of our souls, and flood our understanding with Divine love, through desire to do thy will.

Teach us so to live, so do and dare, that each day may find us nearer the Divine Good. Fill us with desire (Oh, ye glad messengers from the realms of light) to do our duty to our fellowmen.

Make us to feel that no greater mission can be ours, than that of uplifting those who need our help.

Teach us to feel that we all are as one family, and children of the one God, who is spirit.

Lead us, wise and loving messengers, into the valley of peace.

Flood our souls with understanding of Thy presence, and teach us to know that Thy presence is for our benefit.

That Thy mission to us is to elevate, to bless and guide and guard us, insofar as the law between the seen and the unseen, or the physical and the spiritual, will permit. Teach us to know of the realities of the spiritual realms, and of immortality.

Create within us a desire to know more concerning the evoluting forces of spirit, that we may grow in knowledge of the laws of being, and the uses thereof.

Bring to our hearth-stones those of our loved ones, we pray, who are with you, and teach them to manifest their presence unto us, that the sting of separation, may be healed, and we may feel truly blest. Amen.

TO THE UNKNOWN GOD

Some Reflections on Spirit Manifestations.

To the Editor:—A poet erected a monument on the Rocky Mountains "To the Unknown God." Unknown powers, forces, spiritual beings, and the laws which govern them, are being discovered. The unknown is now known. Spirits throw their thoughts upon the sensitive brains of mediums and tell about the wonderful land of the dead in God's great country beyond the stormy gates of death. Thoughts are real material things and have been photo-engraved. Clear minded people can project, or send out, thought substances which can be caught on sensitive paper in the various designs desired by the thinker. Mental healers, Christian scientists, mediums and doctors may cure the sick by sending out strong, healthy "thought-pills" of invisible atoms. Draughtsmen, etc., may think of triangles, houses, etc., and their thoughts may be photographed under fine conditions. Thoughts may be sent thousands of miles, without any wires or apparatus, similar to wireless telegraphy. Mediums can often read persons' thoughts at great distances. Of course, this is devilish, because some of the clergy don't understand it. Rev. Charles Sheldon says, in a late story: "Were Christ here to-day, the pastor of any wealthy congregation, they would crucify him again, even after the lapse of 2,000 years of historical Christianity." Neither spiritual nor material things are understood by the general public. At seances solid matter can be passed through solid matter by dematerialization of the atoms. Ayer says he has seen spirits have a solid cane put through a solid board door, to look as if it grew there, and afterwards removed, leaving no traces of a hole, or injury to the cane. Mediums have been partly, or even fully, dissolved or dematerialized, while spirits gathered the atoms about their invisible bodies and were both recognized, identified by friends and even photographed by the camera. The angel in Christ's tomb was probably made visible by this divine process, and doubtless they utilized atoms from the Savior's body. Christ would to-day be classified as a materializing medium. Indian wizards, conjurers and witches performed many spirit manifestations, even when America was first discovered. Good Father De Smet tells about "Religious opinions of the Assiniboinee," under date of 1854, that "the belief in ghosts is very profound and common in all these Western tribes. Indians have told me seriously that they had met, seen and conversed with them, and that they may be heard almost every night in the place where the dead are buried. They say they spoke in kind of a whistling tone." Secret Indian pow-wows have some similar spiritual manifestations to what may be seen and felt in modern seances. The East India Theosophist-Diakka are of the same class; so are the heathen Chinese. Spirits for science prove that these residents of the next world appear to all races, only under different names and diverse conditions. At New Canton, Ill., with Oscar Ward, spirits have music without instruments, messages on paper, written in the air; voices talk for one or two hours by spirit vocal chords, and often several at once. Raps, bell-ringing and table movements also occur. At E. F. Rice's, of Kalamazoo, Mich., with the medium, Mrs. Amy Buchanan, of Jacksonville, Fla., slates were written on when held ten feet from the medium, mental questions were answered by the spirits; a question in the Holland language was answered in English, etc. Voices spoke through trumpets to friends. NEBRASKA.

Meetings Are Held at Lincoln.

The work in this city is slowly progressing. For the last eight weeks a meeting has been held in Richards' Hall, on O street, between Tenth and Eleventh streets. The first five Sundays I assisted in the building up of the meeting, which at first was very small, but has gradually increased. I gave five lectures, and on each occasion Mrs. Bonney gave psychometric readings and tests. Her reading were very accurate and gave general satisfaction. We were ably assisted by Mrs. Etta S. Bledsoe, who is a fine inspirational instrument and an attractive speaker.

Mr. Scott Bledsoe also took an interest in the meetings.

Since I left Lincoln Mrs. Bledsoe and Mrs. Bonney have been continuing the meetings, and they hope to receive the support of all true friends of Spiritualism in Lincoln. Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe have purchased a home in Lincoln, and expect to remain there. They may possibly take a trip to Kentucky for a few weeks; should they do so, the meeting will be carried on by Mrs. Bonney and other friends.

We see no reason why Lincoln Spiritualists should not come to the front and assist the few active workers to build up a good, strong permanent organization. This can easily be done if they will sink all little differences of opinion and personal grievances and work together with a determination to succeed. The time is ripe for better organization of Spiritualists all over Nebraska and we earnestly hope those interested in our grand philosophy will see to it that nothing shall stand in the way of united effort.

I expect to work out of the State for a time, yet I do not intend to neglect any duties which may devolve upon me as secretary of the State Association. I hope the time will come some day when societies will be formed all over the state and speakers be able to find plenty of employment. At present such is not the case. Our teachings are needed by the masses of the people, why not organize in such a way that they can be reached? Nebraska is very well supplied with good, honest, capable home talent, but organization is sadly neglected. This should be rectified without delay. Letters of inquiry regarding speakers and mediums should contain a stamp for reply. Address

It is very gratifying to report that this meeting was an unqualified success. The ability and fitness of the lectures as a whole was conceded by the people in attendance; and the satisfaction given by the mediumistic fraternity was shown in the immense patronage given them. To name all the workers in these lines would occupy too much space, and to mention a few would be invidious; and also offensive to some, as all have individual preferences.

A Southern Camp-meeting Association has been formed and regular annual meetings are now expected. The present meeting paid all expenses and left over fifty-six dollars in the treasury for next year. It is hoped that a permanent place may be purchased before next meeting, so that cottages and other permanent improvements may be put upon the grounds.

This camp-meeting is an illustration of what one person can accomplish. Last year, the entire money responsibility was assumed by one person. The meeting was a success. Every bill was paid, and the camp-meeting association partly organized. And the same persistent energy urged the meeting just closed so successfully. To Mrs. Nettie Howell we are indebted for the business push which has given us two camp-meetings, and the good promise for more in the future. The hope is that the officers of the association will be earnest workers in carrying out the work needed for future success.

Spiritualistic Time-Servers.

For some years past, Light has been looked upon as one of the principal Spiritualistic periodicals in England. Of late, however, it has assumed an attitude in regard to the churches, which cannot be considered as fairly representing the opinions of the majority of intelligent Spiritualists.

It is only too apparent to all readers of Light that week after week it is bidding for clerical support. It is lamentable to think of a representative Spiritualist journal stooping to such a course of action, degrading thus Spiritualistic investigation. What would be thought of say, an astronomer who went around to the clergy cap in hand to beg of them to preach approval of his facts from their pulpits. In Spiritualism there is room for all religions, but no religion is large enough to contain Spiritualism. Light, July 14, published an article, "The New Church-woman," in which a strong desire is shown to try to trim our truths to suit a Christian theology of some description, as it were, clothe our disreputable facts in a reputable and orthodox garb. And although the writer would appear to differ considerably with the "Church-woman," on fundamental points of doctrine, yet he fences with the real question in this way, "So far as we know, Spiritualists have not, as a rule, concluded that the new thought is inconsistent with the old; and we certainly are not aware that they have cast away the old faith for the new, without enquiring whether the two can be reconciled. But we will pursue this no farther. We prefer to join hands and agree."

Agree! About what? Agree to differ! Of what use crying peace, peace, when there is no peace? Why make a pretense of agreeing with what we well know to be false? We are told at the conclusion of the same article, Miss Whiting is welcomed and rejoiced over, as a good church-woman! "We are glad of it, and only wish that all churchwomen were as rational, as generous, as spiritual, and as ready with a welcome for all our modern guests at the father's table."

Light is overjoyed at having a churchwoman on its side, but does not make quite clear, why a churchwoman (Church of England presumably) should be considered as such a very important convert, after all. It might have been supposed by an uninstructed observer, that a philosophical thinker, a scientific skeptic, would have been a greater gain to the cause than any credulous believer in bygone myths. If the tactics adopted by certain Spiritualists should prove to be successful and Spiritualism be converted into a sect, then all philosophical and rational enquirers who have been hitherto content to be called Spiritualists will be compelled to adopt another name, to separate themselves entirely from those who prefer psalm-singing to investigation, and place preaching before knowledge. Perhaps the title of Scientific and Secular Spiritualists might serve the purpose.

On July 28 the leading article in Light was entitled, "The Church Awaiting," and commences: "We offer our respectful congratulations to the Church Times. Its article on Spiritualism, on July 6th is almost perfect in tone. For gravity, fairness, knowledge, and good taste, we hardly remember anything better, if as good, from what we hope without offense, we may call an outsider." Why should so apologetic, so deferential a tone, be assumed by the Editor of one paper towards another? Why should Light, "thus bending low, and in a bondsman key, with whispering humbleness" address the Church Times? Ecclesiasticism is only a tyrant to the slaves who choose to bend beneath its sway. It is almost incredible that a Spiritualistic paper of the standing of Light could so far forget its responsibilities, as to cringe before the clerical party. Towards the end of the article, though, this admission is made by the writer: "We do not say that the Church Times is with us. In fact in parting (as in its introductory article) it gives us the usual slap in the face for safety, but we do say that its admission leads straight to our conclusion and we are quite content to wait, in the assurance that the right inference will assert itself." Thus it will be seen that Light not only receives rebuke from her sectarian contemporary with becoming humility, also accepts with the utmost meekness two slaps in the face in one day, and will no doubt come up smiling again next week to offer the other cheek, and then sit down submissively until acknowledged by the Church Times and the rest of the theological quibblers. Such Christian forbearance can only be compared to the conduct of the gentleman, who, having been twice kicked out the door and twice thrown out of the window, still found an entrance down the chimney. THE PSYCHOGRAPH
DIAL PLANCHETTE.
This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.
Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?
The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship
with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.
Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."
Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM
Furnishes all you desire.
Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM. It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school. It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Thirza Boyd: The successful way to do a thing is to do it, and if you feel strong enough to bear whatever small discomforts the exercise of your mediumship may bring, the only way for you is to place your light in public and stand by the consequences. It is the true and only cause to bring out your latent faculties.

Mencella Goodspeed: The passage from Peterslea, on materializations, perhaps is too strong in its denunciation, and should not be interpreted as denying the existence of such manifestations. It is a protest against the mercenary spirit which has converted mediumship into a handmaid of greed, and by fraud and deception brought obloquy and disgrace on the cause.

H. D. McCoy: Q. I am always conscious when friends are writing me, and often sit down and write them at the same hour. How is this to be explained?

A. It is a constant attendant of the sensitive state, and has received the name of telepathy, or thought transference. The proceedings of the Psychic Research Society contain a great number of instances, enough to demonstrate the theory.

C. W. Jackson. Q. I find that the spirits disagree on many things, for instance some say there are animals in spirit world, others that there are none. Why cannot these contradictory spirits be got together in the same seance and have them explain things they report so differently?

A. It would be impracticable, by the well known laws of spirit-manifestations to bring those as conflicting into the same seance in debate, and if this were possible there would follow the same unsupported spirit testimony. The causes which have produced these contradictory reports have been discussed in this department several times in the past year and the correspondent is referred to these numbers of The Progressive Thinker.

The causes which lead in general to contradictions, and make communications unreliable, may be briefly stated. All communications depend on three elements: The spirit, the medium, the circle or surroundings.

The spirit may be unreliable, as a majority of those in the physical life, being ignorant, or deceiving. They may assume well-known names of friends, or of historic fame, and communicate anything they know will please or excite.

Even well-meaning spirits may in their ignorance communicate what they believe to be true, but which is entirely erroneous.

The circle may be the strongest force and the plastic medium fail partially or completely under its influence. It may act as a whole on the medium, as hypnotic operator on his subject, and the communications which it receives will then be only a reflection, or echo of its thoughts.

J. R. M.: Q. I have the key to the natural and spiritual scenes, and am preparing four lectures on these, and Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages. With this key there is no question conceived in the mind of man which I cannot answer. My lectures will not only be a school, but a court with the audience for witnesses, the Bible my support. I know what the seven seals, the seven angels, the seven trumps and the marriage of the bride and bridegroom means. The seventh trump has not blown, but it will soon, and I am a poor man, working in the ——— shops at $1.40 a day to support my wife and five children, and laying by the means to bear my expenses to the mountains of Missouri, that I may fulfill the prophecy of Isaiah and John to have the ensigns lifted on the mountain tops, and stand with the angels on one of the four corners of the earth. What I want to know is, when the trumpet of the breaking of the seventh seal blows, what are you going to do about it?

A. I have no doubt the readers will smile as they read this medley, and wonder why it is admitted into this column, but it has a meaning, a terrible meaning, in that it strikingly shows the far-reaching influence of a belief in the inspiration of the Bible. One must laugh over the strange infatuation which places implicit faith in the wailings of an unknown "prophet," and the incoherent utterances of Revelations, and persuaded that the time is at hand, saves a few dollars from the hard-earned wages of an iron-worker, that he may get to the nearest mountain-top and wave his red banner, and blow his tin horn amidst the final wreck and ruin of created things. Yet this man is only one of untold millions who have been dwarfed and distorted, and made, like hypnotic subjects, to dance to the beck of superstition. He is not an object to awaken laughter, but the saddest of all sad things, a wrecked human soul, at which angels may pityingly weep. I hold him up as an object lesson, and call the old beliefs, and the Bible which has made them current, to account before the bar of eternal justice and humanity.

What am I going to do about it? To offer this advice; that as any key you may find to unlock the Bible, is like a key to a trunk, which when opened contains mummies and dust. The cure of the wife you have vowed to cherish, of the children, pledges of her love, is of more consequence than flaunting red banners on every mountain-top of the world, or blaring a trumpet at the crack of doom. If St. John made a prophecy, let him see to its fulfilling, for surely an honest worker who has all he can stagger under is not called to prevent his becoming a false prophet.

Do not go out with those four lectures, for they are entirely beyond the comprehension of common people, who have heard the seven angels, seven trumps, seven seals, and the four and twenty elders talked about, and hashed and warmed over by theologues little and big until they call for a rest. Let the seals be smashed and the trumpets blare, and at the final hour when you are called to account, which in ordinary human, common sense justice will be most acceptable, the man who deserts his family to run to a mountain-top with a banner, that he may get with the four angels, or he who abides his burdens, and stands up with his wife on one side and his children on the other and bravely says: "We have done our best, with the poor chances that were ours, but where one goes all must go?"

For two thousand years the world has been scared by the bugaboo of the seals and the trumpets and Gabriel's blast to arouse the dead, and Christians have placed the coffins with heads all one way so that the resurrected might rise facing the east, where the white throne of the despot god would be seen blazing like the sun. Constantly the wail of prophets, howling war, pestilence and ruin, and the last day and the era of all things. The ignorant have quaked at the awful predictions, and there are ignorant people yet. But it is time this rubbish be brushed away and no more gibber in the light of day.

Farther, what will I do about it?

If the angel breaks the seventh seal, and all goes on as depicted by the gloating church-member, who believes he is elected while the majority are damned, and the goats are divided from the sheep, the elect from the sinners, my voice will be raised strong enough to reach the throne in thanks to be with the goats, the sinners not saved, rather than with that little band of pecksniffs who go up to glory, because so mean they allow another to suffer for the sins which so richly merit condemnation. If all the great men of antiquity, sages, poets, historians of the world's earlier pre-Christian ages, and all the leading thinkers since that time, and all who do not bow the knee of the hypocrite and say they believe what it is impossible for the human reason to believe, are cast to perdition, there would I go also. The dreariest punishment for me would be to sit forever with the elders, singing to the sound of harps praises to the glory of a tyrant who could have saved but would not, the flower, beauty and perfection of mankind.

LAKE HELEN, FLA.

Land of Pines, Song Birds and Palmetto.

The storm clouds of winter are hovering on the horizon. Now is the time for the sensitive and the invalid to make up the mind to seek the genial resort of Lake Helen Camp, Florida. Winter will soon be here. The cold north wind brings his harvest of death. The sweet birds are saying, "let us go to the warm south-lands and continue our song to the flowers and the sun."

Let us imitate the birds. Sometimes, instinct has the wisdom of divinity. The sick and the old need the better conditions of life afforded by the winter season of Florida.

This season the camp will open about the middle of January and extend its meetings till the end of March. The intellect will be fed at the same time that nature is carefully nursing the vitality of the body.

One year ago I went to Lake Helen, very sick and not expected to live out the winter, but the effects of that country and the magnetism of its spiritual conditions have put me into a good, I may say, a perfect state of health. I speak of Lake Helen with pride and enthusiasm, because it did so much for me.

Lake Helen is located on the highest point of land in Florida. Beautiful lakes abound in its neighborhood. The pine trees are ever giving off their health-giving powers.

The camp-grounds are on a gentle slope running down to Colby Lake, as fine a sheet of pure water as the eye of man ever looked upon. There is a good hotel on the grounds, well suited to the needs of people who want the comforts of home. There are cottages scattered about the grounds, of sweet design and comfort. The auditorium is a good and comfortable building. There will be lectures every day, good music, tests from the platform, entertainments in the evenings, seances; reliable mediums have been engaged, and nothing but the best of time is anticipated.

Mr. Webster's Sanitarium, a beautiful structure, stands just outside the grounds. It has a magnificent location and patients can be well cared for at that delightful spot. Dr. Webster is a skillful physician and is well equipped for the great work undertaken at that place. I hope that he will meet with abundant success.

On the grounds will be our gracious president, Dr. Brigham, who will give the best care to the ailing and sick.

Mrs. Huff is now on the grounds and will gladly give all information about the camp, the way to get there, and the lodgment and hotel conveniences—any needed information she can give the public.

Close to the grounds is the home of George Colby, the lecturer and medium. I understand that he will be home before the camp opens its meetings. I believe him to be a good medium.

Mr. Budington, of Springfield, Mass., will be on the ground in good season to do what he can to make all things go well. Mr. Palmer and wife will as usual be there to enjoy their beautiful cottage.

A great many people have promised to come this year who were never there before.

Mrs. Carrie Twing, one of the most entertaining of lecturers will be at the camp the whole time of the meeting.

I shall hold my Spiritual and Psychical school for the second year this season and hope for a goodly number of attendants.

This camp is destined to be a great success. The more Florida becomes known to the people of the North, the more successful it will be. The railroads are doing much for the state in opening it up to home-seekers.

Come, then, to our camp in the land of pines, song-birds, and the palmetto.

J. CLEGG WRIGHT.

RESURRECTED TO ETERNAL LIFE

A Discourse Delivered at the Funeral of Samuel Fish, Milan, Ohio, by Hudson Tuttle.

I come before you to speak some words of comfort; to bring if possible a balm for your suffering hearts; to give assurance that beyond the broken shard, the body tenderly placed in the casket, overlaid, and embowered with flowers, there is an endless existence, where the shattered strands of this life will be united. I did not realize how hard this service would be until I came to the door and missed the warm greeting I always received, and it was said that "Father is dead!"

My friend is dead! Nay, not dead, but resurrected to eternal life! I know not what other word to use, for I cannot say "departed," for I do not think he has gone away; I cannot repeat "dead," for he is more alive than ever before.

This life is the complement of what is called death, to which all must come at last.

Whether we mourn or rejoice at his approach depends on the manner in which we regard the future. If we are disturbed by fear of endless punishment and the legends of creeds, the very thought of dying is agony. If on the other hand we believe the future to be a continuance of this life, in the same direction, with the same capabilities, faculties and culture carried forward to a new sphere of existence, death becomes no more than a journey to another country. No adamantine walls shut down between the world of spirits and the world of men, and we are conscious of the living presence of the dear friends who have passed from our sight into the shadows.

Standing here to-day on the shores of the dark ocean of eternity, its waves laving our feet, we gaze into the thickly gathering mists and ask the questions which have been repeated by countless generations, Whence? Wherefore? Whither? and we feel that our happiness depends on the answers. There is the infinite past, the infinite future, between which we stand the central fact.

Your father and my friend has ceased to feel the discords of this life and has obtained answers to these questions. In fact he needed not this experience, for he has received assurance on these great problems, and in his knowledge he had wonderful peace of soul.

We have all thought along the same path, although we may not have recognized the drift, and necessary conclusions to which he came.

If we exist in the next state as individuals and retain our emotions and feelings, we shall desire to come closer to those we leave, and whisper to them of our celestial life. If you accept the Bible as the foundation of faith, you will find it a history of spirit visitations from the beginning to the time of the apostles. Their appearance at critical times shows that they knew what was passing on earth, and retained an interest therein even centuries after their death.

It is said of Paul that in a spiritual trance he was taken to the other world and saw things not lawful for him to utter; in other words, like many a modern subject of trance, he found it impossible for him to describe what he had seen. But it begot in him a longing to return, to leave the barren scenes of this life, and as he expressed it, "depart and be with Christ."

In the writings attributed to him this question is answered in a manner clearly and perfectly. What is death? was asked by a follower. This mortal or "terrestrial" body cannot inherit eternal life. There are two bodies, the terrestrial or physical, and the celestial or spiritual. These are united in this life, and their separation is death. Then the silver cord which unites them is severed, and the celestial or spiritual being continues existence the same.

The belief in future existence is common to mankind from immemorial time. Go where you will, to China, to Hindustan, the Mohammedan countries, or the isles of the Pacific seas, and most prominent, often it is true, horribly distorted, it dominates all other beliefs. It is held by the most barbarous, and the highest cultured people. The great religious leaders have held it dear, and often believed they were especially favored with angelic presence. Wesley taught it, Swedenborg extended to greater length, and the sermons of nearly all ministers are pervaded by this belief. We were taught it in the prayer we lisped at our mother's knee, for angels to guard us while we slept, and that grand Christian hymn which has been sung around the world, murmured through the lips of a dying bishop:

"Bright angels have from glory come,
They are 'round my bed, they are in my room,
They wait to waft my spirit home,
All is well! All is well!"

Death unlocked his perceptions and allowed him to catch a glimpse of the beauties of that future world while he retained partial control of his body.

Bishop Bowman gives his own wonderful experience when supposed to be dying. He says that instead of becoming unconscious, he fell into an ecstasy, and a daughter who had died twenty years before, in infancy, came and told him she was there to meet him, and asked: "Do you not think I have grown, papa?" She was glorious as light, and he said further, that he believed it was his daughter, who had grown from an infant, in spirit life, and that she would meet him at last, and conduct him over the dark waters of death.

The spiritual realm is not seen by physical eyes, but by the spiritual, and it is thought that when we approach the boundary between the two worlds, with the casting aside of the physical senses, the spiritual are quickened. It is a beneficent provision that at the hour of death, the spirit becomes clairvoyant and sees the coming of its departed friends. At this supreme moment, when the wonders and beauties of the future burst on the vision, the spirit reflects on the face of the body it is leaving, its surprise and delight, and the features retain the expression after the spirit has gone. How blessed the reality to him when he first caught glimpses of the eternal life, of his children and beloved wife and friends, and knew that his belief in the spiritual philosophy which for so many years had been his testament of life was true! Days and weeks and months of pain; sleepless night, and weariness, all forgotten in the new delight! How wonderful to feel the restoring touch of the silent messenger and conscious of a sweet and quiet rest which is itself a joy! How exquisite the pulsations of the new atmosphere soft as light, and the refreshing coolness, contrasting with the fever heat of earth. Spirit friends not only meet and welcome, they will conduct his wandering spirit, startled by the strange scenes on every hand, to their own bright sphere. Then others will greet him, and friends of long ago, and new friends even more in sympathy, and the broken ties and shattered promises of this life be united and gathered, and love and affection here be found to be prophecies of boundless joys in the hereafter.

Blessed reunion! father and mother, sister and brother, children and friends gathered by bonds of sympathy in groups fraternal and enjoying the delights of an existence over which hangs no cruel cloud of change; across whose bright landscape blow no blighting winds, or winter frosts.

More than anything else do I like to take for my text a well-ordered life, for a righteous life is an epitome of the universe. Long years of intimate acquaintance urges me to say what I know, no one present will for a moment gainsay, that such a life was that of the man, to whom to-day we pay our last homage. It was not for him to stand on the greater arena of the world and have his deeds blazoned on the scroll of fame. Few there are who have this opportunity, but he was none the less a hero; for true heroism is devotion to right and duty, and however narrow its sphere it comes from the same source and should receive our admiration. He was honest, an honesty and integrity which went into the smallest details of his business and he was not satisfied until his work brought perfect results. If the larger field, the blazing arena is not ours, the sphere of lesser duties is for all, and unless these are faithfully performed we are not prepared for the world-wide should they come. He was a loving, tender husband, a kind father, a faithful friend, a generous neighbor, a public spirited citizen.

Early in life he became an ardent believer in Spiritualism, and was a student of that science till his latest movements. I hold up his character as an example of the result of that system outwrought in character. He never hid his light nor compromised, and yet he did not press his belief. If the question be asked of the Recording Angel, what he has done, it may be said in reply, He did his duty. In that short sentence, all is contained. He felt as with the strength of knowledge that he was heir of the infinite heritage of eternal life, and that he was in its beginning setting out on an endless journey.

To the friends who mourn, the children and grandchildren, his belief offers the balm more precious than that of Gilead. The broken body is given to the elements from which it came, and the grass on the meadows will grow greener, the rose blush and send forth sweeter perfume, but his spirit will overshadow those he loved in this life.

Shall we call him back? To return to the shattered body, from which he departed because he could no longer retain it? It would be selfish for us to do so. He has met the great transition, and entered a new sphere of activity. We with our mortal eyes and mental perception see only the cold and moveless body, the pall, the grave. We whisper his name as we bend over his marble face, and there comes no answer. We confound the spirit with the lifeless clay, and weep. Tears are the offering of undying love, pearls from the heart of affection. Yet if we look through the rifts of the clouds of grief, we shall see that this is only the confining cage that is left us, from which he has escaped, and after weeping, which is human, there will be rejoicing which is divine.

On occasions like this, I am in doubt which to do; mingle my tears with the friends who mourn, or in gladness join my voice with the angels on the other side that another spirit has ascended.

He is safe with those he loved. No more pain, but the joyousness of perfect rest. He is one of the host whose influence falls on us like a blessed benediction, inspiring us to good deeds and faithful endeavor.

And when this life is finished and we approach the immortal shore, these guardian angels will welcome us with soul-greeting as angels only can bestow. Then shall we find that we live that we may die, and we die, because death is the gateway to life eternal, where our vague and unsatisfied longings for ideal excellence will be realized. Until that time we say to all that is mortal of our friend, good-bye, to his spirit, with the angels: "Welcome Home!"

BOOK REVIEW.

As It Is To Be. By Cora Linn Daniels.

This is a decidedly unique book. The author states as a matter of fact, that since she was about twenty years old, she has occasionally heard "Voices" speaking to her, distinct to her consciousness as a human voice, yet making no sound. This book is the result of questions asked by her and answers given by the "Voices." It is spiritualizing in tone and influence; and may be read with profit, even though not all Spiritualists may accept all of its teachings. The influence it gives forth is spiritual and good in a high sense. Price $1.00

Eros and Psyche. A Fairy Tale of Ancient Greece. Re-told after Apuleius, by Paul Carus. Illustrations by Paul Thumann.

Dr. Carus has a special penchant and aptitude for delving in the mines of ancient mythologic lore, and making his "finds" presentable to modern minds and tastes.

As stated in the Preface, the story of Eros and Psyche reflects the religious life of classic antiquity more strongly than any other book, poem, or epic, not excepting the works of Hesiod and Homer.

Dr. Carus has done his work admirably well, and the book will be found well worthy the study of all interested in the problem of life and the mystery of death.

PROF. LETSCHE SAYS HE HAS SUCCEEDED WITH HYPNOTISM—CALLS IT MOST HUMANE—SAYS AS A HOUSEHOLD PHYSICIAN THAT HYPNOSIS IS WITHOUT A RIVAL.

The remarkable demonstration made by Prof. Letsche, of Jersey City, recently before some of the leading officials of that municipality has attracted such world-wide attention that we present to our readers this week a signed article by the latest conspicuous demonstrator of the mysterious science which has recently come so remarkably to the front. Prof. Letsche assumes no mystery in the matter and does not surround himself with any of the theatrical glare of the Delphic cave, but says that all parents should familiarize themselves with the science as it would be of the greatest service to humanity to have it generally understood.

Jersey City, September 20.—Having come to prominence recently, on account of having my children vaccinated under the influence of hypnosis for the mere purpose of saving them pain, and being certain that the lymph would do its work successfully in both instances, you asked me to write a short treatise on hypnotism. For the sake of science and to convert thousands of skeptics who are afraid of touching this treatment I freely respond to your request.

Instead of being afraid of hypnotism everybody should study the science. Fathers and mothers should be practical operators and teach hypnotism to their children; teachers should know it; it is indispensable for doctors, dentists and nurses, if they would practice hypnotism, they would not ruin thousands of persons every year with morphine, cocaine, chloroform and other poisons. The lawyer, clergyman, and other business men ought to be familiar with its mysteries in order to be successful.

However, I will confine myself to the use of hypnotism in the family circle. As hypnotism takes the place of opiates it should be applied and practiced in every household, as hypnosis will not and does not leave any bad effects on the human system like the above mentioned poisons, while the coveted rest, and the relief from pain are so thorough that one wonders how it is there are people afraid of its subtle influence.

As an educator hypnosis is bearing fruit and the desired result is gained without any apparent effort on the part of the child. Its memory is getting strengthened, the nerves are getting strong and steady, disease, bashfulness, nervousness, etc., are banished from the system of the child, and it ripens to manhood and womanhood far more easily than its playmate who has not the advantage of being treated physically and mentally by the powerful influence of hypnotic suggestions.

Parents can scold their children, yell at them, whip them, cuff them, despise them, etc.; yet with all these kinds of punishments the child does not improve. It is getting dull, it learns to hate its father and mother on account of their cruelty, but, please, parents, stop your punishments, learn the science of hypnotism, you will save time and anger, for if you are acquainted with hypnotism it takes you less than half a minute to have your child in the deepest trance. You speak to its subconscious mind or to its subliminal self, show it how vulgar it is to be naughty, point out the way it should be, and as the clock strikes twelve your child, unconsciously, will do what you suggested, and will form a different habit. "Well," says some critic, "you can't put your child to sleep so often or it will ruin its nervous system," but, allow me to say you need to treat your children more than once a day. Again, there is no such thing as a nervous disorder in children or adults resulting from being put under hypnosis. Moreover a six months babe could not suffer from oversleeping as it normally sleeps about 16 hours out of the 24. Every time you put your children under hypnosis and give them the proper suggestions they will feel better after it and thoroughly rested.

As a household physician hypnosis stands without a rival. How many ills is a child heir to! Every little while it is indisposed. Summer complaint, scarlet fever, functional derangement and a host of other ills. The little one hurts itself by a fall or in play. Often mother suggests that the child have a doctor and he has to come. Mamma says my child is sick, yet the doctor knows that it is really mamma who needs a nerve tonic, but he was not called in to give mamma a tonic, only to give the child some poisonous drug to make it sleep or to kill the pain, never thinking that by killing the pain by poisonous drugs the child will also be killed; and before that child reaches maturity it is a dyspeptic or has some other chronic ailment. Now why not leave the doctor in the shade of his office, enjoying himself at his case full of poisons, and you yourself be your child's own doctor, using hypnosis and suggestion, which are more effective than all the drugs on the market, while the child is getting cured instead of ruined.

Of course I am a professional hypnotist, having adopted this science as a means of earning a livelihood, and perhaps there are some who will say that I uphold hypnotism from a financial standpoint, yet allow me to say that I urge every father and mother to learn it, and I do not expect to teach everybody who might happen to read this, but all the same I say: "For humanity's sake, fathers and mothers, become practical hypnotists. It will be money saved for you; your children will thank you in later years. Get instructions from some practical operator and you never will feel sorry for it. By using hypnosis while your offspring is in childhood you can define its destiny, mold its character and be its guiding angel. It is far easier to prevent a child from falling into vice and bad habits than to reform it and cure it.

JOHN M. LETSCHE.

The above gives a bird's eye view, as it were, of the wonderful results that will flow from a proper use of hypnotism in "child culture." The articles we have heretofore published on the same subject contain a great deal of valuable information, which should have been carefully treasured by every reader. Hypnotism should never be practiced for "the fun it may impart," but to promote health, to alleviate pain, to change the current of evil thoughts and intentions, and to create high and noble aspirations. Such a prominent factor has hypnotism become in the world to-day, that "schools" here, there, and everywhere almost have arisen which teach its mysteries, its methods, etc., for an exorbitant price. Dr. W. X. Sudduth, a reputable physician of this city, charged Lutellus Smith $100 for imparting instruction in Hypnotism. According to the Chicago Chronicle, Dr. Sudduth had promised Mr. Smith that by receiving instruction from him, he, Smith, could cure his epileptic son. He failed, however, to do it, and Dr. Sudduth sued him for $100. The jury, However, before whom the case was tried, refused to order payment to Dr. Sudduth. Such an exorbitant charge for teaching hypnotism is not in harmony with humanitarian work. As well pay a hundred dollars for teaching the alphabet or multiplication table to one who wishes to learn the rudiments of knowledge. In order to protect our own subscribers from those who are making exorbitant charges for teaching hypnotism indifferently, we have grouped together all the really valuable books on the subject. These books will teach you all about hypnotism, and if you study them carefully, you can be instrumental in doing a great deal of good in the world.

"Has a slight glimpse been yet obtained of the never-ending, all-important consequences that will arise to the eternal family of man, from the knowledge that the character of each is formed for, and not by the individual?

"No! Not a human being has ever yet been competent to receive the idea, follow it, step by step, to all its legitimate and most certain consequences. The discovery of the general law of gravity has been considered a most important addition to human knowledge, and so undoubtedly it is, as are the discoveries of all previously unknown general laws of nature; but what is the importance of this material law, in comparison with the mental law of the principle, by which the internal organization, and external character of man are formed, and the means by which both may hereafter be well formed, and thereby the permanent progressive happiness of humanity be secured, as long as humanity itself shall exist?

"What is the rule, and where are the figures, by which the difference can be calculated, and its full value be estimated?

"Man is irrational and miserable without this knowledge; rational, progressively improving and always happy with it.

"In what words, or by what means, shall this difference be expressed?

"It is the difference between an earthly pandemonium, inhabited by insane demons, whose delight has been to oppose, traduce, vilify, rob, and murder each other for the love of God; and an earthly paradise, in which no one of those insanities will exist, but in which all will earnestly and affectionately endeavor to increase the well-being and promote the happiness of each; and in which charity, kindness, love, and truth, will be alone known and be ever united actively to advance all in every kind of excellence and knowledge, until the earth shall be filled with goodness and wisdom and man shall truly rejoice in his lengthened existence. Here, then, in this new course, will the path be opened in which will be found the germs of that "sublime and pure charity for the convictions, feelings, and conduct of the human race, which will dispose them"—nay, compel them, through the laws of necessity—"to be kind to all that have life, seeing that this varied life is formed by the same Incomprehensible Power that has organized human nature, and given man his peculiar faculties."

"With the knowledge accurately ascertained, and received without doubt into the mind, that the internal organization of man is created for him, without his consent, knowledge, or control, and that his external character is formed for him by the society and external circumstances which surround him from birth—that he is compelled to entertain the impressions which force upon him his convictions and his feelings, and that his conduct necessarily emanates from his convictions or his feelings, when opposed to each other, or from both when united—how could motives to falsehood, the bane of human existence, ever arise, or anger, ill-will, violence, wars, plunder and murder, jealousy, revenge, contest, or competition, avarice, or any desire for individual possessions, privileges or advantages?"

"These as well as all the other unenumerated evils of past and present society, have, one and all, arisen immediately or more remotely from the insane idea, that man formed his own character, and was responsible to the causes which created and formed it, for what these causes irresistibly compelled it to become. Hence the endless and senseless superstitions of the human race in its infancy of ignorance, as to all the fixed laws of its nature; hence the reign of insanity for so many thousand years over the earth; hence the bloodshed of man, and the worse than childish contention of nation against nation, and the universal deception and falsehood by which each nation now strives to obtain advantages over other nations."

"Hence the rank insanity at this day [1844] of England and America, and other nations, contending for territory, and wealth and power, when they know not how, advantageously, to use the enormous territory and wealth and power, which they possess, while unconscious that they possess the most ample, nay, illimitable means, to increase wealth and power beyond the utmost limits of all rational desires."

"Let men but renounce the ignorant notion that they form themselves, and are responsible for that formation, and the world will immediately become religious in the only sense in which the word can have any rational signification; for by this same conduct all would speedily become good, wise, and happy, and to become so would be the essence of all true religion; when all would speak the language of truth only, and act, in every instance, in accordance with the principles of the most extended, most enlightened and purest charity." THE STONE CUTTER.

[A Japanese Legend.]

Despised, oppressed, dejected, and obscure,
His back with age and toilsome labor bent,
There lived a man both ignorant and poor,
Whose heavy heart was full of discontent.

Long had he prayed the gods for restful ease,
But each successive morning brought as great
A burden as the last; when earth did freeze
One day he thus deplored his wretched fate;

"Ah! were I only rich enough to rest
On soft straw matting, wrapt in raiment fine."
An angel heard his prayer. "At thy behest,
All that thou shalt desire at once is thine."

But as he lay upon the matting soft,
Wrapt in fine robes, the Emperor passed by
In silk and gold, his banners waved aloft,
And round him rode his numerous cavalry.

"Alas!" cried he, "what good is it to rest
On soft straw matting, wrapt in raiment fine?
To be a powerful Emperor is best;
Oh! were I such, for nothing could I pine."

"Be it according to thy heart's desire,"
The angel said, and Emperor was he.
His banner waved aloft in golden fire,
In state he rode amidst his cavalry.

But as he passed, the envious sun waxed hot,
No pleasant shade the Emperor could descry:
"Ah, wretched that I am," he moaned; "is not
The sun by far more powerful than I?"

"Be then the sun," once more the angel spake;
And now his beams fell on the fertile earth,
Save where, from storm-clouds, watery floods outbrake,
And, spreading, caused a universal dearth.

Unhappy still, he wished himself a cloud—
And in this form he floated far and wide,
Over the plains, wher'er the winds allowed,
Or drifted slowly round the mountain side.

Yet now it seemed to him a barren rock
The strongest thing in all the world must be;
Heedless of sun and storm, and of the shock
Of all the fury of the seething sea.

"Have thou thy will," the angel said, and so
A cliff he stood, of granite hard and fast;
Against its base the waves dashed to and fro,
And vainly howled above the pitiless blast.

As thus he stood, a quarryman obscure,
With chisel sharp the fragments flying sent,
Although he seemed both ignorant and poor,
His back with age and toilsome labor bent.

"Then let me be a man once more," said he;
Once more the angel graciously replied;
And ever after this contentedly
And peacefully he lived, until he died.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

On October 18, 1900, at the home of her son, near Rochester, Minn., Mrs. Eliza S. Dodge was born into the higher department of life, having faithfully served the body for 77 years. Kidney disease and other complications severed the tie. Sister Dodge had good medial powers, and was a Spiritualist for many years, yet her oft-repeated wish to have a Spiritualist speak at her funeral was not granted.

FLORA W. FOX.

Rochester, Minn.

Passed to spirit life, October 14, Maggie, only daughter of Thos. and Mary Hardy, aged 17 years and four months. Modest and retiring in disposition, she had won the love and esteem of a large circle of friends, whose sympathy goes out to the parents and brothers in their trial. George Campbell, president of the Nanaimo Spiritualist Association, conducted the burial service.

ELIZABETH M. CAMPBELL.

Mrs. Dr. Catherine S. Scott passed to spirit life, October 22, 1900, at 11:20 p. m., from her late residence, Francisco Terrace, Chicago. Mrs. Scott has many friends in Chicago, having for many years been a physician, healing the sick and effecting cures where others failed. She had many rare qualities as a medium, and made many friends wherever she resided. She was a true friend, and one that could be relied upon. May the blessing of God and the angels be with her evermore.

A POWERFUL HEALER

The Secret of Dr. J. M. Peebles' Great Power, which Dispels Disease as if by Magic, is the Combination of The Psychic and The Physical, which Successfully Combats All Disease.

"DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS HOPE FOR YOU."

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

What is this great Healing Science which cures so-called incurable diseases, and has revolutionized the art of curing to such an extent that physicians and scientists stand dumfounded at its mystical power? Dr. J. M. Peebles, the grand old man who is its originator and has given it to the world, calls it psychic force, and says there is nothing mystical or supernatural about it. That it seems to come from the mysterious deep and have a supernatural origin is because it HAS PERFORMED SUCH MARVELOUS CURES and has dispelled disease of every nature from man and woman when all other human power failed, but that in reality it is a logical method, founded upon scientific study, and now at the ripe old age of 79 I can look back over 50 years of patient work and experiment before I evolved it to its present perfection. The whole secret of the grand success which I have had is that at last I have found THE MIND OF THE SOUL, and demonstrated that by the correct use of my psychic force I can, through it, this mind, restore the tissues of the body and place that abnormal condition of the body which is brought on by disease into a normal condition and the correct functional working of the entire system; THEREBY DISPELLING DISEASE. The thousands of testimonials which, unsolicited, have been sent to Dr. Peebles are positive proof as to the merit of his wonderful discovery. Mrs. J. W. Henderson, of St. Johns, Washington, who suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness, was entirely cured by the Peebles treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, Marionville, Pa., says she can not express too much gratitude for the results received through Dr. Peebles's treatment. She suffered for years from falling of the womb. Francis Wavering, Seattle, Washington, suffered for twenty years with a severe case of Catarrh; was completely cured through the psychic treatment. L. A. Ford, Elsworth, Wis., was permanently cured of Dyspepsia, and Nervousness. Geo. H. Weeks, of 83 Minerva Street, Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration of health after suffering from Nervous Prostration and Insomnia; says he now enjoys restfulness and sleeps sound every night. Mrs. Mary A. Clair, Lexington, Ky., after thirty years continual suffering from Epilepsy, and trying to be cured by eminent physicians, writes: "Two months of your treatment has made earth almost a heaven to me." If you will send your name and address, also leading symptoms, Dr. Peebles, through his occult power, will diagnose your case ABSOLUTELY FREE. He will also send you his grand book and other literature which will give you the key to his grand science, and which should be in the hands of every man and woman who in any way suffer from disease or abnormal conditions. This he will do WITHOUT ANY COST WHATEVER TO YOU. Remember you are cured in the privacy of your own home without the knowledge of anyone. Dr. Peebles' Treatment KNOWS NO DISTANCE. The work goes on if seas divide healer and patient. Address Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

Dr. J. M. Peebles WILL TEACH YOU HIS PROFESSION, which is the grandest and best paying profession of the age, to any man or woman who wishes to learn it, the only education necessary to know how to read. Full instructions free to all addressing Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

MAN

—IN THE—

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF

Results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind.

From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only our personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contribution which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

THE World's Sixteen Saviors,

—OR—

CHRISTIANITY BEFORE CHRIST.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

New and startling revelations in religious history which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods. This wonderful and exhaustive volume will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which the author has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape, the student of free thought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows to the mark. Printed on fine white paper, 380 pages. New edition, revised and corrected, with portrait of author.

OUR MEDIUMISTIC GIFTS.

An Address Delivered by Mr. H. Taylor, in the Odd Fellows Hall, Melbourne, Australia.

Ever since my inception to Spiritualism I think those who have guided my thoughts have made it pretty evident that they desire me to be recognized as a fearless advocate of the "grand philosophy" in its highest aspect, as also a fearless denouncer of all that tends to place man's spiritual existence on the lowest planes of thought and make everything in connection therewith antagonistic to reason and the best interest of God and the spirit world.

"Peace at any price" has ever been foreign to my nature, but "peace with honor" has always been in harmony with my desires. I do not, therefore, intend to divert from these principles in giving to you the thoughts which have been transmittted to me by unseen forces, in connection with that most priceless (if properly used) gift, "Spiritual Mediumship," but should my plain speaking beget enemies (as it ever has done), I would ask them to remember that all I say is conscientiously in the best interests, according to the light given me, of true Spiritualism and true mediumship, and if all who profess to be Spiritualists, would only demand from those claiming to be mediums, that everything in connection with their work should bear the light of day and the world's scrutiny, instead of, as many do, pandering to half-developed mercenary rogues and swindlers, ever ready to hush up and gloss over any little discrepancies, to use a mild term, because they, perchance, at times receive a "test" from these degraded beings; then would mediumship and those few, so very few, in proportion, honest mediums who are striving to convince the unconvinced millions of the world's inhabitants of the continuity of existence after the material body has served its purpose, then, I say, would those few, well-meaning, well-living earthly servants of the heavenly messengers of "peace, good will to all," have some hope of succeeding in what now seems to be such an arduous, if not altogether hopeless task.

And what is the cause of these conditions?

It lies in the fact that so many striving to develop mediumistic abilities, they perhaps [illegible] not, even in the slightest degree, po[illegible], without either considering or ca[illegible] to know the great responsibilities [illegible]y take upon themselves when decl[illegible]ng to become subservient (I use the word advisedly) to the influence of any denizen of the spirit planes who may come along and whio, perchance, may have no more spiritual enlightenment than themselves, and who, when on earth, had the one object in view: a greed of gain for the purpose of gratifying their selfish aims. And so these much-to-be-pitied and condemned individuals place themselves in the hands of those on the other side who pander to their vanity and whose ideas are congenial with their own, caring nought for anything but the amount of shillings, half-crowns or pounds such earth-bound guides, in conjunction with themselves, can extract from the pockets of their dupes, as the reward of a few haphazard "tests," which, no matter of how little real value of a material and none of a spiritual nature, make them only the more anxious; their continual cry, as they hover around, like the moth in the seeming charmed circle of the candle light, being, more tests! more tests! until, like the poor insect, their wings get scorched, and instead of taking the lesson to heart and profiting thereby, they make all sorts of foolish excuses "for the poor persecuted creature," as they choose to style him or her who has been preying upon their feelings and their pockets, and the unrest that is created in their minds, through the rotten foundations they are working upon, causes them to renew the attack on the delusive light, fearful, lest it is only, after all, a "Will-o'-the-Wisp" they have been fluttering after, and must, therefore, further satisfy themselves with more useless, because not thoroughly convincing tests.

And so the cardsharper, the fortune-teller, and the undeveloped medium, mixed up together under the cloak of Spiritualism, continue to thrive at the expense of the true sensitive and deal out their wares to those who place the greatest value on "I am very pleased to see you," when coming from some one they possibly knew, or fancied they did, in earth life; or, if it comes from someone claiming a big name, the greater the name the greater the satisfaction. And greater value still is placed on any information telling them to do this, that or the other thing, and they will reap so many more golden guineas thereby; or if they take a certain journey they will be benefited by it.

Anything which tends to worldly aggrandizement is swallowed with the greatest respect and faith, and acted upon, until the, too often, fallacy of it is exposed. And yet a bright message of reasonable advice of a really spiritual nature is taken as being of no importance and oft-times with contempt, or with "this-sort-of-thing-can-wait" style, no matter from whom it may come.

And so the unspiritual Spiritualists continue to be wrapt up in test-hunting as the only means of quieting their restless spirits, and often guilty consciences; putting off the great day of reckoning with themselves, which they will so surely have to undergo, and ignorant of the fact that if they only approach the spirit world for truly spiritual upliftment, those in spirit life are ever ready to communicate all they can see necessary for them to know in order to keep above material want, without having to be continually catechised for nothing but selfish purposes.

Some may say this picture is too harshly drawn, but can the truth of one stroke of it be challenged? If so, then those who have guided me to sketch it have deceived me for the first time.

No, friends, it is only too well and truly known that there are so many ever ready to take advantage of the opportunities offered, and to be made, for practicing deceit and lying in connection with mediumship for the sake of what material profit can be made out of it, and the only way to improve the situation is for all, no matter under what "ism" they live, to fearlessly denounce these blasphemers of the Infinite Spirit of the Universe, and shield from the cold blasts that arise from the wrong-doings of others, those few priceless workers for the uplifting of the people, the "true medium."

Test and try well all mediums coming before the public as workers for the public benefit. Those found wanting, advise them for their good. Those who are found to be a credit to their calling, encourage and support with your sympathy and assistance (for I fully recognize the necessities of their material existence), and give them such a passport as will guard them against the hypocrite and deceiver who bespatter them with mud; a passport that will act as an incentive to their ever trying to go on and on, upward and higher in their own progression, and thereby taking with them all who listen to and take heed of their spiritual outpourings. Such as these are only fit instruments for the use of the spirit world, and they alone understand the cares and responsibilities of what mediumship really means. And if the mediums themselves could only see, as I can, the necessity for their not only living in harmony together, but for forming themselves into a strong body for their own mutual protection and advancement, then would they quickly see the ranks of the "wolves in sheep's clothing" become so disorganized and depleted that they need fear no more onslaughts on their spiritually guarded pastures, nor any more interruptions to their work of gathering the vast flocks of the world's stray sheep into their morally and intellectually strengthened folds.

Everyone has a gift of some sort, which, however, takes longer to develop in some than others, whilst many go to their graves with the talents given them by God, unused through having neglected or been unable, on account of their surroundings, to expand them.

It is according to the opportunities given and taken that we succeed in the expansion of our powers, which, no matter of what description they be, all tend towards the uplifting of our spiritual natures if conscientiously carried out.

Some are ordained by God—mind—by God, not man (as the licensed priest and doctor are), to take up the work of oratory, known to us as inspirational or trance-speaking; others, the work of healing, magnetic or otherwise. Then again there are others gifted with the power of seeing into the beyond, commonly called clairvoyance; others have the power of hearing messages from our spirit entities; this is classed as clairaudience; and again there are those who spend their lives in developing the gifts of music, drawing, painting, modeling, experimenting (chemically or otherwise). Also those who pry into the secrets of nature, its causes and effects, such as geologists, astronomers, and other scientists.

All of these are mediumistic gifts when properly understood.

And last, though by no means least, I would draw your attention to the sublime gift of authorship: they who are responsible for formulating all the various ideas of themselves and others, which, by their facile manner of expressing them in writing, those who wield the pen, place before the world that which becomes man's ruling power. Some, no doubt, place the gift of inspirational writing at the bottom of all the other generally accepted phases of mediumship. Many do not even class it in the category of spirit communion, unmindful of the fact that the pen is indisputably mightier than the sword, and becomes the moulder of man's destiny, both spiritual and material, and the arbiter of the world's progression, and it should command more attention than it does from the mediumistic standpoint. The utility of this, to me, much undervalued and neglected phase of spirit power amongst Spiritualists, I wish to impress indelibly upon all young minds. Not that I would advise those who have other gifts to neglect them for the purpose of trying to write, but that they who have any taste for writing should strive to develop it in preference to attempting to force on a power they think might be more useful to them from a worldly-minded view, bearing in mind that the good we do in this life, although "oft interred with our bones," only remains so for a short time and is quickly resurrected with all the glorious surroundings we are told were attendant upon the resurrection of Christ; but, alas! all too often, the good deeds of the departed are only resuscitated for a brief existence and then forgotten in the whirligig of time, but anything of value which is written can ever live, while the very best of outspoken extempore thoughts or ideas fade out of the memories of the most retentive minds, and thus are lost to the world many, many pearls of great price, through never having been committed to paper.

This loss is most keenly felt in connection with our trance and inspirational speakers, whose best emanations, in most instances, quietly glide into the forgotten past, unhonored and unsung, instead of becoming revolving beacon lights for all spiritually wrecked mariners who have been buffeted about upon the seas of this benighted world's troubles.

Had I had the opportunities and teachings in my youth which are the happy lot of the child of Spiritualism to-day, I venture to assert for the benefit of all who take any interest in mediumistic possibilities, that my pen by this time would very likely have chronicled matters from such high planes of thought, that I should now be standing before you as great a power in the land as your one-time honored leader and co-workers, Junor Brown and Alfred Deakin, instead of being one of those unfortunates who can only look back with the deepest regret upon lost opportunities and strive all in my power to make amends during the short time which still remains for me here. I do not say this boastfully, but claiming it as a right and a duty to hold myself up as an example of what might have been, if I had not for the best part of my life been in total ignorance of the latent gift within, and which has, to my own mind at any rate, developed so rapidly, that experience teaches me it is outside the knowledge of anyone to conceive to what state of perfection they can develop the special phase of mediumship with which they may be gifted, if they honestly strive to do so without forcing it on for the purpose of turning it to a solely selfish account, that is, for using a divine gift as merely a commercial speculation, as so many do.

To those who are instructing our young (and here comes in another most important phase of spiritual power) the power to teach, which so few, comparatively speaking, possess, to them I would point out the necessity of laying a sure foundation for pure unalloyed mediumship, in the minds of their pupils, by teaching them first of all to try to know themselves by knowing something of the power and love of God, who has given to their guidance all the beautifully intricate, illimitable, never-changing laws of nature, the breaking of the least of which will retard their mediumistic progression in the future. And ever keep in their view the simple plain laws laid down by Christ (the great medium of Nazareth), as being necessary to evolve the Kingdom of Heaven, which is the Kingdom of the Spirit of their divine father, God, within them, and of which he, Christ, was such a wonderful prototype, a state gained by exercising a life of self-denial, and all those who wish to become worthy the name of medium must strive as far as lies in their power to follow his steps.

We heal the sick, the hungry feed:
The lame we make to walk;
The blind we help whene'er they need;
We make the dumb to talk.

All those thought dead we raise to life,
Help weaklings to progress;
We free all souls from earthly strife:
From this dark wilderness.

Which one of us can Amen say
To such great acts as these?
Is there one here can lead the way
And thus the angels please?

Or boldly say, my faith I'll prove
By deeds like those of old,
And show how by a life of love,
God's gift I can unfold.

Be always tender, true and just:
Do all the good I can,
And on each stony heart try thrust
The love for fellow man.

That mighty strength may come anew,
Sent from the great Unseen,
And give me power like deeds to do
As Christ, the Nazarene.

Other forms of mediumship in painting, modeling, music, etc., which are not looked upon by the generality of people as being the outcome of spirit guidance and which do not receive the attention they should from the mediumistic standpoint, by those who are in touch with the spirit world, can by careful consideration and close investigation be proved to be foreign to the evenly balanced nature and powers of the individual in their normal condition.

Place the work of the true artist side by side with that of the one, who, failing the necessary mediumistic gift, paints his picture in a methodical, harsh, angular, though withal, perhaps, a perfectly correct style, only wanting what is termed the "fire in it" to make it a success.

Watch the two at work and compare their efforts.

Mark the very soul-force of the true artist depicted in his work and as he ever and anon recedes from his picture to study the result of, perhaps, only one little touch of the brush, note how his face lights up and his limbs tremble with delight under the control of the spirit which has enabled him to obtain the desired effect, and which, of his own weak self, he was unable to accomplish.

Truly this one's soul lives in heaven for the time being.

Never a thought has such a one for the amount of sordid wealth his great masterpiece is to bring him, his only wish, his very life being wrapt up in the desire to produce his ideal of what a picture should be, in order to touch the fine chords in the nature of every human mind, and make them reverberate in harmonious response to each touch of the brush that has produced such a pleasing, uplifting, soul-elevating feeling in the breasts of all who gaze upon its every detail so true to nature's handiwork. Such results as these are only obtainable by the spiritual artist, who, given the necessary conditions, stamps his name indelibly on the scroll of fame and lives in touch with the spirit influences which tend so greatly to his success and which make his work his everlasting prayer, and his life's absorption in it, his heaven.

What more harmonious existence can anyone wish for on this earth than the knowledge of being able, with the assistance received from the unseen world, to reproduce a counterpart of nature's beauties and God's handiwork, sufficiently inspiring to make all who gaze upon such a wonderful creation of man's ideas, feel the better for it.

Now take the case of the one who is trying, for mercenary motives alone, to force on a gift they do not sufficiently possess, and what do we find. A sordid-minded, ambitious individual, being unable and not altogether willing to give the necessary conditions, striving in a laborious kind of way to produce a great picture, a great name, and a greater fortune for himself, before he has, perhaps, learnt how to properly mix his paints. His work is irksome to him and he toils wearily on, with no real eye for the beautiful, with no aspirations of the soul to elevate the thoughts of others by his work, with but the one object before him, to get his task finished and sold to the highest bidder so that he can indulge his fancy in something else more congenial to his nature, and which, if he made it his ideal, he might also make it a success and thereby find that life was worth the living when its right use is discovered and properly developed. And so do hundreds and thousands waste their mediumistic powers in attempting to accomplish, in a half-hearted manner, that which they are unfitted for.

I, and others, might as well expect to excel in trance or test mediumship, with the same chance of success as anyone of either of these denominations would have in trying to wrest the laurel wreath from a properly developed healing or writing medium. And it is for this reason I would impress upon all the desirability of being thankful and contented with whatever form of mediumship they discover they are possessed.

Never mind if you find those who are more prosperous than yourself in their use, or may be abuse, of some other form of spiritual power, stick to that for which you are fitted and consequently ordained by God to make use of, and strive to develop it honestly and truthfully for the benefit of others as much, or more than for your own worldly aggrandizement; for it is by this means alone you can excel, and all your endeavors for development, either at home with others, or wasting time continually seeking advice from man instead of God, through his messengers, will profit you nothing, if you have ulterior motives in view, other than the uplifting of humanity out of the mystifying nightmares with which those in authority are ever surrounding it.

If you wish to become true mediums, working for God and humanity, follow as near as you are able in the footsteps of that great medium of Nazareth who developed his gifts by living as near to God as he possibly could, thereby evolving the divinity within, to such an extent he was able to penetrate with his spiritual eye all the worldly ambitions and the cloaks of deceit and self-righteousness of the material man, and show how transient and worthless such things were when compared with the power to benefit the world by healing the sick, spiritually strengthening those in need of upliftment from the conscience-stricken remorse which was continually sinking them lower and lower in the whirlpools of iniquity, and foretell to them what was deemed necessary by an all-wise providence to be beneficial for their future guidance in raising the material to the greater knowledge of the spiritual existence.

This is what mediumship is intended for—to spiritually help mankind to a better knowledge of the life to come, and how to prepare for it by leading unselfish lives of progression here, and helping others to do likewise, so that "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," may reign on earth as it does in heaven for ever and ever.

See to it, mediums, that you cultivate spirituality as your stronghold against the wiles of evil spirits.

See to it, sitters, that you extend your untiring sympathy and love to those worthy the name of medium, who elect for the honor and glory of God, to battle with the contumely and scorn ever to be met with in a world as whimsical as a fickle babe. Ever be ready with your strongest condemnation for all unprincipled, undeveloped, or wrongly developed beings, who set God and his laws at defiance by daring to practice, behind the shield of spiritualistic mediumship, avarice, and deception of the vilest description to satisfy their greed for material wealth, forgetting, that without a clear conscience, all the gold brought to light, together with that which still lies deep in the bowels of the earth, is powerless to bring one moment's real happiness.

Thy gifts, O, God! are freely strewn as sand upon the shore
For all to cultivate and use, as did the Christ of yore;
To use, in honor of thy name, as means of doing good:
To make thy wondrous ways by all
much better understood.

Not for the sake of sordid gain should be thy children's bent,
But the one aim of doing good should be their sole intent
In cultivating heavenly gifts inspired by thee in all,
So, that in rising to the light they pilot
those who fall.

If mediums would study to develop on these lines they could create a new era of Christianity that would become such a motive power in man's spiritual, and thereby material progression, that soon would the object so vainly looked forward to now, be obtained, and the ray of light which is only fitfully flickering, would develop to such an extent, and so quickly, that from a streak it would become a bright beam, and yet again a dazzling sun overpowering the sight of all who refused to purify themselves sufficiently to make their spiritual aura as bright and piercing as the rays of the great orb of day shining in all its glorious majesty with the pure magnetism of its creator, God, around and in it. It rests with all who claim the name of Spiritualist to see to it that we protect ourselves as far as possible against fraud and deceptions, and it rests, in a great measure, with our public mediums to determine the time when Spiritualism is to take its proper place in the annals of thought, science, and the world's history. For as they choose to use or abuse their God-given opportunities, so will they decide the amount of credence mankind at large will place in the demonstrable facts of the eternal continuity of the spirit and so will they strengthen the minds of those already believers or shake their faith in the honesty of purpose of all those professing to be anxious to know more of the great beyond.

Spiritualists, pray for your mediums, and mediums, pray for yourselves and one another to be always progressing whilst on earth, so that if the time should ever come in which you are required to yield up this mortal life at the hands of your persecutors, you will be able to do so with the same calm, self-assuring knowledge of the glorious hereafter, as did the Christ, who, in his last moments contentedly said: "It is finished," and took his way to live still nearer to God in spirit life.

AUDI ALTERAM PARTEM.

Agitation of Thought Is the Beginning of Wisdom.

Any system which does not practice as well as teach that maxim, is doomed. The church is slowly dying, in spite of its wealth and popularity, as an orthodox institution. Instead of its converting the world to its dogmas, the world is converting the church to its common sense. The world has always practiced free discussion. The church only to a limited extent. Spiritualism to a greater extent. The human mind has always loved freedom for itself, even when it denied it to its neighbor. As it grew larger, stronger, clearer, better, it accorded the right of freedom to the other side. Its growing love of justice prompted it to say, "Let us hear the other side," until its voice echoed down the ages through the lips of the Roman ruler, Agrippa, to Paul, "Thou art permitted to speak for thyself." Is this not the right of every human being?

I never knew more of this freedom of debate than is exhibited through the columns of The Progressive Thinker. It is exhilarating to read, week after week, pages of sharp criticisms by Spiritualists themselves about themselves and their convictions, and let it be said, to their credit, that, for the most part, kindness, urbanity, good will rule.

I notice, however, that one gentleman, for whom I have great regard, declares on page 2 of number 569, "The spiritistic iconoclast with hammer for pounding, torch for burning, and lips for spitting spite at the churches, has had his day. He is a back number. The polemic period has largely past."

Why, that grand old young man, who carries his eighty years so gracefully, can scarcely write a line or preach a sermon which does not fairly bristle with polemics. It is this which makes him so interesting. Not many of his keen words go unread. As an ardent admirer of Jesus, how could he be anything else? Jesus, whose example our brother thinks and says is good, began his "polemical" career when but twelve years of age, "sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions,—the very marrow of debate. The Rev. Dr. Buck makes special mention of this polemical peculiarity of Jesus. He said: "The ministry of our Lord was a perpetual controversy," and he added that the apostles followed in his polemical footsteps so faithfully that they "came at the truth by much disputing." This is the grand object of debate, tersely told. Paul disputed for days, weeks, months in the market places. He was called a "babbler," "a setter forth of strange gods;" "some mocked," but the earnest Paul "encountered" his opponents, Jews, Epicureans, Stoics; "disputed" with them, "reasoned with them." With the example of Jesus and his disciples it is not surprising that Rev. Dr. Storrs exclaims: "I never was afraid of discussion. We can better get at the roots of things."

If any "Spiritistic" advocate, as we are soberly informed, is guilty of carrying a "torch for burning," and "lips for spitting spite," that is discourteous. But better all the abuses of controversy, than one iota less of mental liberty. Better an occasional cyclone, than a dead calm. Better let loose the winds of controversy to lash into foam the sea of ignorance, than stagnation. As your own A. J. Davis says: "The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom."

When Spiritualism turns its back upon the principle of free discussion it will become a mere sect. I have sometimes thought that your great movement is drifting onto a sectarian shore; for where are the Spiritualistic platforms to be found which are as free, as broad, as liberal as The Progressive Thinker? Nowhere! Am I mistaken? When I obtain the proof I will make the correction.

Two years ago I sent courteous invitations to twenty-five Spiritualistic societies for joint debate on Materialism and the "Evidences" of Spiritualism. I received several kindly replies, explaining that arrangements were made for the season. I tried for a year in advance; but no acceptance of my brotherly invitation to this hour.

The conviction is forced upon me that Spiritualists are afraid of debate. If they have the eternal truth on the question of future conscious existence, why should they unanimously shun debate with one who is as gentlemanly as any Spiritualist in the land, and more so than any "spiritist," according to report.

You can take me, you can print me,
You can true to nature tint me,
But you cannot paint the pleasure that I give;
I'm the likeness of your mother,
Of your father, sister, brother,
And long after they are buried I will live.

You can wash me, you can soak me,
And then with your brushes stroke me,
When the substance I resemble has decayed;
But you cannot paint my nearness,
Or obliterate my dearness,
For the virtue of my being cannot fade.

SLEEP AND DREAMS.

Their Nature, Uses and Significance.

This is a subject that is always interesting, because it comes to all of us, and to which there are no exceptions, and around which hang all the mysteries of all the ages. Into this mystic sphere the keenest intellects have sought to penetrate. All things sleep. the world cares not what it is, so it can sleep when nature demands it, and it is but few who ask, What is sleep?

To dream in sleep has always been considered the most fictitious and unreliable of all things, but some of the most important events in human life have been foretold in dreams; and if we assent to the records, the Christian religion itself is founded on a dream.

But what really is the most important of all the phenomena of nature, without which nothing can exist? True it is tired nature's grand restorer, but it is something more than simply rest. Rest never can take the place of sleep. People have dropped off to sleep in various attitudes, riding on horseback, on steam engines, in places of great danger, even under torture in the days of the horrible Inquisition, and for the time got a new lease of life to bear their trials; so there is something in sleep far greater than physical rest.

Why should we not ask the question and desire to penetrate its mysteries? From my limited reading I have failed to find this true answer to my inquiry. I cannot say that it has never been answered, and yet it seems to me that it should be better understood, for within it lies the undying nature of the essences or spirit of all nature. Nothing can die that can sleep, and all things sleep, from the granite rock to the celestial angels; not even a spirit can exist without sleep. This vibration to and from the self-existent infinite is a necessity of existence in everything that we can have any cognizance of.

Simply to rest, doesn't answer the question why do all things sleep? We all know that all organic bodies, vegetable and animal, require a periodical influx of material substance that is used to mantain physical existence, and we also know that if a living form is not present in the physical, the material influx cannot take place; and we also know that no finite is self-existent, therefore the living form which gives all its qualities to the ultimate life must derive its support from some higher source capable of giving life to its finite receptacle; therefore every finite life is a vessel so formed that it necessarily must receive life from its original source, and as that conscious ultimate life cannot possibly approach or take cognizance of the infinite, it must receive its existence in an unconscious state; therefore sleep—and it is why all things sleep. The self-existent source of life is so hidden that no finite can perceive or approach it, and yet, unconsciously to its finite receptacles is life given, that the life of each finite appears to be its own.

The individual spiritual being which gives life to each material form is as much dependent on its source of life as is the material form on an influx of material substance. The body turns in regular periods, according to its life, into the state of unconsciousness to live, hence the importance of sleep is greater than material food.

We breathe the spiritual atmosphere in sleep, hence the modification of breathing in sleep; and it is of the utmost importance that during this state the natural atmosphere should be of the greatest purity, because we are not conscious of impurity during sleep, and the body may die while the spirit is actually renewing its life, but as the vessel itself is of spiritual substance, its finite form is indestructible.

Sleep has been called the twin sister of death, merely because of its material unconsciousness, when really it is a daily or nightly renewal of life. The self-existent life is so present in all things, that escape from it is necessarily impossible, and every conception of it is just as impossible, and all previous attempts to finite it into form are a childish absurdity. The body is a necessary continent for spiritual substance to be finited into form and have conscious existence, and no form can exist otherwise in the spiritual world—no more that a thought can have a form until it has an ultimate expression; therefore the self-existent life itself is only conscious of its existence in its endless, interminable, finite expressions.

The higher the development of animal life, the greater is the necessity of sleep, especially in the infancy of its existence, because the spiritual vessel, like its body, required a more constant influx of life to support its material existence.

That mysterious realm we must all inhabit we can have but little knowledge of during our natural lives; without doubt this is an absolute necessity, an order of nature we call infinite wisdom. That the spiritual vessel is opened to a living influx in sleep, from the spiritual atmosphere which pervades every atom in the boundless universe, must be admitted, for how else could all things live? and for what other purpose could sleep exist?

"Now I lay me down to sleep" is a constant acknowledgment of dependence on supreme power, whether by the just or the unjust.

In sleep come dreams, and what are they? One of the unfathomable mysteries of life, and one in which every individual is intensely interested. Dreams, so far as we can penetrate, seem to be instantaneous impressions on the brain (that is all that we are able to take cognizance of), while the spirit is returning to its waking state. Though the impression may seem to pass through long periods of time, to our waking senses, this is the appearance to the dreamer; but time is nothing in the realm of spirits, and these impressions are more frequently in symbolical figures than in the language of the dreamer, which we often find it difficult to understand in our waking senses, and very many seem to be extremely ridiculous, yet they may mean something we can't understand.

What we call trance or somnambulism is not real sleep, that opens the spiritual vessel to influx from the spiritual atmosphere, but an opening of the spiritual senses, bringing the individual in rapport with the denizens of the spiritual world, for short periods of time only, because in that state they do not breathe the atmosphere adapted to spirits.

Disturbed and diseased physical states are by necessity noticed by the spirit in sleep, and disagreeable symbols are left on the brain at the instant of waking; and all such dreams have a warning significance, that is worthy of notice.

In the most healthy condition of the system sleep is seldom disturbed with dreams, but when it is, the dream is sure to have some purpose impressed on the dreamer by spirit influence.

Life is real, and dreams are a part of the reality of life, but not understanding and classifying them has led to a world of superstitious notions.

Since writing this short dissertation, I see a work has been published advocating the same views—that all space is filled with an interminable, exhaustless multitude of spiritual beings, breathing a living, spiritual atmosphere which we necessarily breathe in sleep, and which is all times beyond time giving life to this boundless universe.

AFTERMATH.

The N. S. A. and the Declaration of Principles.

As I was not in your symposium of N. S. A. expression preliminary to the convention, I present a few thoughts. I do this in a saddened mood. Spiritualism to me is the embodiment of truth, justice and right action. It is discouraging when a brother or sister shows even the semblance of making might right, in place of the great lesson of kindness which is ever and always given us from the angel world.

The demand for a declaration of our principles was legitimate. In this it was not expected we should pose as one of the many branches of a universal religious belief. We had enough of these; but it was very desirable that we could be estimated by what we knew that the rest did not know. As to our being a religious body, we needed no claim to worship that which all conceded we could not comprehend, while we could honestly worship truth—the good, the beautiful and true—all that lifted man above and away from the savage and toward the angelic state. Was it not unkind, to say the least, to thus represent one, with devotion to high spiritual ideals, with aspiration for an exalted spirituality, by presenting as a first factor that which from earliest history is known to have filled the world with woe and drenched its soil with human blood?

And what is the real difference between the godwise and the godless? Ask the most cultured Unitarian and the ablest atheist, and both unite in the belief that there is a cause of all causes beyond human comprehension.

Then the query rests, what have we as Spiritualists in a declaration of principles to do with that which we do not know and as a body of honest investigators have not proven? We certainly know much not known in our religious environment, and it is this the world is demanding of us to place our signatures to.

I will not unkindly judge of the motives of those who have placed us where we now stand; but it is disappointing after the promises of amendment so freely made by the supporters of the declaration to see these in the convention just closed entirely ignore all criticism and proceed in the power of might, as if to say: We have things our own way now, and are indifferent as to how you like it. This might be expected in politics, but not where a religion is sought to be recognized.

It will not be denied that a recognition of Atheism in such a declaration would be an outrage on Spiritualism, and its adherents. Why a recognition of its opposite is not equally so, I cannot see. It is of no account as to which is the correct belief—this is not the question—it is what we as a body of people claiming to be religious know. If we are to present the old beliefs as ours, why formulate new? Why not remain with and strengthen the old?

No one who has truly accepted the angelic lesson would unnecessarily injure the feelings of any person whose worship was of God in any form, nor would he grieve over one who ignores such worship. But whether he does or does not, the subject has no place in what should have been worded: A declaration of what we have proved to be true.

FOR a moment stop and consider. The Progressive Thinker is the one original dollar Spiritualist paper. It introduced a new era in the ranks of Spiritualism. Its success financially has been all that could be desired. Notwithstanding the rise in the price of print paper, it has still maintained its status as the only one dollar Spiritualist paper. Not only that, but it introduced the Divine Plan in its business with its subscribers—a portion of the profits of the office returning to them. Just think of the Seven Premium Books being sent out to our subscribers for $2.35. After paying the postage of these seven books, and the expense of mailing them, all that we have left is $1.50. You can readily see that we are furnishing them for less, by far, than the actual cost to us. We do this work in accordance with The Divine Plan, in order to assist in forming the nucleus of a library in every Spiritualist home. Read carefully our premium list, and you will certainly want to become a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker, if not so already, and obtain the books we announce.

SPIRITUAL CONVENTIONS

E. W. Could Offers Some Reflections and Practical Suggestions.

The eighth and last annual convention has just closed its sessions at Cleveland, Ohio.

As there were great expectations and predictions as to the result of this convention, it may be interesting to many, especially to some who were prevented by adverse circumstances from attending the convention, to spend a few moments in glancing over the proceedings of that body of delegates. Although of course it can only be a glance, as it would require volumes to report in detail the proceedings of a four days' convention, under the direction and management of that indomitable worker and superior presiding officer, President Barrett.

And it may not be improper for me at this point to say, as many of the friends of the cause know, I have for several years used the little influence I possess in these conventions, to defeat the re-election of President Barrett, and it is hardly necessary for me to add that my opposition to his re-election is not predicated upon his inability to act as a presiding officer, or an earnest, energetic lecturer.

Although I gladly admit that his physical endurance has far surpassed my anticipations, and I am prepared to accept his most sanguine expectations that his spirit friends are supporting him, "and encourage him to undertake the phenomenal amount of labor he performs." In fact it is not two months since, while sitting in a private seance, in San Francisco, that the spirit of our venerable Brother Colby, of the Banner of Light, urged me to attend the convention, but admonished me not to oppose the re-election of Bro. Barrett, as he would undoubtedly be the choice of the delegates, although Bro. John Day, the former assistant editor of the Banner of Light, at the same sitting, urged me to go early to the convention, and to do all I could to defeat the re-election of his more successful rival.

I mention this as a mere incident in this connection, as others may know more and feel a greater interest in these interviews than I do.

My principal object is, and always has been, to preserve the life and health of President Barrett, for the great value his ability and devotion to the cause of Spiritualism seems so admirably adapted, and so much appreciated by many.

But to resume my narrative.

I think this was the largest convention of Spiritualists ever held, except that of 1893. That being at Chicago in the year of the great World's Fair, accounts for the larger attendance. As I have not the record before me I cannot say whether all the States that have heretofore been represented by delegates were represented at this meeting. I missed the presence of many that usually have attended, and some were present for the first time.

I think there was more harmony, more disposition to yield contested points, than I have ever before observed, which is an encouraging symptom to those who have confidence in these large conventions, and feel that only through harmony and a compromising spirit, can any organization advance profitably. The place of holding the convention was well selected, and the building in which the meeting was held, the Chamber of Commerce Hall, was all that could be desired.

And had there not been a resort to a little sharp practice on the part of those having that building in charge, everything on the part of the citizens of Cleveland would have been very courteous and very agreeable. That city had been selected at a previous convention, held at Chicago, and an offer of the use of the Chamber of Commerce building was accepted, as one of the inducements for the convention to be held at Cleveland, and it was with no little surprise that the officers of the convention were notified, after their arrival at Cleveland, that the gratuitous use of the hall would only be extended to the daylight meetings.

If it was used in the evenings a charge of seventy-five dollars for each evening would be made. And as the program had been made up, there was nothing left for the management to do but to accept.

The only apology or explanation that was made for this breach of contract and extortion, was that "a new secretary had been elected who would not recognize the acts of his predecessor."

This was a dodge the convention thought the great and beautiful city of Cleveland would not countenance.

Washington, the home and headquarters of the National organization, was, I think, erroneously selected, as the meeting place of the next convention. The liberality of the treasurer, Brother T. J. Mayer, was fresh in the minds of the delegates, as he had just conveyed a title to the N. S. A. of their present headquarters, overcame the earnest applications and eloquent appeals of several representatives present from a number of eligible cities, occupying central positions, which it seemed to me, entitled them to consideration, one of which should have been selected. But the convention thought differently by a very large majority.

I am afraid this decision will reduce the number of delegates at the next annual meeting, as it will add to the expense of a large number of delegates who are less able to pay transportation expenses than are our more fortunate brethren of the East.

Besides, we have made all the converts at Washington that are probably to be made at present, while we have wide fields for missionary labor in many eligible locations for conventions.

The difficult question of proxies was intelligently discussed and a step taken towards a more consistent rule in the future. It is beginning to be understood that the rule governing proxies is a very important one, and should be more fully comprehended.

There were a large number of States unrepresented in this convention, showing a lamentable lack of interest in the National organization, which is or should be the leader, the guiding star of all practical progressive Spiritualism. I apprehend, however, there was a greater lack of money than interest, that kept them from this convention, and unless there is a disposition on the part of our Eastern friends to hold our conventions nearer the center of the N. S. A., I am of the opinion that the lack of money and interest combined, will suffice to confirm the assertion sometimes now made, that this is an organization in the interest of Eastern Spiritualists exclusively.

To overcome this suspicion or jealousy, it is necessary that every practical effort should be made by the N. S. A. to extend to distant points all possible advantages, to keep them in as close touch and sympathy with the N. S. A. as possible.

I am and always have been doubtful of the polity of organizing State societies. While recognizing the good they may do, I fear that it is done at the expense of the National, inasmuch as it separates the N. S. A., partially at least, from the local societies, from which the life blood of our cause should be derived.

This convention recognized for the first time for some years the importance and value of local societies, and although late, it is hoped they may be saved by wiser counsels and the fostering care of the N. S. A.

Two important subjects that have furnished themes of unusual interest in many discussions, in the last year, and were supposed to be prominent factors in the discussions of this convention, were wisely passed over. I refer to the "declaration of principles" that were adopted at the previous convention, after a heated discussion, and the question of separating the philosophy from the phenomena, upon the public platform, especially on Sundays.

The discussion of both these subjects will for some years yet probably create inharmony and perhaps ill feeling, and should be deferred, as no important results are involved and inharmony should be avoided in discussing important issues.

The "Mayer fund," that had been drawing its slow length along for twelve months, was completed, and a title to the property was handed to the president by Brother Mayer, who received deserved applause.

The financial question received due consideration at the hands of a very competent committee.

Their efforts resulted in the collection of a very generous sum of money, which, added to the amount collected through the efforts of the secretary, in behalf of the Mayer fund, during the year, aggregated several thousand dollars, and placed the N. S. A. in position to enter upon a line of work they have never before been able to embark in to any considerable extent.

While the convention enjoined no definite instructions upon the trustees, as to the disposition or use of the money in the treasury, it was evident from the discussions and reports presented by the missionaries employed in that work, that it was in that field of labor the delegates felt and expected much of the surplus funds to be expended.

And it is to be hoped that the wisdom and the observation of the trustees will enable them to see in many of the feeble local societies good missionary fields worthy of their assistance.

The limited number of missionaries to be placed in the field seems to me entirely inadequate to the harvest now ready for the husbandman.

The appointment of President Barrett to go into the missionary field, as generalissimo, and to devote his entire time to that work, after the first of December, seemed an excellent step on the part of the convention, although I voted against the appointment, believing it was adding more upon him than his physical faculties could endure, although as he accepted the position with thanks, I felt that as long as he could endure the fatigue we should have an efficient officer and a faithful missionary, whatever may become of the Banner of Light and its many readers.

A very comprehensive and able report was read by the secretary of the Lyceum Association, and a small collection made for its benefit, but entirely inadequate for the purpose of so important an auxiliary. Many important matters were referred to the incoming board for further action.

It occurs to me that the next convention should take up this lyceum question, and if possible instill into the minds of the delegates, and through them into the minds of the people, some enthusiasm, some more practical methods by which they may comprehend the great importance of the lyceum to their children, and to the cause of Spiritualism. The lyceum is to us what the Sunday-Schools are to most other denominations. If any one is wise enough to tell why they are not so accepted, let them rise and explain.

The election of officers, always one of some interest, resulted satisfactorily I think, although but one female member was honored with a position on the board of trustees. Why this omission, this slight, I do not understand, as our female members are always the first to respond when any important work is to be done, money to be raised, or acts of benevolence performed.

The efficiency and politeness always manifest in our secretary, should encourage delegates to feel that we have many other female members equally competent and worthy of positions on the board, and I trust another convention will see this injustice corrected.

With two exceptions, the old board was re-elected, and confidence and general satisfaction was expressed towards the entire board for the faithful performance of the duties entrusted to them.

The amendments to the constitution and by-laws proposed were almost unanimously voted down, although the apprehension that was manifest, that someone might secure membership through the use of too much money, I think was ill conceived, and until our people show more inclination to attend Spiritual conventions, we have no reason to apprehend unfair voting by individual membership. The use of money to the N. S. A. will overcome all fear of unfair voting in convention, for some years to come, in my judgment.

Any legitimate thing that can be done to induce Spiritualists to send delegates to the annual conventions, will be a step in the right direction.

And it is hoped and believed that wise counsels, moderate and judicious legislation, will soon encourage many sincere Spiritualists, that have never yet attended a Spiritual convention, to lend their presence and counsels in promoting the great cause of Spiritualism through the agency of annual conventions.

SPIRITUALISM THE PARAMOUNT ISSUE, AND A STRENUOUS LIFE ITS SALVATION.

Lecture Prepared for the N. S. A. Convention in Cleveland, Ohio, October, 1900, by Dr. A. B. Spinney.

Words are soul thoughts clothed. Once spoken they cannot be returned to us again. Each word is a power to either lift up, cheer and bless, or cast down, fetter and oppress.

Spiritualism. What does this word mean? To me it means a new idea of life, its origin, nature and destiny. It means a new idea of death and the after life. If phenomena proves spirit communion, from this phenomena proving spirit communion comes to us a new religion, based on the science and philosophy of Spiritualism, excelling all religions of the past or present.

Before us to-day are two prominent men, each a man of unswerving integrity, sterling character, and honest in his opinions, although differing radically from the other.

One word occurs again and again in every speech or written article characteristic of the man who utters it—W. J. Bryan. What could you expect of the man who never acknowledged defeat but that the key word of his intensely earnest utterances would be "paramount." Let us study this word in all its shades of meaning.

Paramount, superior in form; having the higher or chief jurisdiction. Superior to or above all others; pre-eminent.

The other, with equal frequency rings through every speech and finds an echo in every manly heart.

Strenuous, eagerly pressing or urgent; zealous; ardent.

"The strenuous life." A phrase characteristic of Theodore Roosevelt.

Now to you as a National body assembled, I wish to say that the hope of Spiritualism, the hope of this N. S. A., is in making Spiritualism, as a science, philosophy and religion founded upon its phenomena, the "paramount issue," and with a "strenuous life" to work for its highest good, greatest success, and future glory, that it may bless the unborn generations of mankind. How can this best be done?

First of all, by each person who knows these truths, admits these facts, and who is a member of this association, being true to their own souls, to their highest convictions of right, truth and justice.

Yet with all that spiritual phenomena has brought to the world, with all the proof it has given us of the truth of spirit communion, with all the mighty efforts put forth for organization and protection of this cause, this grand ship, this craft of Spiritualism has impediments, barnacles and dead weights clinging to it that endanger and may sink it.

The greatest, most imminent danger, is the misuse of spiritual gifts. Spiritualism is founded in and depends upon mediumship, which is a divine gift. The gift of mediator between two worlds.

Mediums are human, subject to the temptations of the senses, appetites and passions, hence the danger exists for these instruments to at times and under great pressure prove untrue to their gifts.

How shall we remedy this? How shall we aid the weak and strengthen the tempted.

Last year in Chicago at your National gathering I took the position that public tests, spiritual phenomena upon our rostrum, had come to stay and to walk hand in hand with our teachers, preachers and lecturers.

I still hold that opinion, and I find many who were opposed to me then have conceded I was right, and have been obliged to put our mediums upon the rostrum or have their conventions, camp-meetings and gatherings failures.

Still farther, I took the position that the Master's words were true, that the wheat and the tares must needs grow together, and that you nor I could uproot the tares without destroying the wheat.

Since that time it has come to me over and over again from speakers and Spiritualists, that many mediums, and some of our best and old-time workers, are using "stock tests," which means, I believe, that there is a regularly organized association having a record of events, accidents, deaths, etc., in almost every locality. These are issued to members of the association, so that as test mediums they may give convincing evidence of their wonderful powers, thus securing greater influence and notoriety. I have no proof that this is true. I hope it is not, but if it is I pity most of all those mediums who will thus paralyze conscience, crush out all honor, and sacrifice their spiritual gifts upon the altar of mammon.

The cause is not injured as much as the mediums, for these tests, "stock tests" though they may be, often convince, cheer and comfort those who receive them.

It has made my heart sick to hear the criticism and bitter condemnation of some, in fact nearly all, our public mediums upon these points.

These charges have not been made to them, nor have they come from skeptics, but from their professed friends under strict secresy. If not guilty, have you any conception of what this means to those sensitive mediums, those instruments of the angel world, who have laid upon the altar of Spiritualism home and social life, forsaking all of pleasure the world can give that they may fulfill their divine mission?

If guilty, your duty and mine is to go to them and tell them what the old, tried, devoted Spiritualists are charging against them and their work, letting our words be spoken plainly but kindly to them and to all.

Our second danger is wasting so much energy over little things and leaving the paramount issue untouched and unheeded. If our worthy brothers and sisters who have been so clamorous for a better declaration of principles, one just in keeping with their own ideas, would realize the fact that the effort of that committee on principles and of the convention which endorsed the same, was as far as possible to make them broad enough and in keeping with what the majority would and could endorse, and to put our organization in condition to be called a religious body and to hold property legally.

Had these energies been put forth to uplift humanity, to bless the world, how much could and would have been done. Where are our homes for the fallen, our rescue missions, our hospitals, or even a resting place for our tired, worn-out workers?

Where are our endowment funds to establish such charities? We can turn to the Catholic and Protestant churches, or the Salvation Army, and find that on every hand they are lifting up, blessing and saving the weak, erring ones of earth.

If Spiritualism ever arises above phenomena, if it ever becomes a power for good in the world, it must learn these minor things, stop wasting its energies or splitting hairs over words, creeds and dogmas, and go forth to bless, unfold and redeem humanity.

Our third danger is the jealousy, selfishness and strife among its workers. There is scarcely a local or state society, and I fear it is even so in the National, but has manifestations of this evil. Differences of opinion should not make bitter or personal feelings. Neither should success of friend or brother breed jealousy or enmity in our hearts. Never can success come to our cause, in way of organization or power, until we rise into the realm of spirituality, love and forgiveness. The hope, the salvation of the N. S. A. is in the spiritually minded, earnest, unselfish workers, controlled by progressive and progressive spirits.

May this become to you all the paramount issue, and with a strenuous life put forth all your energies for the success, glory and good of our cause and the safety of our craft.

THE SECOND COMING.

If Christ Came to Chicago, How Would He Come?

The Christ so far has been specially pictured to us in the god-man, Jesus of Nazareth, who walked the earth as the ideal Spiritualist of his time, 1900 years ago. After a short ministry of spiritual teachings, accompanied by remarkable spiritual gifts of healing, etc., he closed a remarkable career by his final transfiguration on the mount in the presence of a few chosen disciples.

The Christian world looks for him to come again that the work begun so long ago may be completed in those "latter days," now so generally recognized as already with us.

The Bible tells us that he will come again in the same manner that he departed; also that he will come in the clouds of heaven.

His departure was along spiritual lines and a spiritual manifestation, therefore his return will be in like manner, and naturally within the ranks of the only radical spiritual movement embodying spiritual facts of phenomena and teachings identical with those of his first coming.

Whether he will ever manifest to the world again as a divine spiritual materialization after the manner of his reappearance to his disciples in the upper chamber, upon the sea shore, or upon the mount, I leave for time to prove, as it does all things and promised events.

It is more with the coming of a fresh personality that I have to deal, one who knows that he is to represent in this age the second coming of Christ, and though the mind and will that has brought him thus far on his weary pilgrimage is impersonal, yet this other name so endeared to and revered by the Christian world seems associated with him and his work.

Mediumship we know is the doorway between the two worlds, the method by which God and the angel world bear messages of love and wisdom to mankind on the mundane sphere of life, and it is but natural and wise that among so many who are termed mediums there should be some few who have a more special office to fill than the regular rank and file of mediumistic workers.

That this was true in the first century we can see full well, and that it should prove true at the second manifestation of spiritual truth in this latter age should also hold good. Besides those twelve disciples in the olden time there was the one central figure, Jesus—Christ, Messiah, Master; and in this age, and growing up in our own movement of Spiritualism, there will be another central figure only possible to understand at first in his interior unfoldment and life, by such few persons—male and female—as who nearest approach him in his unfoldment and severe discipline.

This idea is farther carried out in the number of claimants for the messiahship, who are crying throughout the land, "Lo, here; lo, there; I am the Christ," as was promised long ago it would be.

I am not speaking idle words when I say another personal advent is at hand and knocking at our very doors for admittance, or that others are read to bear him company as co-workers in the great work. But I know as well that our people take little on mere belief and will want proof for such statements. Well, I can afford to wait for the proof myself, and know they will have to as well.

In an age like this, where all is turmoil and strife amid the contending statements of truth, social, religious and political, one might naturally ask what is Truth? What is the true way of Life? What is really God's will amidst such contending elements and warring social conditions and corruptions?

And the answer would come through the recognition of another raised up to be a divine messenger of God and Truth to the world; one set within an organization national, state and local, struggling still in part over the question as to whether Spiritualism is a Religion or merely a Philosophy and Science.

He comes "in the clouds of heaven" only figuratively in the sense of the differences, doubts and contentions existing in the ranks of modern spiritual and religious thought.

He comes at an opportune time to clear away the mists of doubt and skepticism that the light of Truth may shine the clearer upon a darkened world, and mankind come to realize the true meaning of the second coming of Christ in all its spiritual and mundane reality.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE DAWN, CALCUTTA, INDIA

HINDU RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS

India is pre-eminently the land of religious institutions and religious endowments. In founding these institutions, our ancestors must have been vastly influenced by Buddhistic teachings and Buddhistic examples.

Asceticism found a prominent place in the Buddhistic creed. It was the necessary offshoot of the doctrine of Renunciation preached and practiced by Gautama Buddha himself. Buddhism enjoined the performance of Karma for the attainment of Nirvana—that transcendental peace which knows not the elation of Hope or the depression of Despair. To relieve humanity of its load of sorrows and ills was one of the glorious objects of Buddha's life, to which that life was a standing witness. For the propagation of the great Religion of Self-Denial it was necessary on the part of his disciples to take the three vows of celibacy, poverty and obedience. They shaved their heads; wore the friar's robe, tied round the waist with a rope; and begged from house to house, carrying their wooden bowls for boiled rice. They lived in stupas or monasteries, practicing austerities for the purpose of self-denial and self-control. The example of the apostolic fraternity was followed by new converts to the creed. They gloried under the appellation of Bhikshus and Bhikshunis, on whose breasts shone the proud Star of Poverty.

The Buddhistic monastery was generally a rock-cut edifice. We had the pleasure of visiting some of them at Khandagiri and Udaigiri, twenty miles off Cuttack. The country in which they are situated is charming all round. Khandagiri and Udaigiri are two little beautiful hills on either side of the road from Bhuvanesvara, meeting the old Ganjam road. In them you find the gumphas or cells where the Buddhistic monks lived and died. They were cut out of the solid rock and looked commodious enough for human habitation. In the Udaigiri we found a regular barrack of these caves. Buddha's known figure is there in rude sculpture—though others from the Hindu Pantheon were subsequently interpolated. Some of the caves have small apertures for entrance, wide enough for a man to creep into the hollow. In the Khandagiri, there are two reservoirs which also must have been cut out of the solid rock. One cannot restrain his tears at the sight of these places—a sight which recalls to the mind the glory of human self-denial and self-renunciation. O noble souls, ye who died in these caves in the midst of your meditations, teach us those glorious virtues that we may have Nirvana, our soul's final beatitude!

On the summit of the Khandagiri, a Jain temple has been quite recently erected. It houses the Jain god, and a Babaji is seen there to perform the daily worship.

Buddhistic monasticism was supplanted by Hindu asceticism. All the Buddhistic abbeys fell into the hands of the Hindu revivalists.

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE PERISPIRIT.

In an ably written essay on the researches of Reichenbach, considered in the light of modern science, M. Gabriel Delanne, editor of the Revue Scientifique at Morale du Spiritisme, we meet with the subjoined serviceable definition of the aura or perispirit, which surrounds every human body: "The perispirit is the envelope of the soul. It is formed by matter under its primordial form. Therefore it is in a condition of extreme rarefaction, which renders it invisible and imponderable by our instruments. It is the ideal model, the fluidic mould, upon which the body is constructed, and it is because it does not renew itself, like the fleshy matter, that it is enabled to maintain the physical type of the organism, while directing the harmony of its functions. This fluidic body is moved, during life, in order to bring its physiological mechanism into action, by a special force to which has been given the name of vital energy. This force is a finite quantity which goes on diminishing, from birth until death. And it is because the vital energy is not constant, that all living beings evolve; that is to say, they pass through the phases of childhood, maturity and old age, to arrive finally at death, when that energy is completely exhausted. It is a potential force which each being receives at birth, and of which it can make a more or less judicious use, but it necessarily exhausts it by the functioning and maintenance of the organism."

A GOOD TEST.

To the same Revue, M. Orgaz contributes an account of an incident which occurred one evening when his wife, himself, and a young lady who is an excellent medium for writing automatically, were sitting, in Paris, for spiritual manifestations. After receiving various communications, M. Orgaz mentally asked the following question of the controlling spirit (the grandfather of the young lady): "Could you not, the better to convince me, cause your granddaughter to write a few words in Spanish?" Scarcely thirty seconds elapsed before the hand of the medium began to write. When stopped I took up the sheet of paper, and was not a little surprised to read some words of Spanish, which I could not entirely decipher until next morning. The words were these: El tiempo. Los campos son verdes. Buena noche, Senor. (The time. The fields are green. Good night, Sir.) I have preserved this communication. What I found particularly interesting in this experiment, was that the medium did not know a word of Spanish; that I expressed my wish mentally; that neither the phrases nor any word were in my mind, and that I, myself, knew very little of that language."

A MAGNETIC CURE.

M. Francois Brudieux, contractor, of No. 57 Terrasson, Bordeau, also addressing himself to the same Revue, writes: "I had completely lost the sight of my right eye, in the month of January, 1899. I was obliged to enter the hospital, where I remained for a fortnight, and they extracted the nasal nerve in order to save the left eye; for my right eye was in a state of decomposition, as was shown by the matter issuing from it. The doctors who attended to me, called it a case of Glaucomatasis Neoplasm. They asserted that I had a tumor inside the eye, and that its complete extraction was indispensable to prevent its reaching the brain. I consulted another specialist, who told me the same thing. I then went to see Mme. Agullana, rue Gratiolet, No. 4, who had attended my wife several times; and who, by means of magnetism, caused the tumor to disappear and stopped the suppuration. I presented myself a fortnight later to the doctors who had treated me. They were very much surprised that the so-called tumor had disappeared, but I took care to be silent as to the remedy I had had recourse to. If I have still my natural eye, I owe its preservation to the good offices of Mme. Agullana. I do not regret the time occupied in the cure; for the pains bestowed upon me by that lady have been quite disinterested and entirely gratuitous."

SPIRITUALISM IN SWEDEN.

We translate from Le Progres Spirite (Paris), the following letter written by Dr. A. E. Tornebohm, who is, we believe, a medical practitioner in Stockholm: "During the last days of the year just ended, Spiritualism has taken a new departure in the Swedish capital. For some years past it has gained considerable ground here, but very slowly, the work being prosecuted for the most part in domestic privacy. Now it has suddenly become a matter of general interest, owing to the appearance of a very remarkable little volume, entitled Mot Ljuset (Towards the Light), by a well-known lady, the Princess Mary Karadja, a native of Sweden. 'Towards the Light,' is a poem written mediumistically by the Princess herself, as she energetically declares in the preface. It contains the autobiography of a man who, having plunged into every earthly pleasure, becomes disgusted with life and blows his brains out. But, to his immense astonishment, he discovers that he has only killed his body, his thinking entity being just as vital as heretofore. The narrative of his painful experiences in spirit life, and of how, in the end, he is lifted up 'towards the light,' by the awakening of love within him, through the instrumentality of a child, possesses a touching interest, and is particularly well adapted to produce an impression upon the general public. The work, in fact, has occasioned a real sensation, so that, in the course of a few weeks, nearly 4,000 copies have been sold, which is a great deal for any publication in our small country, and is something entirely unprecedented in our Spiritualistic literature. The consequence has been an awakening of interest in Spiritualism in many quarters where it was least expected."

No doubt it is the case in Sweden, as it is in Great Britain and in Australia, multitudes of people never think for themselves—perhaps never think at all—on the most momentous subjects that can engage the attention of the human mind; but they are always prepared to follow the lead of any person of rank and distinction; and when a princess has the courage to own herself a medium, and to publish a poem written under impression and inspiration, "Society" will be equally ready to aver that "It always thought there must be something in Spiritualism, don't-you-know; and now that dear Princess has composed a poem under spiritual direction, we are quite certain of it, don't-you-know."

SPIRITUALISM IN HUNGARY.

We have received from Buda Pesth two numbers of the fourth volume of a weekly Spiritualistic paper, containing sixteen pages of letter press royal quarto, and entitled Rejtelames Vilag Spiritualis Hetl Folyorret. It is issued weekly from No. 18 Jozsef Kornt, in the capital of Hungary, and is edited by Baron Mikos Janos. We regret that our complete ignorance of the Magyar language prevents us from giving our readers any analysis of the contents of our contemporary. Those who speak the tongue of Kossuth boast that it is a virgin language, without mother, and without daughter; and this is perfectly true, for it contains words not to be found in any other European language. It is remarkable for its simplicity, inasmuch as it abounds in monosyllables; while it is also rich in monomatopoetic words; that is to say in those which express by their sound the meaning of the thing they describe. Its Eastern origin is indicated by the fact that its vocabulary is rich in words analogous to those found in Sanscrit, Hebrew and Persian.

That the truths of Spiritualism should find ready acceptance with a people so largely imbued with a passion for poetry and music, and possessing so noble and copious a literature, as the Hungarians are and do, is only natural. Materialism cannot take root in minds like theirs. Art and letters, poesy and song, lofty aspirations, patriotic instincts and spiritual ideals thrive luxuriantly in such a soil; and we may infer from the fact of such a publication as the Rejtelames Vilag, making its appearance every week in Buda Pesth, that the science and philosophy, of which it is an exponent, must number very many disciples in Hungary.

A NOTE FROM ITALY.

In a letter to Il Vessillo Spiritista (Vercelli), Professor Vespasiani mentions that certain Roman Catholics who presented themselves at the confessional last Easter, were denied absolution by the priests on account of their having interested themselves in Spiritualism; while others who had been guilty of the same terrible sin were freely absolved. And he asks why should there be two weights and two measures? Why, indeed! But apart from the arrogant presumption of any clerical daring to usurp functions which belong to God alone; one is astonished at the amazing want of logic exhibited by all such persons. For, if to converse with spirits be a practice so evil as to be altogether unpardonable (for this is what the denial of absolution implies), it follows that Jesus of Nazareth, and his chief disciples, Mary, his mother, Abraham, Jacob, and most of the patriarchs and prophets of the Old Testament, were equally sinful and ought to fall under the ban of the church. For all of them held spiritual communion. So, in later times, did a good many so-called "Saints," as also Joan of Arc. It is true she was burnt alive, with the full approval of the leading ecclesiastics of the period; but by way of atonement there is some talk of whitewashing "the witch," by canonizing her. What! make a saint of a female medium, who was both clairvoyant and clairaudient; and at the same time punish modern Spiritualists who are Roman Catholics, by refusing to absolve them from their sins? Surely the preposterous inconsistency and absurdity of such a procedure must be palpable even to the most ignorant hedge-priest in Italy.

GHOST IN VOLK'S HOME.

Sculptor's Residence Said to Be Haunted.

WALKS AT TWILIGHT—SPECTER EXAMINES BROKEN CASTS IN THE DESERTED STUDIO—TWO FRIENDS WHO VISIT RUINED COTTAGE HAVE STARTLING EXPERIENCE WITH STRANGE APPARITION.

Osceola, Wis., Oct. 26.—A ghost that has been seen by many persons is haunting the house once owned and occupied by Leonard Volk, the famous sculptor, who died about four years ago. The house is situated on a high bluff just north of Osceola, and commands a beautiful view of the St. Croix river. It is an old-fashioned cottage that was once an ideal place for artistic work. From its oak-latticed porch the sculptor was accustomed to watch the placid stream and study the changing colors of the sky at sunset. Here he welcomed many of the leading statesmen and artists of his time.

The old house is now falling into ruins. The many-paned windows are broken, the doors swing on dislocated hinges, and the foundation stones are crumbling. Still, in the great living-room, once used as a studio, there are many traces of the man who made more than national fame for himself. The huge brick fire-place, once the delight of the sculptor, has been untouched by the vandals. The charred back log is just as it was left when the house was deserted. Several benches are drawn up before it, and the round, upholstered settee, eight feet in diameter, stands in the center of the room. the high oaken mantelpiece and on the shelves that run around the marred walls, stand plaster-of-paris models, while the floor is strewn with clay and plaster figures and busts that have been ruthlessly broken by tramps and mischievous boys.

For the first year or two after the sculptor's death many visitors went to the house so closely associated with one of the country's great men, but recently the place has been almost forgotten, except by a few of Mr. Volk's old friends, who were accustomed to spend pleasant evenings smoking before the great fire place or talking out on the little porch. Last week two of these old friends went up to the deserted house. It was one of the pleasant autumn evenings that was conducive to memories of the past. The two friends walked up the hill, and, pausing on the porch, recalled the times they had been welcomed by the man who had gone out of life after leaving in stone and marble many splendid works so closely connected with the history of his time that they must be always a precious legacy to the nation.

ENTERED HOUSE AT TWILIGHT.

They pushed open the front door and went inside. The quick twilight of fall had come, and they saw the benches and the broken models but indistinctly. They went to the old fireplace. One of the men felt on the high mantelpiece to see whether a pipe might not be in its accustomed place. An exclamation from his companion caused him to turn.

In the middle of the room, near the round settee, stood the figure of a man. It was too dark to see the face, but the strange apparition began to move noiselessly about the room. Stooping, the specter lifted from the floor a broken cast of the famous bust of Lincoln, executed in 1860, when the sculptor had but just won fame by his statue of Stephen A. Douglas. The figure bent its head sadly and then dropped the broken cast and advanced to the fireplace. The two visitors shrank away, and the silent form stopped on the worn hearthstone. With bent head the ghost appeared to be looking into the fire long ago burnt out. Then the arms were lifted up, folded, and rested against the mantel in a pose familiar to the friends of the sculptor. There was a movement that made the hair rise on the two unbidden guests. Speechless, they stood watching the specter, which appeared to be unconscious of their presence. Before either man could gain courage to speak the ghost had vanished.

It was in 1855 that Stephen A. Douglas, who was connected with the sculptor by marriage, aided Mr. Volk to go to Italy to study. Two years later he returned to Chicago. The Douglas monument, which is one of his best-known works, was modeled with a spirit of loving gratitude to the man who aided him at a time when he most needed help. Residents of Osceola declare that the spirits of Douglas and Lincoln some times accompany Volk's ghost when it visits the old house. It was whispered that the spirits of these two statesmen often came to the sculptor, who so long survived his great friends. Even before the sculptor's death the old house was avoided by the superstitious, who dislike to pass it after nightfall. It has been suggested that the building be restored and dedicated to some public use, but its distance from the town is an objection to all plans for the preservation and utilization of a place that should not be neglected.

OLD SOLDIERS VISITED COTTAGE

Volk's great soldier monuments endeared him to the Grand Army, and many veterans have visited the house in which the sculptor worked when he ran away from the city for a little while. At the time of the encampment in Chicago a number of old soldiers made a pilgrimage to the cottage. It was reported that one of these veterans saw two ghosts one night while he was sitting on the steps of the old porch, but little attention was paid to the story. The visit last week of the two friends of Volk convinces the residents of Osceola that the town has a haunted house of more than usual interest.—Inter Ocean.

THE OCCULT.

How It Feels to Be Hypnotized.

HARRY A. HARTOGS DESCRIBES HIS PECULIAR EXPERIENCE—SKIN GRAFTING A SUCCESS—WOUNDS ARE BEING HEALED BY POST HYPNOTIC SUGGESTION.

Harry A. Hartogs, who allowed himself to be hypnotized while tattoo marks were being removed from his right arm and skin cut from his left leg grafted over the wounds, on the third floor of 447 Smithfield street, Friday night, described his experience to a "Post" reporter yesterday. He declares that he is still under the hypnotic influence of the operator, Prof. L. W. DeLaurence, and that his mind has been directed so that inflammation cannot occur in the wounds made by the surgeon's knife.

Hartogs says he is a native of Holland. He is the master of seven languages and is a fluent French speaker. He says he came from a highly respectable family, and that the one bane of his life has been the unsightly tattoo figures on his arm. He always dreaded the operating table, having years ago been under the influence of chloroform while his eye was being treated. After he recovered from the anaesthetic, he says he suffered from a sickly sensation, his mind became affected and his stomach was disordered for several weeks.

"Under the influence of hypnotism I was unconscious of what was going on about me," said he. "I seemed to enjoy a pleasant sensation and when I was finally aroused from my sleep I was astonished to find my right arm in bandages and to learn that the operation was over. No, I felt no pain in the arm and did not know that skin had been removed from my leg until they told me."

"How did you feel immediately before you were overcome by the hypnotic influence?" he was asked.

"I felt at first like resisting the will of the hypnotist. It is a peculiar sensation to know that your mind is to be controlled by another man; that he can compel you to do as he wills. Then I realized that it was for my own good, and succumbed. I could feel the influence immediately. His eyes seemed to take possession of me and I became conscious that his mind had full possession of mine. When he told me I was growing drowsy I really commenced to feel such a sensation. Then, when he positively asserted that I would fall into a sleep, a deep, deep sleep, I seemed to descend deeper into oblivion. All the while I had the vague idea that while asleep I was still possessed by the irresistible power.

"Afterward all consciousness left me. When I awoke I had no recollection that anything had occurred in the room or that I had accomplished any of the musical feats attributed to me. The next day I felt exceedingly well. At one time during the afternoon I commenced to feel weary, but at 4 o'clock my mind became possessed with a delightful sensation. I laid down on a couch and slept; later I arose and read part of a novel. This is rather unusual for me, and contrary to my usual afternoon habits."

Prof. DeLaurence says that by reading and sleeping, his subject merely followed out what he directed to do by post-hypnotic suggestion, and when under his mesmeric spell. He declares that when the mind of the subject is once under control of the operator that it is the simplest thing to make him do anything upon awakening, or at any time to be specified in the future. He continued:

"If I would say to Hartogs: 'At 10 o'clock on April 2, 1901, you will write me a letter, or go to a certain place, he would do as directed, no matter at what occupation he is in or under what circumstances surround him at the time. You can order him to telephone to you or make him perform any feat within reason, and he will obey without actually knowing why he is doing it, and perfectly ignorant that he is following out a suggestion made while he was hypnotized.'

"Of the physicians who were present at the peculiar experiment made last Friday night many declared that the teaching of hypnotism was a dangerous business; that it bordered on criminal for an operator to spread his knowledge among all persons desirous of learning the science. It was argued that hypnotism might be used for criminal purposes; also, they suggested that only medical men should be permitted to use the power under any circumstances. They should understand physiology and the science of medicine in order to attend to their subject should any unexpected change occur.

"The mistake members of the medical fraternity have made and are making is that they have made an exhaustive and scientific study of the physical or material part of the human organism, but not of the immaterial part; they analyze and dissect the physical body, but seem to have no realization or knowledge of the non-physical part, or soul of man. The mind controls the physical body, the body being merely a register or an indicator of mental conditions of the mind; therefore, it is essential that every physician should have a thorough knowledge of psychology, which includes hypnotism and mesmerism, as well as physiology. Psychology is a scientific knowledge of the nature, possibilities, susceptibilities of the human mind, its relations to and influence over the physical body in both health and disease.

"By hypnotism and suggestion I propose to heal the wounds of Hartogs. By suggestion no inflammation can set in and the cure will be effected much quicker than were drugs and the usual remedies applied. I have arranged for him to visit me each day and undergo treatment. The physicians who performed the surgical operation will also appear and watch the progress of my work."—Pittsburg (Pa.) Post.

KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

Various Spiritual Analogies.

VIEWS GIVEN FROM A CHRISTIAN STANDPOINT AND KNOWLEDGE.

The kingdom of heaven is the greatest fact with which men are ever called to deal. But it is a subtle, mysterious power or system, eluding analysis while it rewards study. It is more than an influence, and yet it is as evasive as an influence. It has visible effects and substantial results, and yet it itself is like the wind, unnoted in its breezing, or like the light, inscrutable while familiar. The central principle of this kingdom, we may say, is life, understanding by that term a spiritual energizing which works in harmony with the righteous reality of things, for the glory of God and the good of men. This life from on high manifests itself in innumerable forms, and by its fruits is known to a certain extent, and yet, as is the case with the animal life, defies definition and escapes from analysis. Let the chemist probe with his tests, and heat his retorts, and adjust his lenses, still he will not find the secret of life, nor grow so wise as to be able to write out in an ingenious formula the activities of spiritual grace.

But while that principle of life or of grace which is the inspiration, the constructive principle, of the kingdom of heaven, cannot be analyzed with mathematical exactness, cannot be precisely comprehended in a logical proposition, while it eludes the vocabularies and defeats definition, yet it is always possible for the intelligent Christian mind, illuminated by God's spirit, to approximate more or less to a true idea of heavenly realities. Because we may not completely understand those spiritual realities, we need not be agnostics. The direction of a moving point, we learn from the mathematicians, is at each instant a tangent to its path, if the path be a curve. So we may say of the action of an inquiring Christian mind, that it is continually running tangentially to the great sphere of spiritual mystery, always near it, never wholly encompassing it. The true distinction is given in the discrimination made by Paul between comprehending and apprehending. Paul feared to say that he, even though an inspired apostle, had comprehended, that is, had apprehended, many a precious truth.

An encouragement to an intelligent inquiry after spiritual truth, joined with a clear condemnation of the feeble failure of the agnostic who says that we cannot know aught of supernatural mysteries, was afforded by the Master's teaching when, in the seven parables of the thirteenth chapter of Matthew, he declared that the kingdom of Heaven is "like unto" this and that. By tracing an analogy between earthly things and heavenly, the great teacher showed that men could approximate to a satisfactory knowledge of the mysteries of heaven, sufficiently at any rate to fit them for an intelligent discharge of the practical duties of life.

We would do well to keep this distinction clearly in mind. While we may not go to the extremes of a Swedenborg, who fancifully and arbitrarily assumed analogies and "correspondences" in almost everything in heaven and earth, thus, despite his evident sincerity, exposing himself to the charge of seeking to be over wise in things inrespect to which it behooves men to be silent, or at least humbly hesitant, yet we may to a certain extent, and in a thoughtful, guarded way, profitably employ various earthly facts and figures to make clearer to our minds the meaning of spiritual realities, imitating cautiously the method pursued by the Savior in his parable or story-sermons, in which he drew certain parallelisms between things earthly and heavenly. Jesus, it is true, enjoyed the advantage of omniscience, and we shall be safe in our deductions and interpretations only so far as we closely follow His wise leading as He utilized the seed, the bird, the flower, the coin, the barley loaf, or a mess of fishes, to symbolize and illustrate the facts of the kingdom of Heaven which otherwise might remain to men an utterly dark mystery.

It should be carefully borne in mind, however, that spiritual analogies are after all only analogies. At best they serve but as tentative interpretations of the great indefinable mysteries. While Christ compared the kingdom of God to this or that earthly interest or possession He did not identify the kingdom with material things, or worldly ambitions. This is a distinction which men are all the while slurring over in their thought. The kingdom of heaven, we are told by the Master, is "like unto" a field, a coin, a seed, a loaf or barley bread, yet it is not itself a field, a coin, a seed, or a barley loaf. Still many men about us talk and act as though it were. They assume that the kingdom of God is meat and drink, is the loaves and fishes, is houses and flocks and herds, or in modern phrase, that Christianity is bonds and stocks, and fine sanctuaries and political power and social prestige and culture and civilization. Yet Christianity is not all these, though it is like unto these as symbols, and in many cases may bring or induce these things literally. It is always seeking comparison with the things of this present life, but it infinitely transcends them.

At the same time, while it is not to be identified with material things (which was the mistake of the self-seeking Jews, who thought that Jesus had come to set up a brilliant political regime, a newer and mightier Caesardom), yet it has a relation to all present interests, it is like unto them, it is suggested by them, it may use them. That kingdom is far away, and yet it is near. It is in heaven, and yet on earth. It relates itself closely and inquiringly and lovingly with the lives that men about us are living with such joy or such sorrow at the present day. It is an interest for two worlds, and all spheres of existence, now and hereafter.—The Observer, New York.

EVIL SPIRITS.

Indians Have a Battle With Them.

An Indian rite more spectacular than the famous snake dance of the Mokis, but which is known to but few white people in America, is that of the Jocarilla Apaches of New Mexico.

It is the "Battle with Evil Spirits" which these Indians repeat every three or five years. It occurs only when a new moon appears between the 20th and 25th of September. That these Indians are able to make such a nice calculation in astronomy and dates speaks well for their mathematical ability.

September of this year the new moon appeared on the 23d day of the month. The Indians had prepared for their great dance or battle against the powers of evil. Mr. C. E. Ward, of Denver, Col., was a witness of the extrordinary scene.

"The celebration," he says, "which extended over a period of ten days, or rather nights, began at sundown on the first day of the new moon and continued until sunrise the next morning. It was repeated in this order throughout the period.

"As the sun sinks behind the western horizon the grand march of the celebrants begins. The men file in at the west gate and the women at the east, each turning to the right, and, after marching half way around the arena, halt, facing one another in a semi-circle, then retire under the roofed portion of the enclosure around the sides.

"In the centre of the arena is a small pile of brush, upon which a goodly supply of grease and oil has been poured, and at this juncture in strides the medicine woman in all the pride and glory of her barbarous attire.

"The Jicarilla Apaches have no medicine man, as is customary with other tribes. Stepping forward she applies an ignited brand to the pile, and as the fumes of sacred incense are wafted upward to the Great Spirit, the men and women give vent to their feelings by chanting to the solemn and doleful strains of tom-toms.

"After the medicine woman retires, twelve men step to the centre, where a larger and fiercer fire has been kindled, and while they beat the tom-toms the others in successive turns step forward and, forming a semi-circle about ten feet from the fire, go through their fantastic contortions. A weird spectacle they form, these simple children of the desert, clothed in their gorgeous blankets and other barbarous array—their straight, black hair unbraided and flowing in all directions, while their black, beady eyes emit sharp flashes of fanatical enthusiasm.

"After a while twelve evil spirits enter through the east gate and with grimacing faces and diabolical grins advance, while the dancers, panic-stricken and fearful, cease their dancing and rush for cover. It is futile, however, for the evil ones follow and submit their victims to all sorts of punishments until the braves, in their fury and indignation, rise in their might, and grasping their mighty war clubs, drive their tormentors out of the west gate. About 100 women and men are then selected to continue the performance until daybreak, while the rest retire.

"The grand finale occurs on the night of the tenth and the morning of the eleventh day. This night nobody sleeps, but all arrange themselves around the large fire, dancing and shouting all night to the ceaseless beating of the tom-toms.

"In the morning just at dawn, they rush out and place themselves in line along the banks of a little stream that empties into the lake, the women on the east, and the men on the west bank.

"Then the medicine woman again makes her appearance, this time with a large basket upon her arm, the inside of which is separated into compartments, each compartment containing some unction or healing salve.

"If one complains of a headache she dives down into one compartment and, bringing forth the necessary remedy, rubs some of it on the throbbing brow. Another complains of rheumatism, or possibly is suffering with toothache; in fact, every affliction known to Indian kind has its remedy in that mysterious basket and the obliging medicine woman applies it with solemn dignity and fitting ceremony.

"This action is supposed to drive the evil spirits in terror across the horizon, no more to return until the celebration of the next medicine dance, and leave the Indian immune from every ill. It is a sight worth going a thousand miles to witness."—Chicago American.

HEARD GHOSTS.

Comes to Minneapolis to Recover from Shock.

A SENSATIONAL STORY FROM COON CREEK, ANOKA COUNTY.

Mrs. Albert Nelson, the young wife of Albert Nelson, a farmer of Coon Creek, Anoka county, is in Minneapolis, suffering from broken health caused by peculiar circumstances surrounding the house which she and her husband occupy.

About a year ago the couple were married and settled on the farm of 400 acres. The house and buildings had been fitted up in first-class shape for them, to earn a livelihood.

A few nights after their marriage a most extraordinary and unexplainable event occurred, followed later by others of a similar nature, until the young bride had been forced to leave her home.

The first night they were awakened from their sleep by peculiar noises, and on awaking they felt their bed being lifted bodily into the air until it went high enough to allow the castors to drop out.

The chairs scraped across the floors, other pieces of furniture moved and all the movements were accompanied by the most unearthly noises. A thorough search of the house revealed nothing. While at the time he did not believe in ghosts, he was, as he admits, thoroughly frightened. This was the first of the curious occurrences.

Shortly after that they were awakened another night by the peculiar noises. The furniture took to moving in a most unaccountable way. Chairs were lifted from the floor and set down again. Tables slipped from one side of the room to the other, and everything pointed to the only solution, that unseen spirits were at work.

One night there was singing heard in the upper part of the house. By this time Nelson had become accustomed to the antics, and they were growing monotonous. He plucked up his courage and went to the room where the vocal selections were in progress and asked the ghosts in polite but emphatic tones to desist. He explained that he and his wife would like to go to sleep, and that such a thing was out of the question while the concert was going on. He received no answer, nor did he see a sign of anything, spiritual or otherwise.

The young wife at last could stand it no longer, and consulted the family physician. He was a matter-of-fact, gruff man, and they dared not tell him the real cause of her illness, for fear of ridicule. He announced that the only way he could diagnose her case was that the young woman had been terribly frightened. He prescribed for her, but the medicine failed to help her, and at times she was unconscious, she was so ill.

A brother was told of the mysterious night revels, and he slept at the house. Not a sound was heard, and he went away, divided between a belief in ghosts and the length and breadth of his brother's imagination.

Chris Moore a farmer living about a mile away, was invited to spend a night at the house, and the spooks got up a special concert and chair moving performance for his benefit. The two men made a search, but it availed them nothing.

Mr. Moore, although they did not find anything, does not laugh at ghosts any more and backs up his belief in their existence with vigorous language.

At last things became so bad that Mrs. Nelson was forced to come to Minneapolis, and a physician told her she must not go back to the house until the mystery was explained.—Minneapolis Tribune.

A Shaker Eldress' Experience.

To the Editor:—I have wanted much to tell you of the experiences of a Shakeress, in New Hampshire, whom I met several years ago in her own home, but as you have so many such like articles sent in, I do not know that you will appreciate my offering; however, I will write it out for your inspection, and whether published or not, I shall feel the better for an effort to add my mite to the grand array of spiritual testimony you are weekly reporting.

The sister I have in mind was for many years the leading Eldress in the central family at Enfield, N. H., but finally had to resign on account of physical ailment, and for seven years, was confined to her bed, with no hope of recovery, after having been treated by several eminent physicians. She was in middle life, and one whom the society had greatly depended upon because of the strength of her character, the intelligence, and good, motherly qualifications she possessed, and her physical failure was a source of deep regret to the whole community.

Her mind was bright and brave as ever, but the body had wholly lost its bearing. When I saw her she was well and strong again, and eldress in the novitiate family, a very responsible position, and this is what she told me, and others asserted to:

After all hope was gone, and she had been helpless seven years, an Indian spirit, a "medicine man," came to her bedside and examined her case, felt her pulse, etc., just as an earthly physician would do, and told her if she would do as he prescribed she would yet become well and strong. She saw and conversed with him, just as she had her earthly doctors, and had faith in what he said, and so put herself under his exclusive treatment. He came steadily every day, sat down by her bedside, felt her pulse, examined her case generally, noted the changes, dealt out the remedies needed, etc., and oftentimes changed the medicine. She said he was full of life and magnetism, as well as good cheer and pleasantry, often joking with her.

She gained very fast and he soon put her upon her feet, and in a short time told her she must go out into the woods, and gather with her own hands, the roots and herbs necessary to her full restoration—said he would be there and show her what to procure.

She took her basket and went out, and in a few moments she heard a sharp whoop near by, and looking around saw "her doctor" (as she called him ever after), who laughed and talked with her just like an earthly associate would do, and assisted in the gathering of remedies for her—which he often afterwards did.

She said she learned to love, and look with anxiety for his frequent visits, both before leaving her bed, and after getting strong enough to be about—in fact, he had never quite deserted her, as she yet (this at the time I saw her) was sometimes blest with his manly and noble presence. It was a pleasant theme for her.

She was a beautiful character. I cannot now recall her full name—they called her "Eldress Hannah." Her people all loved her, and so did the writer. It is now several years since she passed on to the higher home "over there."

A Bible Extract.

To the Editor:—Here is a sort of return to first principles—a pertinent extract from the "Good Book," which may at this time interest your numerous readers. Ever truly,

GEO. A. BACON.

Washington, D. C.

"When David was up in the morning, the word of the Lord came unto the prophet Gad, David's seer, saying: Go and say unto David, thus saith the Lord, I offer thee three things, choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee.

"So Gad came to David and told him, and said unto him, shall seven years of famine come unto thee in thy land? or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies while they pursue thee? or that there be three days pestilence in thy land? Now advise and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me.

"And David said unto Gad: I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great, and let me not fall into the hand of man.

"So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed; and there died of the people seventy thousand men.

"And David spoke unto the Lord by the threshing floor of Araunah, when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, Lo! I have sinned and I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done? Let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me and against my father's house.

"And Gad came that day to David and said unto him: Go up, rear an altar unto the Lord in the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite.

"And David built unto the Lord, and offered burnt offerings and peace offerings. So the Lord was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel."—II. Samuel, 24th chapter, 11-25.

AN INVALUABLE WORK!

This admirable work contains what a hundred spirits, good and evil, say of their dwelling-places. In this volume the spirits, differing as they may, are allowed to speak for themselves. No man is better qualified than Dr. Peebles to place a work of this kind before the people. He treats of the Mysteries of Life; Doubts and Hopes; The Bridging of the River; Foregleams of the Future; Testimony of Saints; The Growth and Perfection of the Spiritual Body; Is it the Soul or Body that Sins?; Clothing in the Spirit-world; Our Little Ones in Heaven; The Personal Experiences of Aaron Knight; The Red Man's Testimony; Evil Spirits; Testimony of Physicians in Spirit-Life; The Homes of Apostles and Divines; The Friends and Makers in Spirit-Life; Spirit Homes of Bruno and Others; Many Voices from the Spirit-Land. Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the spirits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, sm

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1900.

A Pointed Denial.

We have all read of the awful wickedness practiced by heathen mothers, in feeding the crocodiles in the Ganges with their babies. Sensitive natures revolted at such depravity. It was the duty of Christians to educate those benighted people away from such cruelties, so in all the Sunday Schools of fifty years ago contributions were taken up at stated periods, to defray the expenses of missionaries in teaching those people the true religion.

The New York Sunday Sun published awhile ago a letter from Swami Abhedananda, an educated East Indian, during which he met this falsehood of the missionaries with a square denial. To quote him accurately:

"I have walked on foot along the River Ganges, from its source down to Calcutta, nearly fifteen hundred miles, and have lived among the Hindus of all classes and castes, but never have I heard the stories of Hindu mothers feeding the crocodiles with their babies which the Christian missionaries have spread far and wide in this country, printing pictures thereof in Sunday School books, in order to serve their purpose."

And while the Swami is on the witness stand, and is a very intelligent observer, we may as well let him nail another lie; that relating to the sacrifices under the wheels of Juggernaut:

"The truth is, the car festival was never prohibited by government [as alleged by missionaries]. It takes place every year in summer. I have seen it with my own eyes, and have lived in Puri, or Juggernaut, for six months. If any one wishes to verify my statements, he can refer to the Commissioner of Orissa, or read the history of India, by W. W. Hunter. The story created by the fertile brains of globe-trotters that the Hindus throw themselves under the car of Juggernaut to get salvation, is utterly groundless and false. No historical evidence can be adduced in support of such a story."

There is scarcely an end to falsehoods of like nature which have been reported as the wicked doings of the Orient. One writer exaggerates facts, and a hundred others magnify the tale, each adding somewhat to its horrors. The better we know the East and its people the less will we believe the Munchausens told of them.

Luxurious Homes of Missionaries.

Writes Winifred Black to the Denver Post:

"I have never met a naval officer, a Minister to other countries, or a traveler of any intelligence, who believed in foreign missions. When I was a very little girl I went to Sunday-school. The brother-in-law of the superintendent was a missionary to the Hawaiian Islands. Every Sunday I put a round perspiring nickel in the box for the Sandwich Islander. When I grew up I went to these blessed islands. The first day I went out to drive I saw a magnificent country seat. 'Missionary So-and-So lives there,' said my driver. And then I saw another country place, and another, and yet another—magnificent homes, the like of which none but multi-millionaires can inhabit, much less own, in this country. All of them belonged to missionaries. A prominent missionary gave a picnic and invited me to it. He had twenty servants on horseback to help attend to the comforts of the guests."

This statement regarding the magnificent living of the missionaries in the Hawaiian Islands corroborates the reports from China. And this is really why the expelled missionaries are so anxious to return. They cannot endure the simple ways and styles of living of those who contribute pennies and dimes for their support. Basking for a time in luxury it is very difficult to fall back into the humble methods surrounding their early years.

A Paramount Need.

The Baptist Examiner says: "The paramount need at the present is piety." If by "piety" is meant "Affectionate reverence and devotion to parents, friends and country," then we join in opinion most heartily with our Baptist contemporary as to the real need of the hour. If, on the contrary, as we suspect, it means a greater love and devotion to the church, its narrow and impracticable teachings, with greater observance of forms and ceremonies, more faith in the unreal and shadowy nothings which constitute Christian virtues, with added love for holy days and festivals, and practices which lower self-esteem instead of ennobling, then we must be permitted to differ as to the present need.

The Young Men's Christian Association.

In the very heart of the business portion of Chicago is located the palatial Central Department of the Young Men's Christian Association. It is equipped with every accessory that will make it attractive to the class it is intended to draw within its walls. The gymnasium is furnished with every accessory for physical training, and large enough to accommodate one hundren and seventy-five men training at the same time, and skilled instructors are provided. In connection the finest baths in all variety are provided, and a natatorium finished in white tile and marble, with no extra charge for swimming lessons. Off this is a hand ball court, and at Ravenswood is furnished the finest athletic field in the West.

There is a reading room and library, where all the leading magazines and newspapers are on file.

There are magnificently finished parlors, with the most luxurious furnishings, at the disposal of the members. Off the parlors and adjoining the library, is a correspondence room, amply lighted, with stationery free for the use of those who desire.

On the seventh floor is a restaurant, where meals are served at nearly cost.

The educational feature is most marked. The course embraces every department of science and the arts, modern languages, and a thorough business training under the best instructors. There are lectures on sociology, civic, scientific, historic and literary subjects. These are given in the superbly finished auditorium, in which a series of entertainments are also presented.

According to the annual announcement for 1900-1, "It is possible to furnish so many privileges at such nominal cost to young men, through the generosity of the leading citizens of Chicago, who contributed to the erection of the building and who annually subscribe to the current expenses."

The annual fee of membership giving all these privileges "to any young man of good moral character," is ten dolars.

The object of this great work is "the highest and truest development of young men. The enjoyment of membership privileges is not conditional on nationality, occupation, or religious belief."

In the city of Chicago, aside from the central home, there are nine branches, four of which are especially devoted to railroad men, and the colossal proportions the effort has assumed may be comprehended by the fact that it is pushed forward in all cities and towns in this country, and is now extending its labors to the Orient. The buildings specially owned by 344 associations are valued at $20,000,000.

The price is only ten dollars a year, and the opportunities for improvement well nigh boundless. The homeless young man from the country who has come to the city to make his way, is greeted with fraternal fellowship at the door, and if worthy every effort made to find him a desirable position. On the face of the announcement, nothing but a moral character is demanded or sought. We presume a member might continue without any assumption of religion, but in the light of after reading he would not be pleasing to the management.

The scheme originated in a desire of propagating church doctrines; as a feeder to the church, and has become everything its founders desired.

Its object according to Mr. Frederick White, Religious Work Director, as given in the announcement for 1900-1 is: "To unite those who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Savior, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men."

For this object there is held a series of religious services—a Sunday afternoon meeting, a social hour held in the parlors immediately after the service, a fellowship lunch from six to seven for members and their immediate friends and strangers in the city, followed by short devotional service, a noon meeting every weekday, addressed by ministers or laymen, a Tuesday evening meeting for "those who are beginners in Christian life, a Saturday night meeting for prayer, especially praying for blessings on the work of the following Sabbath. To these is to be added twenty-three Bible classes.

Professedly there is no other requirement than a "good moral character," but however moral a member may be, he is only an "associate" unless he is a "member of an evangelical church!" A Unitarian or Universalist would have to take second place.

Every effort is exerted to win young men to Jesus Christ. That is the purpose of the Association, and to stand well with the management, to have influence and popularity, and be recognized in full fellowship, it need not be said that acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as the Savior is absolutely required. If this is not believed—if the young man cannot believe it—every incentive is offered for his becoming a hypocrite, and few there are who under the pressure would not yield. And as they grow in years, the pressure always being felt, they become fixed in their methods of thought, or rather thoughtless members of the churches whose ranks the Y. M. C. A. was designed to recruit.

Ten dollars pays for an annual membership, but it does not measure the cost.

A Lesson from Natural History.

Huber, the well-known Swiss naturalist, told of his watching the raid of a community of reddish ants, formed in a close phalanx eight to ten inches long, and four inches broad, marching a distance like a body of soldiers and attacking a hillock of dark ash-colored ants. He described the attacked, their confusion, defence, and the triumph of the assailants, followed by the sack, looting and carrying away by the captors of the young and the eggs of the defeated colony. These were carefully cared for until they reached maturity, then were compelled to toil as slaves to the victors.

The church seems to have borrowed its most successful method of Christian expansion from these slave-capturing insects. Its tools everywhere labor to gain control of childhood and youth, while in their plastic state, so as to mold them to their own will. It is said Catholic priests come very largely from orphans who fall into the church's hands, are educated by it, are inducted into the ministry, and repeat the process by which they became slaves, willing tools to serve the church, always ready to do its bidding. This is why it is almost impossible to make any inroads on the parent church. Its foundation is on a rock, which is really doing by children what the red ants, in Huber's observation, did to the defeated brown ants they enslaved.

A Curse to the Country.

A writer in an English journal, "Reynold's Newspaper," who, the editor says, holds a very important position in China, and has exceptional advantages for knowing that country and its people, states in the course of a long letter:

"The missionaries have the best houses in China, finely furnished, large staff of servants, and a splendid table. They do no work in the summer, but go away to the hills, where they have fine summer residences built, and they are not long in the country before they buy land and make money. This is not idle talk, as all foreign residents in China can bear out what I say.

"I have visited missionaries and dined with them, and can assure you that if they were in England they could not keep up the houses they do here and be able to go away to a summer resort for three or four months every year. Another great benefit they have is that they get so much for every child they have. Now, Mr. Editor, I beg of you to do your best to try and prevent any more money being sent to this country to support missionaries. I am sure the money can be laid out to much better advantage in England amongst the starving poor than to keep a lot of idle people here in luxury. The missionaries are flocking to Shanghai in hundreds, and many of them stay with their families at the best hotels at seven dollars per day. This equals at least fifteen shillings per day each, so you will see it requires capital to do this. You can hear people remark on all hands what an enormous amount of money must be sent from England to keep these people going. Many say they are a curse to the country."

It is universally conceded the missionary interference with the religion of China was the sole cause of the present disastrous condition in the Flowery Kingdom. Because of it all the Western nations have been put to enormous expense, and have lost many valuable lives.

Now as we write the statement comes that 1,800 American soldiers are to remain in North China, and that the missionaries have, or are about to ask, the authorities at Washington to increase the number, probably with the view of permanently remaining in China to protect the missionary interests.

We know what the missionaries accomplished in the Hawaiian Islands. After reducing the population from 150,000, as they took possession of those islands in 1820, to some 31,000 in 1890, the sons of those missionaries usurped the government, and transferred it to a foreign power. The natives, the true owners of the islands, were not consulted, but the usurpers took control and maintained it, to the prejudice of those whose fathers were induced to worship a crucified God. With that example before the Chinese they cannot be blamed for their revolt against Christian rule. It is their methods and their violence we all deplore.

Atrocious Criminals for the Church

Gibbon says in Chapter XV of his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, p. 354, vol. 1, of Putnam & Sons' edition:

"It is a very ancient reproach * * that the Christians allured into their party the most atrocious criminals, who, as soon as they were touched by a sense of remorse, were easily persuaded to wash away, in the water of baptism, the guilt of their past conduct, for which the temples of the gods refused to grant them any expiation."

This incident of history was recalled when reading the Associated Press dispatch to the Kansas City Star, as follows:

"Wichita, Kas., Oct. 23.—Frank Allgood, recently convicted of horse stealing here, was taken from his cell in the county jail Sunday morning and, accompanied by officers, went to the Christian church, where he was baptized. The Rev. Lynch, pastor of the First Methodist church, performed the ceremony. Allgood was then taken back to jail, to await being sent to the state prison."

Whether the same occurrence or another we cannot say, but we read a few days ago of a convicted felon, lately baptized by immersion, who had manacles on his hands and shackles on his feet when the holy rite was administered. Were they afraid the candidate for heavenly rewards would make his escape from earthly punishment as easily as he had escaped that reserved for sinners in another life?

Cargoes of Pastors.

The following from a late London paper now before us:

"This seems too good to be true. American deacons, we are told, are now in this country seeking pastors for some prominent pastorless churches in the United States. Let us hope to God they will take back with them a ship-load—nay, a dozen ship-loads—aye, and come again for some more. We will try and squeeze out a few crocodile tears; but, oh, DO let them carry off a few cargoes soon. It is blessed to give—more blessed in this case than to receive—and right manfully will we put up with the loss."

Well, well, is England tired of priestly rule? But never mind. Send on the pastors and we will send them out as missionaries to China, or to the cannibal islands. Good, fat, sleek ones are always in demand in the latter markets, particularly in those seasons when the bread fruit crop is short; and China has a method of its own of disposing of them when in excess.

The Spread of Mormonism.

Within the past two years over 1,600 picked young men, some of them college bred, have been commissioned as standard bearers of the Latter-Day Saints to propagate the Mormon faith in America and Europe. By next January it is expected no fewer than 3,000 ambassadors of Mormonism will be at work in America and other lands. The student volunteer movement cannot show such marvelous results and enthusiasm as the Mormon movement. It is affirmed that the gains made by Mormonism in the Dominion of Canada are greater than in any other region in the world. This aggressive body has about 300,000 communicants, of whom some 20,000 were added in 1899.

No other denomination has made such wonderful advances as has Mormonism. Continued at the same rate of increase as for the last seventy years, and in two thousand years it will dominate all other Christian faiths. We know its origin, the character of its projectors, the shallow fraud on which it was based, but the advance goes on unchecked.

Women the Life of the Church.

A writer in Harper's Weekly says he has been visiting a large number of churches during the last year, and specially noting the number of adults of each sex in attendance at Sunday ministrations. He found on an average there were about three women to every man. Where the preacher is a radical, and gives full expression to his boldest convictions, men are as numerous, sometimes more so, than women. He gave it as his opinion that the falling off in church attendance is due, not to bicycles, out-door amusements, or Sunday newspapers, but to the fact men are indifferent to ordinary Sunday preaching. They want information along religious lines, on subjects the pulpit rarely or never discusses.

The pulpit orator is never more at home than while depicting the agony of a dying God. He mingles his tears with his rhetoric, and draws a picture that is really sublime. It is a hard heart that can listen to such eloquence without being moved by pity. Away from the church, in his thoughtful moments he is ashamed to have given ear to such supreme nonsense as a God dying on a cross at the hands of man. Had the preacher exhausted his logic in proving that man is immortal he would have said something practical to think about. After listening to the usual pulpit harangues for ten to twenty years, and gaining no new thought, he is content to remain at home, and let his wife represent him in church circles. Educated wives, however, like their husbands, have begun to question the creeds, and they are gradually finding rest or entertainment outside of church pews. And who blames them for it?

Will Reap the Whirlwind.

It is rarely The Progressive Thinker will have occasion to indorse any position taken by the "Christian Endeavor World," but we not only approve but highly commend its disapprobation of the looting and immoralities at Tientsin and Pekin by the allied armies, when those cities became subject to the Christian powers. We quote:

"What can the so-called Christian nations expect after this horrible exhibition of barbarism? They have sown the wind; they will surely reap the whirlwind! The excesses of the Boxers in their maddest moments were apparently no greater, if they were as great, as the rapine and destruction of these barbarians from civilized lands. Who can blame the Chinese for any reprisals they may hereafter make upon these hordes of white bandits who have overrun their country?"

Severe, but just. The whole press of the country should disapprobate this vandalism either at home or abroad.

Marvels Will Never Cease.

A steamboat has been plying on the Dead Sea since last June, capable of carrying thirty passengers and considerable freight. Another is in process of construction. This sea receives the waters of the Jordan, but it has no outlet, save by evaporation. It lies 1,312 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Its sides are graced with perpendicular cliffs rising from 1,000 feet on the west to 2,000 feet on the east. Chateaubriand reported the Arabs claimed no one could venture upon the sea and live. He disproved the statement by bathing in it, but the water was so dense he could not sink, so floated with his body half out of water.

Now a railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem; thence to the Sea of Salt, as it is sometimes called; and thence by steamer to Kerah, on the eastern coast, said to be the ancient capital of Moab, which contains a population of about 8,000.

Recall the Missionaries.

The Chinese Ambassador to England, in a late official declaration to the British government, made an appeal which is worthy of preservation. Said he:

"It will be quite impossible to have peace in China so long as foreign missionaries are allowed to interfere with the institutions of the country; and no government at Pekin can be strong enough to protect unpopular missionaries throughout so vast an empire. We may not be able to keep these missionaries out of China, because we are not a fighting nation. Anything will be better than the missionaries. Peace, prosperity, and healthy commerce will be impossible until the missionary shall have been eliminated from our local problem. Recall the missionaries, and all will go well."

All governments should heed this pathetic appeal.

As Funny as Any of 'Em.

A London paper tells of a Ceylon planter whose wife died. A clergyman called to express his sympathy. Neither the man nor his wife had been a church member. The husband was prostrated with grief, but roused himself as the man of God entered.

"Is there any part of the Scriptures you would like me to read at the funeral?" inquired the clergyman.

The husband sat up, mopped his eyes, thought for a moment, then: "You might try that bit about Samson and the foxes. I think that's about as funny as any of 'em."

He Saw It Correctly.

Rev. A. C. Lucey, rector of West-Meston Rectory, of England, lately wrote very sensibly to the Church Times:

"The sooner we clergy realize that what the present age requires is the re-presenting of religion, the better it will be for us and for religion. It is most difficult for us to shake ourselves free from old-fashioned prejudices and knowledge, and to know how to acquire sound methods."

The Boxers Were Reformers.

Now come representations that the Boxer movement in China was inspired by an absolute desire to reform governmental affairs. They ascribed their failure to gain reforms to the "foreign devils," who controlled the Chinese officials by corrupt methods, and the grant of privileges to missionaries confirmed them in their suspicions.

HON. A. B. RICHMOND.

About the first of December we shall commence a most remarkable narrative, by the Hon. A. B. Richmond, of Meadville, Pa. Mr. Richmond is widely known as the Sage of Cassadaga. Our Winter Campaign will be especially brilliant. Send in your subscriptions now, and enjoy the feast of good things.

15 CENTS.

OUR WINTER CAMPAIGN

It will be especially brilliant and attractive, and we desire to reach at least 50,000 Spiritualists who take no Spiritualist paper, and who are actually in midnight darkness in reference to what is going on in our ranks. In order to do this we will make a great sacrifice financially, and will send the paper out twelve weeks for 15 cents to all new subscribers, or those who have not been on our list for one year. We will also send to each trial subscriber a copy of The Progressive Thinker containing the "Crimes of Ministers and Church Members." This issue of The Progressive Thinker contains twelve pages, the largest paper ever issued on this earth from any Spiritualist publishing house. The data presented was collected during three months' time in 1898, from the secular press, illustrating in a marked degree the vast amount of crime among ministers of the gospel and church members. Whenever you hear an orthodox minister defaming Spiritualists, all you have to do is to present him this special issue of the paper in answer. It is a stunner, and will silence him! The data and statistics of this paper alone are worth to every Spiritualist at least ONE DOLLAR. It is a weapon of defense they cannot afford to be without. Any Spiritualist in renewing his subscription can have this remarkable paper sent to him by enclosing a two-cent stamp. We desire to send this paper to every Spiritualist in the United States, a million or more! When we sell this paper to the trade, independent of a subscription, the price is 10 cents.

Bear in mind that if your subscription expires now, you should not shift from yourself to another member of your family (or any one else, for that matter) in order to get the reading of the paper for less than actual cost to us, under the pretense that that person is a new subscriber. On the contrary, you should renew at once, and send in all the yearly subscribers you can, to strengthen our hands in this great missionary work. The trick of changing the subscription to another member of the family, when the yearly subscription expires, in order to take advantage of our trial rates, has been played upon us, but we hope it will never be repeated. As the lamented Col. Ingersoll said, "Let us be honest."

We want to do a missionary work this winter among Spiritualists exclusively. We want them to read what the Hon. A. B. Richmond, the Sage of Cassadaga, has to say. His narration will extend through several months of the paper, and will prove highly fascinating and interesting.

This offer is made solely to reach the Spiritualists. We want to take a census, and determine how many Spiritualists can be induced to read a Spiritualist paper when it is sent out almost as a gift. If they will read The Progressive Thinker for three months, we are sure they will read it longer. This is a Special Campaign among the Spiritualists. We want to reach them exclusively. There always have been thousands of Spiritualists who do not read our literature. They know absolutely nothing of the great events constantly occurring in our ranks. They are in midnight darkness in respect to the personnel of our movement. We don't think that one Spiritualist in a hundred knows that the National Spiritualist Association met this year at Cleveland, Ohio. We want to reach this class in this our Special Campaign.

Giles B. Stebbins Passed To Spirit Life.

It appears from the Evening News, that the veteran reformer, Hon. Giles B. Stebbins, on October 31, expired of old age at his residence, 143 Pitcher street, Detroit, Mich. He had felt the approach of death for several weeks and talked over the details of the funeral and interment with his wife.

Mr. Stebbins was born 83 years ago of New England stock, at Springfield, Mass., and began life at 14 as clerk in a hardware store. His ambition was to become a Unitarian minister. With that end in view he subsequently attended school again, and in the '50s was sent by the Boston Unitarians to Ann Arbor, where he established a Unitarian society and was its pastor for about two years. But after that he became converted to the doctrine of Spiritualism, and while at the time of his death he was a member of the Unitarian church in this city, he was also and had been since his youth one of the most ardent and industrious writers on Spiritualism in the United States.

Before the civil war Mr. Stebbins took a prominent part as a writer and lecturer in the anti-slavery cause, spending part of his time in Washington, and after the war he became an equally zealous advocate of protection. In 1867 he removed from Washington to Detroit with his wife, whom he had married at Sodus Bay, Ont., in 1846. Since coming to Detroit he had been a prolific writer for the newspapers and various publications, besides issuing a number of books on religious, educational and political subjects. He spent two years in Chicago as editor of a Spiritualistic paper, a year or two in similar work in Milwaukee, and during the year 1892 was editor of the American Tariff League organ in New York.

Mr. Stebbins was a very quiet, gentle, unobtrusive man except as the nature of his work brought him into prominence. He and his wife lived alone, their children having died in infancy. About four years ago they celebrated their golden wedding. The remains were cremated and the ashes taken to Springfield for interment in the family lot.

A NOTABLE WORK BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

The Science of Spiritualism—Mediumship, Its Laws, Conditions and Cultivation.

Since my supervision of the Questions and Answers Department in The Progressive Thinker, over five years ago, I have been in constant receipt of letters from those interested in the investigation of Spiritualism and kindred fields of thought, desiring personal lessons, often offering more than the exorbitant prices of the advertising "scientists," "occultists," etc. To all these I have replied that I could furnish nothing beyond the books I have published and the answers given in The Progressive Thinker, which is free to all.

The demand is so urgent that it has been decided to condense the answers given on Mediumship and Spiritualism in The Progressive Thinker, for the past years, with new matter, and so far as possible, meet the demand for "lessons" on these subjects.

Perhaps no questions are so often asked as: "How can I became a medium?" "How shall I proceed to investigate to satisfy my ardent desire to know?" To answer all such questions is the object of this book. Its Introduction is the Principles of Spiritualism. It gives the fundamental laws and conditions of mediumship, and then discusses its various phases, giving "practical lessons" in each. Clairvoyance, psychometry, mind-reading, Mesmerism, or Hypnotism, Healing, Writing, Inspiration, Physical Phenomena, etc., with a series of "Hints and Suggestions," clearing up obscure places.

Brother Francis, after his "Divine Plan," has made the price 35 cents, and will have it ready on or before December 15.

Those who desire such a book will confer a favor by sending me a card with their address (not money until publication).

I will take this occasion to thank those who have so generously subscribed for "Asphodel Blooms." Already the-number guarantees its publication, which will be in November, in time for the holidays, as it will be printed and bound in a manner to make it an attractive gift.

Those who send in their names and postoffice addresses at once will receive both "The Science of Spiritualism," etc., and "Asphodel Blooms" for $1. Address Hudson Tuttle, Berlin Heights, Ohio.

He Has the Three Volumes of the Encyclopedia.

Los Mochis, Sinaloa, Mexico, Oct. 8, 1900.

To the Editor: I received Vol. 3 of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World in due time, and I have read it and re-read it, and I would not take ten dollars for it now, and do without it. It is about the best book I have yet seen; to say that it is a real treat, is putting it lightly. The contributors are among the most noble and able of both the living and dead, and after reading their opinions and experiences I am constrained to look with fond anticipation when I may pass over. I have the three volumes and no Spiritualist should be without every one of them.

Wonderful Occult Powers.

As set forth by the Chicago American, William H. Mack, a young man from New York, believes that some day he will show that there is something wrong with the law of gravitation, and that the laws which now govern the attraction of the earth will have to be amended.

At present he is a living demonstration of the fact that the laws of gravitation don't always work as they are laid down in books, for Mr. Mack can make himself so heavy nobody can lift him, or he can allow himself to be lifted easily by a man of moderate strength.

He has known of the strange power he possessed ever since he was a mere child. He has exhibited it for the benefit of the greatest specialists, but none of them can give an explanation of just what the subtle power is which he possesses. Prof. Virchow, of Berlin, says it is a form of nervous energy. Charcot, the great French exponent of hypnotism, declares it is a management of invisible force, whatever that may mean; and so on. But nevertheless the fact remains that Mack can regulate his weight, and also has control over his pulse.

He has traveled around the world showing his power, and in the course of his travels was in China in 1896, where he was not allowed to exhibit before the people, as he was regarded as a supernatural being. He did, however, give an exhibition before Li Hung Chang. That shrewd diplomat said to him: "You ought to be very rich; you have such a grip on the earth."

Mr. Mack is now in Chicago, and he gave an exhibition of his strange force at the American office yesterday, where he defied the strongest employe in the building to lift him from the ground if he did not so choose. In his exhibitions he simply places his finger upon the neck of the man trying to lift him, and he is glued to the earth. No amount of energy seems able to raise him, but when he does not apply this touch he is as easily lifted as an ordinary man.

Mr. Mack also has the power of transmitting his peculiar resistance to others by simply placing his hand upon the neck. He has recently come from Harvard, where he was a source of wonder and amazement to the football team, which tried mass plays upon him without avail. He defied their united strength. Three or four of the biggest men on the team tried with might and main to lift him, but failed.

Mack performs many wonderful feats, but perhaps the strangest is this: He holds a vaulting pole in an upright position between the palms of his hands and permits as many as can conveniently grasp the pole to do so, but their combined efforts are unable to force the pole to the ground.

Mack first discovered his unusual power when a small boy. He came home from school without a merit card, and his father was about to punish him. The small boy grasped the father by the neck and the father's hand was stayed, he could do nothing with the boy, and was astonished. He tried to carry the boy to the house, but was unable to lift him from the ground.

Dr. Marion L. Simms, the family physician, was called to see if he could explain the phenomenon, but after several experiments gave it up. Spiritualists thought they detected a great medium, but young Mack did not show any genius in this respect.

In 1890 the strong man went to England and submitted to tests by experiments there, but no good explanation of how he exerted his power was obtained, and Mack still wonders why he does it and why he is so different from other men.

The definition of a pound, according to physicists, is "the pull of the earth exerted upon a small piece of platinum deposited in the Exchequer at London." To Mack this means nothing, for he can make the earth exert a greater or less amount of "pull" upon him and the unit of the measure of the force of gravity is of no use.

On the scales he can vary his weight "working," 123 pounds, but he can also tip the beam at 800 pounds and then slowly decrease his avoirdupois to about 35 pounds below normal, and he cannot explain it any more than anybody else.

Professor Virchow, in Berlin, made a three weeks' study of Mack and at the end of that time gave no clear explanation of the phenomena which he had studied. He gave it as his theory that it was some form of nerve resistance and the consensus of the savants seem to be it is something of that sort, but something they have never been able to discover before and are absolutely unable to account for.

Mack becomes exhausted after a little time and seems in a state of almost total collapse after performing his feats but regains his normal poise in about half-hour of rest which goes to confirm the theory of it being nervous power which he uses.

For the American Mack performed his usual feat of increasing and diminishing his weight. He was not feeling in the best of health, and said his "work" affected him more than usual. He proved himself to be absolute master of his weight and could weigh about what he wished when anybody tried to lift him. One, two, three and four men made trials, but could not move him from his feet. He could be wrestled from his feet easily or toppled over and then lifted, but when he placed his finger on the neck of one of the men and they all touched flesh somewhere along the line his resistance baffled all their efforts.

There seemed to several reporters who tried the experiment and watched it closely, a trick of balance. They tried similar experiments among themselves, and found that when one of their number placed his finger on the neck of another it was almost impossible to lift him, but other trials failed, and they finally came to the conclusion there was some unusual power being manifested.

The Progressive Thinker Travels.

To the Editor:—In a late edition, I see a short squib headed, "The Progressive Thinker Travels," in which it says that "a poem written by a gentleman in Sturgis, Mich., had traveled to the top of the Rocky mountains."

I can furnish you with a much more remarkable instance, illustrating the wonderful circulation your paper seems to have, which apparently is not not confined to the little narrow limits of the United States, or even England, nor of both combined. You published an article of mine in your paper of August 11, entitled "The Home Circle," and in response thereto I received a postal card from an editor at The Hague, Holland, which I herewith enclose, and of which you can give a fac simile for the benefit of your readers, if you desire. Respectfully,

J. S. ENSMINGER,
Topeka, Kans. Atty-at-Law.

Dear Sir:—With much pleasure I have read your communication about the cases with Frank Nevils and your wife Emma, in the number of August 11 of The Progressive Thinker. If you would send me also some account of further experiments, I shall have the pleasure to insert it in the Dutch paper, De Sphinx. Yours truly,

A. J. ROTTEVECL.

AUTOMATIC WRITING.

Showing How Different Spirits Express Themselves Upon the Same Subject.

The sun and moon are properly termed King of Heaven and Queen of Earth, or nature. The two united, form the natural power under which all nature's forces serve, but it is not a self-acting operation, nor yet chance work. All is supremely governed.

The electric forces of the Earth and elements are centered in the sun, in the substances and forces in which said electricities are contained. Therefore, the sun is the producer of the refined electricities, by using all things in nature as batteries and by these connections and force exchanges, currents are produced and supported, atmospheric and oceanic boundaries fixed. Water, wind and wave, are made to contribute to this system in its refining and propelling labors in nature.

The moon contains the magnetic and propagative forces of corresponding seeds in nature. She is the gentle goddess whose influence upon earth means not only production but multiplication and constant improvement, by reason of changes due to these inherent powers in nature to which the selections centered in sun and moon correspond and thus act in union, as the propelling power of all things within their radii.

No. 2.—The sun is an evolved centre or dynamo. It is a centre qualified by exact mathematical calculations of all substance and force employed in its evolution and continuous support. It is a centre that can and does, exercise sufficient attractive force to insure evolution of all evolvable matter of its sphere, which sphere represents all that is contained in a mathematical plan for a new creation, in its entirety of labors from start to finish.

One of the Creative Masters said this, concerning the sun and its auxiliaries: We have provided nebulous belts and rings around the corporeal world, that by a study of these, man may comprehend the rotations of the vortical world. For his utility we created a great circle of electrical currents and set the sun within it, its power great yet subject thereto. We created the vortices to resemble whirlpools or batteries fed by the corporeal world. The sun's vortex does thus forever rotate and carry all other currents and vortices in it, according to their density and position. Thus are they carried forth and around about the sun by the power of these currents and which are differently manifested at different times. Whirlwinds and great storms are only the effect of differently manifested electric currents, all connected within the solar system.

By means of these affixed vortices, the planets turn on their axes and are carried in their orbits. The sun's heat and the earth's rotation on its axis are, in the main, the cause of all atmospheric disturbances in connection with its vortical currents. Electricity is the natural atmospheric agent effecting these disturbances. The equatorial regions are the parts of the earth most heated, therefore in those belts the heated air is constantly ascending, which results in frequent rain accompanied by lightning and thunder, a proof of electrical action and the to and fro movement of the whirlpools for the generation of electrical currents.

The sun, as the master stationed over all vortical currents, sets all this atmospheric machinery in motion by heating the equatorial regions and using heat and electric forces for its power supply in constantly evolving all evolvable matter from the earth.

The earth is composed of chemical elements, and the atmosphere contains the corresponding chemical elements and properties, all of which are fixed in their correlative services with mathematical exactness, as they are numbered and named per calculus. There is no chance work about this, and those who think they have become masters in learning nature's force play, behold only the effects of the cause behind it.

No. 3.—Another spirit speaking on this same subject—the sun—said: To the sun is due men's physical strength to perform physical labor. The chemical force that comes from the sun really performs all the heaviest work in the corporeal realm. By the sun's power apart from heat and light, carbon and oxygen are separated and all the poisonous gases which in that state need these chemical affinities from the sun are then utilized as fertilizing forces by the Divine Husbandman, to strengthen and prosper the vegetable world.

No. 4.—Another spirit says this: The rotation of the planets which are discovered, is at the present time being somewhat changed, which is due to the positive arranging of all principal meridians and their respective parallels. These changes were all marked in the original creative drafts as enlargements of spheres by incessant involution and evolution. Astronomers therefore have some critical work before them for the reason that the Masters turn the pivot slightly. This will become apparent to the students' searching vision and somewhat perplex them.

It has been the supposition of some of these students, that there would come a time, when this sun with all its planetary auxiliaries, Earth included, and welded into its mass, would roll as a black ball through infinite space, because they fail to see how the sun can be fed and put forth its great force which is so constantly and lavishly expended.

There is no need of fear on that score. A great surplus of such substance and force is on hand, yea; too much, and it is of necessity returned to exhaust itself upon Earth, to maintain the order and stability of this central system. Therefore it is desirable that men study how to put this natural wealth to use, for it is purposed that it should be used to increase the world's wealth and humanity's comfort.

It is time that not only gas, oil and ore should be extracted from nature's bosom; but from the atmosphere and its elements the surplus must be drawn, by which the labor processes, that is, nature's operations and ruling may be more perfectly learned than from any other effort for such results.

All evolutionary processes per higher, purified substance, are conducted by induction or as some call it, involution, through nature's nerve or psychic system. In nature's workshop, all is so governed that each grade of soul germs makes it possible for the next higher grade to take up or build forms from the matter so purified. Thus grade after grade of embodiments are conducted for the purpose of refining all of nature's raw materials by the use of organisms through which her dynamic forces can and do exert themselves to cement, as well as to draw such substance as the law of evolution designates on every plane. The fittest is ever cemented with that a grade in advance, and this connecting and welding of these links is so perfect that it can be traced like an open book, when intellectual unfoldment and spiritual insight make it possible.

These natural processes are wonderful when clearly and rightly discerned by the quickened vision and senses, for it is plainly marked what part each force is playing in selecting and impelling that which is fit for cementing purposes in each degree, according to marks of law and nature's absolute ruling. All expressions of corporeal forms are the result of life or chemical substance in nature, but fanned into life and governed by Supreme, Universal spirit.

At the present time, the soul-life of all nature is undergoing great travail for higher expressions. Nature's nerve system throbs in all plant, vegetable and animal life. All that is, is severely affected by the strong force currents directed upon nature, as also upon the mortal mind realm. Nerve stimulus is being exhaled and inhaled rapidly from organisms to organisms, the higher and lower orders mingle. This psychical exchange is necessary. The present crises through which earth and man are passing would be overwhelming if strength were not supplied from above and the force and substance assimilations and cementing processes for the necessary uplifting which alone insures safety and curbs the tides of ill force which threaten woes for mortals and shortens the periods of hardships for the dwellers of earth. This great psychic or nerve stir and invigoration is felt in all religious, political and commercial spheres. It impels thought and action. It is realized as comfort and discomfort, as desired peace and provoked war, as a desire to cling to old dogmas and ideas and being perforce overwhelmed by the new thoughts forced upon the minds. This force will work until the errors vanish. It works for unity, for harmony, for joy, for righteousness and will not return void, but will accomplish its purpose, although while the struggle for this result is on, it may well be said that these are times that try men's souls.

CRITICISES MINISTERS.

Takes Exception to Statement that God Sent Disaster.

John W. Ring, a prominent Spiritualist of Galveston, Texas., does not think that God was responsible for the terrible flood that wrecked the Texan city and caused the death of 10,000 people. In an address at No. 222 Superior street, Cleveland, Ohio, during the N. S. A. convention, he took occasion to criticize the ministers of the north, who, he said, are preaching that God sent the terrible flood as a lesson to the world and to demonstrate His power. Mr. Ring said that the flood was the working of nature's laws; the effect of the causes of nature working through man. "The flood," he said, "was the working of nature's laws and not the direct result of an angry God."

Mr. Ring claimed that the country is approaching a great climax; that the incoming century will bring a developing of spiritual understanding hitherto unknown in the history of the world.

Mr. Ring was in Galveston during the day and night of terror, and he painted a rather vivid word-picture of the disaster. He was in the midst of the storm district and he remained there from early in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Then he started out and walked about the streets waiting for spirits or intelligences to tell him what to do. He entered an orphanage asylum, and while standing in the entrance a spirit warned him to leave the building. He did so and the next morning he found the building had been destroyed, and had he remained there he would have been killed. He took refuge finally in a house which contained a number of persons of the Catholic and Episcopal faith. "These people were deeply religious," said Mr. Ring, "and during the night they fairly bombarded the holy city with their supplications." He described how a vision in the form of a beautiful angel had appeared to a little boy who was in the household and how when the boy asked the angel if they were to be saved the angel had nodded its head three times in the affirmative. The house was not destroyed and all the inmates were saved.

Mr. Ring said he had been asked a number of times why spirits had not appeared to all the Spiritualists of Galveston and warned them of the danger, that they might have an opportunity to escape. Seven members of the Galveston Spiritualist Society lost their lives. He said those members of the faith were so satisfied with their safety that they refused to heed the warnings of their mortal friends. As for himself, that early in the day, not being advised by spiritual intelligences, he remained at his home. In the afternoon, however, he left his home and went about the streets, waiting for the spirit intelligences. Finally he entered the orphanage and a spirit visited him for the first time and told him to leave that building. He did so, and probably saved his life, as the structure was destroyed.

Citizens of Galveston, so Mr. Ring said, do not think anything of being compelled to take off their shoes and stockings and wading to the street cars. Such incidents are common for the reason the island being so low, is often inundated to the depth of a foot or two. So when the great storm of Sept. 8 broke, the citizens were not very much alarmed when the streets ran a foot deep with water. The storm continued from early morning to 4 o'clock in the afternoon and then a perfect hurricane arose, the wind blowing 110 miles an hour. The town was flooded to a depth varying from eight to fourteen feet. Not a single building in the city escaped the fury of the storm. Many were razed completely and every building was more or less damaged."

The speaker argued from the proposition, "Was God in the Galveston flood?" He denied that Galveston was visited by the wrath of the Deity for the reason it was a sinful and wretched city. He said, judging from the number of churches, Galveston was a very pious city. Most of these were destroyed. The only place of religious worship in the city that was not entirely destroyed was a Jewish synagogue. He claimed the disaster was due solely to the workings of nature's laws.

BABY FAITHS.

A Whole God, or No God at All.

I don't know just how hard Prof. Loveland is punching other people's "baby faiths" or Gods, but I do know he is not leading out even in the direction of mine, and perhaps not in the direction of Mr. Stewart's "God." Perhaps the Professor will better understand our "baby faith" by critically examining some of his own faiths which are yet more "babyish." Evidently Prof. Loveland uses the term "humanity" in relation to human beings in the very same sense that we use the term God, Being or Noumenon, in relation to the whole concatenation of things which we call the world or universe. The term "Matter" in relation to physical things, and the term "Spirit" in relation to spirit things, are used by others, if not by Prof. Loveland, in the very same sense that we use the term God in relation to both physical and spiritual things, and to any other systems or planes of existence that there may be of which now we know nothing.

If Prof. Loveland uses the term "Nature" in the sense of some "incomprehensible," "unknowable" something underlying all things and of which all things are the sum of its "potent energies," then his faith is our faith, and neither more nor less "babyish."

The fashion, however, is to divide "Nature" up into departments, as human nature, physical nature, spiritual nature, animal, vegetable, mineral, elementary and atomic nature. The sum of these "Natures" is the full-grown "God," as far as we know anything about him; but evidently a full-grown God is too much for a great many people, therefore they take him in broken doses and perhaps without realizing that they are taking their medicine at all. And having taken their God in these broken doses or "baby" forms—such as "humanity," "Matter," "Spirit," "Nature," and the like—they can't see what earthly use any man has for any more God, evidently believing that enough of a thing is a God's plenty.

These baby gods bear the same relation to Being or Noumenon that polytheistic Gods bear to the monotheistic God among those who give God the personal or anthropomorphic character.

But Prof. Loveland insists that our God is personal or anthropomorphic. Well, our God is but the sum of your baby gods. Sum them up and see if you have any personality in the result. Is "humanity" personal because each man is personal? Is Nature personal because natural things are personal? Is "Matter" personal because physical things are personal? Is "Spirit" personal because the spirit individual is personal? Is not personality the very thing which radically differentiates the things of the world from your baby gods of the world? In like manner personality or individuality is precisely the thing that demarks phenomena from Noumenon, or finite "beings" from the infinite Beings. If you choose you may remember, if you read it, what we said about the ocean divine in relation to the concatenation of personality. And you can call it "Ocean of Nature," or you may say it is made up of "Matter," "Spirit" and "humanity," and that each evoluted on its own lines into the world of personality as we have it now.

Of course if we attributed to Being or Noumenon the same kind of intelligence, emotion and volition we have, we would make a personality of him the same as we are personal. He must see through eyes and think by a brain the same as we. But that is precisely what we do not do, and what Prof. Loveland does not do when he speaks of the intelligence of "humanity," or "nature," and others when they speak of the intelligence of "Matter" or "Spirit."

But is any man vain enough to suppose ours is the only kind or plane of intelligence, emotion and volition? We see in the animal and vegetable economy, in our own physical economy, things done which we as an individual can't even approach, can't even conceive of or understand. Fancy a man making an egg, or making a chick of it. All he or the old hen can do is to produce conditions under which the egg will "hatch" itself into a chick.

Nonsense. We see a noumenal intelligence everywhere different from our own, and so much above, that we can't comprehend it. Even Prof. Loveland would have to acknowledge that "Nature" has all of man's intelligence and much more. Still he speaks of Nature not as a personality, but as the very opposite of personality.

It is true the "faiths of babyhood" die hard, such as "Matter," "Spirit" and "Nature." And perhaps it is well that they do not die until we take on a full-grown faith in Noumenon or Being. Until we discuss the world with Noumenon and phenomenon as the opposite poles of thought we would find it impossible to discuss it intelligently without using the term Nature, Matter, and the like.

If the N. S. A. had said: We believe in an unknowable Noumenon of which all known things are the phenomenon, I fancy there would have been no harm to Spiritualism in that, for it is a universal belief, as is shown by the "baby" beliefs in matter, etc. Where creeds come in is in attempting to comprehend and define an incomprehensible or unknowable and indefinable something. The world has tried that for thousands of years without any other success than to kill out the "baby" Gods. I have tried it all my life and, failed, and of course that should end the matter.(?) Having failed in that, suppose we take the world as we find it and make the most of it, giving others a lift as we go along. Give the Gods, the Jew and the priesthood a rest. Or let those only bother with the nature of God and what the Jews thought, who think it worth while.

But says Prof. Loveland, if that is the program, let Noumenon go with the rest. But let any man attempt discussing the world either in itself or as to its origin without a common source and "nature" in all things. To do so is to fall into all manner of jumble and end at total skepticism. Let Prof. Loveland try discussing the world without using the terms Nature, Matter, Spirit, Humanity and the like. Indeed, let those who so strenuously object to our discussing the world with reference to an unknowable Being or Noumenon, of which the world is the phenomenon, give us a better way. And remember we can't let them use their "baby" gods which are equally unknown. They must confine themselves strictly to the individual or thing, and what they do. When they are denied the use of their baby gods they will then be in position to appreciate the necessity of a full-grown God such as Being or Noumenon.

GOOD NEWS.

From the Secretary of the N. S. A.

To the Editor and Friends:—You have all doubtless learned all about the last N. S. A. convention at Cleveland, and its grand success financially, and in point of business and harmony, so there seems to be little more for me to say in this connection. But even at the risk of repetition, I cannot refrain from making special mention of the beautiful and touching gift of the valuable watch and chain of our arisen sister, Mrs. Caroline Hilligoss, who left it to the Mayer fund of the N. S. A., and which was brought to the convention by Dr. Hilligoss from Indiana, and there disposed of for one hundred dollars in the interest of the N. S. A. home. The silk quilt donated by Mrs. Nelson, of California, brought twenty dollars to the fund; there is no doubt that it was worth a great deal more, but we had so many articles to sell, and as we could not dispose of any by shares, we had to do the best we could, with these things. The lovely table-cover donated by a Nebraska lady, brought the association, twenty-nine dollars, this and the quilt being bidden for and secured by a member of our board, also a resident of the good and loyal state of Nebraska.

Immediately upon the adjournment of the convention, the N. S. A. board went into active session, and until midnight of October 19 formulated plans and laid out work for the advancement of the cause during the coming year. Several special missionaries were appointed, among them Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, of Jamestown, N. Y. These two good workers are to spend much of their time this season in the state of Indiana, and will be engaged in helping to strengthen local societies, organize new ones, advance the cause of Spiritualism generally, and give teaching and demonstration of its truth and claims. They are authorized to work financially, and in every line for the N. S. A. We trust our Indiana friends will give them a hearing, and aid them in their good work in every possible way.

I have also the pleasure of announcing that President H. D. Barrett is to keep in the missionary field this year, and this is proof that the N. S. A. is mindful of the public needs, and will respond to them. Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing will serve as a special missionary during a portion of the year, in the South.

A good friend of Comanche, Texas, Mr. J. I. McCarty, writes of the work and needs of the N. S. A. in a most helpful manner. I have mentioned his good work in former letters. This brother sends another ten dollars to this association, and renews his offer to be one of a thousand Spiritualists to give ten dollars a year to the N. S. A. to aid it to go on with its organizing, missionary and propaganda work in Spiritualism. Who will be the next to fall into line?

And now for my final and grandest piece of good news. You who have kept track of the Mayer fund, and my letters, know that Mr. S. L. France, of Massachusetts—I do not say what town, as we do not wish the dear old friend overwhelmed with begging letters—gave two former donations, one of a thousand dollars, and one of eight hundred dollars to the fund. While we were in board meeting, Saturday, Oct. 20, I received a letter from this good and noble soul, stating that as he wishes to see the home well established, he had drawn a check to me for three thousand dollars, for the N. S. A., and would send it to me as soon as I returned to Washington. You may imagine our rejoicing, and the hearty telegram of recognition immediately dispatched to Mr. France. The check is here, and we are blessing the donor.

LAND OF SPIRITS.

He Learns More About the Unknown.

S. Burd, who attended the National Spiritualist Society meetings at Cleveland, last week, has returned to his native heath more thoroughly a believer than ever before, if that were possible. Mr. Burd has been a Spiritualist for a number of years. He is a stockholder in the Lake Brady Association of Spiritualists, and is known to mediums and others active in the faith far and wide as their friend and supporter. Mr. Burd's belief is not the result of a single seance or a midnight dream, but has come after the maturest consideration and thorough investigation.

Mr. Burd says that the most marvelous of his experiences at the test meetings was a spiritual communication with the late Valentine Eckert, of Canal Fulton, who was killed during the past year by being accidentally shot by ex-Marshal Ford. "When the first mention of this affair was made to me," said Mr. Burd, "I protested that I had never known of it. I was spiritually informed that Mr. Eckert had met his death accidentally at the hands of Mr. Ford, who was shooting at a dog, but I could not recollect any accident of that kind. To the last I maintained that there was a mistake somewhere, but upon my arrival home I learned that the killing really had taken place. No one can tell me that the medium had been previously informed of this affair. I know that the true medium does not need information from temporal sources."

Some of Mr. Burd's friends suggested to him that if he had been in Massillon to witness the exhibition of Magician Maro, at the Armory, his views concerning Spiritualism might have undergone a great change. He replied that nothing could change his position; that while he admitted that many frauds were practiced, he knew that the real Spiritualism was honesty itself. "Why," said he, "the other night a woman who was a complete stranger to me called at my home to ask for information as to a house I had for rent. As I stood talking to her she remarked, 'You must have lost a child; I hear a voice calling 'papa,' 'papa.' That woman was a genuine Spiritualistic medium. She had never seen or heard of me before, yet the unseen forces were present to inform her of the fact that I had a child on the other side."

"The great beauty of the Spiritualistic belief," continued Mr. Burd, "is the absolute freedom from fear of death that a man enjoys. It matters not whether we die to-day, to-morrow, or a score of years hence, we know whither we are going and that we will be happier than we ever were here."—Independent, Massillon, Ohio.

THE SPIRIT WORLD.

Home and Its Beauties—Progress in the Future Life.

Within every vital organism there is an invisible side lying beyond the realm of physical apprehension. It eludes the laboratory of the chemist, it laughs at the scalpel of the anatomist, it scorns our yard stick and all other physical appliances, and yet so real is it, that it is the only enduring side of organized life, and so near is it, you cannot separate it from it.

We need neither go down or up to find other modes of being. Nor is it necessary that the soul cut loose from its prison house of clay, should ascend or descend to reach this Spiritual universe. As the tree has its invisible life-force, as the rose has its aroma, so this universe is everywhere enveloped by its invisible Spiritual universe, real, permanent and substantial. So this invisible side has in its more refined and Spiritual sense, plants and flowers. There birds of brilliant plumage float in ambient air, singing sweetly through the long summer days. There wooded cliffs look out upon the sea, and glassy lakes turn up their crystal lips to meet the kisses of the moon.

Bro. Davis, Swedenborg and other seers claim to have seen all that we have here intimated.

1. They tell us that it is a world dotted with homes, as we dot this world with homes for ourselves and those we love. I am glad to believe that this is true. When I look over this earth, I see this love for home threading like a silver thread of light through all departments of life. Even the little ant toils to build its mound. The beaver is a home-builder. The bird, too, is a home-builder; it builds its nest for its young.

All animal life seems to find some sacred spot, some it consecrates. It may be beneath the shade of a generous tree, or on the banks of a flowing stream; it may be in some spot where a crystal spring bubbles forth to slake its thirst, or it may be a cavern temple unthinking nature has left in the rocky cliff with doors ajar. Home-building is the instinct of the animal and the aspiration of man. The poor savage will select some spot where with boughs and bark of trees, he can shelter his dusky babe from sun and storm. The tired peasant never gets so weary in his terrific struggle in labors' ceaseless battle-field that he will not seek in the deepening twilight, some humble cot, where the vines creep up toward the lowly roof, and half-clad children watch for his coming.

If there is one being above another for whom my heart yearns with tenderest pity, it is the one who has no home. To me the man or woman who is homeless is like a wandering bird, cut off from all its kind. Home is a poem, a benediction, a prayer; home is the dream love has on earth of the glories that await it in heaven. Did you ever think that man is the only creature who is dissatisfied with the home that he builds? He always has an ideal before him, hence the form and style of material of his home constantly changes. The first beaver and the last build the same. The swallow of to-day and the swallow of a thousand years past build their homes precisely alike. The first eagle and the last hatch their young in the same form of nests. But man's home is progressive. Parolythic man made his home in the caves; Neolythic man built his poor hut from the unpolished bark and limbs of trees.

As civilization moves onward, homes become more artistic and beautiful. If in our present state of knowledge man is enabled to build his cottage so fair, what beauty and skill will be displayed in home-building on the other side. How many busy hands are building at this moment homes for us there. They are doing for us perhaps at this moment a labor of love, as the expectant mother prepares with deft fingers the garments for her unborn child.

2. The law of association obtains there as here. In hades or soul-land, the relations born of friendship or family are maintained with renewed force and vigor. It is not an Oneida community or a soulistic monstrosity where everything is in common and nothing in particular.

Special and personal friendships there blossom into their most perfect flower. The pictures of Damon and Pythias are no longer an idle dream. On those serene heights where the dead abide, disembodied souls know the depth and meaning of Platonic love. They know what it is to rise above sex impulse and passion and blend together in unselfish union, as the fleecy clouds meet and blend in the hour of twilight. Nor does love escape its more earthly and human manifestations. Families are bound together by deathless ties. The maternal heart beats there for her child as on earth.

"The mother meets in that tranquil sphere,
The delightful child she has wept for here.
And we quaff of the same immortal cup,
While the orphan smiles and the slave looks up."

Father-love, mother-love, husband-love, and wife-love continues to burn and glow in hades more perfect and beautiful.

In this world we judge of the value of particular places and locations by the societary privileges they offer. The schools, churches, literary culture, morality and integrity of the inhabitants are all taken into account in our estimate of it. This being true in this life, what social wealth there must be for you and me in hades or soul-land. There dwell the wise and good of every nation and clime. What company for the philosopher! Who would not yield every dream of earthly bliss for the society of Socrates, Plato, Descartes and our own Emerson? What poet would not delight to sit at the feet of Homer, Goethe and Shakespeare and listen to the fresh melodies they breathe? What statesman would refuse to exchange earthly honors for the society of Solon, Lycurgus or our Washington or Lincoln? There dwell the world's poets, musicians, artists, philosophers, statesmen and philanthropists. Hence, all that pertains to the social life of man may find in hades its largest, truest and deepest expression.

3. The Spiritual philosophy affirms in direct opposition to the theology of our time that the law of progress obtains in hades or soul-land as in this world. Evangelical Christianity declares that all progress ceases at death. "As the tree falleth so it lies." This is the foundation-stone of modern orthodoxy. It affirms that our future life, its happiness or misery, depends wholly and entirely upon what we believe in this life. The Spiritual philosophy protests against this narrow and unsatisfactory view of hades. It says we have the same opportunity and perhaps greater for growth on the other side than we have in this life. It affirms there is not a hell so deep that the divine love cannot penetrate it.

There is not a soul so low that it may not rise to higher heights of being. All hells are temporary and conditional. There never was, and never will be a special and local hell where damned souls dwell in a sea of fire. Such hells exist only in the distorted minds of ignorant and vindictive priests, who use them to frighten reluctant sinners into the folds of the church.

We carry to hades or soul-land our hells and heavens with us. We build them by our lives here. Wherever hate, envy, jealousy, avarice and lust reign, there is hell.

Look into the bloated face and bleared eyes of the drunkard; look at the blanched cheek of the poor unfortunate prostitute; look at the pinched face of the miser, and you shall see in each the shadow of hell.

We need not go to hades to find hell, unlock the door of the millionaire's castle and you will often find it.

Hell is not a public domain, it is a private and personal estate; it is a hidden and ungarnished chamber in the soul.

I remember to have once read of a wealthy merchant who purchased an old English castle as a home. It was an estate which had been occupied by the English nobility since James sat on the gorgeous throne of England.

The increasing family of the merchant demanded additional room, and an architect was called to enlarge the old castle. He came and made extensive measurements of the building, then went into the merchant's office and said: "Sir, why do you ask me to enlarge this house when there is a room now you do not occupy? I have been measuring these walls and rooms, and from the most careful measurements I can make, in yonder chamber there is a hidden room you have not found."

The fact was revealed to the merchant's wife, whose woman's curiosity demanded he find the secret room at whatever cost. Whereupon they went with the necessary help into the ancient chamber and began to cut away the wall. Soon the concealed door was revealed. They turn the door upon its rusty hinges, and the merchant's wife faints at the sight before her.

There in a room furnished with all that wealth can contribute, a table loaded with the richest viands; crouched in a corner is the eyeless skeleton of a man, and lying on a costly sofa the bones of a woman, who had died in the hidden room. Excitement now rose in the neighborhood to fever heat. No one could at first recall the history of the hidden room.

At last it was learned that this ancient castle was at one time occupied by a proud nobleman, who doubting the fidelity of his wife, decoyed her and her paramour into this room, loaded the table with the richest viands, each of which contained a deadly poison, then locked the door and walled them in that nothing might be left to tell of their death, while busy rumor reported they had eloped.

We shall all carry our hidden rooms, our hells to hades. There will be no secret rooms in the chamber of the nobility there. In hades souls suffer as here, but the door to progress is open before them. They have an eternity in which to grow. What encouragement, what hope in this thought for you and me! What if our progress is slow, there is an eternity before us! What if we are misguided to-day, in one of those golden to-morrows, hurrying with winged feet to meet us, we shall be known as we are. What if the hand of disappointment does rest cold and hard, it cannot forever chain us. What if love does weep for an hour over the cruel wounds she has received, there is an eternity in which they may heal. What matters it, my brother, if your home is humble, your wife and children poorly clad; what if you do have to work in summer's sun and winter's storm, with no holidays, no rest for your tired feet, you will have another chance in hades, soul-land. The contest will not be as uneven then as now. There are no walls of castle, of creed, of wealth or of sect in soul-land.

Is your sight dim, cheer up; your vision shall be opened there! Are your ears heavy, wait a little longer and sound shall be restored. Soon shall you hear the musical beatings of the infinite heart over the crystal sea of life! Has age plowed furrows in your cheeks, withered your limbs, dried your blood and dimmed your eyes? Grieve not! The faded rose shall return again. You shall walk again with nimble feet.

Angels are at this moment holding up torches to your eyes so you can see over the willow-fringed river the white gates that open into the eternal city beyond.

Mother, has baby's eyes been hushed to sleep by the sighing breath of death? Weep not. Your darling child shall wake again, and play with childish glee on the verdant lawns of hades, the world forever beautiful.

Who can measure the hope this thought of eternal progress kindles in the soul! How grand to live! How gloriously grand to die! I tremble with joy when I think what we may become! If a babe can grow into a philosopher, statesman, scientist or orator in one brief life, what vast possessions will hades or soul-land give!

CREEPING UP THE STAIRS.

A recitation given by Arzella C. Clay, of Grand Rapids, Mich.

In the softly falling twilight
Of a weary, weary day,
With a quiet step I entered
Where the children were at play.
I was brooding o'er some trouble
That had met me unawares,
When a little voice came ringing:
"Me is creeping up the stairs."

Ah! it touched the tender heart-strings,
With a breath and force divine,
And such melodies awakened
As mere words can ne'er define,
And I turned to see our darling,
All forgetful of my cares,
When I saw the little creature
Slowly creeping up the stairs.

Step by step she bravely clambered,
On her little hands and knees,
Keeping up a constant chattering,
Like the magpies in the trees,
Till at last she reached the topmost,
When o'er all her world's affairs
She delighted, stood a victor
After creeping up the stairs.

Fainting heart! behold an image
Of man's brief and struggling life,
Whose best prizes he must capture
With an earnest, noble strife—
Onward, upward, reaching ever;
Bending to the weight of cares;
Hoping, fearing, still expecting,
We go creeping up the stairs.

On the steps may be no carpet;
By the sides may be no rail;
Hand and feet may often pain us,
And the heart may almost fail;
Still, above there is the glory,
Which no sinfulness impairs
With its rest and joy forever,
After creeping up the stairs.

PREVENTED AND CURED.

THE BLIND SEE...  THE DEAF HEAR.

BY THE GREAT EYE RESTORER AND ONLY CATARRH CURE.

ACTINA is a marvel of the nineteenth century, for by its use the Blind See, the Deaf Hear and Catarrh is impossible. Actina is an absolute certainty in the cure of Cataracts, Pterygiums, Granulated Lids, Glaucoma, Amaurosis, Myopia, Presbyopia, Common Sore Eyes or Weakened Vision from any cause. The author says: "Each individual partakes of both physical and mental or spiritual ailment for himself. Each one must digest their various kinds of food for themselves, and that is all they can possibly do whether they be priest or layman, teacher or pupil. My physical expands by virtue of that food and nourishment of which I individually partake and digest. My soul must expand by virtue of the soul essence which I individually gather and comprehend or digest." For sale at this office.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

An entertainment will be given, Thursday, Nov. 15, by the Englewood Spiritual Union at Forbes' Hall, 420 W. Sixty-third street, under the auspices of the Ladies' Auxiliary, entitled "A White Evening." The exercises will begin at two o'clock in the afternoon, continuing through the evening. The hall will be beautifully decorated with the society's colors (white and yellow), also flowers. Ten little folks, dressed in colonial style will seat the people. A most interesting program will be given from 3 to 5, following with an intermission for social greetings and dainty lunch served for all who wish to partake. The evening exercises will open a 8 o'clock with a fine musical program, a short play entitled, "Widow Jones' Boarding House," closing with tableaux, after which ice cream and cake will be served. It is the intention of the Ladies' Auxiliary to give an entertainment every month throughout the winter, and all may confidently look forward to a grand good time.

The following comes from Amesbury, Mass.: "Just before Mrs. Patrick Sullivan died she dreamed that she saw her soldier son, James, dead in a coffin covered with the American flag. A letter has been received here telling of James Sullivan's death in Japan, on September 3, the date of the mother's dream. He was the first American soldier to enter Tien-Tsin."

Frank T. Ripley writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I only have the Sundays of January, February and March open. My time is all taken for November and December. I can give week evenings during November and December, within one hundred miles of where I am speaking. I would like to go south during January, February and March, New Orleans, La., Atlanta, Ga., preferred. I go from here to Bridgeman, Mich., for the first two Sundays in November. The last two I will be at Owosso, Mich."

The Inter Ocean says: "H. M. Brennecke, of Nashville, Tenn., is in Chicago, searching for his father-in-law, Moses Pearson, who disappeared from his home in Memphis, Aug 22 last. Brennecke was led to come to Chicago because Charles Stone, a colored clairvoyant of Memphis, while in a trance traced the missing man to this city. Pearson is 75 years old, and for a time it was thought he had been murdered. His relatives were induced to consult the clairvoyant, because he was credited with some remarkable visions. The medium told Brennecke that his father-in-law had come to Chicago and registered at the Palmer House under the name of A. W. Walker, on August 25. He also said that the old man had gone to a house in Fourth avenue, now Custom House place. The house, he said, had the name of Mrs. Warner on the doorplate. Further than this the clairvoyant could not trace the missing man. The son-in-law came to Chicago and found that a man had registered on August 25, as A. W. Walker, but further than this could not trace his father-in-law according to the directions given by the medium."

Course of five public lectures on the following days at 8 p .m.: Tuesday, November 13; Friday, November 16; Tuesday, November 27; Friday, November 30; Tuesday, December 4. Public question meetings on Saturday, November 17, and Saturday, Dec. 1, at 3 p. m. The Wednesday night meetings are for Theosophists only. The dates are, November 14, November 28, December 5. At 6558 Stewart avenue, on the following Mondays at 3 p. m. and 8 p. m.: November 26, December 3 (public lectures), subjects to be selected; Monday, November 12, for Theosophists only. At Woodlawn, Sunday night, November 25, at 8 o'clock, Universalist church, Kimbark avenue, near Sixty-fourth street, (public lecture), subject, "After Death States." At the same place, two public lectures on Thursday night, November 15, and Thursday night, November 22. At 6115 Woodlawn avenue, Thursdays, November 29 and December 6, (for Theosophists only). At Hyde Park, 5427 Washington avenue, Friday, November 16 at 3 p. m. Public question afternoon. Three public lectures on the following Saturday nights at 8 o'clock: November 10, subject, "What Theosophy Does For Us." November 24, "Prayer." December 1, "The Sight that Conquers Space." Mrs. S. E. Tripp writes: "Owing to sickness in family, it will be impossible for me to go to St. Louis and other cities to give a series of materializing seances as requested. I will continue my seances at my home, 207 30th street, Chicago."

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

The Monitor of San Francisco, Cal., says: "The death of the founder of the 'Thirteen' or Anti-Superstition Club in London recalls the fact that the starting of that club brought out, in answer to the secretary's polite request for patronage, the superstitions of many leading men and women. To begin with, the Queen is very superstitious, and believes in a score of old signs and warnings, even though she is precluded from exchanging private confidences with 'the woman next door,' and could not visit a fortune-teller on the quiet, even if her life depended on it. When the Prince and Princess of Wales were married, one of her Majesty's greatest concerns was about the proper pelting of an old boot after the bridal carriage. Parnell's nature was fearfully superstitious. He fully believed in certain colors, lucky days, and a hundred other things familiar to every old woman in Ireland."

H. F. Arnold writes from Burr Oak, Mich.: "The Burr Oak Spiritual Association held two large and very interesting meetings at the Opera House, Sunday, October 28, the speaker being the State missionary, Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit. Her lectures were of the highest type of inspiration and decidedly out of the sermon order. The church people attended largely in the afternoon and left their own services to come in the evening. Her descriptions were nearly all recognized, and she has aroused the greatest interest among outsiders. Several additions to our membership have been made, and the workers all feel inspired to go forward in the work, and hope she may soon return to us. She wins the hearts of orthodox church members and materialists alike. At the business meeting, Sunday, Mrs. Belle D. Himebaugh was elected president, the other officers being re-elected."

W. B. Ketcham writes: "I am greatly pleased with The Progressive Thinker, for it brings comfort to sorrowing hearts."

Lou E. Johnson, secretary, writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "Frank T. Ripley has just closed his engagement with the Grand Rapids Spiritual Association for the month of October. He gave many spirit messages to strangers which were recognized. He also gave his services to the Ladies' Aid for three weeks, for which it was truly thankful. On October 21, a message service was given, which filled the hall."

Emma J. Huff writes: "Brother Wright made a mistake in his article, saying the Lake Helen Camp, Fla., would open in January and continue to the last of March. There will be Sunday meetings all winter, and doubtless entertainments many evenings, as quite a large number of persons are going in November, and the hotel will be open about the 15th; but the regular yearly session does not commence until February 5, and continues until March 19. Mr. Wright will be on the ground all winter. Perhaps it would be well to make a note of these facts in your paper, as it would not be well to mislead the people about the time of the regular meeting."

R. Spalding, formerly of this city, writes from Owatonna, Minn.: "Mr. E. Easton, an old subscriber and a neighbor of ours, gets The Progressive Thinker. Perhaps you would like to know something about him. He is an old veteran Spiritualist, now in the eighties, and very smart for one of his years. How is it, are Spiritualists longer lived than other people? I know of many who are old in years, but retain all their powers. Have we found the 'Elixir of Life,' or do we live nearer to nature's laws; but I digress. I wish to talk about the paper. It was a birthday gift from my daughter, and I do not like to miss a copy. What an elegant gift a year's subscription to the best paper printed in the cause of religious freedom! The time for gifts for the holidays is close at hand, and if each subscriber will present a friend with a paid subscription to The Progressive Thinker for a year, it will enable ten thousand more people to think, and strengthen your hands in the great work in which you are engaged. There are but a very few Spiritualists in this priest-bound city. Mr. Eaton, referred to above, was the first one to unfurl the banner here, and is still doing much to help along the cause. He took me in his carriage recently to the banner farm in Steel county, and just outside the city limits, the home of another subscriber to your paper, Hon. G. W. Buffem. He has a medal from the Chicago World's Fair exhibit for the best specimen of wheat in the world—another inducement to take The Progressive Thinker. His good wife is doing quite a missionary work scattering Spiritual literature among her friends. They have an ideal home and farm, and I can report, that if Spiritualists are few, they are among the best of the citizens."

Dr. L. P. Griggs writes: "The Progressive Thinker comes to me every week laden with many good things. Brother Peebles' address at the National Convention in Cleveland, has the ring of true Spiritualism in it, and should be carefully read by every one into whose hands your valuable paper falls."

N. Ewan writes: "The officers of the Independent Spiritual Society have withdrawn from the same, but the meetings will be continued under the supervision of G. N. Kinkead."

J. R. Nichols writes from Salt Lake City, Utah: "I never saw Rev. Joel A. Smith till yesterday, and did not know who he was till after hearing him deliver one of the finest funeral discourses I ever heard. He officiated at the funeral of a kindly old lady, 'Auntie' Thomson, who has been a medium for years, and loved by everybody. Well, Smith delivered a discourse of such a nature that all who did not know him wondered who that Spiritualist speaker was. By numerous illustrations he showed that we did not have to wait for some far-off general resurrection before we could meet and converse with those gone before, but could do so right now. He showed up very finely that creeds, beliefs, etc., did not count, but acts, works and deeds make the next state of existence happy or unhappy. He portrayed the happy home that Aunty had gone to; that she had prepared by her kindly life of good deeds here. Mr. Smith will be outside of the church inside of three years."

Mr. Luey Sweitzer writes from Alicеville, Kan.: "A Spiritualist camp association was organized at Neosho Falls, Kan., known as the Neosho Falls Spiritualist Camp Association. It was organized October 18, 1900, by Mrs. L. A. Ma Bee and Mrs. Laura B. Payne, who have given lectures here for the past week, with the assistance of Mrs. Inez Wagner as test medium. Officers were elected as follows: President, Rev. Mrs. L. A. Ma Bee; vice-president, Rev. Laura B. Payne; secretary, Luey Switzer; treasurer, Warren Miller; representative at large, Inez Wagner. The association will hold its first annual camp-meeting in Riverside Park, Neosho Falls, from September 6 to 24 inclusive, 1901."

J. W. Dennis writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "The Lyceum (Buffalo's only Lyceum) held at the First Church Temple, under the motherly care of Mrs. Mattie Hull, is the most perfectly managed Lyceum that has been held here. It is held at the close of the forenoon services each Sunday, and it attended by about fifty-five or sixty scholars. Mrs. Hull acts as though she was a mother to all the youngsters in her classes under her care. The attendance of adults is about as many in numbers as there are little ones. Last Saturday Mrs. Hull invited the whole class of children to visit her in a social way to partake of ice cream and other refreshments that children like so well; and let it be remembered that these children will never forget the kindness and care that this good woman has bestowed upon them, even after they have grown to man and womanhood and are scattered all over the known world as they will be."

Mrs. Geo. H. Brooks writes: "We had a very large attendance at our social Thursday evening, October 18. There was a great interest manifested by all. Each one had a most enjoyable time. We are greatly encouraged. Our membership list is growing larger daily. Our Sunday afternoon and evening meetings are full of interest along progressive lines, and cannot fail to reach every inquiring mind. The outlook for our winter's work is fine and inspiring. Will O. Hodge will be with us one more Sunday. We have found in him a most conscientious worker, a fearless speaker for the cause of Spiritualism. No better field of labor exists for practical Spiritualism than Englewood, and we know that from the present outlook we are quite likely to outgrow the limits of our hall."

The New York Journal has the following from Wichita, Kansas: "Miss Bessie Brown, a young woman prominent in church circles, and heir to a fortune, says she is wedded to the ghost of her betrothed, who was killed two years ago. In a house unoccupied by any other living person save herself, Miss Brown is now spending, she says, the first days of her married life, her honeymoon with her ghostly husband. The house is furnished throughout for two. There is a dining-room, with two chairs at the table, a bedroom for herself and her phantom husband. There is a closet for his clothes and in this are even hung the clothes worn by him before he died. Miss Brown lives at Cameron. She is not insane, at least say the Spiritualists from all parts of the country, who have been called in to examine her case. Two years ago she was engaged to John Allen, a promising young man of Cameron. Three weeks after the engagement was announced Allen was killed in a railroad wreck. The young woman's cheeks lost color from the day they brought Allen home a corpse. She visited his grave day after day, spending hours there in tears. Her parents tried in every way to console her. But a more helpless melancholy settled over her day by day. Suddenly there was a complete change in her bearing, as if she had awakened and discovered the death of her lover to have been only an ugly dream. She returned home with her face transfigured with joy. Her parents were alarmed. They feared she had lost her mind. She noticed the troubled look in their faces, and said, smiling: 'Do not worry, my dear parents. I have not lost my senses at all, but John's ghost has returned to earth to comfort me. I will not be sorry any more. True to her word, they saw no more sadness in her face. She smiled as brightly did she the day of their engagement. A few weeks ago she told her parents that she had promised to marry the ghost of her lover. They protested, but in vain. She wanted enough money to buy a fine house, but her father told her it was all foolishness, so she rented a five-room cottage. She had it furnished in sumptuous style and two weeks ago moved into it, announcing that the wedding had taken place, and thereafter she would live with her husband."

Address G. W. Kates and wife at 58 Royalston avenue., Minneapolis, Minn. They have one or two open weeks next summer for other camp engagements.

Reporter writes: "The fondest expectations of the members of the First Spiritual Church of Chicago (and that means much) were more than fulfilled at the dedication held last Sunday evening at their new hall, corner of Oakwood and Ellis avenues. The affair was characterized by a crowded hall. Potted palms and beautiful cut flowers greeted the eye on every hand and reflected in its fullest sense the 'Symbol of Love'—pastor and congregation in perfect accord. The dedicatory address was delivered by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, and met with well-deserved enthusiasm. The speaker, always interesting, was more than impressive on this occasion. It was, as she said, a dedication of the soul everlasting, rather than the perishable walls of a lifeless structure. Mrs. Lucinda B. Chandler followed Mrs. Richmond in a few well-chosen remarks, which were received, as her words always are, with the spirit of love in which they are uttered. Her sweet voice and the peaceful expression of her face told the story of perfect soul harmony. Another happy feature of the exercises was the singing of Mrs. Grace Frazer, consisting of two solos, one of which was 'The Holy City,' the rendition of which filled the hearts of the audience with a deep inspiration. Another to whom the congregation is indebted for the success of its musical feature, is Mr. Charles Quinlan, of Evanston, who rendered a violin solo, which captured the audience. A noteworthy thing is the fact that the violin was Mr. Quinlan's own make. The closing exercises consisted of spirit messages by the pastor, under control of 'Mayflower.' It would be paying the worthy pastor no undue compliments to say that in the spiritual as well as in the material world, that the good things were always reserved for the last. It was the desert of a genuine spiritual treat; every emotion of the audience was reflected in the earnest manifestations. The benediction following, witnessed the closing of one of the most successful meetings ever held in the city."

Mrs. Mary J. Thomas writes: "How much there is for us to learn in this world of cause and effect. How much there is to study, even if we do not look inside of a book. What vast fields of observation we find written in that grandest of all books, Nature. Really we do not know where to draw the line between God and nature. If we would seek God and perfect happiness we must place ourselves in harmony with nature and divine laws. We realize that there is no one perfect, but that we are all in different grades of earthly experiences, and that each one is perhaps passing through that which is most necessary to bring out the highest good in his or her nature. We do not need to go back a number of centuries to reach the highest truths that God reveals to his children. The truth has been in the world all the time; it has only been covered up through the erroneous teaching and prosecutions of the past. Let us not only try to be good and do good, but let us also try to help others to a better understanding of life and its duties."

Mattie E. Hull writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "The work has been taken up earnestly in this city the present season. Mr. Hull resumed his labors for the First Spiritual Church the first Sunday in October. The audiences are large and constantly increasing. The lyceum work has not received so much encouragement since I have been here as at present. The membership roll is increasing rapidly; the leaders are thoroughly alive to the work, and the children are doing their best in every department. Last Sunday Mr. Hull's class numbered about fifty. In addition to the First Spiritual Church, and Lyceum, which is now an auxiliary, we have an active woman's society, known as 'The Helping Hand.' It is instituted for just such work as the name implies. We are looking forward to a most pleasant and profitable season. The utmost harmony prevails among the officers and members of the various societies, and the cause is demanding attention from scores who are not numbered with us."

G. Warster writes from Lafayette, Ind.: "The Spiritualists of Lafayette wish to say that after the meeting held at the Assembly Hall at the Soldiers' Home, and also the meeting held at the famous Tecumsie Trail by Harry I. Moore and J. K. Hilles, of Chicago, we, the Spiritualists of the city, persuaded our good brothers to hold meetings near, so that those that could not go out to the Home could benefit by their good work, hence a meeting was held at Mr. Jacobs', who resides at the old Hospital Home, and it must be said that the meeting was a success. Those present of national prominence were Prof. J. Stanley Grimes and the Rev. Mr. Switzer, of the M. E. Church, and they both expressed their approval of the sermon and spirit messages. Mr. Moore took the position in his dissertation that the Word of God meant Mediumship, and the Man of God meant a Medium. Both Mr. Grimes and Rev. Switzer recognized spirit messages given by and through the mediumship of Mr. Hilles. We all join in wishing success to the Moore-Hilles disseminators and hope they will very early return to Lafayette again."

Scribe writes: "A reception was given to Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, in the Unitarian Church, Minneapolis, upon their return from the N. S. A. Convention, Tuesday evening, October 30. The reception was extended by the State Association. As its missionaries, these workers are busily engaged in the field and had to pass through Minneapolis on the above stated evening. The large church was well filled, although the evening was a very stormy one, showing the popularity of those worthy advocates of our cause. President Maxwell being absent, sent a letter saying that the State Association intended to settle Mr. and Mrs. Kates in Minneapolis for local work during the winter. The attempt will be made to unify all of the local Spiritualists into a concerted movement for a strong work. At the reception Mr. Kates reported results of the N. S. A. Convention and showed the good results there augur well for progress. His report was much enjoyed by the people, who hope to see the Spiritualists united in good effort. Mrs. Kates gave some excellent spirit descriptions and interesting remarks. Will J. Erwood, a rising young speaker, gave a spirited address. Max Hoffman gave tests in his usual forcible manner. Mrs. C. D. Pruden gracefully presided. The music was good and the flowers beautiful. It was quite an event for Minneapolis. Much enthusiasm exists here in the proclamation by the N. S. A. of Minnesota as the banner State. We hope to hold the honor and be worthy of it."

Mrs. L. Le Sieur writes: "The members and workers of the Band of Harmony wish to make an especial appeal to friends and visitors to bring their luncheon with them for their supper. The Band of Harmony provides only the tea, coffee, sugar and cream. The sum of ten cents is charged each person (bringing their luncheon) for their tea and coffee. We have been having steadily increasing numbers in attendance for the past two months that tax us to the utmost to accommodate; and when from twenty to forty people come, and do not bring any provisions, we find it very embarrassing, as there is not sufficient food for them. Under the circumstances we are obliged to go out and buy bakery stuff, which is never satisfactory, and does not bring sufficient return to help pay our rent and other expenses. We earnestly solicit your co-operation in this matter, from every one attending our meetings. At our regular meeting, Thursday, November 1, a motion was made and carried that those bringing refreshments should pay ten cents for tea and coffee, while those bringing none, should be charged twenty-five cents for their supper. Our rooms are 608 Handel Hall building, No. 40 Randolph street."

Bertha Sheneman Moore writes: "I feel it my duty to make a few remarks through the columns of your paper in behalf of a brother and sister Spiritualist, Mr. Battles and wife, who are at the Home for Incurables, on Ellis avenue, between Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth streets. Many of our Spiritualists, and especially mediums, will remember Mrs. Battles, formerly Mrs. Minor, who for twenty years or more had a free home and a welcome for all Spiritualists and mediums. At the present time Mrs. Battles is lying very ill, and is wasting away, you might say, for the lack of companionship. I only recently heard of them and called, and my visit seemed to instill new life into her. My heart went out in sympathy to the dear old soul, for her sufferings are almost unbearable, but she longs to go to the beautiful spirit home where there will be no more sorrowing or suffering. I feel that it is our duty as brothers and sisters in the cause of Spiritualism, to do all in our power to help these two dear old souls (who have seen more than four score years) and make their last days on earth as pleasant and as happy as we can."

The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Longhurst will undoubtedly be pained to hear that Mrs. Longhurst is lying near death's door at Providence Hospital, from a fractured hip. The decisions of the physicians are that recovery is impossible. These worthy people are now past three score years and ten, and in needy circumstances. A benefit, social and test seance will be held for them at 77 Thirty-first street, Monday evening, November 12. The best of Chicago talent will be present, including Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, Mrs. Irene Dobson, Mr. and Mrs. Warne and many others. An admission fee of 25 cents will be charged and the entire proceeds given these earnest pioneer Spiritualists. It is hoped that the hall will be crowded. Other workers whom we are unable to name at present in goodly numbers add their testimony of appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. Longhurst by sharing in the evening's program. In the meantime any reader who feels impressed to aid them by sending their mite, be it only ten cents, can do so by addressing the same to Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, pastor of the First Spiritual Church of Chicago. Mr. Longhurst has long been a member of this church, and his many friends out of the city will gladly respond as well as those at home. Mrs. Cooley's address is Flat 1, 98 Thirtieth street, Chicago, Ill. Will speakers and pastors of all Chicago societies please announce this benefit from their platforms Sunday, November 11. Remember the date, Monday evening, November 12, at 77 Thirty-first street."

H. Augir writes: "A few days since I attended a funeral where, in the absence of a clergyman, a layman officiated. The services consisted of singing, and reading the 15th chapter of II. Corinthians, which has 58 verses on the resurrection of the body at the sound of the trumpet. The 52d verse says: 'In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible.' Thessalonians, 1st chapter, 16th verse, says: 'For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout with the voice of the arch-angel, and with the trump of God,' etc. I believe that the majority of the audience of 200 endorsed what was read from the Bible. That the narrative or history of a single individual who lived 1900 years ago, written by questionable authors, in the dark ages, should be taken as true against the combined testimony of all ages and nations, who have seen and conversed with those that have left the tenement of clay, is a marvel to say the least. Not a day passes but thousands see or converse with their loved ones over the river of death, so-called."

The work of Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt during October was highly appreciated by the Unity Society of Spiritualists of Milwaukee. Highly commendatory resolutions were unanimously adopted at the closing meeting, and in view of the increasingly bright and encouraging prospects of Unity Society, Mr. Hewitt was re-engaged for the month of November. His address is 498 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. J. W. Kenyon has been holding meetings in Fitchburg and Leominster, Mass., during October, to large houses. Tests given through her medial powers give great satisfaction. Those converted to a knowledge of immortal life through her demonstration can be counted by the hundreds. During November she holds meetings in Pawtucket, Providence, R. I., and Worcester, Mass. She has open dates. Address her at Onset, Mass., Box 166.

Persons or societies wishing the services of Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A., may address them at 55 Wayne street, Fort Wayne, Ind., until December 1.

Lyman C. Howe writes: "I want Spiritualism sustained and directed by wise, earnest, determined combinations of men, women and angels, without any compromise with dogmatism, theosophy, crazy mysticism, and the personal concepts of cranks and crack-brained adventurers, or defunct myths and graveyard skeletons and ancient superstitions. I hope much from the N. S. A., and your symposium is a valuable factor in evolving the true, good and enduring."

Missionary work in Minnesota:—The following items from Minnesota show that the press of that state is disposed to favorably notice our workers, and they also show that good work is being done. From the LeRoy, Minn., Independent: "Mr. and Mrs. Kates, the Spiritualist missionaries who lectured at the opera house on Thursday and Friday evenings of last week, attracted large audiences on both evenings, and the people seemed to be deeply interested in what they heard about this comparatively new religion. Mr. Kates is a pleasing and fluent speaker, and advances some very logical arguments in favor of his creed. Mrs. Kates is indeed a remarkable woman, a gifted talker and possessed of much personal magnetism. Her test readings were said to be for the most part correct, although on the last evening she was much annoyed by noise. The local Spiritualists have in view the organization of a society."From the Aitkin, Minn., Age: "Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, the Spiritualist lecturers, held meetings at the Episcopal church, from Friday to Tuesday evenings, inclusive. They were advertised for only three nights, but so much interest was taken in their meetings that they were persuaded to prolong their visit to Aitkin a couple of days. This lady and gentleman are not of the sort who travel about the country humbugging the people with sleight-of-hand tricks, palming them off as spirit manifestations. Mr. and Mrs. Kates entertained the people by describing their religion and promulgating its doctrines, which, from a moral point of view are as elevating as those of the more popular creeds. We are not prepared to say that the Spiritualists' claims are true, but we do believe that Mr. and Mrs. Kates are sincere, and are doing much good in the state, because their lectures are full of good moral teachings and they appeal for the most part to people who cannot be reached by the Christian churches. In our opinion any teaching which tends to make people better is commendable, regardless of the source from which it emanates. Mrs. Kates is a remarkable woman. She is an exceptionally good speaker and possessed of a personal magnetism which holds her listeners at rapt attention. In her descriptive work, given at the close of each lecture, she certainly seems endowed with unusual gifts."

A Trying Trip and Double Funeral.

To the Editor:—Just as I was getting settled down for a home season, after a five weeks' absence, a telephone call from Limestone, Pa., started me away again; but meanwhile the "grippe" was coquetting with me in a way to disturb my probabilities, and after the funeral Wednesday evening I returned at the pleasant home of Mr. Schoonmaker to refresh for the coming day; but about 1 a. m., I awoke in a vigorous chill, with a terrible headache, my cerebellum in a vise, and a giant wrenching on the screw, and it just felt as if I "was not long for this world. I sprang from bed and searched my satchel for a box of Spences Negative Powders, which always banish chills; but for the first time in years there were none there. Something must be done, and quickly, too, for we were to have another funeral service in Mansfield the next day, and I must surely be ready to ride 20 miles by rail and 11 miles in a carriage. That chill must be stopped, and that giant must loosen his grip on the vise, and the vise must let go of my medulla oblongata, or there would be another funeral call without a telephone. Back to bed I went for the fight, and attacked the enemy with a weapon given me by my spirit friends fifty-six years ago! It is simple, but wonderful in efficacy. I commenced a deep, vigorous breathing, each breath occupying from 10 to 30 seconds, taking in all the air I could induce to enter my lungs, accompanying it with a vigorous exercise of my toes, ankles, knees, hands and fingers, and rubbing briskly while inviting and receiving the co-operation of spirit friends. In about twenty minutes the chill was gone; a moisture was palpable on the skin; the vise on my head and spinal axis unclasped; the giant that screwed it down went off in disgust, and I telegraphed an invitation to Morpheus to come and "rock me to sleep." The next morning Mrs. Baker and her spirit helpers gave me a treatment, and we proceeded to Ellicottville by rail, thence to Maple, where a second large audience assembled to honor the memory of A. J. Brown, whose early life was spent there. He was a deputy sheriff in Limestone, 51 years of age, loved and honored by all who knew him, and had never been sick until stricken with typhoid fever, and died in eight days! His faithful wife and family relatives are comforted and sustained by the gospel of Spiritualism.

The To-Morrow of Death.

...OR THE...

Future Life According to Science.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY S. R. CROCKER.

A VERY FASCINATING WORK.

This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author is not a Spiritualist—he even mentions Spiritualists as "devotees of a new superstition," etc., etc., in which he manifests the usual animus of the "scientific class," yet he says again: "There is a true and respectable basis in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of Earth," and he goes on to relate instances of fact in evidence. There is, to a Spiritualist, a manifest discrepancy in the author's ideas, but the well-read mind will readily select and arrange the pros and cons, and out of the whole will find not only good mental culture, but much valuable information. The author holds the theory of reincarnation. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

Joys Beyond the Threshold

A SEQUEL TO

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled in the bosom of etherial space. "BEYOND THE TERRESTRIAL" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy; claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. A Compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature.

BY AUGUSTA W. FLETCHER, M. D.

In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well-handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

G. W. P., Ky.: Q. Whenever I sit in a circle I fall to sleep, or seemingly so, awakening without any memory of anything that has been seen or heard by me while in that state. Is it sleep, or what does it mean?

A. It is not true sleep, but the entrance to trance, and the mind not being directed in any particular channel, either remains inactive, or if it receives impressions fails to remember them when aroused. Hypnotic subjects left to themselves fall into the same state. The operator awakens them to active thought by leading them in any desired direction. After repeated trials they are able to do this themselves by taking some object or purpose to investigate before they awake. This correspondent can keep himself from the sleep state in the same manner.

An American Girl: Q. Although I strive to be good, I feel that I am not as good as I ought to be. What can I do?

A. The judgment as to our worthiness and goodness is modified by the ideal we form of true excellence. If that ideal is low, it is easily satisfied. If high it is difficult to attain, and it may be so idealistic that no effort can realize its exceeding righteousness. The fact that there is dissatisfaction at the results, evidences that the ideal is high, almost unattainable. No one is as good as they "ought to be," or there would be no further advance. What shall we do? The way is plain and direct. There is no casting the work on others. None other to pay for us in case we fail. The outcast asks what he shall do to rise to higher planes of thought and living, and the angel in robes of light, self-accusing for neglected opportunities, eagerly inquires how life may be made better and purer.

The answer to all is the same, for all are ascending spirits: Live for the highest. Do that which reflects the spiritual—the eternal. The first law of the material, is "care for self;" the first and fundamental law of the spirit is "care for others," which extended in the spirit-world means "Do all for others." That is the true golden rule.

You care for yourself, preserve your health, increase your knowledge, labor for possessions, that you may be stronger and more helpful to others.

You hold love supreme, and become its radiant center. He whose mind is filled with hate and selfishness becomes not only a center diffusing waves of hate and selfishness, but an attractive center for such influences.

In more particular terms, in the details of life, wait not for great opportunities. There is a life of religion in the effort to make a loaf of perfect bread; in sweeping a room, in the greeting of a friend. Are you good to excellence in the little things, the every-day affairs which tend to exasperate, and drag the spirit in the mire? Are you so trained as to have the thoughts of an angel, while your hands are soiled with irksome duties? Can you smile and return pleasant answer to the tongue of ingratitude and censure? Remember that your standard is not what others say or judge, but your own opinion of yourself.

"A Spiritualist": Q. How can money be best invested to promote the advance of Spiritualism?

A. Briefly, first by the endowment of a great publishing house, such as all the various church denominations maintain. Once the power of the speaker was predominant. The sermon, oration and lecture were the potent means of diffusing knowledge. Now the press is the great leader, and the main influence of the speaker comes from the wide hearing given by the printed report far more than his influence on the limited audience that listens to his words. Spiritual science needs more than any other cause a cheap literature and the means for its diffusion.

Second. By assisting in the publication of a journal which shall rank with the best, and reflect the highest tide of the world of thought in the light of Spiritualism.

Third. By the publication of books, pamphlets, leaflets and tracts pertaining to the cause, at cost. This is done by endowment funds by all the churches, some of them furnishing (as the Swedenborgians) their leading books for the postage, and all make sure of supplying the children of their Sunday-schools with papers, reflecting their peculiar doctrines.

Fourth. By promoting the organization of a bureau of information, of mutual benefit, uniting writers, speakers, mediums and all interested into a brotherhood for one common object, the promulgation of truth and right living. It would also furnish a source of information on all subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, to which all might apply.

Fifth. By connecting therewith a library, reading and circle-room.

Sixth. By prizes and other means stimulating investigation and the development of the ripest thought on this subject.

Seventh. By endowment (or otherwise) securing writers to furnish articles on this subject to the secular press. Such writers would constantly watch for opportunity, to supply articles, and correct misstatements. Few papers that will not now admit articles on Spiritualism if written in a manner that awakens interest, and not antagonism. In this manner a vast host of readers are reached to whom a spiritual journal is unknown, or would not be tolerated. In this matter I write from personal experience, for Spiritualists have constantly for a long series of years, whenever they have seen an opportunity in their local papers, applied to me for articles on certain subjects, or when the cause was assailed, for replies. These contributions have in no instance been refused, and in many instances the editors have written requesting other articles. Of course it is understood that such matter is furnished free, and however devoted writers may be to the cause, there are limits to such gratuitous service. There is ample room for many writers, of diverse talent, in this most useful field which lies outside the sphere of the spiritual journal.

J. D. McIntyre: Q. What is meant by saying we have a spirit guide?

A. The belief in guardian angels is exceedingly ancient, and has been almost universally entertained. Children were taught that they guarded their slumbers. Fostered by this belief, it has come into the minds of some Spiritualists that everyone has a "spirit guide," or those who have more ostentatious views, think they have whole "spirit bands" to look after their welfare. That certain spirits are appointed as guides to certain individuals, or that there are selected "bands" attending others, is a most mischievous error. It cultivates egotism and dependency; both ignoble. The people of the other world have something else to do, than follow someone through life as an intangible shadow. It may be observed that those who boast of the most famous "bands" are those who do nothing to indicate such valuable guidance. The plain truth is that, spirit friends endeavor to influence those near to them, the ties of love and affection bring them near, and when it is possible they impress their ideas and wishes or forewarn of danger. They are not appointed guides; there may be one or many; they may come for an hour, they may remain indefinitely. They hold precisely the same relations that they did or would while in earth-life.

SOMETHING TO LIVE FOR.

Much as our hearts have been stricken with sorrow,
Much as our years have been harassed with pain,
Oft as our loved ones have passed from life's drama,
Can we deny that we'll see them again?
Can we believe that our mortal existence,
Ends for all time when we battle with death?
Can we conceive of the justice or mercy
Of rules causing ego to vanish with breath?

When we have struggled with troubles and sorrows,
When we have ached under crosses and cares,
When we have learned just a few of life's lessons,
Is the reward of our alms and our prayers—
Only oblivion; only destruction?
Only grim death in its sense of despair?
Is there no time when our deeds are rewarded,
And something will show for our virtue and care?

No! There's a time when our hearts are all gladdened;
A day when we stand on the shore of new life;
A day when we glance far ahead in the ages
And know that we've done with temptation and strife.
O'er the Norse "Rainbow Bridge" we are carried by loved ones;
O'er the Styx of the Greeks we're transported in glee;
The land of our loved ones, called dead, is our Eden,
For there are our spirits made happy and free.

For there in glad union we view our departed,
And know our existence was not all in vain;
We see that eternity stretches before us
And ever renews the reward of our pain.
In place of oblivion often expected,
Instead of indefinite judgment in view,
We hear the glad news of eternal progression,
And there, in rejoicing, existence renew. G. W. ASHLEIGH.

What Ought to Be Done.

I have waited patiently since reading the last article by Spirit Franz Petersilea, thinking that some one would write, who has charge of camp-meetings, something that might be a help to others who have that part of the work to look after.

Franz Petersilea says: "If every seance-room could be visited by men of science—exact science—and every medium claiming the gift of being able to make spirit materialize could be subjected to such conditions that fraud would be impossible, very little materializing would be found in the world, and what there was would be genuine and worthy to be placed as a great truth, with exact science."

Do those who conduct these camp-meetings know that their materializing mediums are genuine, and that they are not giving the people impersonation, transfiguration, and using masks, etc., and calling it materialization?

I think like Franz Petersilea, that our trumpet mediums, materializing mediums, and all others that are allowed to do work on the grounds, should be obliged to go under test conditions. I think we would get more converts to our beautiful religion if there were more pains taken, and investigators could feel and know when they went to this or that camp-meeting that it has the reputation of getting the best mediums, and they demand that their trumpet and materializing mediums go under test conditions.

It seems to me there is a great deal of truth in Franz Petersilea's last paper, and that a great deal of good ought to come to the people from reading it, and it ought to be discussed in The Progressive Thinker. Discussions help people to get at the truth of things. I hope we may have a number of good articles on this paper.

ROBERT OWEN.

"The knowledge of the fact that man does not make himself or any of the qualities of humanity, will—when it shall be understood in the full import of this expression, and when its innumerable links in the chain of consequences shall be foreseen, and systematically pursued step by step to their ultimate results—be discovered to be one of the most sublime truths that man has been enabled yet to elicit from thought and reflection for the happiness of his race. It is the turning point between ignorance and knowledge; between vice and virtue; between irrationality and a sound state of mind; between division and union; between all manner of unkind and uncharitable feelings and thoughts and the most unlimited kindness and charity for man and all that has life, as far as the latter is practicable with a superior state of human existence; in fact, between universal strife, degradation, and misery, and cordial union, elevation of character and happiness.

"While man is forced to receive the insane notion that he formed his own qualities of humanity, and especially his own individual qualities, differing, as they are found to do, from every other individual, he can not be made to understand what real charity means; he has no power within him to grasp either its source or its inevitable consequences. If he had been trained to comprehend this subject, he would know that charity could no more be commanded than love or hatred; that charity is alone the result of an accurate knowledge of the mode by which humanity is so wondrously combined in man and woman, and how the character of each individual is formed before and after birth, to the extent that the facts known to man allow him to investigate them. While on the contrary, the imaginary notion, that man forms himself, can believe, disbelieve, and love and hate at his pleasure, shall be forced from birth into the minds of all, and man shall form his religion, laws, governments, and all other institutions upon these errors of the imagination, all real charity must be destroyed; and to command or advise human beings to be charitable, under such instruction and institutions, is as useless as to command or advise them to fly, without first giving them wings with sufficient power to enable them to fly. And when such wings shall be given to them, they will have too much pleasure in the exercise of the power of flight to require either command or advice to use it. So it will be when the human race shall be taught the eternal laws of humanity, when the religion, laws, governments, and institutions, shall be devised in accordance with those laws, and when the character of each individual shall be in unison with them; for them no necessity will exist to command or advise anyone to be charitable; they will be of necessity compelled to have the feelings of charity for all, in its highest and most pure state, and sympathy and kindness for all, will become a permanent instinct of their constitution.

"When society shall be based on true principles, and every character formed in accordance with them, all the inferior qualities hitherto exhibited in human conduct will be overcome, and in future prevented; there will be no cause existing to create pride, ambition, anger, revenge, jealousy, envy, hatred, or malice; or any unkind or uncharitable feeling for the physical, mental, moral, or practical character of any individual. The causes generating these evils, in past and present humanity, will cease to exist, and their removal will destroy the effects which hitherto they have so abundantly produced. By these natural means being adopted to remove the causes generating error in individuals and throughout society, a new spirit, totally unknown in the human character up to this period, will be created and diffused through the whole of society by each one being thoroughly imbued with it.

"Nor will there be any uncertainty in the character of this new spirit, or in the conduct of individuals; their feelings and convictions having been formed in accordance with human nature, it will be known how they will think and act under all the changing circumstances as they may arise. There will be as much certainty in human proceedings, individually and generally, as there has been and is in the general laws of nature, and they will be calculated upon with as much accuracy. It will be known that all will, of necessity, act under every variety of new circumstances in such manner as will the most effectually promote the permanent general benefit, and the happiness of all individuals.

"And not only will all, influenced by this new spirit, act in this manner to their fellow-men, but to all that have life, that happiness may be extended among the animal creation as far as it is practicable with the well-being of the human race; that race being possessed of the most superior organization; for it is natural and best that that which is the inferior and least useful should be subservient to the more useful and superior.

"It is most desirable that there should be the greatest amount of happiness throughout the universe; and why all things constituting the universe, possessing sensation, or the capacity to feel pleasure and pain, are not eternally happy, it is most difficult to answer, except under the conviction that the greatest amount of happiness has ever been experienced that the elements composing the universe are capable of producing; for no intelligent and good power would put limits to the greatest amount of happiness that is attainable. If any power should act otherwise, it cannot be kind, charitable, or benevolent in its qualities. And as pain and misery exist to a greater extent upon this earth, the only rational conclusion—with the facts known—is, that the best that can be done, by the eternal laws of necessity, ever has been, and is now, effected, with the elements of which the earth is composed. When this new character of knowledge, charity and love shall be given to man—and it may be now more easily formed for him than the present character of ignorance, want of charity and love—he will have no inclination to illuse, maltreat, or be cruel to anything having life and conscious sensation; and, in consequence, the animal creation will also become different in character. It will have no fear of man, or suspicion that it will ever be harshly or unkindly dealt by, except when absolutely necessary in self-defence. There will be no cruelty in man's nature; real knowledge of himself, and of the general laws of nature, will, of necessity, create a spirit of universal charity and good feeling for all that has life, and no desire will ever arise to inflict avoidable pain, even upon what appears to our senses the most insignificant of living existences.

"Those fierce and untamable animals which cannot be subdued into friendship for man, or into a condition in which they shall not be injurious to him and his most helpless progeny, must have their races destroyed in order that the earth may be safely and happily enjoyed by the most superior mental and moral existences which have been produced from it. Thus will a terrestrial paradise be formed, in which harmony will pervade all that will exist upon the earth, and there will be none to hurt or destroy throughout the whole extent of its boundaries. And thus will that varied life, formed by the same Incomprehensible Power that has created man, be made to enjoy existence to the extent of the capacity given it to enjoy."

LYCEUM NOTES.

The National Lyceum Spiritualist Association.

The N. S. L. A. held an interesting meeting in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 19th ult., immediately at the conclusion of the last business meeting of the N. S. A. Owing to a lack of representation from the lyceums chartered with the N. S. L. A., we were unable to transact business, consequently there was no election of officers, and as a matter of course, the old officers must hold over until the next annual meeting. The national conductor, vice-conductor, treasurer and secretary were not a little disappointed that they were legally compelled to serve the association another twelve months, but as they had no power to change matters, they rededicated themselves to the work and promised to do everything in their power to aid the lyceum cause the ensuing year.

As there were not enough qualified voters to attend to the business pertaining to the N. S. L. A., the meeting was announced by the president of the N. S. A. On motion of our treasurer, W. H. Bach, the proceedings of the meeting were included in the proceedings of the N. S. A.

The necessity, compelling us to hold our meeting in open convention, gave us the opportunity of presenting the claims of the lyceum to a larger audience than we would have had if the N. S. A. had adjourned and our meeting been subsequently called by the national conductor. The hour was late, every day meeting during the session of the N. S. A. had been long and laborious, the delegates weary, and after raising so much money for the N. S. A., and laying plans for future work, it was not to be supposed we could arouse much enthusiasm for the N. S. L. A. Contrary to our expectations, the remarks of the conductor, the statements of the treasurer, and the appeal of the secretary met with hearty response from the delegates of the N. S. A. Several of the most earnest workers, among them some of the most generous in the ways of giving, addressed the delegates and awakened an enthusiasm that was encouraging and inspiring. The dollars were handed in freely; Mrs. Carrie Hatch was called on by the secretary to assist in receiving the money and names of the donors. In a few moments upwards of fifty dollars were given to the N. S. L. A. Previous to this meeting, an active lyceum worker had presented the secretary with a check of fifty dollars, thus with no expectation of raising funds, eighty-two dollars were put into our treasury. Of course this was a small amount compared to the munificent sums that rolled into the coffers of its parent—the N. S. A., but it was generous on the part of the contributors, as those who were the most liberal in giving on this occasion, were those who had largely given to the "Mayer Home" and missionary funds.

I wish to make an appeal at this time for certificate memberships. We have on hand a large quantity of handsomely printed certificates for adults and children. The adult certificates can be procured for fifty cents. Any person under fourteen years of age sending twenty-five cents will receive one of the children's certificates. Both kinds of certificates bear a gilt seal of the association and are pretty enough to frame. The money received from this source is turned over to the general fund and the same used for the interest of lyceum work.

It has been suggested by some of the best supporters of the N. S. L. A. that we amend the constitution so as to make an individual membership, thus creating a larger voting power in the association. We have learned by past experience that it is impossible to hold a delegate convention. Something must be done whereby we may be enabled to reach the masses in this work. I trust the officers of the N. S. L. A. will consider the matter and be ready to act thereon in the next annual meeting.

The question may arise, "What does the N. S. L. A. want of money?" "What is it doing?" etc.

In answer I would say, there is a demand for literature for the young. A paper should be put into the field devoted to the interest of the lyceum. Not a week passes that many letters do not reach the secretary containing questions as to the possibility of issuing a children's paper. This was the hope of the good brother who handed us the fifty dollars in Cleveland. Others who contributed expressed the same desire. So thoroughly were the national conductor and treasurer and secretary impressed that something of the kind must be undertaken, they held a conference while journeying home, on the day following the closing of the convention. They canvassed the situation thoroughly, and after considering the matter, came to the conclusion it might be possible to publish a monthly devoted to the welfare of the young, in the interest of Spiritualism. In doing this, we did not forget that several of the Spiritualist papers contain a "Children's Department," in every instance most admirably conducted, but we, who are constantly in the children's work, know that a page in a large paper is not as satisfactory as a little paper "all the child's own." In taking this step, some of us know what it means. Perhaps one reason we have reached the conclusion that a paper must be issued under the auspices of the N. S. L. A., is because we have enlisted the interest of some of the best people connected with the N. S. A. We received assurance while in Cleveland from some of these good people that when we needed actual assistance in the lyceum cause, in the promotion of good works they would aid us. What is more needed than books and papers for the young who are with us?

Already we have the promise of literary aid from some of the bright writers among us, among them good sister, Carrie E. S. Twing, who always has something rich and racy for the children. We know of young people in the East who have been schooled in the Spiritualist Lyceum, whose parents are heart and soul with us, who we are told will write for a children's paper; I have nearly secured the promise from Mr. Hull to become a contributor; a good lady in my home city offers to write stories for the children. Last, and perhaps least, the secretary will do her share. She has had a long experience in that kind of work, and will rally her best forces to aid in this enterprise.

Dear reader, will you not take this matter into consideration?

This work does not simply belong to the N. S. L. A.; it is a work that should enlist the co-operation of Spiritualists in all the country. Write to the secretary, tell her how much or how little you can do.

Think of the money paid for juvenile literature in the evangelical denominations. The so-called orthodox Sunday-Schools are considered of primary importance by the managers of the church work. What are the Spiritualists doing for the children and youth whose fathers and mothers are with us? Nothing—positively nothing.

In conclusion, I appeal as a Spiritualist, as one who has had a long experience in children's work, as one who believes in them and knows the longing of their nature, I ask you to consider the question in all seriousness. What are we doing for the children? I do not make this appeal that Spiritualism may receive a boom through the lyceum movement, nor that the N. S. L. A. may achieve any especial honor under its present administration, but in the name of Truth, I ask that we may make an abundant place in our hearts, in our societies, in our work, for the rising generation. As you give to this cause, I thoroughly believe you will be blest in your store, and, better than all, in spiritual things. You and I know that Spiritualism is a fact; let us not only tell it to our children, but live it in generous deeds and with a desire to crown them with the glorious heritage that the angels have so freely given unto us. An Appreciative Letter.

To the Editor:—I have been stopping sometime with Dr. D. Winegarden, and being a patient of his, have had access to his fine library of spiritual works, and chief among the collection of his good books are found the seven premium works offered to subscribers for the paltry sum of $3.35, including a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. This is almost an entire gift of these seven grand books, and I never tire reading them. I have also been a constant reader of The Progressive Thinker since my arrival here, and am well pleased with it, and of its mode of firing such tremendous broadsides into superstition's old hulk as to make the scales fall from the eyes of those long-faced, psalm-singing old moss-backs, and if they will only read and think for themselves they will no longer be haunted by the angry God and Devil of their making. The Progressive Thinker, is one of the cheapest and best spiritual papers published, and I will soon be numbered among your army of readers as a life-long subscriber. I desire to thank you for the many sacrifices you have made and are continually making in the interest of truth, as I see you are not "in it" for the filthy lucre that may accrue therefrom. I again thank you and the angel world for this labor of love manifested in sending forth the seven good books as premiums to subscribers to The Progressive Thinker, at such a marvelously low price. At present I am incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, yet I feel I could accomplish a good work in helping to increase the circulation of The Progressive Thinker, as well as to sell your catalogued books, and particularly the seven fine works alluded to above. This is a priest-ridden country, and the people know comparatively little about the grand truths of Spiritualism, yet if the right plan is followed by right workers, much headway will result, as shown by the works of our fellow co-laborer and zealous advocate of true Spiritualism, Dr. D. Winegarden. I wish to engage in sale of your books, and would like to make the seven premium books a speciality. Kindly state your price per dozen of same. I expect to travel and continue in the work, and will put forth best efforts to increase the circulation of The Progressive Thinker. JOHN B. LEWIS.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

AS I SEE IT.

Spirit, Life, Matter and Spiritual Forces.

The elementary spiritism of nature is the infusion of life forces into all matter, permeating all heights and depths of the material universe. Matter and spirit are eternally wed in the very nature of things. They blend in universal helpfulness of each and all. Spirit is life, and life is but the manifestation of spirit in matter. The withdrawal of sustaining spirit force denotes change in the organism of organic matter, called death, yet certain elements of spirit nature continue its labors, and force, and power, in a new and still useful transformation of the so-called dead. The dead cannot sleep under its reconstructive power. It is not possible for the limited perception of man to discover all the divisions, and sub-divisions of matter and spirit, or all the agencies of a perfect whole in the grand universality of nature. Human sensibilities in the materiality of life has its limits. It can, at best, only send forth inquiring thought, seeking the truth of spirit realities in all the Spiritualism of nature, so grand that it overwhelms every inquiring mind, that recoils back upon itself, in wonder and amazement at what it may discover.

All matter in the realms of endless space, ever was, is now, and ever will be subject to spiritual forces, which constitute the infinite soul of nature. The organic life of nature, perfect in every element, and agency of operative forces, moves all the materiality of worlds, seen or unseen, true to the spirit of its own innate wisdom, that never sleeps, never slumbers, never errs, or makes a blunder; for the will and the law of spirit over all matter is supreme in its own infinite perfection. These operative forces bear witness of themselves, in all that our finite wisdom can conceive, or art and science can discover. The wisdom of man has no power to cast them aside, he cannot ignore them or live less their co-operative aid. Their organic power and wisdom in material construction of all, from the tiny flower to teeming worlds, are ceaseless in their co-operative labors producing new forms, clothe nature with beauty, grandeur and all the sustaining elements that enter into life itself. So far as men knowledge can perceive, his organic self is created with all his nerve senses and an inner consciousness, that serves as a spirit receiver of the spiritual in his material constructed organism.

He is the embodiment of spirit, and nature's wisdom, that has taught him all the knowledge he has yet attained. The religious creeds have given to nature specific deities as its creator, filled them with erring fashions of man, their own ignorance, and stupid failures as a supreme God.

Man in his spiritual observation, saw the morning sunbeam kiss the rosy cheek of fairest flower and fruit, and he, too, caught the holy inspiration of love, and was made better for what he saw. One by one the distinctive sensibilities of his mental nature enters into the knowledge of the truly spiritual, and that inner conscious nature of his soul life expands, and widens in its growth, and man is made better for it. As he approximates towards nature's wisdom in care of himself and enters into the essential labors of life that builds home, feeds, clothes, educates and disciplines himself as a child of nature, studying art, science, true government of himself, he has advanced in civilization and progress. Nature is the sum of it all, man included, as her children.

His flighty imagination and perceptions of nature was too limited to make a god true to his own spiritual attributes and aspiration for a future life. What was temporal and transient with himself, he made infinite and eternal for his God. Feeble in knowledge himself, he clothed his Deity with infinite wisdom. His God was above the maker of man; woman was not in his origin, but an after convenience, when his Gods comprehended his needs, and saw what was convenient to have. Here man stultified the supreme wisdom of his God with his own debauchery. Holy motherhood, ere she had kissed her first-born, passes under divine curse of man's deified and merciless God. The children of a mother's love must be born accurst of God, that a priestly redemption might fasten its clutches upon all the future with its sham, its ignorance, its enslaving power, its murder, its crucified Christs. Let the historic past tell its own tales of religious savagery, of war, of persecution, and wicked deeds of blood. The priestly fiction or falsehood of the fall of man has had on our race all the force and effect of a fact. The biblical tale when once accepted as a truth became the false premise of an enslaving priesthood, that has doubled the damnation of the race. It drew down the curtains of darkness over the windows of the soul, and the light of nature's truths has been slow to dispel this darkness—this religious nightmare, so frightful, with savage gods, devils, and sulphuric hells for man or woman that dare hold up the torch of truth. Every good in the Christian or any other religion is the rays of light nature's truths have poured into the darkness that has covered the intellects of men. King and priestcraft were not without their purpose; foolish as the story is, it has enslaved millions to a religious priesthood, by the inspiration that drove the pen that wrote the pious lie concerning the fall of man with the curse of motherhood and womanhood and child-birth multiplied, with added pains.

The snake that ought to have been cursed and made to crawl upon his belly in dust and east the dirt of the ground, was the pious fraud who forged this religious lie that has added relentless woes to the believing Christians. I would that every true Spiritualist should drink deep of the pure waters of fact, and despise the very appearance of fraud. There is no good but truth, no heaven outside of right act and manly deed. Let will and intent be wed to an exalted love of the right, the pure and the good, that gathers in its folds the sacred rights of all and win from the great storehouse of nature some grand truths, that more splendid light that reveals a glorious immortality for all in the great beyond. It is truth and wisdom in right act and deed, and the adoption of correct methods in course that wins heaven at last. Light, Will and Wisdom, are the needs of the race. It is better than faith, fraud or religious fog, for the trustful saint, or careless sinner—as I see it.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

T. D. Kayner, of Beverly Hills, Ill., husband of the well-known medium, Isa Wilson Kayner, passed to spirit life, October 25, after a brief illness of six days. Burial service was conducted by the Odd Fellows, after a brief address by the writer, at the home, Saturday at 2 p. m. A delegation from the Englewood Spiritual Union attended the services in a body, furnishing appropriate music for the occasion. The loving sympathy of many friends will be extended to our faithful medium and co-worker, and to all members of the family in this, their hour of bereavement.

WILL C. HODGE.

Mr. John Williams, of Muncie, Ind., passed to spirit life, October 22, 1900, aged 83 years. He was a pioneer, having lived in his vicinity sixty years. He was honest, energetic, enterprising and successful, and a noble example of a high standard of citizenship. His companion preceded him one year ago. Six children and many grand-children, all filling useful stations in life, bear testimony to the precept and example exemplified in the lives of these noble souls. Funeral services were conducted by the writer.

G. N. HILLIGOSS.

Anderson, Ind.

Passed to spirit life, in Peoria, Ill., September 28, Mrs. Mrs. Rachel Jeffries, aged 76 years. To my knowledge she has been a true and good Spiritualist oved twenty years. She passed away with the full "assurance that spirit friends were with her to the end of life's journey.

C. BRAYSHAW.

Passed to spirit life, October 11, at Peoria, Ill., Mr. Jacob Rummel, aged 75 years. He was a philosophical thinker, a good Spiritualist, a kind father, and a friend to all. For two years he was president of the Peoria lyceum. Funeral services were conducted by R. B. Marsh, of the People's Church, and Rev. T. B. Fisher, of the Universalist. The body was taken to Centreville, Iowa, his old home, for interment.

C. BRAYSHAW.

Passed to spirit life, Martha McCalla, at her home in Anderson, Ind., aged 79 years, she was a pioneer in Spiritualism, having enjoyed its comforts and exemplified its beautiful teachings for over 40 years. It was my privilege, by special request of the deceased to conduct the services at the temple, and at the conclusion of the services many were heard to say, "Spiritualism is not only beautiful in life, but beautiful in death." May we all live to exemplify it as did this noble soul.

C. N. HILLIGOSS.

From her late residence in Medina, N. Y., Mrs. Robert Eleson, aged 73, passed to the higher life. Mrs. Eleson was an old-time Spiritualist, and had realized from time to time the consolations and strength Spiritualism gives in time of trial. Although a daughter is the only surviving member of the family of the old home, she will have to some extent, the companionship of a nephew, and undoubtedly through that relative she will receive from time to time, tangible evidence of the presence of her loved ones. He was present when the spirit of his grandmother left the body. During the transition, while sitting with the aunt by the bedside of the one who was leaving this plane of life, he felt impressed to take a pencil and paper, and after sitting for a few moments, he was influenced to write automatically, these words: "On her way to her loved ones." After the spirit had left the body he was influenced to write again, and gave a message, reassuring the friends that the loved one had met her dear ones at last. This circumstance caused comment among those who know but little of Spiritualism, but to such it carried the thought, "There is something so comforting and so beautiful in the doctrine of Spiritualism." And so there is, especially to the young man who received the writing, comfort and a strength imparted, because, though in one sense an orphan in this world he must know that if the dear ones can come to him, and give him the assurance of their presence when "the pale boatman" was near him, that he is not forsaken, and to the physically bereft, he and others who are under the shadows, are held tenderly in charge by those who are only just beyond the thin veil that obscures mortal vision. The funeral services were conducted at the home in the presence of many friends by the writer.

MATTIE E. HULL.

Henry J. Horn, a respected citizen and a Spiritualist of the old school, for many years a resident of Washington, D. C., and Saratoga Springs, N. Y., passed to spirit life from the latter place, October 23, at the advanced age of 83 years. Mr. Horn was a man of refinement and culture. His early life was devoted to art, studying many years in Europe. He was well-known to New York artists. His spiritual philosophy was of the highest order. He had the good fortune to be one of the witnesses at the famous seances held in New York in 1847, where Andrew Jackson Davis gave to the world that wonderful address known as "Nature's Divine Revelations." M. B. Little, of Glenn Falls, N. Y., delivered an address at his funeral on the 25th ult.

A POWERFUL HEALER

The Secret of Dr. J. M. Peebles' Great Power, which Dispels Disease as if by Magic, is the Combination of The Psychic and The Physical, which Successfully Combats All Disease.

"DESPAIR NOT, THERE IS HOPE FOR YOU."

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

What is this great Healing Science which cures so-called incurable diseases, and has revolutionized the art of curing to such an extent that physicians and scientists stand dumfounded at its mystical power? Dr. J. M. Peebles, the grand old man who is its originator and has given it to the world, calls it psychic force, and says there is nothing mystical or supernatural about it. That it seems to come from the mysterious deep and have a supernatural origin is because it HAS PERFORMED SUCH MARVELOUS CURES and has dispelled disease of every nature from man and woman when all other human power failed, but that in reality it is a logical method, founded upon scientific study, and now at the ripe old age of 79 I can look back over 50 years of patient work and experiment before I evolved it to its present perfection. The whole secret of the grand success which I have had is that at last I have found THE MIND OF THE SOUL, and demonstrated that by the correct use of my psychic force I can, through this mind, restore the tissues of the body and place that abnormal condition of the body which is brought on by disease into a normal condition and the correct functional working of the entire system; THEREBY DISPELLING DISEASE. The thousands of testimonials which, unsolicited, have been sent to Dr. Peebles are positive proof as to the merit of his wonderful discovery. Mrs. J. W. Henderson, of St. Johns, Washington, who suffered for years with pain in the ovaries and uterine weakness, was entirely cured by the Peebles treatment. Mrs. C. Harris, Marionville, Pa., says she can not express too much gratitude for the results received through Dr. Peeble's treatment. She suffered for years from falling of the womb. Frances Wavering, Seattle, Washington, suffered for twenty years with a severe case of Catarrh; was completely cured through the psychic treatment. L. A. Ford, Elsworth, Wis., was permanently cured of Dyspepsia, and Nervousness. Geo. H. Weeks, of 53 Minerva Street, Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration of health after suffering from Nervous Prostration and Insomnia; says he now enjoys restfulness and sleeps sound every night. Mrs. Mary A. Clair, Lexington, Ky., after thirty years continual suffering from Epilepsy, and trying to be cured by eminent physicians, writes: "Two months of your treatment has made earth almost a heaven to me." If you will send your name and address, also leading symptoms, Dr. Peebles, through his occult power, will diagnose your case ABSOLUTELY FREE. He will also send you his grand book and other literature which will give you the key to his grand science, and which should be in the hands of every man and woman who in any way suffer from disease or abnormal conditions. This he will do WITHOUT ANY COST WHATEVER TO YOU. Remember you are cured in the privacy of your own home without the knowledge of anyone. Dr. Peebles' Treatment KNOWS NO DISTANCE. The work goes on if seas divide healer and patient. Address Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

Dr. J. M. Peebles WILL TEACH YOU HIS PROFESSION, which is the grandest and best paying profession of the age, to any man or woman who wishes to learn it, the only education necessary to know how to read. Full instructions free to all addressing Dr. J. M. Peebles, Battle Creek, Mich.

CONTENTS.—The Wisdom of Life; Counsels and Maxims; Religion and other Essays; The Art of Literature; Studies in Pessimism.

"Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophical writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany.—Translator.

MAN

—IN THE—

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF

results of recent scientific research regarding the origin, position and prospects of mankind.

From the German of

DR. LUDWIG BÜCHNER,

Author of "Force and Matter," Essays on Nature and Science," "Physiological Pictures," "Six Lectures on Darwin," Etc.

"The great mystery of existence consists in perpetual and uninterrupted change. Everything is immortal and indestructible—the smallest worm as well as the most enormous of the celestial bodies,—the sand grain or the water drop as well as the highest being in creation, man and his thoughts. Only the forms in which being manifests itself are changing; but Being itself remains eternally the same and imperishable. When we die we do not lose ourselves, but only out personal consciousness. We live on in nature, in our race, in our children, in our deeds, in our thoughts—in short, in the entire material and physical contributions which, during our short personal existence, we have furnished to the subsistence of mankind and of nature in general."—Buechner.

World's Sixteen Saviors,

—OR—

CHRISTIANITY BEFORE CHRIST.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

New and startling revelations in religious history which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a key for unlocking many of its sacred mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods. This wonderful and exhaustive volume will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which the author has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape, the student of free thought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows to the mark. Printed on fine white paper, 380 pages. New edition, revised and corrected, with portrait of author.

Price $1.50. Postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.
